PREFACE

17.50 (2-22)
BEFORE the compilation of this work was commenced the impossibility of presenting the detailed history of Cook county in two volumes was apparent to the Editors and Publishers, and hence the design as announced in the Prospectus was only to summarize the most important events. An examination of this work will show that much of the matter here introduced not only pursues an entirely different path of thought and investigation but supplies a wealth of comprehensive and valuable material never before presented on the pages of Cook county history. A perusal of the chapters will prove the truth of this statement. We believe subscribers will appreciate the immense amount of interesting and original matter presented and the critical and comparative method of treatment.

Answer
The Editors and Publishers in their laborious researches have received from all with whom they have come in contact nothing but courtesy and assistance. Particularly are their grateful acknowledgments due the officers and attendants of the Chicago Historical Society, the Chicago City Library, the Municipal Library, the Library of Congress, the War Department and the various and numerous city and county departments. To Hon. William D. Barge, assistant corporation counsel, and Col. Francis A. Eastman, city statistician, are thanks due for valuable assistance and special favors. After all, the most important, valuable and reliable sources of information were found in the old newspaper files wisely preserved and guarded in the Chicago Historical Society Library and the Chicago City Library and kindly submitted to our writers and compilers without any restrictions.

The Publishers hereby cordially thank their subscribers, without whose material assistance these volumes could not have been prepared.

THE PUBLISHERS.

HISTORY OF COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS

FRENCH, SPANISH AND ENGLISH CLAIMS

DURING from the first settlements along the Atlantic coast and the Gulf of Mexico, there arose among the warring, envious and ambitious nations of Europe conflicting claims to the ownership of American soil. Regardless of water courses, river basins or rival claims, the English colonies along the Atlantic claimed an extension of their territorial grants westward on parallels of latitude to the South Sea, as the Pacific ocean was then called. On the contrary, both France and Spain, upon discovering a river and forming a settlement on its lower course, claimed the entire valley of that stream, regardless of rights or claims on the upper courses. Thus the French at the start claimed the whole St. Lawrence valley, which included the Great Lakes and the tract now known as Cook county, Illinois. By the discovery of Columbus in 1492, Spain could claim all of the two Americas. The discovery of North America by Cabot in 1498 gave England a claim to that country. In 1603 France granted to De Chartes a strip from forty to forty-six degrees north latitude and extending westward across the continent; this included Cook county. In 1606 an English grant extended across North America between thirty-four and forty five degrees north latitude. The London colony grant was between thirty-four and forty-five degrees north latitude. The Plymouth colony grant by James I., on November 3, 1620, embraced the country from the Atlantic to the South Sea (Pacific ocean) and from the fortieth to the forty-eighth degree of north latitude. On August 10, 1622, the Council of Plymouth granted to Mason and Georges much of what is now Vermont, New Hampshire and a part of Maine. What is now Connecticut was included in the Plymouth colony grant of 1620. The present state of Illinois was claimed as a part of Florida and was so laid down on the old Spanish maps. This claim was confirmed by Pope Alexander VI, who granted Ferdinand and Isabella in perpetuity all the land they had discovered, or should thereafter discover, west of an imaginary line drawn from north to south one hundred leagues west of the European shores. Thus the westward extension of the English colonial grants, as claimed, likewise embraced Cook county. The Atlantic colonists, with a persistence that demands admiration, continued to claim this westward extension until the formation of the Northwest territory. Thus at first the swollen and ephemeral claims of the English, the Spanish and the French to the tract of territory now known as Cook county, Illinois, may be said to have been about equal in points both of unsoundness and uncertainty.

But the French, with greater energy and envy, perfected their claims to the soil here, while the English and the Spanish did not, and therefore France, be it said to the credit of her martyrs, became the first white owner of what is now Illinois and therefore Cook county. But this splendid result was as much due to individual enterprise, the undaunted spirit of adventure and the self-sacrificing proselyting efforts of the Catholic fathers as to the colonizing ambition of the French government. At that date the servile and erratic French people were more the tools and puppets of royalty than the people of any other country except Spain. They yielded a blind and unquestioning obedience to the empty mandates of their butterfly sovereign, mainly because Church and State were united; and to question the acts of the King was tantamount to an assault, not only on the State, but on religion itself. Thus the idle and indifferent wish of the King, announced by his paramours through the Governor of New France, as Canada was then called, was sufficient to send into the Western wilderness, among savage beasts and little less savage men, such heroic souls as Nicolet, Perrot, Joliet, Marquette, Moreau, Durantaye, Duluth, La Salle, Tonty, Hennepin, Allouez and scores of others, who gladly at the King's behest offered themselves to martyrdom for the glory of France.

It seems that the word Chicagou, or Chicago as it is now written, had a meaning among the Indians and the French explorers and missionaries equivalent to the English words great, strong, mighty, superior, etc., signifying some unusual and notable quality in the object to which it was applied. The term may have included the idea of water, though it is known to have been applied to individuals, to tracts of country and to the wild onion growing throughout Northern Illinois. The pungent odor of the onion—strong and unusual—probably led to this application of the word. The mighty Mississippi, particularly its lower course, was designated Checagou, variously spelled, by the tribes on its banks. At the time the bloody expedition of De Soto reached the Mississippi river in 1539 he found the Chisca (Chickasaw of a later date) nation of Indians, who called the Mississippi the Chucagua and applied the same term to their entire province. In Franquelin's large map of 1684 the Kankakee river is called Chekagou and the Chicago river is called Cheagoumeman. In De Lisle's map of 1718 the present Des Plaines is designated Chicagou, and so is a section of Lake Michigan, but his map of 1703 applies that term to the present Chicago river only. D'Anville in his map of 1755 calls the Des Plaines the Chicagou and also a section of Lake Michigan by the same name. In Mitchell's map of 1755 the present Chicago river is named river and port of Chicagou. In Popple's map of 1733 the Chigagou is mentioned, but clearly referred to the St. Joseph, where Fort Miami was located and an Indian village called Chigagou stood. On La Houton's map of 1703 a deep bay south of Chicago is called Chegakou and the Chicago portage is called the same. In Charlevoix's map of 1774 the term Checagou seems to apply to a portion of Lake Michigan. In Senex's map of 1710 the Chicago river is not shown, but the term Checagou is plainly applied to a village of the Mascoutens or Kickapoos, or both, located on the present site of down-town Chicago. Moll's map of 1720 names only the Checagou portage. It is probable that Lake Michigan or its southern extremity may have been called Chicagou by the Indians. Hennepin in his erratic account of La Salle's expedition in 1782 said in a caption, "An account of the building of a new fort named by us Fort Crevecoeur, on the river of the Illinois named by the savages Che-cau-gou." In his map of 1684, Franquin (probably by mistake) calls the Ohio river the "River St. Louis or Chucagoa." Thus the St. Louis, whatever stream it may have been, was known as Chucagoa. Coxe in his map of Louisiana calls the Illinois the Chicagou. Samson's map of 1673 styles the Mississippi the Chicaqua. In Margry's map (1679) the Grand Calumet is called Cheka-goue. Father Membre, who accompanied La Salle in 1681-82, says they "went toward the Divine river (Illinois), called by the Indians Checaugou." La Salle says (1681-82) that they arrived at "the division line called Chicagua, from the river of the same name which lies in the country of the Mascoutens." This was the Des Plaines. The head chief of the Illinois was Checaqua, named thus because he was great, mighty, powerful, strong. The name is variously spelled Chikagu, Chekagou, Chicagu, Chicague, Checagou, Checaqua, Chicagou, Checaugou, Chucagoa, Chucagua, Chigogoe, etc. Even as late as the treaty of Greenville, held August 3, 1795, there was manifest confusion as to what had been located on the Chicago river and what not. By that treaty the Indians ceded to the United States "one piece of land six miles square at the mouth of the Chicago river, emptying into the southwest end of Lake Michigan where a fort formerly stood." The latter clause very likely refers to the fort that stood on St. Joseph river formerly called Chicagou. It is clear that, owing to the fact that several streams were really called Chicagou by the Indians and therefore by the whites, the distant mapmakers themselves became confused when they attempted to locate forts, villages or circumstances thereon. The old Indian name of the Calumet was spelled Killimick or Calamick; the Kankakee was spelled Teatika.

An important reference to Chicago was made by Governor Rocheblave of Illinois in 1783. At that time he was fighting to have his claims for losses during the Revolution made good by the British government at Quebec. He stated he wanted his claims allowed at once as he had to go from Quebec to "find Madame Rocheblave and the rest of the family at Chikagou." It is known that his family were still at Kaskaskia. Thus the reference was not to the present Chicago. It must have been either to the western country as a whole, or to the Mississippi or Illinois river settlements in particular.

In 1721 an English commission, having explored the Western country, reported, among other findings, that "from the Lake Huron they pass by the Strait Michillimackinack four leagues, being two in breadth and of great depth, to the Lake Illinoise (Michigan), thence 150 leagues on the lake to Fort Miamis, situated on the mouth of the river Chicagoe. From thence come those Indians of the same name, viz.: Miamis, who are settled on the aforementioned river (Maumee, formerly Miami) that runs into Lake Erie. Up the river Chicagoe, they sail but three leagues to a passage of one-fourth of a league, then enter a small lake of about a mile and have another very small portage, and again another of two miles to the river Illinois (Kankakee), thence down the stream 130 leagues to the Mississippi." This must have been the river referred to in 1699 by St. Cosme when he wrote that on a trip to the Illinois country he found the Miamis at Chicagou, where there was already a mission under Fathers Pinet and Bineteau. Neither at that time nor at any time were the Miamis located permanently on the present Chicago river, but they were on the St. Joseph, then called Chicagou, where there was a mission and a fort. Charlevoix writes: "All having promised to send deputies there, he proceeded to the Western quarters; but turned south and went to Chicagou at the lower end of Lake Michigan, where the Miamis then were." He spoke of it as a place and not as a river. This visit must have been made to the St. Joseph river, called Chicagou, where the Miamis were, and not to the present Chicago river. Shea, in a footnote to Charlevoix's account, says that Perrot went no farther than Green Bay, because the Miamis were not then at Chicago; but Shea apparently did not know that St. Joseph river was early called Chicagou, and that therefore the Charlevoix account was consistent, Perrot's visit being to the Miamis on St. Joseph river. Shea seemed to think that because the Miamis were not then at the present Chicago river, Perrot could not have made the visit as narrated by Charlevoix. But there are too many particulars mentioned to warrant any doubt that Perrot at this time really visited the Miamis on St. Joseph, and probably was the first white man to look upon the present Cook county. The Miami head chief then was too old to attend the proposed general assembly of the Western tribes, but he empowered the Pottawatomies to represent him and his tribe on that occasion. This assembly was held at Sault St. Mary in May, 1671. Perrot did not visit the Mascouten, Kickapoo or Illinois tribes at this time—why, it is not known.

Joliet and Marquette were probably the first white men actually to traverse the present Chicago river; this was in July, 1673, on the return trip from their first visit to the Mississippi. The fact is certain, but the route traversed is somewhat doubtful; it may have been the Calumet or Stony creek route. The description fits the Calumet river as well or better than the Chicago river, and one writer, at least, Albert D. Hagar, has argued with much force and plausibility that they must have passed over the former route. However, both routes were within the present limits of Cook county. In December, 1674, Marquette again passed over the same route, whether it was by the Calumet or the Chicago river. From the 4th to the 12th of December, he and his companions spent the time at the mouth of the river killing game and getting ready to cross the portage. Deer were abundant. There were eight or nine cabins of the Mascoutens near the mouth of the river. With him, among others, were two Frenchmen named Pierre and Jacques. After starting he stopped at a log cabin nearly five miles from the mouth of Chicago or Calumet river. This hut was owned by two traders—Pierre Moreau (La Taupine) and a trader-surgeon, both of whom were temporarily absent, though they returned as soon as they heard of the presence of Father Marquette. The possible location of the cabin has been recently, though perhaps erroneously, marked in the lumber district of Chicago. So far as known, this rude house was the first white human habitation in what is now Cook county. When it was built is unknown. Here Marquette remained the balance of the winter—sick but patient, brave and contented with his lot, though death stared him in the face. Mr. Hagar argues that the cabin stood on the Calumet route, but recently writers and public opinion have placed it on the South Branch of the Chicago river.

Father Claude Allouez, who succeeded Marquette in charge of the Illinois missions, and who came out in 1677, related that upon his arrival he was met at the mouth of the Chicagou river by a large number of Illinois Indians, who conducted him to their villages in the vicinity of the present Utica, Ill. This Chicagou river may have been the St. Joseph, because in a subsequent visit he spoke of Chicagou river and clearly meant the St. Joseph. He returned to Canada, but came out again in 1678 and again in 1680 and 1684, the latter time with Durantaye, who at this time built a fort at the mouth of the Chicagou river. The Chicagou river here referred to must have been the St. Joseph, of Michigan, because there is no evidence that Durantaye or any other person built a fort thus early at the present Chicago, but a fort was built on the St. Joseph about 1784, and Durantaye, the same year, was in command there. At this date Tonty commanded Fort St. Louis at Starved Rock, Ill.

In 1679 La Salle and a body of Frenchmen passed southward along the western coast of Lake Michigan; visited the Indians on Green Bay; continued past the present Cook county; admired the beauty of the landscape; landed at the mouth of St. Joseph river; there built Fort Miami, the first in the "Illinois country"; was there joined by the faithful Tonty and more Frenchmen; passed with all up the St. Joseph to about South Bend; then crossed the portage to the Kankakee river, down which they moved, entering the Illinois, and finally built Fort Crevecoeur near Peoria, and later Fort St. Louis at Starved Rock. La Salle again came out in 1680 and 1681. The brave and skillful Tonty remained in the "Illinois country." La Salle preferred the St. Joseph-Kankakee route—did not like the Chicago portage recommended by Joliet—called it a ditch. For several years he made Fort Miami a distributing point. A little later it was destroyed by deserters from Fort Crevecoeur, but was rebuilt about 1784 by Durantaye, as before stated.

La Salle says in his "Relations" concerning the Chicago portage: "This is an isthmus of land of 41 degrees 50 minutes north latitude at the west of the Islinois (Michigan) lake, which is reached by a channel (Chicago river) formed by the junction of several rivulets or meadow ditches. It is navigable for about two leagues (nearly five miles) to the edge of the prairie a quarter of a mile westward. There is a little lake (Mud) divided by a causeway made by the beavers, about a league and a half long, from which runs a stream which, after winding about a half league through the rushes, empties into the river Chicagou (Desplaines), and thence into that of the Islinois. This lake is filled by heavy summer rains or spring freshets, and discharges also into the channel which leads to the lake of the Islinois, the level of which is seven feet lower than the prairie, on which is the lake. The river of Checagou (Desplaines) does the same thing in the spring when its channel is full. It empties a part of its waters by this little lake into that of the Islinois, and at this season, Joliet says, forms in the summer time a little channel for a quarter of a league from this lake to the basin which leads to the Islinois by which vessels can enter the Chicagou (Desplaines) and descend to the sea."

Father Zenobius Membrè wrote of La Salle's expedition: "On the 21st of December, 1681, I embarked with Sieur de Tonty and a part of our people on Lake Dauphin (Michigan) to go to the Divine river, called by the Indians Checagou (Kankakee and Illinois), in order to make necessary arrangements for a voyage. The Sieur de la Salle joined us here (probably at Fort Miami, on the St. Joseph river) with the rest of his troop on January 4, 1682, and found that Tonty had had sleighs made to put all on and carry over the Chicagou (Kankakee), which was frozen, for though the winter in these parts is only two months long it is notwithstanding very severe. We had to make a portage (near South Bend) to enter the Illinois river (Kankakee), which we found also frozen. We made it on the 27th of the same month, and dragging our canoes, baggage and provisions about eighty leagues on the river Seigueley (Illinois), which runs into the river Colbert (Mississippi), we passed the great Illinois towns (near Utica) without finding any one there."

St. Cosme wrote in 1699 that on his journey to the Illinois country he passed up the Chicagou river and "put up for the night about two leagues off on a little river which is lost in the prairie." Very likely he put up at the cabin on the South branch of the present Chicago river, perhaps previously occupied by Father Marquette. The next day he "began on the portage, which is about three leagues long (seven and one-fourth miles), when the water is low, and only a quarter of a league in the spring, for the little lake in spring can be used, but not when it is dry, to reach the Desplaines."

The successes of the Iroquois were not sufficient to extinguish the claims of France to the Illinois country. The Illinois colony, particularly that portion on the Mississippi, continued to receive many desirable settlers from both Canada and Louisiana. The vast grant to La Salle in 1684 presumably included what is now Cook county, the language being that his dominion should extend "from Fort St. Louis, on the Illinois river, into New Biscay (Durango)." This must have meant all included within the colony of Fort St. Louis, and if so, may be said to have embraced Cook county, really an outlayer of that settlement.

Prior to 1712 military law ruled Louisiana, and therefore the Illinois colony, the latter being independent, but attached to the former, which was a dependency of New France, or Canada. Tonty was the first military commandant of the Illinois colony, and as such was both chief constabulary and chief executive. His word was law, but he was accountable to France for his conduct. It is not improbable that French cabins and trading posts more or less continuously occupied the traversed portions of Cook county, particularly at the spot on the South Branch, where stood the La Taupine cabin, occupied by Marquette, or at the Calumet portage. Owing mainly to the relentless incursions of the Iroquois, Fort St. Louis was abandoned in 1702, as it had previously been abandoned in 1680 by Tonty. Swine were probably introduced into the Illinois colony before 1700; domestic cattle were brought here in 1711. By 1700 scores of Frenchmen and missionaries began to pass between Canada and Louisiana, often by the Chicago route, when it could be done in safety. Hardy French traders and devoted missionaries were at this date living with all the western tribes. The Illinois country began to send down the Mississippi boat loads of flour, meal, pork, beef, hides, furs, etc. Already it was famous in Canada and France for the beautiful scenery, temperate climate, rich soil and velvet plains teeming with wild game.

After the grant of Louisiana colony to Anthony Crozat, in 1712, the Illinois country became a part of Louisiana and the latter remained, as before, a dependency of Canada. The grant was for fifteen years; it lasted but two. Crozat was succeeded as Governor of Louisiana by Cadillac in 1714, and he by L'Espinay in 1717. From 1712 to 1725 the Illinois country enjoyed a period of pleasing growth and prosperity. Numerous boats with thousands of colonists, traders, voyagers, missionaries and adventurers passed back and forth over the waters between Canada and Louisiana, the Chicago route getting, no doubt, its share of the travel. The building of Fort Chartres in 1720, on the east side of the Mississippi below St. Louis by D'Boisbriant rendered the colony safe for women and firmly and permanently established French settlements in the Illinois country. There sprang up immediately in that vicinity the happy and prosperous settlements of Prairie de Rocher, St. Philippi and Cahokia. The Sulpetians built at Cahokia a water-mill—saw and flour. The Western Company, which succeeded Crozat in control of Louisiana and therefore of the Illinois colony, conducted a large warehouse at Fort Chartres. The fort gave absolute security to the inhabitants and blocked any attempt of the English to gain a foothold on the Upper Mississippi. The Western Company took the grant of Louisiana (including the Illinois colony and Cook county) for twenty-five years—1718 to 1742.

At the commencement of the Seven Years' War the French held actual possession of the Mississippi, though the English claimed ownership to its banks at the south and also at the north, in the valley of the Ohio. The French had settlements and forts at St. Joseph, Mich., and along the Wabash, the Illinois and the Mississippi, with the impregnable Fort Chartres, just built, to guard the upper courses of the latter. They had also captured Fort Duquesne at Pittsburg, and thus practically held possession of all the territory west of the Appalachians. The English prepared to assault at four quarters along the northern and western borders. In the Illinois country were 300 French soldiers. Captain Villiers, in 1754, was sent from Fort Chartres with a detachment to assist the force at Fort Duquesne, upon which, it was seen, the first blow would fall. War on a large scale and in earnest, with all the accompaniments of savage barbarity, was now to settle the long and vexatious controversy as to the ownership of American soil, including what is now Illinois.

In 1757 Governor De Kerlerec, of Louisiana, formulated his design of uniting the tribes of the Mississippi, combining them with available French forces, and marching on the Atlantic colonies, in order to divert them from the projected attack on Canada. It was wisely concluded that while the British forces were engaged elsewhere, the French could cut the colonies in two down the Potomac valley, and thus, with an attack in their rear, force the English from concentrating against Canada; but the French court was too impotent to take advantage of this plan, and accordingly General Wolfe came from the Plains of Abraham with a splendid victory. However, the English, under Braddock, were terribly defeated near Pittsburg, mainly by the French and Indians under Capt. Charles D'Aubrey, of Fort Chartres. Had such success been quickly followed, as it should have been, by all the French and Indian power of the West, and further been followed by a prompt advance down the Potomac valley, history might have assumed an altogether different finality. The Illinois country might have remained to France, and hence could not have been won by the Colonies in the Revolution. In that case what is now Cook county, Illinois, might have remained a dependency of France. The latter might not have joined the Colonies in their struggle for independence. Indeed, the Colonies might not have won their independence, or, if they had, might not have obtained the western country, including Cook county.

Capt. Thomas Sterling, on behalf of the British, took possession of Fort Chartres and the Illinois country on October 10, 1765, and remained in command until Maj. Robert Farmer took charge in December, 1765. The latter was succeeded by Col. Edward Cole in 1766, and he by Colonel Reed in 1768. From September 5, 1768, until March 30, 1772, Lieut. Col. John Wilkins, of the Eighteenth or Royal Regiment (British), was military commandant of the fort and the Illinois country, but at the latter date he was succeeded by acting Maj. Robert Hamilton from Fort Pitt. On June 11, 1772, Hamilton was relieved by Capt. Hugh Lord. The latter had two companies of infantry and three artillerymen and remained in command until May 1, 1776, when he and the most of his troops were recalled to Canada, leaving the Illinois country exposed to the attacks of savages. Called away thus hurriedly Captain Lord turned over the fort, the country and his own family to Phillippe Francois de Rastel, Chevalier de Richeblave, who in the end proved to be the last of the British commandants to govern or control the Illinois country. Rocheblave, without troops money or official authority, acquitted himself with signal distinction until the country was captured by Col. George Rogers Clark, in July, 1778. Doubtless Rocheblave was left in command because he was acceptable to the French residents. He certainly had the confidence of Captain Lord, who left his family with him; nor was that confidence misplaced. In all the arduous trials of the Revolutionary period Rocheblave, though beset with dangers and enormous expenses, proved faithful to his pledge to Captain Lord and to his office under the British.

From 1765 to 1768 the Illinois country, though included within the jurisdiction of Canada, seems to have had no regular form of government except that of the commandant's court; but on Nov. 12,

1768, General Gage ordered a change. Commissions equivalent to those of justices of the peace were granted to seven of the residents, French and English, of the Illinois country. They were constituted a court with jurisdiction in all cases of debt, but no jury was provided for. It was called the "Court of Enquiry," and seems to have been dominated by "The Company," a mercantile institution of Kaskaskia. "The Company" was composed of Boynton, Wharton and Morgan, the latter of whom was president of the "Court of Enquiry." The proceedings of the court were unsatisfactory to the French inhabitants and a small rebellion resulted. The inhabitants wanted the "Court of Enquiry" to be conducted by the military commandant and not by "The Company."

Rocheblave, a Frenchman himself, though satisfactory to the French residents, proved unsatisfactory to the English inhabitants. Though as a whole faithful to the cause of Great Britain, he was partial to the French residents as against the English. Several English traders on the Illinois river, probably at Peoria, petitioned against him to Sir Guy Carleton, commander in chief of Canada. It was declared that he trampled on their liberties, despised the English and their laws, acted as both counsel and judge, traded liquor to the Indians against his own orders, required a servile submission; yet, although these charges were probably true, it cannot be denied that he showed great skill in keeping the savages in subjection without troops, meeting the emergencies in his trying position without money or resources; keeping the Spanish, whose language and intentions he knew, from taking possession of the country, and outwitting the rebellious colonists until he was captured by Colonel Clark. Generally, his course was satisfactory to the English authorities, and his acts were approved. He made his headquarters at Fort Gage, Kaskaskia. Had Captain Lord and the two companies of troops not been sent away at the commencement of the Revolution, Colonel Clark could not have captured the Illinois country. The latter might have had a different fate.

After the Seven Years' war the territory east of the Mississippi was never again called Louisiana. Before that war ended France, perceiving that she might lose all her American possessions unless Spain joined her, entered into a secret agreement with her, called the "Family Compact," whereby the latter, should she lose the Floridas or Cuba to England as a result of the alliance, would be recompensed by the transfer to her of Louisiana. But, as a result of the war, France having lost to England that part of Louisiana east of the Mississippi, and Spain having lost Cuba and Florida, therefore that part of Louisiana west of the Mississippi was ceded by France to Spain. Thus what is now Cook county, Illinois, passed from France to England as the result of this war.

Upon the conclusion of peace at the end of the Seven Years' war the English as soon as practicable took possession of all the French posts east of the Mississippi. Many Frenchmen, unwilling to become English subjects, crossed the Mississippi to Spanish territory. Taking possession proved a difficult step, owing to the open hostility of the Indians and the repugnance and opposition of the French inhabitants. In order to establish British authority, it was found necessary to displace all French civil officers with English ones, and this was done. But the Jesuits had so much influence over the Indians and the French inhabitants that the hostility to everything English continued. Therefore, as a last act, to establish British rule and authority, all the Jesuits were expelled from what may be called British Louisiana—that east of the Mississippi, which included the present Cook county, Illinois. Under the British the country east of the Mississippi and north of the 31st degree of north latitude continued to be called Illinois.

Soon after the accession of the Western country by Great Britain she proceeded to divide Florida into two sections—East and West—and provided each with a suitable government. The northern boundary of West Florida was, in 1764, extended up to the mouth of the Yazoo river. The Illinois country seems to have been left without a provincial government—seems to have been under the control of Maj. Arthur Loftus, Governor of West Florida, or his subordinate at Fort Chartres. The following extract taken from the Annual Register (English), Vol. VI., explains the status of the English possessions north of the Yazoo and east of the Mississippi, and of course included the Illinois country and what is now Cook county:

“The readers will observe, and possibly with some surprise, that in this distribution much of the largest and perhaps the most valuable part of our conquests does not fall into any of these governments; that the environs of the Great Lakes, the fine countries on the whole course of the Ohio and Ouabache (Wabash) and almost all that tract of Louisiana which lies in the hither branch of the Mississippi, are none of them comprehended in the distribution. The government of West Florida extends in no part much above half a degree from the sea. Many reasons may be assigned for this apparent omission. A consideration of the Indians was, we presume, the principal, because it might have given a sensible alarm to that people if they had seen us formally cantoning out their whole country in regular establishments.” The writer complained that all the territory recently acquired north of the Floridas had not been included in either East or West Florida, nor in any of the colonies to the east.

In the Revolution the Colonies sought to gain their independence and as much territory as possible. England owned all east of the Mississippi and Spain all west of that stream. Both had the right to navigate its whole course. France had been mourning in sackcloth and ashes ever since the Seven Years' war, for the loss of her American possessions, and hated England with intense and undying bitterness. She was ready for any step to humiliate her enemy, wound her in a vulnerable part, or win back what had been lost in the Seven Years' war. Even before the revolt of the English colonies, France had intimated that she would assist them to gain their independence; and after the struggle had begun she openly helped them with money, munitions and encouragement. She formally joined the Colonies by treaty of alliance dated Feb. 6, 1778. She repeatedly urged Spain to join against Great Britain, and that country would have done so had not conflicting interests in America arisen. Spain soon had a different object in view. She owned the right bank of the Mississippi from its source to the Gulf. Above all things, she wanted to secure the Floridas, in which case she would own both banks of the Lower Mississippi, and therefore believed she could control the navigation of that stream. She also wanted the territory east of the Upper Mississippi—the same that France had owned before the Seven Years' war—which included the Illinois country and what is now Cook county. Owning both banks of the Mississippi throughout its course, and owning both of the Floridas and the remainder of the Gulf coast, she would have not only undoubted and absolute control of the navigation of that river, but could declare the whole Gulf a mare clausum or closed sea—could shut all other countries out of both river and Gulf. As the war progressed, it became evident that the Colonies would probably secure not only their independence, but all the country east of the Mississippi as well. When this eventuality became evident Spain perceived that her American colonial designs were certain to conflict with those of the Colonies after the war. She therefore refrained from joining the Colonies against Great Britain. In fact, on May 8, 1779, she declared war against Great Britain, but did not form an alliance with the Colonies. She was forced to take this step, in order to forestall the Colonies in capturing the Floridas and the Western country and to take advantage of England while she was busy with her rebellious colonies, and while the Colonies themselves were unable to interfere.

It thus came to pass that Spain actually conquered the Floridas from Great Britain and later claimed to have conquered all the upper country east of the Mississippi, including the Illinois country and what is now Cook county. But the latter claim was not allowed by the United States after the Revolution, partly because George Rogers Clark during the war captured the Illinois and Wabash valleys in the interest of the Colonies. What Spain really did in the upper country, while the Colonies were struggling in the Revolution, was to take possession of Natchez, establish posts at Walnut Hills (Vicksburg), and Chickasaw Bluffs (Memphis), strengthen the posts and the settlements in the Wabash and the Illinois country, take possession of the left bank of the Mississippi opposite Arkansas post and capture St. Joseph, Michigan, and the Illinois country by an expedition from St. Louis. In all of these movements, the real object of Spain was to gain the Floridas, and both banks of the Mississippi. While the struggling colonies were in their sorest straits near the close of the long and crushing war, Spain coolly and unhesitatingly told the Colonies that the only obstacle in the way of her joining them against England was their absolute surrender of the right to navigate the Mississippi. France pointedly and persistently urged the Colonies to grant this demand. In this dire extremity, when the Colonies were hardest pressed, when it seemed that another supreme effort would win independence, and when it was believed that Spain could supplement that supreme effort, the Continental authorities came within an inch of surrendering their prized and invaluable right to navigate the Mississippi. They knew that if they won their independence, their domain would extend to the Mississippi above the 31st degree north latitude, and that by virtue of the English right to navigate the lower course of that stream, secured by the treaty of Fontainebleau, they would be entitled to navigate the lower course. In the absence of railroads the Mississippi was the only outlet to the ocean the Western people possessed; they, therefore, vehemently declared that the surrender of their rights to navigate the Mississippi would be followed by their withdrawal from the Union. The opposition of the Western people and the selfish attitude of Spain—grasping, unfriendly, narrow-minded and treacherous—at last roused the Continental Congress to the importance of immediate and specific action, and thereupon they passed a resolution never to surrender the rights of the United States to navigate the whole course of the Mississippi.

Upon the conclusion of peace in 1783, England ceded to Spain the Floridas, but ceded to the United States all the upper country—all north of West Florida and east of the Mississippi. It required a half dozen years before Spain relinquished her claim to the upper country east of the river (including the Illinois country and Cook county); and it required an even score of years before the absolute right of the United States to navigate the whole course of the Mississippi was finally settled. It will thus be seen that the treaty of 1783 permanently transferred the Illinois country and Cook county to the United States.

After the revolution, much truer than before, the right to navigate the Mississippi was, in the absence of railways, all important to the Western people. The Illinois country grew rapidly and immensely. The project of shutting out the Americans from the lower Mississippi, or of surrendering for twenty-five years, as was proposed, the right to navigate that course was declared sufficient, if carried into effect, to cause the Western people to set up an independent government. Their rights were not interfered with except temporarily.

The treaty of October 27, 1795, between Spain and the United States established the southern boundary of the latter on the 31st parallel of the north latitude, located the western boundary in the middle of the Mississippi, extended to the United States the right to navigate the whole course of that stream, and gave the latter the right to deposit merchandise at New Orleans for three years, or an equivalent establishment elsewhere, if not at New Orleans after that date. This treaty rendered the settlement and prosperity of the Western country both certain and rapid. The interdiction of the merchandise deposits at New Orleans in October, 1802, and the failure of Spain to assign an "equivalent establishment elsewhere" again roused the Western people; but the transfer of Louisiana by Napoleon, in 1803, to the United States forever made the Mississippi exclusively the property of the latter and thus removed all clouds from the commercial sky of the Illinois country and Cook county.

It will be seen that the tract of country now called Cook county, Illinois, was first the property of the Indians—presumably the Mascoutens, then the Illinois, and then the Pottawatomies. At the date of exploration France claimed it as a part of New France (Canada), and the English Atlantic colonies claimed it as a westward extension of their grants. But France perfected her claim and thus became the first white owner of Cook county. In 1684 it was included in the grant to La Salle, but was soon freed by his early death. In 1701 the English, by their treaty with the Iroquois, secured a claim to the country westward to the Mississippi, but this claim probably extended no further northward than the Calumet, and, therefore, did not embrace all of Cook county, though it did embrace much of the Illinois country. In 1712 this county was included in the grant to Crozat; in 1714 it passed in the grant to the Western Company, which in 1718 united with the Eastern Company; and in 1723 it was embraced in the grant to the Royal India Company—all French, of course. From 1732 to 1763 it remained under the immediate government of France. In 1763 it passed to England as a result of the Seven Years' war, and in 1783 was ceded to the United States. It was claimed by Spain at the close of the Revolution, but this claim was never seriously considered, and after a score of years was abandoned. The cession of Louisiana to the United States in 1803 settled the rights of the latter to the Mississippi.

THE INDIANS

IT DOES not appear that the Miami, except perhaps for short periods, ever occupied the present site of downtown Chicago. Their permanent home was on St. Joseph river, Michigan, and their domain probably extended as far as the Little Calumet, and therefore may have embraced the southern part of Cook county. It is known, however, that the Mascoutens, who were closely related to the Miami, were early at the mouth of the present Chicago river; in fact their domain joined that of the Miami on the west. It is probable that the occasional attacks of the Five Nations from the East may have driven the Miami to the present Chicago river to live temporarily. It is known that before 1671 the Miami and Mascoutens occupied villages in common in Wisconsin, and that a portion of the Miami tribe continued to live there as late as 1697. In 1699 St. Cosme and his associates found the Miami at Chicago (St. Joseph, Michigan), where there was a mission in charge of Fathers Pinet and Bineteau. Although the name Chicago is here used, reference to St. Joseph is undoubted, owing to the fact that Fathers Pinet and Bineteau at that date had a mission at the latter place and not at the former. In 1721 Charlevoix wrote as follows: "Fifty years ago the Miami were settled on the southern extremity of Lake Michigan, in a place called Chicago, from the name of a small river which runs into the lake, the source of which is not far distant from that of the river of the Illinois." This reference also is to St. Joseph. The Kankakee was then called the river of the Illinois, near the head of which the St. Joseph river had its source. The Des Plaines at no time was called the Illinois. The Miami, it is known, were then located on the St. Joseph, then called Chicago. A little later the Weas, also related to the Miami, occupied at least a part of the present Cook county. At the treaty of Greenville, August 3, 1795, Little Turtle, chief of the Miami, claimed that the domain of his tribe extended westward as far as the present Chicago, but the Indians usually claimed more than was due them. His tribe really claimed to the Calumet. The Illinois, also related to the Miami, at times no doubt occupied the present soil of Cook county; so of the Kickapoos. Still later the combined Pottawatomies, Ottawas and Chippewas drove the Illinois and their allies from this vicinity and kept possession until they were dispossessed by the whites. All of the tribes mentioned above were of Algonquin or Chippewa stock, and were thus closely related.

The Treaty of Greenville, concluded at Greenville, Ohio, August 3, 1795, between the United States, on one side, and the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawnees, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pottawatomies, Miamis, Eel Rivers, Weas, Kickapoos, Piankeshaws and Kaskaskias, on the other, provided that there should pass to the United States "one piece of land six miles square at the mouth of the Chicago river, emptying into the southwest end of Lake Michigan, where a fort formerly stood." By this treaty the whites were allowed a free passage "from the mouth of Chicago river to the commencement of the portage between that river and the Illinois and down the Illinois to the Mississippi." The above tribes, or portions of them, as above stated, had claimed, from time immemorial, the soil at what is now Cook county, and Chicago. Several of them that had no just claim to this tract (Wyandots and Delawares) were joined in the treaty in order to forestall any subsequent claim against the Government.

On November 3, 1804, the Sacs and Foxes ceded to the United States all the country south of the Wisconsin, and a direct line drawn from a point thirty-six miles up the river to Sakaegan Lake (which is supposed to be about thirty miles from the shore of Lake Michigan), thence to a branch of the Illinois river. But this was really Winnebago territory. The Ottawas, Chippewas and Pottawatomies protested against this sale of their lands by the Sacs and Foxes.

To the War of 1812, with its accompanying influence for the worse upon the Indians, was due the attack of the Indians at the Lee residence and at Fort Dearborn. Charles Lee owned a farm on the South Branch about four miles from its mouth; his house stood on the northwest side of the river and was first called "Lee's Place," and later "Hardscrabble." Lee himself and his family lived near the fort, and his "place" was occupied by Liberty White, a Frenchman named Debou, a discharged soldier and a boy. On April 6, 1812, a war party of eleven Winnebagoes appeared and killed two of the men, the other man and the boy having become suspicious and escaped to the fort. On their way they notified the family of Burns, living on the river at what is now North State street, of their danger, and a squad of soldiers was sent to escort them to the fort. All of the families gathered in the fort and the Indians left the neighborhood. This ended the affair, but the next two months the Indians hovered around and the whites had to be on their guard.

War between England and the United States was declared June 18, 1812, and on July 16 Fort Mackinac was captured by the enemy. On August 9, a message with news of the war was received here from Gen. William Hull, at Detroit, commander of the Western Department, accompanied with an order to Capt. Nathan Heald, commander of Fort Dearborn, to evacuate the fort and return with his command to Detroit. Under the circumstances, this was an insane order and could have been issued only by such a timorous officer as General Hull. The force here consisted of fifty-four privates, twelve militiamen and three or four officers, and in the fort were about a dozen women and twenty children. Captain Heald presumed upon the friendship of the Pottawatomies and waited six days, until about four hundred of that tribe had assembled. He expected they would act as escort to his charge all the way to Detroit. On the 13th Capt. William Wells arrived from Fort Wayne with thirty friendly Miamis to assist Captain Heald on his march. All of the ammunition and guns not needed and all of the whisky were destroyed and thrown into the river or the lake. The destruction of the liquor greatly inflamed the Indians, and was one of the causes that induced the Pottawatomies to turn against the whites. The Indians held a council and resolved on the destruction of the garrison. Notwithstanding this fact was made known to Captain Heald, and notwithstanding the opposition of John Kinzie and the friendly Indians, of whom there were several, the commander determined to obey the order of General Hull and evacuate the fort. The massacre which resulted was due to this determination and not to any necessity to evacuate. Disobedience of the order would have been fully justified with almost certain massacre staring the garrison in the face in case of evacuation. The fort could have been held for months, or until relief from Detroit or elsewhere could have arrived. Captain Heald undoubtedly thought the Pottawatomies could be trusted and relied upon that hope. He did not seem to take into consideration that the Indians might be acting at the instigation of the British, and, as it transpired later, this was actually the fact, but the determination to evacuate was carried out. At 9 o'clock on the morning of the 15th all marched forth. At the head were fifteen of the Miamis and the other fifteen brought up the rear; between were the women and children in wagons and on horseback; and around them were the regulars and the militiamen. The march led south along the lake shore. On the west, beginning a little south of the fort, was a sand ridge extending parallel with the shore far to the south. When the march began the Pottawatomies accompanied the party as a supposed escort, but when the sand ridge was reached they passed to the west side of it. Concealed by the ridge, they hurried forward, and about a mile and a half from the fort made preparations to attack the whites when they should arrive near the shore opposite. Captain Wells, riding in advance, was the first to see signs of attack and came hurriedly back. When opposite the Indians, the latter began firing from their place of concealment on the ridge and were charged upon by the troop, and the fighting became brisk. The Indians managed to flank the whites and thus reached the wagons, and there the slaughter mostly occurred. The Miamis fled at the first attack and took no part in the massacre. Twenty-five non-commissioned officers and privates and eleven women and children alone escaped the slaughter; all the rest were butchered. The survivors were surrendered by Captain Heald upon condition that their lives would be spared. Nearly all the wounded were put to death. The Indians engaged numbered about four hundred. Their loss was probably fifteen. Captain Wells, Ensign Ronau and Surgeon Van Voohis were among the killed. The former was horribly mutilated, his head cut off and his heart taken out and eaten by the savages. That this attack was at the instigation of the British is shown by the fact that Captain Heald, the commander, after he had recovered from his wounds at St. Joseph, was delivered to the British at Mackinac and by them paroled. Friendly Indians saved several whites from death. The following day the fort and the agency building were destroyed by fire, and for four years thereafter lay in ruins. So far as known, the bodies of the dead were permitted to rot where they fell.

On August 24, 1816, the Ottawas, Chippewas and Pottawatomies residing on the Illinois and "Milwaukee" rivers and their branches, and on the southwestern parts of Lake Michigan, ceded to the United States "all their right, title and claim to all the land contained in the before-mentioned cession of the Sacs and Foxes, which lies south of a due west line from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi." They also ceded the following tract: "Beginning on the left bank of the Fox river of Illinois, ten miles above the mouth of said Fox river; thence running so as to cross Sandy creek, ten miles above its mouth; thence in a direct line to a point ten miles north of the west end of the portage between Chicago creek, which empties into Lake Michigan, and the river Desplaines, a fork of the Illinois; thence in a direct line to a point in Lake Michigan ten miles northward of the mouth of Chicago creek; thence along the lake to a point ten miles southward of the mouth of said Chicago creek; thence in a direct line to a point on the Kankakee, ten miles above its mouth; thence with the said Kankakee and the Illinois river to the mouth of Fox river; and thence to the beginning." By this treaty the United States relinquished to the above tribes all other land contained in the aforesaid cession by the Sacs and Foxes lying north of a due west line from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi, except reservations in Wisconsin. This treaty of the Sacs and Foxes referred to did not touch any part of what is now Cook county; its eastern boundary was in part the Fox river. Two of the Indian names signed to this treaty of 1816 were Black Bird and Black Partridge.

"In 1816 a tract of land bordering on Lake Michigan, including Chicago and extending to the Illinois river, was obtained from the Indians for the purpose of opening a canal communication between the lake and the river. Having been one of the commissioners that treated for this land, I personally know that the Indians were induced to believe that the opening of a canal would be very advantageous to them, and that under authorized expectations that this would be done they ceded the land for a trifle."—(Governor Edwards' Message.)

On August 19, 1825, at "Prairie des Chien," it was conceded by the United States that "the Illinois Indians have also a just claim to a portion of the country bounded south by the Indian boundary line aforesaid (running from the south end of Lake Michigan directly westward to the Mississippi), east by Lake Michigan, north by the Menominee country (about the Milwaukee river), and northwest by Rock river."

In 1825, and before, Alexander Wolcott was Indian agent at Chicago. He had granted in 1823 and 1824 licenses to trade with the Indians to the following persons: Jeremie Clermont, David Laughton, Jacob Harsen, Isidore Chabert, Stephen Mack, Jr., Nathaniel Leonard, Jr., Cole Weeks, John Baptiste Beaubien and Archibald Clybourn. Clermont was at Milwaukee, Laughton on Vermilion river, Harson on the Kankakee, Chabert on the Iroquois, Mack on Rocky (Rock) river, Leonard at Milwaukee, Weeks at Grand Bois and Beaubien and Clybourn at Chicago. Each of the latter had only $500 of capital thus employed.

In 1828 occurred the Winnebago Indian alarm; they killed a few emigrants, when a volunteer force overawed them. The Indian trade was the only good trade here at this time. Alexander Wolcott was Indian agent in 1827 at Chicago; Stephen Mack on Rock river, Archibald Clybourn, by a substitute, on Rock river; Elisha Taylor at Milwaukee, George Hunt on Rock river, and Clermont Lauzon at Milwaukee. In 1829 the superintendency of Indian affairs of Michigan territory embraced Chicago, and the latter included all the country along Lake Michigan from Milwaukee to Grand river in Michigan. Alexander Doyle was sub-agent of Indians at Chicago in 1829. At this date there was an aggregation of 105 soldiers at Fort Dearborn under Major Fowle; they were two companies of the Fifth infantry.

By the treaty of July 29, 1829, held at "Prairie de Chien" with the Chippewa, Ottawa and Pottawatomie Indians, the United States secured the following tract: "Beginning on the western shore of Lake Michigan at the northeast corner of the field of Antoine Ouillette, who lives near Gross Point, about twelve miles north of Chicago; thence running due west to Rock river; thence down said river to where a line drawn due west from the most southern bend of Lake Michigan crosses said river; thence east along said line to the Fox river of the Illinois; thence along the northwestern boundary line of 1816 to Lake Michigan; thence northwardly along the western shore of said lake to the place of beginning."

From this cession there was reserved to Billy Caldwell "two and a half sections on the Chicago river above and adjoining the line of the purchase of 1816; to Victoire Pothier one and a half sections on the Chicago river above and adjoining the tract of land herein granted to Billy Caldwell; to Jane Miranda, one quarter section on the Chicago river above and adjoining the tract herein granted to Victoire Pothier; to Archange Ouilmette, a Pottawatomie woman, wife of Antoine Ouilmette, two sections for herself and her children on Lake Michigan south of and adjoining the northern boundary of the cession herein made by the Indians aforesaid to the United States."

It was agreed that these tracts of land should never be leased or conveyed by the grantees or their heirs to any persons whatever without permission of the President of the United States, and that the United States, at its own expense, should cause to be surveyed the northern boundary line of this cession from Lake Michigan to Rock river as soon as practicable. The commissioners to conclude this treaty were John McNeil, Pierre Menard and Caleb Atwater. John H. Kinzie (Indian sub-agent), Lieut. Col. Zachary Taylor, Alexander Wolcott (Indian agent), and Thomas Forsyth (Indian agent), were present. At this treaty there were paid by the United States for Indian depredations the following claims: To Antoine Ouilmette $800 for damage by the Indians at the time of the Chicago massacre and during the War of 1812; to the heirs of John Kinzie, for damages at the Chicago massacre, and at St. Joseph (Michigan), during the War of 1812, $3,500; to Margaret Helon, for losses at the Chicago massacre, $800, and to James Kinzie, for money due him, $485.

By the treaty of October 20, 1832, at Camp Tippecanoe, the Pottawatomie Indians ceded the following tract to the United States: "Beginning at a point on Lake Michigan ten miles southward of the mouth of Chicago river; thence in a direct line to a point on the Kankakee river ten miles above its mouth; thence with said river and the Illinois river to the mouth of Fox river, being the boundary of a cession made by them in 1816; thence with the southern boundary of the Indian territory to the state line between Illinois and Indiana; thence north with said line to Lake Michigan; thence with the shore of Lake Michigan to the place of beginning." There were many reserves at Little Rock village, Twelve Mile Grove, Thorn Creek, Soldier's Village, Hickory Creek, Skunk Grove, villages of Minemaung, Mesheketeno, Waisuskucks, Shabonier. It was provided that thereafter annually there should be paid to Billy Caldwell $600. The following claims, among many, were paid by the Government: Gurdon S. Hubbard, $5,573; Antoine Le Clerc, $55; Alexander Robinson, $91; Peter Menard, Jr., $37. At this treaty the following tracts in Cook county were reserved: Section 7, Township 37 north, Range 15 east (near the mouth of Calumet river); Section 8, Township 37 north, Range 15 east (also near the mouth of Calumet river); Section 33, Township 35 north, Range 14 east (near Steger); Southwest quarter of Section 5, Township 37 north, Range 15 east (near the mouth of Calumet river); Sections 31 and 32, Township 36 north, Range 14 east (near Homewood).

The Black Hawk war of 1832 only indirectly affected Fort Dearborn and Chicago. By May 10, of that year, about seven hundred persons, among whom were 213 women and children, were congregated in Fort Dearborn for protection. The men here with guards out remained on their farms to care for the stock, etc. Colonel Owen, commander of the fort; Gholson Kercheval and Colonel Hamilton, extra quartermasters, did all they could for the comfort of the settlers. From fifteen to twenty persons were crowded often in a single room. The Sauks and Foxes sent delegates here to induce the Pottawatomies to join them in their war on the whites. They brought strong pressure to bear on Billy Caldwell, chief of the Pottawatomies, located here, and upon Alexander Robinson, another chief. Finally Colonel Owen, Colonel Hamilton and Chiefs Caldwell and Robinson held a council with them on the North side, on which occasion Blackfoot and others savagely attacked the Government for the wrongs done the Indians and declared that now was the time to get even, and the young braves present favored their views. But Colonel Owen, in a dispassionate speech, showed how such a course would react upon the Indians and completely changed the tide. The Indians retired, consulted and finally returned and gave their hands to Colonel Owen, asserting that they were friends of the United States and would furnish 100 braves to go against the Sauks and Foxes. Upon hearing this conclusion of the Pottawatomies and their allies, the Chippewas and Ottawas present in the vicinity of Chicago, the delegates of Black Hawk's band departed. If the latter had succeeded in inducing the former to join them against the whites, there might have been another massacre at Fort Dearborn. The leading men here visited threatened points within twenty or thirty miles of Chicago and assisted in protecting the people. Companies of militia escorted to Chicago the whites gathered at James Walker's, near Plainfield, and at Holderman's Grove. The troops here joined the general movement westward against the Indians. On July 8, Gen. Winfield Scott arrived here with a large force and brought with him what was as bad as the Indians—the cholera. The soldiers who died of this disease were buried on Lake street and no record was kept of the interments. About twenty years later, when excavations in Lake street were made, their bodies were discovered and removed to the City cemetery.

By the treaty of October 27, 1832, the Kaskaskia, Peoria, Michigan, Cahokia and Tamarois Indians—all of the Illinois nation—ceded to the United States all their claims to lands in Illinois and Missouri.

By the treaty of September 26, 1833, concluded at Chicago with the Chippewa, Ottawa and Pottawatomie Indians, the claim of the United States to the following tract was reaffirmed and made permanent, viz.: "All their land along the western shore of Lake Michigan and between this lake and the land ceded to the United States by the Winnebago nation (Rock river), bounded north by Milwaukee river, and on the south by the line running due west from southern point of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi—containing in all about 5,000,000 acres." The Indians were removed west by the provisions of this treaty. Mrs. Mann, daughter of Antoine Ouilmette, other children of Ouilmette, the Laframboise children, the Beubiens, Billy Caldwell, Billy Caldwell's children, Alexander Robinson, Joseph Laframboise, and others, received cash in lieu of reservations.

On September 26, 1833, the treaty with the Pottawatomies (about 7,000) was held on the North Side under a tent. Thomas J. V. Owen, George B. Porter and William Weatherford signed the treaty on behalf of the United States. The Indians ceded all their remaining territory in northern Illinois and Wisconsin—about 20,000,000 acres. The Indians were mostly encamped in the woods on the North Side, but a large band was under a cottonwood tree at Lake and State streets. Many speculators were present. "There were scenes enacted which it would be no credit to humanity to narrate. Quite a large number of our present citizens were here at the time of the treaty—(Annual Review of Chicago, 1854). The Indians were fleeced by the whites of nearly all they obtained at this treaty.

"NOTICE:—The Chicago treaty of September 26, 1833, having been ratified only on certain conditions, and as it is not known that these conditions will be assented to on the part of the Indians: Therefore be it known, that all persons presuming to settle on the ceded tract will be immediately removed therefrom."—(J. V. Owen, Indian Agent, August, 1834.)

Mr. Calhoun, an eye witness, thus in part describes in his paper the payment of the Indian annuity on October 28, 1834: "About $30,000 worth of goods were to be distributed. They assembled to the number of about 4,000. The distribution took place by piling the whole quantity in a heap upon the prairie on the west side of the river near the corner of Randolph and Canal streets. The Indians were made to sit down upon the grass in a circle around the pile of goods—their squaws sitting behind them. The half-breeds and traders were appointed to distribute the goods, and they leisurely walked to the pile and taking an armful proceeded to throw to one and another of those sitting on the grass, and to whom they were appointed to distribute, such articles as they saw fit, and then returned to the pile to replenish. Shortly the Indians began to show an anxiety not to be overlooked in the distribution and at first got on their knees, vociferating all the time in right lusty Indian gibberish. Then they rose on one foot, and soon all were standing, and they began to contract the circle until they finally made a rush for the pile. I saw then a manner of dispersing a mob that I never saw exemplified before nor since. The crowd was so great around the pile of goods that those who were back from them could not get to them and the outsiders at once commenced hurling whatever missiles they could get hold of, literally filling the air and causing them to fall in the center where the crowd was the most dense. These, to save a broken head, rushed away, leaving a space for those who had hurled the missiles to rush in for a share of the spoils." This statement was made by Mr. Calhoun in 1854 upon the request of the author of Annual Review of Chicago. Indians were killed at every distribution. Only two such distributions were made here.

"On Monday of last week the Indian annuities were paid. Considerable drunkenness among the Indians was observed, but we are informed that this evil was greatly diminished from the last year. A number died while here, and two Indians were killed by being stabbed by others."—(Democrat, November 5, 1834.)

"The agents of the United States are now paying the Indians at this place. The number here has been estimated at from 2,000 to 4,000, and a more motley group eye never beheld. Yesterday they had a dance through some of the principal streets around the star spangled banner. Their clothing is of every color, bright red predominating; and bedizened with bracelets, ribbons and feathers, they presented a scene in which art and nature were strangely jumbled together. On Monday one was tried by his tribe for the murder of a squaw and sentenced to death. He was shot by the chief a short distance from town"—(Democrat, August 19, 1835).

During the summer of 1835 the Indians were removed in groups to their new homes west of the Mississippi. In September, Col. J. B. F. Russell advertised for forty ox-teams of two yoke each with which to remove the last of them. With these wagons and teams he started about October 1, accompanied by about fifteen hundred Indians—men, women and children—and such baggage and belongings as they possessed. Thus the curtain was rung down on the last of the Indians of this county.

It should be noted that the tract six miles square at the mouth of the Chicago river, obtained from the Indians at the treaty of Greenville in 1795, was never surveyed and its boundaries defined and marked. The object of the United States for the location of a fort at the mouth of the river was attained when this cession was secured, and to the future was left its survey if needed. It was not needed, because the treaty of 1816 affirmed the grant of the six-acre tract by including it in a much larger cession.

COOK COUNTY BEFORE ITS FORMATION—THE NORTHERN BOUNDARY—HURON COUNTY— LAND SURVEYS, ETC.

THE Colony of Virginia was very active, both before and during the Revolution, in pushing its claims to the Western country. The establishment of Fort Pitt was really a movement of the Virginia colony. So was the grant to the Ohio Company of a large tract at or near the present Louisville. Kentucky itself was mainly a Virginia settlement. The movement of Capt. James Willing down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, early in 1778, was primarily in the interest of the Virginia colony. The expedition of George Rogers Clark a few months later had the same origin—was instigated by Virginia in the interest of the colonies generally, and herself in particular. Thus the colony was active in placing wide claims on as much of the Western country as possible, in order to forestall either of the other colonies, particularly Pennsylvania. This design held good during the Revolution, because it was presumed that ownership of the Western country among the colonies themselves, whether they gained their independence or not, would still remain open for settlement after the war.

Nothing whatever concerning the boundaries of the thirteen original colonies was said in the Declaration of Independence. In the Articles of Confederation adopted July 9, 1778, it was provided that "the United States, in Congress assembled, shall also be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences now subsisting, or that hereafter may arise, between two or more states, concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever." The Constitution of the United States adopted September 17, 1787, provided that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." On October 5, 1778, the Virginia assembly created Illinois county by the following act in part:

"AN ACT FOR ESTABLISHING THE COUNTY OF ILLINOIS AND
THEREOF.

"WHEREAS, By a successful expedition carried on by the Virginia militia on the western side of the Ohio river, several of the British posts within the territory of the commonwealth, in the country adjacent to the river Mississippi, have been reduced and the inhabitants have acknowledged themselves citizens thereof and taken the oath of fidelity to the same; and the good faith and safety of the commonwealth require that the said citizens should be supported and protected by speedy and effectual reinforcements, which will be the best means of preventing the inroads and depredations of the Indians upon the inhabitants to the westward of the Allegheny mountains; and,

“WHEREAS, From their remote situation it may at this time be difficult, if not impracticable, to govern them by the present laws of this commonwealth until proper information, by intercourse with their fellow citizens on the west side of the Ohio, shall have familiarized them to the same, and it is therefore expedient that some temporary form of government, adapted to their circumstances, should in the meantime be established; therefore,

“Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That all the citizens of this commonwealth who are already settled, or shall hereafter settle, on the western side of the Ohio aforesaid, shall be included in a distinct county, which shall be called Illinois county; and that the Governor of this commonwealth, with the advice of the Council, may appoint a county lieutenant or commandant in chief in that county, during pleasure, who shall appoint and commission so many deputy commandants, militia officers and commissaries, as he shall think proper in the different districts, during pleasure, all of whom, before they enter into office, shall take the oath of fidelity to this commonwealth and the oath of office according to the form of their own religion, which the inhabitants shall fully and to all intents and purposes enjoy, together with all their civil rights and property.”—(October, 1778, 3rd of Commonwealth, Chapter XXI, page 552, Vol. 9, Henning's Statutes at Large.)

The act continued and made full provision for the care of the people, as well as the wilderness and remoteness of the county permitted. Civil officers were to be chosen by a majority of the people, and the militia was to be organized. Col. John Todd was, by act of the Assembly of Virginia, on December 12, 1778, appointed county lieutenant or commandant of Illinois county. The county of Illinois was created as soon as practicable after it was learned that Col. George Rogers Clark had captured the Illinois country. Colonel Todd was thus instructed by Gov. Patrick Henry of Virginia—“Consider yourself as at the head of the civil department and as such having the command of the militia, who are not to be under the command of the military, until ordered out by the civil authority, and act in conjunction with them.”

The county organization in Virginia was in imitation of the English shire system—in reality a sort of microcosm of the state. The chief officer was the county lieutenant, who was first denominated “commander of plantations” with authority over certain territory. In England this office was usually occupied by a knight and hence in Virginia "gentlemen" were usually found in such positions. His powers were more executive than judicial and he was held responsible for the faithful administration of county affairs. He was at the head of the militia and could order them out.

Congress by act of September 6, 1780, recommended that states having claims to "waste and unappropriated lands in the western country" should cede to the United States for the common benefit of the Union a liberal portion of such claims. In response to this recommendation the state of Virginia did on January 2, 1781, pass an act to surrender all its right, title and claim to the territory northwest of the river Ohio, subject to conditions as follows: 1.—That the territory so ceded should be laid out into independent states. 2.—That Virginia should be reimbursed for reducing the British posts at the Kaskaskias and St. Vincents (Vincennes) and for her subsequent expense in maintaining the garrisons and supporting the civil government there, etc. 3.—That the French and Canadians there should be secured in their possessions. 4.—That as George Rogers Clark, who had been sent out by Virginia and had conquered the western country, had been promised a gratuity of land, he and his soldiers should be given a grant in said territory of 150,000 acres. 5.—That certain other military claims should be settled by the retention on the part of Virginia of other tracts of land northwest of the Ohio. 6.—That the remainder of said territory should be devoted to a common fund for all the states alike. 7.—That private claims of individuals based on Indian grants to any part of said territory should be void. 8.—That all the remaining territory of Virginia should be guaranteed to that state by the United States.

New Jersey contended that the demands of Virginia concerning the western or "crown lands" were "partial, unjust and illiberal." This state took the position that it was understood at the outset by the thirteen states that each of them was to have its "just and uncontrovertible claim to its full proportion of all vacant territory." The New Jersey Legislature further said June 14, 1784: "It is particularly disagreeable to have occasion to trouble Congress with so many applications on this head, but the importance of the subject, the danger of so much property being unjustly wrested from us, together with its being our indispensable duty, in justification and defense of the rights of the people we represent, must be our apology; we cannot be silent while viewing one state aggrandizing herself by the unjust detention of that property which has been procured by the common blood and treasure of the whole and which on every principle of reason and justice is vested in Congress for the use and general benefit of the Union they represent. They do therefore express their dissatisfaction with the cession of western territory made by the state of Virginia in January, 1781, as being far short of affording that justice which is equally due to the United States at large, and request that Congress will not accept of said cession, but that they will press upon the said state to make a more liberal surrender of that territory of which they claim so boundless a proportion."

"It is idle to talk of the conquest as being purely a Virginia affair. It was conquered by Clark, a Virginian, with some scant help from Virginia, but it was retained only owing to the power of the United States. . . . Had Virginia alone been in interest Great Britain would not have even paid her claims the compliment of listening to them. . . . The revolutionary war was emphatically fought by Americans for America. No part could have been won without the help of the whole, and every victory was thus a victory for all in which all can take pride."—(Winning of the West.—Roosevelt.)

It was shown by William L. May in Congress in 1834-5 that the westward claim of Virginia did not extend as far north as the southernmost bend of Lake Michigan; the grant of that colony extended two hundred miles north and two hundred miles south of Point Comfort. New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts and Virginia laid claim to territory northwest of the river Ohio.

Congress earnestly recommended to the states of Massachusetts and Connecticut that they do without delay release to the United States in Congress assembled all claims and pretensions of claims to the said western territory without any conditions or restrictions whatever, and declared that the United States could not consistently "accept the cession proposed to be made by the state of Virginia or guarantee the tract of country claimed by them in their act of cession," for the following reasons: 1.—It appeared to your committee from the vouchers laid before them that all the lands ceded or pretended to be ceded to the United States by the state of Virginia are within the claims of the states of Massachusetts, Connecticut and New York, being part of the lands belonging to the said Six Nations of Indians and their tributaries. 2.—It appeared that a great part of the lands claimed by the state of Virginia and requested to be guaranteed to them by Congress is also within the claim of the state of New York, being also part of the country of the said Six Nations and their tributaries. 3.—It also appeared that a large part of the lands last aforesaid are to the westward of the west boundary of the late colony of Virginia as established by the King of Great Britain in Council previous to the present Revolution. 4.—It appeared that a large tract of said lands hath been legally and equitably sold and conveyed away under the Government of Great Britain before the declaration of independence by persons claiming the absolute property thereof. 5.—It appeared that in the year 1763 a very large part thereof was separated and appointed for a distinct government and colony by the King of Great Britain with the knowledge and approbation of the government of Virginia. 6.—The conditions annexed to the said cession are incompatible with the honor, interests and peace of the United States and therefore in the opinion of your committee altogether inadmissible; therefore,

“Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to the state of Virginia, as they value the peace, welfare and increase of the United States, that they reconsider their said act of cession and by a proper act for the purpose cede to the United States all claims and pretensions to the lands and country beyond a reasonable western boundary consistent with their former acts while a colony under the power of Great Britain and agreeable to their just rights of soil and jurisdiction at the commencement of the present war, and that free from any conditions and restrictions whatever.”

Thus in the end Congress agreed substantially to grant the above demands of Virginia from Number 1 to Number 6 inclusive, rejected Number 7 as unnecessary in view of the acceptance of Number 6, and refused to grant Number 8. The Congressional records show that the members of Congress generally took the same view of the Virginia claims that New Jersey did. The debate on the subject was sharp and epigrammatic, each state making such claims exhibiting decided jealousy of its rights; but finally a diplomatic or conciliatory course was pursued, and Virginia and the other states having claims to distant western territory were requested in the interests of the inhabitants of all the thirteen states to cede such claims without reservation to the general government for the use of all. While placing this finality in the form of a request, Congress did not surrender the right of the government to demand for the use of all the people the possession of all territory wrested from Great Britain by the united efforts of the thirteen states. The opinion prevailed that the territory acquired outside of the reasonable boundaries of the thirteen states had been obtained by the joint efforts of all and should be disposed of for the common benefit under the direction of the government. This conclusion was one of the most notable of the early surrenders of the doctrine of states rights. Virginia assented to the request of Congress by Act of Dec. 20, 1783.

It was proposed in Congress on July 7, 1786, that the territory northwest of the river Ohio should be divided into five states—three between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, separated by lines north and south through the mouths of the Wabash and Big Miami rivers and south of a due east and west line extending from the Ohio to the Mississippi rivers and passing through the most southerly point of Lake Michigan. The fourth state was to be between Lakes Huron and Michigan, and the fifth between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river.

The ordinance of 1787, passed by Congress July 13, 1787, provided that, "It is further understood and declared that the boundaries of these three states shall be subject so far to be altered that if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient they shall have authority to form one or two states in that part of said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan."

The Ordinance of 1787 further provided that the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio should for purposes of temporary government be constituted one district, subject later to be divided into two districts; that there should be a governor who should be commander-in-chief of the militia, a secretary, a court of three judges, a legislative council and a house of representatives.

On June 20, 1790, Knox county was created with the following boundaries: "Beginning at the standing stone forks of the Great Miami river and down the said river to the confluence with the Ohio river; thence with the Ohio river to the small stream or rivulet above Fort Massac; thence with the eastern line of St. Clair county to the mouth of the Little Michillimackinac; thence up the Illinois river to the forks or confluence of the Theokiki (Kankakee), and Chicago (Desplaines), thence by a line to be drawn due north to the boundary of the territory of the United States, and so far easterly upon said boundary line as that a due south line may be drawn to the place of beginning."—(St. Clair Papers, Vol. II.). Knox county thus embraced the present Cook county.

By act of May 7, 1800, Congress divided the Northwest territory into two separate governments—all west of a line drawn from the mouth of Kentucky river to Fort Recovery and thence due north to the Canadian line to be called Indiana territory. This included Cook county. The same government was prepared for this territory as had been prepared for the Northwest territory in 1787. Saint Vincennes was made the seat of government.

By proclamation of the Governor, February 3, 1801, what is now Cook county was embraced within the new limits of St. Clair county, the following being the language: "The county of St. Clair shall be bounded on the south by the before-mentioned east and west line running from the Mississippi through the Sink Hole Springs to the intersection of the north line running from the Great Cave aforesaid; thence from the said point of intersection by a direct line to the mouth of the Great Kennoumic (Calumet) river, falling into the southerly bend of Lake Michigan; thence by a direct northeast line to the division line between the Indiana and Northwestern territories; thence along the said line to the territorial boundary of the United States and along the said boundary line to the intersection thereof with the Mississippi and down the Mississippi to the place of beginning."—(Executive Journal, Indiana Territory, Vol. III., page 982.)

Previous to the formation of the State of Indiana, Congress had carefully observed the provisions of the Ordinance of 1787. When that State was admitted, Congress disregarded and extended the northern and western boundaries of the state, the former ten miles north of the east and west line through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan. "The State of Illinois subsequently assented for a valuable consideration to this deviation of Congress from the Ordinance so far as related to the western boundary of Indiana in which alone was she interested."—(Senate Documents, 1st Session, XXIV Congress, Vol. III.)

The people of the counties of Randolph and St. Clair, in Indiana Territory (which included Cook county), petitioned Congress in February, 1808, that they were called upon to suffer great hardships by the failure to divide the said territory into the two states provided for in the Ordinance of 1787. They recited that "among the disadvantages they state that the inhabitants of their two large and populous counties are subject to be called from one hundred and eighty to one hundred and fifty miles through a wilderness (which for want of wood and living water must long remain dreary and difficult to pass through) to attend as suitors, witnesses, etc., at the general court, which is held at Vincennes, has cognizance of every matter in controversy exceeding the value of fifty dollars." The House Committee of Congress, to whom was referred this petition, reported that it was then inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

The question of dividing Indiana Territory as proposed in the aforesaid petition, was again considered by Congress in December, 1808. The committee of the House decided "that as the majority of the citizens desired the separation it was deemed advisable to grant the same, and that therefore the following resolution should be adopted": "Resolved, That it is expedient to divide the Indiana Territory and to establish a separate territorial government west of the river Wabash agreeably to the Ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio passed on the 13th day of July, 1787."

The Act of February 3, 1809, divided Indiana Territory into two distinct governments. The Illinois name was revived, as it was dear to the hearts of the people. "Illinois country" had been its name since the first French invasion. It was formed of all that part of Indiana Territory lying west of the Wabash river and a line drawn from the said river and Post Vincennes due north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada. Illinois state, admitted April 18, 1818, was bounded as follows: East, by the Wabash river and the north line from Vincennes to the northwest corner of Indiana, thence east with the north boundary of Indiana to the middle of Lake Michigan, thence north along the middle of Lake Michigan to North latitude 42 degrees and 30 minutes, thence west to the middle of the Mississippi river, thence down the same to the mouth of the Ohio, thence up the latter to the mouth of the Wabash. The population in 1800 was 215, in 1810, was 12,282, and in 1820, was 55,211.

On April 28, 1809, Nathaniel Pope, territorial Secretary and acting Governor, created by proclamation St. Clair county, with the following boundary: "All that part of Illinois Territory which lies north of the line dividing the counties of Randolph and St. Clair as it existed under the government of Indiana Territory." On the last day of February, 1809, Cook county was embraced within the limits of the New St. Clair county.

On September 14, 1812, Madison county was created as follows: "Beginning on the Mississippi river to run with the second township line above Cahokia east until it strikes the dividing line between Illinois and Indiana Territories; thence with said dividing line to the line of Upper Canada; thence with said line to the Mississippi; thence down the Mississippi to the beginning." This description embraced the present Cook county. "I do appoint the house of Thomas Kirkpatrick to be the seat of Justice of said county (Proclamation of Gov. Ninian Edwards, Kaskaskia, September 14, 1812).

By Act of November 24, 1814, Cook county was included in the new county of Edwards, as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of Bonipart (Bon Pas) creek, on the Big Wabash, and running thence due west to the meridian line which runs due north from the mouth of the Ohio river; thence with said meridian line and due north until it strikes the line of Upper Canada; thence with the line of Upper Canada to the line that separates this territory from the Indiana territory; and thence with said dividing line to the beginning, shall constitute a separate county to be called Edwards."

Cook county was included in Crawford county by the following Act, approved December 31, 1816: "Beginning at the mouth of the Embarras and running with said river to the intersection of the line dividing Townships Nos. 3 and 4 north, Range 11 west, of the Second principal meridian; thence west with said township line to the meridian and due north until it strikes the line of Upper Canada; thence to the line that separates this territory from the State of Indiana; thence south with said dividing line to the beginning, shall constitute a separate county to be called Crawford."

The Act approved March 22, 1819, creating Clark county, embraced what is now Cook county, as follows: "All that part of Crawford county lying north of a line beginning on the Great Wabash river, dividing Townships 8 and 9 north, running due west, shall form a new and separate county to be called Clark."

Pike county was created January 31, 1821, with the following boundary: "Up the middle of the Illinois river from its mouth to the fork and up the south fork (Kankakee) to the Indiana state line; thence north with the state line to the north boundary of the state; thence west with said state line to the west boundary of the state; thence with said boundary to the place of beginning." What is now Cook county was thus embraced in Pike county.

Edgar county was created January 3, 1823, bordered on Indiana and was twenty-four miles wide. By the same Act "All that tract of country west of Edgar county that is not attached to any other county, and all that tract of country north of said Edgar county to Lake Michigan" was attached to Edgar county. It appears from this Act that the southern part of what is now Cook county was attached to Edgar county—probably all south of an east and west line through the most southern point of Lake Michigan. The remainder of the present Cook county was attached to Fulton county by the following Act approved January 28, 1823: "Beginning at the point where the Fourth principal meridian intersects the Illinois river; thence up the middle of said river to where the line between Ranges 5 and 6 strikes the said river; thence north with the said line between Ranges 5 and 6 east to the township line between Townships 9 and 10 north; thence west with said line to the Fourth principal meridian, thence south with said line to the place of beginning; and all the rest and residue of the attached part of the county of Pike east of the Fourth principal meridian shall be attached to, and be a part of, the said county of Fulton until otherwise disposed of by the general assembly." Chicago is referred to in this Act.

Putnam county was created January 13, 1825, with the following boundary: "Beginning at the point where the township line between Townships 11 and 12 north touches the Illinois river; thence up the river to the south fork (Kankakee) thereof; thence up the said fork to the line dividing this state from Indiana; thence up the said line to the northeast corner of this state; thence west on the north boundary thereof to the range line between Ranges 4 and 5 east; thence south on said range line to the line between Townships 11 and 12 north; thence east to the place of beginning." Putnam county was placed in the first judicial circuit. Nothing in the Act was said about Chicago.

"By one of the provisions of the Act creating Peoria county, January 13, 1825, all the country north of that county and north of the Illinois and Kankakee rivers, etc., was attached to Peoria county. No part of Cook county was ever in Peoria, but all of it was once in Putnam at a time when all of it was attached to Peoria and when the Peorians held the offices."

"Peter Cartwright, of Sangamon, for the committee on internal improvement, introduced in the House, in 1828-9, a bill that bore no title. In making up the journal the clerk entitled it—'An Act forming the counties of Chicago, Pinckney and Brown.' It was read twice, sent to the committee of the whole, and reported with amendments, and then on motion of Jonathan H. Pugh, of Sangamon, was laid on the table, where it remained. As originally drawn, the third section of the bill would have created the county of ——— with a boundary line running west from the northeast corner of Township 41 north, Range 14 east, of the Third principal meridian (in the lake near Evanston) to the northwest corner of Township 41 north, Range 10 east (near the village of Barrington); thence south (on the line between the towns of Palatine and Barrington) to the northwest corner of Township 37 north (now in the northern boundary of Will county); thence east to the northwest corner of Township 37 north, Range 11 east (one of the Du Page-Will corners); thence south to the southwest corner of Township 35 north; thence east on the township line to the east line of the state; thence north to Lake Michigan and along the state boundary to the place of beginning, including and embracing the lands covered by the waters of the lake, being within the jurisdiction of the state. In the original bill all the words describing this county have been crossed out, and over them is pasted a slip, evidently the amendment of the committee, which names this county "Chicago." The bill attached to Chicago county considerable adjacent territory. . . . It may be that the failure of this bill can be accounted for by the fact that the Senate had passed, and the House was then considering, though it took no final action upon, a bill for "An Act constituting the county of Michigan," which county would have included all that part of the state east of Fox river and north of the Illinois and Kankakee rivers."

"During the first session of the Seventh General Assembly, 1830-1831, there was presented to the House a petition from Jo Daviess, Putnam, and the attached parts of Tazewell and Peoria counties, asking the formation of a new county. Then Joel Wright of the Pike, Adams, Fulton, Schuyler, Peoria and Jo Daviess district presented a petition from the inhabitants in the neighborhood of Chicago in the county of Peoria praying for a new county. On motion of John F. Posey of the Fayette, Bond, Tazewell, Montgomery and and Shelby district, it was resolved that a select committee be appointed to lay off all the country on the other side of the Illinois river from Peoria county to Chicago into counties and to report by bill. The committee was composed of Posey, Wright and Jonathan H. Pugh of Sangamon. To the same committee was sent, on motion of Posey, after its second reading, a bill introduced by Jacob Ogle of St. Clair for 'An Act to organize the county of Columbia.' This select committee reported a bill for 'An Act to create and organize the counties therein named,' which passed the House. It was amended in the Senate, the House concurring, and became a law January 15, 1831. It created Cook and La Salle, changed the boundaries of Putnam and added some territory to Henry."

"It was enacted by the first section of this act, that the country within a line commencing at the Indiana line where it intersects the line between Townships 33 and 34 north (in Will county); thence west to the southwest corner of Township 34 north, Range 9 east, of the Third principal meridian (on the Grundy-Will line); thence north to the northern boundary line of the state; thence east with said line to the northeast corner of the state; thence southwardly along the state line to the place of beginning, shall constitute Cook county and the county seat shall be at Chicago. The thirteenth section of this act attaches to Cook all the territory north of Cook county and parallel with the lines of the same as far northwardly as Rock river. This act gave Cook all its present territory, all of Du Page and Lake, three miles now at the east end of McHenry and about two-thirds of Will."

"The original bill for the 'Act to create and organize the counties therein named' gave Chicago as the name of the county formed by the first section. In the second section it is provided that the boundary line of La Salle county shall begin at the southwest corner of Chicago county. There is nothing on the original bill to indicate when the name of this county was changed."—(The above quoted paragraphs were contributed by William D. Barge, attorney, of Chicago, who has made an elaborate and special study of early Cook county affairs.)

"Notice is hereby given that application will be made at the ensuing Legislature for the erection of a new county, to be taken from the counties of La Salle, Cook and Iroquois, as at present organized."—(Ottawa newspaper, July 24, 1834.)

By act of January 12, 1836, Will county was created with the following boundary: "Beginning at the northwest corner of Township 37 north, Range 9 east, and running thence east to the east line of Range 10, thence south six miles, thence east six miles, thence south six miles, then east six miles, then south six miles, thence east to the state line, thence south to the Kankakee and down the same to the north line of Township 31, thence west to the west line of Range 9, thence north to the place of beginning." As will be seen, this division cut away a considerable portion of Cook county.

By act of January 16, 1836, McHenry county was created with the following boundary: "Beginning at a point on Lake Michigan where the township line dividing Townships 42 and 43 strikes said lake, and running thence west along said line to the east line of Range 4, east of the Third principal meridian, thence north to the northern boundary line of the state, thence east to Lake Michigan; thence along the shore line of said lake to the place of beginning." This cut off another large slice from Cook county.

"During the session of the Tenth General Assembly, 1836-37, there was presented to the House a petition from Cook, Will and Kane, praying the establishment of a new county, and it was sent to a committee that was soon afterwards, at its own request, discharged from consideration of the matter. Then John Naper, a county member, had the petition sent to the committee on Internal Improvements, and he later introduced and there was passed a bill for the formation of Michigan county, which was approved March 2, 1837. It provided for the establishment of a county of that name out of that part of Cook lying west of the line between Ranges 11 and 12 (all of the town of Lemont, the county of Du Page and the towns north of it) if a majority of the voters in Cook at the election therein provided for consented thereto, but they did not do this, so the act failed to have any effect."—(William D. Barge.)

"In 1838 a scheme to make four counties out of Cook met with some favor, and committees were appointed and meetings held to promote it. One county was to have nine townships out of the northwest corner of Cook, and another (Du Page) immediately south of this was also to have nine townships. A failure of the committee to meet at the appointed time disconcerted the promoters, and the scheme failed."—(Blanchard, History of Du Page County.)

Several of the people of Cook sent to the Senate of the Eleventh General Assembly, 1838-39, a petition praying that the territory in the county within Range 9 (the towns of Barrington and Hanover), and the west half of Range 10 (Palatine and Schaumburg), be annexed to Kane county. The petition went to the standing committee and was never heard of afterwards, possibly because the passage of the bill for the creation of the county of Du Page might be considered as giving sufficient relief. That act was passed upon petitions from Cook and Will for a new county, and was approved February 9, 1839. It was not to become effective unless a majority in those counties voting at the election therein provided for consented thereto. The result of the election took from Cook county all of the present Du Page with the following boundary: Commencing on the east line of Kane county at the division line between Sections 18 and 19, in Township 37 north, Range 9 east, of the Third principal meridian, pursuing the same line eastward until it strikes the Des Plaines river; thence following the said river up to the range line between Townships 11 and 12 east, of the Third principal meridian; thence north on said line to the township line between Townships 40 and 41; thence west on said line to the east line of Kane county; thence south on the east line of Kane county to the place of beginning.

An unsuccessful effort to create a new county out of Cook and Will was made before the Twelfth General Assembly in 1840-41. The people in Range 9 and the west half of Range 10 in Cook asked the Thirteenth General Assembly, 1842-43, to annex that territory to Kane. Others in Cook asked that the county be divided. Some wanted another county out of Cook and McHenry, and others asked for a new county out of Cook and Will, but all their efforts failed. Three hundred and twenty-five citizens of Cook petitioned the Fourteenth General Assembly, 1844, for the formation of a new county, and three hundred of Cook and Will asked for another county. Neither petition accomplished anything. The next effort to divide the county was made during the session of the Seventeenth General Assembly, 1851, and it failed.

"To the Voters of Cook County:

"The undersigned voters residing in the territory now comprising the towns of Schaumburg, Palatine, Barrington and Hanover beg leave respectfully to submit the following facts to the consideration of the voters of Cook county, and in view thereof to appeal to their magnanimity and sense of justice to allow the people of said towns to be relieved from the inconvenience they now endure by detaching the said towns from Cook county and adding them to Kane county. 1.—All legal and political business of a county is generally transacted at the county seat. The average distance from such towns, in a direct line to the county seat of Cook county, is about thirty miles (by traveled route it is still more), while to the county seat of Kane county it is only a distance of about sixteen miles—a difference in distance in favor of Kane county of about one-half—and by public conveyance the difference is still greater. 2.—Most of the business of Schaumburg and Palatine and nearly all of Barrington and Hanover is now transacted in Kane county. At Elgin and other points on Fox river our milling, mechanical business, merchandising, etc., are done; our social relations and interests are also mostly with the people of Kane county. 3.—The west line of Hanover and Barrington is from half to one and a half miles east of Fox river, to which river, as is usual in such cases, the trade and commerce of a belt of country on either side thereof naturally tend; so that by the laws of trade as well as socially the said towns ought to be attached to Kane county. Toward the people of Cook county we entertain none other than friendly feelings, and were it not for reasons enumerated above—evils to us arising solely from our peculiar position—we should never consent to a separation; but as things exist our wants and inconveniences impel us to ask a separation, and in this manner we earnestly solicit the voters of Cook county to be just—to do with us as they, in a similar situation, would be done by, and vote for striking off said town from Cook county, March 16, 1853.

These petitioners secured the passage of the Act to provide for annexing certain towns in Cook county to the county of Kane, approved February 12, 1853, and provision was made for a vote upon the proposed transfer of those towns. To make the act effective there was required a majority of all the votes in Kane and a majority of all those in Cook who voted on the question. The change was not made. The bill for the act was introduced in the House by Homer Wilmarth, of Cook. During the session of the Eighteenth General Assembly, 1853, when the act last mentioned was passed, efforts were made to establish a new county out of Cook and Will, and to form one out of Cook, Will and Iroquois, and for one out of Will and Iroquois. There was introduced in the Senate a bill for An Act to establish the county of Columbia, and for other purposes therein named. It was read twice and sent to a committee that was afterwards, upon its own request, discharged from further consideration of the matter, and the bill was laid on the table and never taken up. The act that created Cook originated in the House, and the honor of selecting the name belongs to Samuel Alexander, of Pope county, a member of the Senate, who, when the bill was pending there, secured the adoption of his amendment striking out Chicago and inserting Cook. The name was chosen in honor of Daniel Pope Cook, Auditor of Illinois Territory, Judge of the Territory, Attorney General of the State and the first Congressman elected from the State."—(Ford, History of Illinois; Davidson & Stuve, History of Illinois; Reynolds, Pioneer History of Illinois.)

Nathaniel Pope was chosen territorial delegate to Congress in 1816. To his determination and efforts is due the fact that Chicago is in Illinois and not in Wisconsin. To understand the force of his argument, the condition of affairs at that time must be considered. The Ordinance of 1787 fixed the northern boundary of Illinois on the east and west line passing through the southern extremity of Lake Michigan, thus giving the state no lake coast except at a single point. There were no railroads in those days and it was not known that there ever would be. It was thought that commerce would have to depend upon water for transportation and that an eastern outlet for the shipments of products over the Great Lakes would be of vital importance. Indiana had succeeded in having its northern boundary extended ten miles to the northward, thus giving it considerable stretch of lake coast. Michigan had left an abundance of coast and the new state to be formed in the northwest (Wisconsin) would also be well supplied in this regard. But Illinois had none. It had no outlet through the Great Lakes, but was entitled to one and could only get it by having its boundary extended northward. If the boundary were extended northward only ten miles it would come near passing directly through Chicago and would cut in half and place in two states the proposed canal sure to be built connecting Lake Michigan and the Illinois river. The proper step to take, therefore, was to remove the northern boundary far enough north to locate both Chicago and the proposed canal wholly and surely within the State of Illinois. That was the logic of the situation. It was sound and reasonable, and it won. The proceedings in Congress are interesting.

"The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to enable the people of Illinois Territory to form a constitution and state government, and for the admission of such state into the Union on a footing with the original states. Mr. Pope moved to amend the bill by striking out the lines defining the boundaries of the new state and to insert the following:

"Beginning at the mouth of the Wabash river; thence up the same and with the line of Indiana to the northwest corner of said state; thence east with the line of the same state to the middle of Lake Michigan; thence north along the middle of said lake to north latitude 42 degrees 30 minutes; thence west to the middle of the Mississippi river; thence down along the middle of that river to its confluence with the Ohio river; and thence up the latter river along the northwestern shore to the beginning."

"The object of this amendment, Mr. Pope said, was to gain for the proposed state a coast on Lake Michigan. This would afford additional security to the perpetuity of the Union, inasmuch as the state would thereby be connected with the states of Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York through the lakes. The facility of opening a canal between Lake Michigan and the Illinois river, said Mr. Pope, is acknowledged by every one who has visited the place. Giving to the proposed state the port of Chicago (embraced in the proposed limits) will draw its attention to the opening of communication between the Illinois river and that place, and the improvement of that harbor. It was believed, he said, upon good authority, that the line of separation between Indiana and Illinois would strike Lake Michigan south of Chicago and not pass west of it, as had been supposed by some geographers who had favored us with maps of that country; and, Mr. Pope added, that all the country north of the proposed state and bounded by Lakes Michigan, Huron and Superior, and by the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi river, must form but one state, Congress being restricted by the Ordinance of 1787 from erecting more than five states in the Northwest Territory. This motion was agreed to without a division." The House Committee to consider the Illinois bill were Messrs. Pope of Illinois, Claiborne of Tennessee, Johnson of Kentucky, Spencer of New York, and Whitman of Massachusetts.

In January, 1850, when Nathaniel Pope, judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Illinois, died, the bar of Chicago assembled and adopted suitable resolutions, one of which was as follows: "Resolved, That we recur with high and honorable pride to the period when, as a delegate in Congress from the then Territory of Illinois, he successfully struggled to embrace within our boundaries the land lying north of the southern border of Lake Michigan, which in his wisdom he foresaw would be so necessary to the future greatness and prosperity of the state."—(See Daily Democrat, January 26, 1850.)

In December, 1828, there was laid before Congress a petition of the inhabitants of Galena and vicinity to the number of one hundred and eighty-seven, for the formation of a new territory to be called Huron. They prayed "that the line passing through the southernmost end of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi, as ordained by Congress in 1787, be reestablished and made the line between that portion of the territory northwest of the Ohio which they inhabit and the State of Illinois; and that they be stricken off from the territory of Michigan and erected into a separate territorial government with the following boundaries, to-wit: Commencing where the line between the United States and Canada crosses Red river of Lake Winnipeg; thence up said river to Lake Traverse and across the portage to the Big Stone lake; thence in an easterly direction until it strikes the Missouri river; thence down the middle of said river to the line of the State of Missouri; thence along said line to the Mississippi; thence up said river to where the line drawn through the southernmost end of Lake Michigan west to the Mississippi intersects said river; thence due east along said line to Lake Michigan; thence passing through the middle of said lake to its northern extremity; thence along the line of the old Territory of Michigan to Lake Superior to the line between the United States and Canada; and thence with said line to the beginning." They prayed that the seat of government might be established at Galena.

In December, 1829, the House of Representatives, Congress, considered the division of Michigan Territory, and after ample discussion passed a bill to that effect by a large majority. The new territory was to be called Huron and was to be located west of Lake Michigan and north of Illinois and Missouri. At this time Michigan included all the country north of Illinois and east of the Mississippi; over the territory west of that river there was no government. The new territory was to be bounded east by the center of Lake Michigan, north by Canada, west by the Missouri river and south by Illinois and Missouri. 'Mr. Biddle presented a memorial of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan, praying that the integrity of the territorial limits of the said territory may be preserved inviolate; that no part of it may be annexed to the contemplated government of Huron; and that no right or privilege whatever may be taken from Michigan as a territory, which would have the effect to impair the future importance of Michigan as a state.'—House Journal, second session, XXI. Congress.)

In December, 1829, a memorial from the inhabitants of Michigan Territory west of Lake Michigan praying for a division of the territory was presented to the House. About the same time, also, a petition was received from the inhabitants of Michillimackinac praying not to be included in the territory asked for above. The petitions were presented by Joseph Biddle, delegate from Michigan Territory. At this time (January 18, 1830), Mr. Duncan presented a petition from the inhabitants west of Lake Michigan praying that the northern boundary of Illinois might be established, and that a new territory might be created, etc. But the attempts to change the northern boundary of Illinois and to form the Territory of Huron were unsuccessful. The bills introduced in Congress, though meeting with some favor, were permitted to die in committee rooms.

In 1840 there was made an effort to annex all northern Illinois to Wisconsin. James Duane Doty, Governor of Wisconsin, favored the plan. He said in a letter addressed to the people of Wisconsin, and dated October 30, 1840: "I hope no inducement which may be held out by political expediency or respect for a government which has attempted to infringe the rights of a state (Wisconsin) which had no voice in her councils, will deter us from proceeding to frame a permanent government for the state according to its constituted boundaries." He had before said, January 19, 1840, in a letter addressed to several in northern Illinois: "My doctrine has been, and still is, that if Congress saw fit to establish more than three states in the territory northwest of the Ohio, the Ordinance of 1787 fixed definitely the northern boundary of the states bordering on the Ohio river on a line drawn east and west through the southerly head or extreme of Lake Michigan. It is, therefore, lawful for these (that is, those living north of the line last aforesaid), to unite with the people who occupy the other portion of the fifth state (now called Wisconsin Territory) to frame a state government for themselves according to the articles of cession contained in the Ordinance of 1787. This right is paramount to any act of Congress. The public debt of Illinois is enough alone to alarm the property holders in every part of the state, especially the industrious farmers. Justice, however, I think, requires that provision should be made in the constitution of the new state for the completion of the canal from Chicago to the state line, and also the improvement of the navigation of Rock river, and the repayment of a fair proportion of the expense incurred by Illinois upon these works. A proposition so equitable I cannot but believe would be acceptable to Illinois, and the course pursued by Wisconsin approved by the world."

Many people in northern Illinois preferred to remain with Wisconsin and favored the change of boundary. On July 6, 1840, a convention at Rockford, Ill., declared that the fourteen northern counties in Illinois belonged to Wisconsin and proposed a convention to be held at Madison in November of that year to fix the southern boundary of Wisconsin. In 1842 the Territorial Governor of Wisconsin sent a committee to the Governor of Illinois informing him that the Illinois jurisdiction over the frontier counties was accidental and temporary. Much excitement ensued. Wisconsin was in a state of ferment till admitted into the Union in 1848. Congress confirmed the boundary of 1818.

Northern Illinois was principally settled from New York and New England. A little later Germans from Pennsylvania came in; then Irish and other nationalities of Europe. On March 23, 1816, Mr. Robertson, from the Committee on Public Lands (H. R.), reported a bill to provide for the appointment of a surveyor for Illinois and Missouri territories. On February 6, 1821, Illinois passed "An Act providing for the running and marking the line dividing the states of Illinois and Indiana." In establishing this line no notice was taken of the surveys of the public lands, nor was the intersection of these public surveys with the state line noted, so as to show the correct fractions and subdivisions of the public lands on each side of the state line. In November, 1827, the Surveyor General of Ohio, Indiana and Michigan Territory was instructed to connect the surveys of the sections caused to be made fractional on each side of the state line with the line itself. This direction was not complied with, whereupon the same instructions were issued in December, 1828, to the Surveyor General at St. Louis (for Illinois, Missouri and Arkansas), but he replied that no surveyor could be found to do the work for the price allowed by law—three dollars per mile—to retrace the old line and connect the public surveys with the state line. So the lands could not be offered for sale. Hence the law of Congress to relieve the situation. Mr. Clarke, of the Committee on Territories, reported a bill in the House in January, 1830, for ascertaining the latitude of the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan, and of certain other points, for the purpose thereafter of fixing the true northern boundary lines of the states of Ohio and Illinois.

Congress, in 1830, passed an act granting preëmption rights to settlers on public lands. Prior to January, 1831, the plats and surveys of lands not yet offered for sale were not filed in any land office. But the act of Congress required citizens with preëmption rights to any such lands to avail themselves of the provisions of the law previous to the day appointed for the commencement of the sale of lands in the district, which could not be done in the absence of the plats and surveys. So Illinois asked that the preëmption law be extended one year—or to January 1, 1831. In 1831 a new land district north of the line dividing Townships 21 and 22 north of the base line and east of the Third principal meridian, including all that part of the state to its northern boundary, was created, the office to be located by the President. The Legislature in January, 1833, memorialized Congress to grant preëmption rights for two years after the enactment of the law to actual settlers on the public domain. Congress passed an act on March 2, 1833, authorizing the President to cause the public surveys to be connected with the line of demarcation between Indiana and Illinois.

The Act of Congress of June 25, 1834, authorized the President "to cause to be sold all the lands in the Northeast Land District of Illinois excepting only Sections 16 of each township and individual tracts and government reservations." This Act placed the Indian reservations in Cook county in the market. In 1834 the land offices in Illinois were at Shawneetown, Kaskaskia, Edwardsville, Vandalia, Palestine, Springfield, Danville and Quincy. A bill creating a surveyor general for Illinois alone passed Congress early in 1835; before this for some time Illinois and Missouri were united in the surveyor.

"Custom, as well as the acts of the general government, has sanctioned the location of settlements on the unsurveyed public lands by granting them preëmption rights to a sufficiency for a small farm. Many of the settlers of the tract now offered and to be sold on the 15th inst. came to the West and made their locations under the implied pledge of the government by its past acts, that they should have a preference and a right to purchase the lots on which they located when the same came into market, and at a minimum price. We trust that strangers that come among us, and especially our own citizens, will not attempt to commit so gross an act of injustice as to interfere with the purchase of the quarter section on which improvements have been made by the actual settler. We trust for the peace and quiet of our town that these local customs will not be outraged at the coming sale." We have been favored with the following statement of the amount of money received at the Land Office in this place since the same was opened:

For lands entered under the preëmption laws from May
28 to June 15, 1835.....	$ 33,066.90
Public sale from June 15 to June 30, inclusive.....	354,278.57
Private entry from August 3 to 31, inclusive.....	61,958.57
Private entry from September 1 to 30, inclusive.....	10,654.71
Total.....	$459,958.75

"We do not believe the records of any other land office will exhibit the receipts of half this amount. But a small portion of the land in this district is still in the market. Of that in the market scarcely an acre of good land remains for entry. Facts like these show more conclusively than volumes of abstract reasoning or indefinite statement the rapid advance of this section of our state in wealth and population."—(Chicago Democrat, October 7, 1835.)

"NOTICE.—The Commissioners of the General Land Office have requested me to obtain information as to which of the below named locations may interfere with settlements or preëmption rights. All persons having a settlement or preëmption claim on any of said locations are requested to make proof thereof without delay to this office, stating the time of their settlement, extent of their improvement and describing the tract, and attested in the usual manner.

"Chicago, January 27, 1836."

The Surveyor General of Illinois, located at St. Louis, reported January 30, 1836, as follows: "First: In the Northeast District of Illinois—with important exceptions, all that part of this district which lies south of the old Indian boundary lines has been surveyed and the extensive sale effected therein during the past season, in the townships which were brought into market, fully sustained my reports of the 19th of November, 1833, and the 16th of December, 1834, in relation thereto, and to the unsurveyed lands of the district I therefore again recommend that all the exterior boundaries* be surveyed; and that all the fractions adjoining Lake Michigan, and as many other townships and fractional townships as will be equal in the whole to about sixty entire townships, be subdivided, which gives for this district:

Township lines.....	1,056 miles
Subdivisions of sixty townships.....	3,600 miles
Meanders of the lake and navigable rivers.....	300 miles
Total.....	4,956 miles

"This estimate includes the surveys ordered by the letters from the General Land Office, dated the 5th of August and the 14th of November, 1835."—(E. T. Langham, Surveyor General, Illinois and Missouri.)

In 1821 the following portions were surveyed: Township 35, Range 13; Township 36, Ranges 12, 13 and 14; Township 37, Ranges 11, 12, 13 and 14; Township 38, Ranges 12, 13 and 14; Township 39, Ranges 13 and 14; Township 40, Range 13; and Township 41,

*Ceded to the United States by the treaty at Chicago of 26 September, 1833. The township lines amounting to 560 miles directed to be surveyed by the commissioner's letter of the 5th of August, 1835, and the townships and fractional townships (equal to about 51 whole townships), making with the meanders 3,100 miles of surveying to be subdivided after the breaking up of the winter, as directed by the commissioner's letter of the 19th December, 1835.

Range 12. In 1828 the following: Township 42, Range 10. In 1834: Township 35, Ranges 14 and 15; Township 36, Range 15; Township 37, Range 15; Township 40, Range 14; and Township 41, Range 14. In 1837: Township 38, Range 15. In 1838: Township 42, Range 11. In 1839: Township 40, Ranges 12 and 13; Township 41, Range 13; Township 42, Ranges 9, 12 and 13. In 1840: Township 41, Ranges 9, 10 and 11. In 1843: Township 39, Range 12. In those cases where the same territory was surveyed more than once, as in Township 40, Range 13, the later survey was made because of inaccuracies in the first one.

"In Illinois the office is advised of the survey of ninety-eight townships and the fractional townships embracing the whole of the Pottawatomie cession of October 20, 1832, and such portions of the adjacent cessions as had not been surveyed, thus completing the surveys in the Danville district and in the southern part of the Chicago district. The whole of these surveys can be brought into the market next spring. Instructions were given to the Surveyor General in August last, to have that portion of the lands ceded by the treaty of 1833 and 1834 with the Chippewa, Ottawa and Pottawatomie Indians, which is situated in Illinois, run off into townships, and he has been since directed to subdivide those townships into sections, preparatory to being brought into market."—(Chicago Democrat, February 24, 1836.)

EARLY COOK COUNTY AND CHICAGO, 1779-1840

WITH the exception of the French cabin at Lee's place, occupied by Father Marquette many years before, the Garay (or Guarie) cabin or stockade on the North Branch at an early date, and a possible fort or stockade here at a subsequent period, it seems clear that the first resident of the present site of Chicago was a colored man named Jean Baptiste Point De Saible, who lived here as early as 1779, as shown by the following extract from a letter dated July 4, 1779, and written by Col. Arent Schuyler De Peyster, a British commander at Michillimackinac: "Baptiste Point De Saible, a handsome negro, well educated and settled at Eschikagou (Chicago), but much in the French interest." His cabin was located on the north bank of Chicago river near its mouth and near the point where it turned south just before entering the lake. The fact that De Saible lived here is still further verified by Augustus Grignon, of Wisconsin. Perish Grignon, brother of Augustus, saw De Saible here and said that he was large, a trader, pretty wealthy and drank freely, and that he had a commission of some sort, probably from the French government. In 1796 De Saible sold his cabin to a French trader named Le Mai, from Peoria, who occupied it as a home and trading house until 1804. Chicago was referred to by William Burnett, an Indian trader of St. Joseph, Michigan, in a letter dated May 14, 1786, and addressed to George Mildrum, a merchant at Mackinac. Again, on May 6, 1790, he referred to this place. On August 24, 1798, he wrote saying that he expected a garrison would be stationed at Chicago "this summer." Other references to Chicago were made. It is probable, also, that an Indian trader named Guarie, as before stated, lived on the west side of the North Branch before the year 1800. Traders spoke of the North Branch as "River Guarie."

In the summer of 1803, Capt. John Whistler, stationed with his company of United States troops at Detroit, was ordered to proceed to Chicago with his command and there to build a fort and occupy the post thus established. The company came here by land under the command of Lieut. James S. Swearingen. Captain Whistler, his wife, his two sons, Lieut. William and George and the young wife of William went as far as St. Joseph in the schooner "Tracy" and thence came to Chicago in a row boat. Upon their arrival there were here, according to Mrs. Lieut. William Whistler, but four Indian traders' huts or cabins—all occupied by Canadian Frenchmen and their Indian wives, three of them being Le Mai, Ouilmette and Pettell. In 1804 John Kinzie, then residing near Niles, Michigan, bought the Le Mai property here, and with his wife and young son, John H., came on and occupied the same. Gradually, as time passed, the old cabin was changed, improved and extended until it became an attractive home for that period. The house stood on the north side at the bend where the river turned south before entering the lake. John Kinzie became known, and justly so, as "The Father of Chicago." He came here as an Indian trader in the employ of the American Fur Company, and in the end was much beloved by the Indians, whose friend he was. In addition to his Indian trade, he became sutler for the garrison in Fort Dearborn. No doubt the officers at Fort Dearborn were concerned in the Indian trade. At times John Whistler, Jr., and Thomas Forsyth were interested in business with Mr. Kinzie. In the spring of 1812, in an encounter, Mr. Kinzie killed John Lalime, Indian interpreter here. The officers at the fort investigated the case and acquitted Mr. Kinzie—"justifiable homicide."

It is highly probable that from 1804 to 1812 the few log cabins here were occupied by traders. The Indian outbreaks in 1812 broke up the little settlement, and after an absence of four years Mr. Kinzie returned with his family and occupied his former residence—probably in the Fall of 1816. He resumed his trade with the Indians, not as a representative of the American Fur Company, but as an independent trader. However, in 1818, he sent his son John to Mackinac to become an apprentice of the American Fur Company. This company owned the only schooner on Lake Michigan; it registered about forty tons and came here regularly with supplies for the company's agency. Upon the arrival in 1818 of Gurdon S. Hubbard there resided here two families—those of John Kinzie and Antoine Ouilmette, both living on the North Side, the latter about two blocks west of the former. Ouilmette was a French trader with an Indian wife and several half-breed children. A trader named M. Du Pin lived here a little later. At this date Captain Bradley was a commander at Fort Dearborn. Upon the formation of Pike county in 1821, Mr. Kinzie was recommended for justice of the peace, but there does not appear any record that he was commissioned at that date. He was one of the sub-agents of the government when the treaty of August 29, 1821, was concluded here with the Indians, having been appointed in 1816. The agency was established in 1804 and reestablished in 1816 when Charles Jouett became agent, under whom Mr. Kinzie served. He was sub-agent under Dr. Alexander Wolcott also and at the same time served as Indian interpreter. On July 28, 1825, Mr. Kinzie became justice of the peace at this point for Peoria county, and the same year became agent of the American Fur Company. He died here suddenly January 6, 1828.

From the above it will be seen that up to about the date of the death of John Kinzie Fort Dearborn was all of Chicago, except the houses of Mr. Kinzie and a few French traders. Ellen Marion Kinzie was born in the Le Mai house in December, 1804—the first white birth here. The half-breed children of several French traders, no doubt, had been born here before. On July 20, 1823, she married Dr. Alexander Wolcott, Indian agent—the first marriage in Chicago.

Fort Dearborn was built during the summer and fall of 1803 and was named for Gen. Henry Dearborn. It stood on the south side of Chicago river at the point where the river turned southward before emptying into the lake. It had two blockhouses. On the north side a subterranean passage led from the parade ground to the river. The enclosure was a heavy palisade of wood cut from the adjacent forests. On Dec. 31, 1803, there were reported here at "Fort Dearborn, Ind. Ty." one captain, one second lieutenant, one ensign, four sergeants, three corporals, four musicians, fifty-four privates, and one surgeon's mate. The United States agency building—a two-story log structure covered with split oak siding—stood a short distance west of the fort, fronting on the river. There were here three pieces of light artillery. Capt. Nathan Heald succeeded Captain Whistler as commander in 1810. A settler, Charles Lee, had come here about 1804 with his family, and had preëmpted a large tract at what afterward became Bridgeport. It became known as "Lee's Place" or "Hardscrabble." Lee and his family built a residence near the fort and were thus residents of Chicago very early. Also before this date a family named Burns lived on the North Side west of Ouilmette. The interpreter, John Lalime, and Mathew Irwin, United States Factor, were here as early as 1811. Thus there lived here at the time of the massacre of 1812 the families of Lee, Burns, Kinzie and Ouilmette, and the Lee house at "Hardscrabble" was occupied by Mr. Lee's employes or tenants. In 1817 Kinzie and Ouilmette occupied their former houses. Mr. Jouett took possession of the Burns house—the Lee cabin at "Hardscrabble" was occupied by John Craft as a trading house and the Lee residence near the fort was owned and occupied by Jean Baptiste Beaubien, who had first come here in 1804, but did not secure property until after the massacre, when he purchased the Lee home a short distance south of the fort near the lake shore and the cultivated tract of three acres adjacent. Late in 1812 Francis La Framboise, a French trader, lived in a log hut on the South Side, near Beaubien. The latter married for his second wife Josette, daughter of Francis La Framboise. In 1815, in anticipation of the return of the garrison, John Dean, an army contractor, built a house on the South Side, near the foot of Randolph street. In 1817 the Dean house passed to Mr. Beaubien, who occupied it for some time, but afterward converted it into a barn. In 1818 Mr. Beaubien became agent of the American Fur Company at this point. The old United States building just south of the fort was purchased first by Capt. Henry Whiting and second by the American Fur Company about 1823, and later was sold to Mr. Beaubien for $500. This was occupied by him as a home until 1840.

In July, 1816, Capt. Hezekiah Bradley, in command of two companies of infantry, arrived here under orders to rebuild Fort Dearborn on the same site. Soon after this the Indian Agency was resumed and settlers began to appear. The new fort was a square stockade, within which were officers' quarters, barracks, magazine and provision house; there were bastions at the northwest and southwest angles. A block house stood in the southwest corner. The garrison was maintained here until 1823, when, not being necessary, it was ordered away. Maj. Daniel Baker was commander from 1817 to 1820, when Capt. Hezekiah Bradley returned. In 1824 Maj. Alexander Cummings took command, but the same year was succeeded by Lieut. Col. John McNeil, who continued until 1827, when Capt. John Greene became commander. This was the year when Archibald Clybourn arrived here permanently. In October, 1828, the Indians again becoming troublesome, a garrison was sent here under the command of Maj. John Fowle. They remained until May, 1831, when they were again ordered away. Soon afterward, early in 1832, an Indian scare again brought a garrison—this time under the command of Maj. William Whistler. On July 8, 1832, General Scott arrived with a body of troops to assist in quelling the Indians. In May, 1833, Maj. John Fowle assumed command, but one month later was succeeded by Maj. Lafayette Wilcox. Afterwards, until Aug. 1, 1836, Maj. John Bendu, Maj. John Greene and Maj. Joseph Plympton commanded, but at that date the garrison was permanently withdrawn.

The Chicago government agency embraced the Pottawatomies, Sacs, Foxes, Kickapoos, and Charles Jouett became the first agent here in 1805. Mathew Irwin was factor from 1810 to the date of the massacre. He reported that the total amount of business done here in his department for the year 1810 was $4,712.57 and for the year 1811 was $6,055.89. Jacob B. Varnum became factor in 1816, but could do little business owing to the influx of British traders, who at the conclusion of the War of 1812 poured into the United States, intent on monopolizing the valuable Indian trade. Later these traders were thrown out of business by an order from the Secretary of War. The factory was abandoned about 1823. Charles Jouett was again factor from 1815 to 1818. His residence and agency house stood on the North Side and consisted of two large rooms. This house stood a short distance west of John Kinzie's home. In 1816 a Mr. Bridges lived on the north bank between the Kinzie and Jouett houses. James E. Herron and Henry Whiting were sutlers at Fort Dearborn in 1821-22. A Doctor McMahon and Dr. John Gale were here as early as 1820. Dr. Alexander Wolcott, in 1820, succeeded Mr. Jouett as Indian agent, and resided in the agency house, which stood near the foot of North State street and was called "Cobweb Castle." The next year Doctor Wolcott, Indian agent; J. B. Varnum, factor, and John Kinzie, sub-agent, signed the Indian treaty concluded here. Doctor Wolcott on Dec. 26, 1827, became a justice of the peace of Peoria county, of which the present Cook county was then an adjacency. Col. Thomas J. V. Owen succeeded Doctor Wolcott as Indian agent late in 1830 or early in 1831, and under him were Gholson Kercheval and James Stuart, sub-agents. Connected with the agency were Billy Caldwell (Indian), interpreter; David McKee, blacksmith, and Joseph Porthier, striker. It will be seen that nearly all of the settlers here prior to 1830 were either connected with the Government Agency, the American Fur Company, the Indian trade or the garrison. Gurdon S. Hubbard was agent of the American Fur Company. The trading-house at "Lee's Place," conducted after 1816 by John Crafts for Messrs. Conant & Mack, merchants of Detroit, was very successful, monopolizing most of the Indian trade owing to its advantageous location and to the antipathy of the Indians against the government factories. In 1818 Jean B. Beaubien became agent at Chicago for the American Fur Company and built a trading house on the South Side near the foot of Madison street, and in the end secured the trade of the Crafts house at "Lee's Place." W. H. Wallace traded at the latter place after about 1822. Associated with Wallace was a man named Davis. George Hunt was a trader at Wolf Point, or perhaps at "Lee's Place." Nearly all of these men were connected with the American Fur Company. Soon after 1825 the Indian trade at Chicago rapidly declined.

Originally Chicago river, from the forks to the lake, was about forty yards wide. Its present width is due to dredging. Just before reaching the lake the river turned southward nearly to the foot of the present Madison street. South of the Chicago river there were two sloughs between the garrison and the Point, one at the foot of State street. It ran a little north of the Sherman House, crossing Clark street near the old postoffice, thence crossing Lake street nearly in front of the Tremont House. The latter stood on the northwest corner of Lake and Dearborn and as late as 1834 sportsmen could shoot ducks in the slough from the door of the Tremont House. The other slough entered the river at the foot of La Salle street. The store built by P. F. W. Peck in 1831-32 at the southeast corner of La Salle and Water streets was on the high point of land formed by the bend of this slough. These sloughs were crossed on logs. Another small stream entered the river on the North Side, west of Wells street. According to John H. Fonda, of Prairie du Chien, Chicago contained about fourteen houses in 1825. During this year what is now Cook county was attached to Peoria county, and so far as known the first assessment at Chicago was levied by John L. Bogardus, assessor of that county, as follows:

	Valuation.	Tax.
Beaubien, John B.....	$1,000	$10.00
Clybourn, Jonas	625	6.25
Clark, John K.,	250	2.50
Crafts, John.....	5,000	50.00
Clermont, Jeremy	100	1.00
Coutra, Louis.....	50	.50
Kinzie, John.....	500	5.00
Laframboise, Claude.....	100	1.00
Laframboise, Joseph.....	50	.50
McKee, David.....	100	1.00
Piche, Peter	100	1.00
Robinson, Alexander.....	200	2.00
Wolcott, Alexander.....	572	5.72
Wilemet (Ouilmette), Antoine.....	400	4.00
	<hr/> $9,047	<hr/> $90.47

Of these, Clybourn and Clark lived on the North branch where the rolling mills were later located; Crafts lived with Beaubien; Clermont, Coutra and Piche were traders and probably lived near the forks; the Laframboise brothers were located at or near "Lee's Place;" David McKee was the agency blacksmith, near Wolcott's, on the North Side. Archibald Clybourn, half brother of John K. Clark and son of Jonas Clybourn, came here first on Aug. 5, 1823. Later his father and family came on and built two cabins on the North branch where the rolling mills afterward were located. James Galloway arrived in 1826 and settled at "Hardscrabble;" near them, southward, was another trader named Barney Lawton. During 1827 and 1828 the Miller tavern was erected by Samuel Miller on the North Side where the North branch joined the South branch; it was used as tavern, store and residence. About the same time Wolf tavern was built at the forks, but on the West Side; Elijah Wentworth occupied it in 1829. At the forks also, but on the South Side, was a cabin used for a store by R. A. Kinzie and David Hall; this no doubt was the building occupied later as a hotel by Mark Beaubien. Rev. William See lived here at this time. In June, 1829, Archibald Clybourn and Samuel Miller were authorized by Peoria county to keep a ferry near Wolf Point and to convey passengers across both branches and the main river. They were taxed two dollars and were required to give bond with security in the sum of $100. The Clybourns were butchers for the garrison, and in fact for this whole region, at a very early date, especially during the Blackhawk War in 1832. Mark Beaubien, brother of Jean B., came to Chicago in 1826. He kept tavern on the South Side at the forks and later built the Sauganash Hotel, an early frame house here. It stood at the southeast corner of Lake and Market streets. It was named in honor of Billy Caldwell, the Indian chief, that being his Indian name. Russell E. Heacock came here in July, 1827, but the following year located on the Peter Lampsett claim about three-quarters of a mile south of the lock at Bridgeport, or about a mile directly south of "Hard-scrabble." He was one of the first justices appointed in 1831; he had been admitted to the bar before coming here. Alexander Robinson (Che-che-pin-qua) was a voter here in 1825, 1826 and 1827, as shown by the records at Peoria.

For the year ending March 31, 1827, the net amount of postage at Chicago was so small that it was not reported; Peoria reported $57 and Edwardsville $171.43. In 1829 James Thompson, under authority of the state, came here to make an official survey of the site. His map is dated April 4, 1830; there were then at least seven families outside of the fort.

In the House (Congress) on Jan. 27, 1830, on motion of Joseph Duncan, of Illinois, it was "Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of improving the harbor at Chicago, on Lake Michigan, in the State of Illinois." On Feb. 10, 1830, Mr. Duncan moved the following resolution, but it was laid on the table: "Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House with a survey and estimate for the improvement of the harbor at Chicago, on Lake Michigan." But the following day it was taken up and agreed to by the House. The matter was referred to the appropriate committee as soon as the Secretary of War had furnished the matter desired.

The first frame house in Cook county was built in 1828 by the Government for Billy Caldwell, chief of the Pottawatomies. It first stood on Superior street, where the Catholic church was located, but later was moved to Indiana, west of Cass.

Governor Bond in his message to the first Legislature in 1818 brought the subject of the canal to the attention of that body; and in 1822 his successor, Governor Coles, devoted considerable space to the same topic. By the act of Feb. 14, 1823, a board of canal commissioners was appointed. In the autumn of 1823 a portion of the Board with Col. J. Post, of Missouri, as chief engineer, made a tour of inspection and in the autumn of 1824 Col. P. Paul, of St. Louis, an engineer, was employed. Five different routes were surveyed and estimates made of the costs; the highest estimate was $716,110. In 1823 Sangamon river and Fulton county were the northern limit of settlement. All north was a wilderness. But the people of the south half of the state wanted water communication with New York via the Great Lakes, and saw it could come to Chicago through the Erie canal (completed in 1825) and the Chicago canal. So they favored the law. It was their influence that gave Illinois so much lake coast in 1818 when the north boundary was set north. In January, 1825, the Illinois and Michigan canal was incorporated with one million capital. The stock was not taken, so the act was repealed. In the meantime the Illinois representatives and senators in Congress were urging Congress to grant land for the purpose. Hon. Daniel P. Cook led in this movement. On March 2, 1827, the act was passed, but, owing to the financial stringency, nothing was done till Jan. 22, 1829, when the Legislature passed a law, organizing a Canal Board. S. D. Lockwood came with the canal commissioners in 1829; he said the residents of Chicago then were John Kinzie, who resided on the North Side; Doctor Wolcott, who lived on the North Side, west of Kinzie, and was the son-in-law of Kinzie; John Miller, who kept a "log tavern at the Forks;" John B. Beaubien, on the South Side; and three or four Indian traders living in log cabins on the West Side; these were in addition to the officers and soldiers of the garrison, some of whom had wives and children.

By act approved February, 1831, it was made the duty of the superintending canal commissioner to ascertain whether the Calumet (Calumet) would be a sufficient feeder for that part of the canal between Chicago and Des Plaines rivers "or whether the construction of a railroad is not preferable or will be of more public utility than a canal." Should the said river be found sufficient, excavation on the canal was ordered to proceed without delay.

In June, 1831, pursuant to an order of the Secretary of War, this post was abolished and the fort was left in charge of Colonel Owen, government agent of the Pottawatomies, Ottawas and Chippewas. In July, 1831, the schooner "Telegraph" arrived from down the lake with supplies. By September the fort, the Kinzie home, the other buildings and the hotels were filled with emigrant families. Late in September Colonel Owen paid the Indian annuities. The whites while the Indians were drunk stole a large share of what they had received. In November, 1831, the schooner "Marengo," owned by Oliver Newberry, of Detroit, arrived with supplies. She could not enter the river, but anchored in the lake and rode out the storm that was brewing. Later small boats brought her cargo ashore. Captain Stuart commanded the "Marengo."

During the winter of 1831-32, nearly all families here lived within the fort and were furnished with supplies by George W. Dole, whose store was within the enclosure. Another store was conducted by R. A. Kinzie at Wolf Point, where the river forked. There were no mail routes, post roads nor postoffices. Every two weeks a half-breed Indian was sent to Niles, Michigan, for the mail, covering the distance on foot and consuming a week. Of course the arrival of the mail was an event of great interest. During the Winter a debating society was organized with J. B. Beaubien as president. An occasional dance and a religious meeting once a week were about the only diversions. Mark Noble, Jr., his wife and his two daughters and Mrs. R. J. Hamilton were Methodists; the latter was the mainstay of that church here.

Gurdon S. Hubbard came here in October, 1818. He was an Indian trader. In the Fort Dearborn preëmption suit he testified as follows: "From the piazza of the Kinzie house we could look directly down the river about half way to the mouth, where the view was obstructed by a bank. The mouth was about where Madison street now is. The mouth was a shifty one; it gradually went farther south. At one time it went down as far as where the Illinois Central roadhouse now is, about a mile and a half from the fort.* It was then so small that we could hardly get our boats through. I should say that the mouth at Madison street was the permanent mouth. We used to hunt foxes on the bar. The foxes were caught in the woods and fed and got in condition at the fort. On festival days they were taken to the upper end of the sand bar and loosed, when the dogs were put on them and they were chased in the sand. There was land enough to make the sport entertaining. The bar was about two hundred feet wide, but ran off to a mere spit at the end. Lots 24 and 25 in Kinzie's addition would strike the center of the river. Should say the Kinzie house was on Lot 23. It was in the fall of 1828 that the bar extended down to the pine trees about one and one-half miles. In 1831 the mouth of the river was not far from Wright's place. In 1828 or 1829 the channel was dug across the bar where it now is by the commanding officer of Fort Dearborn. It soon was a deep channel, but afterwards filled up again. At no time did the channel form itself. The effect of the piers was to cause the washing away of the sand bar and the increasing of land north of the piers. The river at its mouth was navigable immediately after crossing the bar. At the mouth we could ride a horse across and sometimes we had difficulty in getting into it with Mackinac boats. There were no houses on the sand bar in 1834. There were some shanties put on the bar in 1835, which were carried off by a gale of wind that fall. The sand bar at the upper end, opposite the old fort, was from three to five feet high, gradually diminishing toward the south. The surface was unequal. No vegetation was on the bar. I was here in the spring and fall for periods of from four to six weeks—1818 to 1825. The commandant at the fort, I think, cut across the bar in 1822; but it blocked up. It was cut through again in 1829 by men from the fort. In 1829 it took us not over two hours to cut a line to let water into the lake from the river, and then the river cut its way in two hours to admit batteaux—was five feet deep by morning—high water mark where the piers now are—no one here to do it but from the fort. They used to receive supplies from a small schooner, forty or fifty tons (chartered by the Government), once a year. That schooner with traders' boats was all the marine of Lake Michigan. The boat passed through the cut from the fort in 1829 merely to test its capabilities. I have seen the river outlet as small as a mere ripple—could step across it in 1828 and have seen it with only six inches of water, though perhaps a hundred feet wide—think vessels loaded off Madison street, and we went out in scows to get goods. We would take goods out and lift boats over—have seen the sea make completely over the bar into the river at points of depression—went over in 1827 and 1828 at foot of Randolph street. John H. Kinzie took a boat and went out to take myself and friends from the vessel. On going out they dragged the boat over the bar—coming back we jumped the bar.”*

Richard J. Hamilton's testimony: “Came to Chicago in April, 1831; never saw any of the fox chases on the sand bar; cabins were built on the bar in 1836 and 1837.” John W. Strode's testimony: “Came here in August, 1836; was here several days in 1831; there were then only seven or eight houses outside of the garrison.” George W. Dole's testimony: “Came here in May, 1831—was clerk of Oliver Newberry—was on the sand bar often—we entered the river in a yawl boat from a schooner—went out in a scow to get goods from vessels—used setting poles in the channel—was in the garrison from May, 1831, to June, 1832—then lived at the corner of Decatur and South Water streets—had my store there—one of the cabins on the bar belonged to George E. Walker—Hardscrabble was afterward called Bridgeport.” William Brewster's testimony: “Came here first in 1818—staid two or three weeks—came by land and stopped at the Kinzie house—was here in September, 1833, at the time of the treaty—had occasion to pass out at the mouth of the river—have seen it not more than six or eight inches in depth, varying with the wind.” Alexander Robinson's, a Pottawatomie chief's, testimony: “Came to Chicago about 1815—knew the Kinzies well—for seventeen years past have lived twelve miles from Chicago—till then lived at the forks of the river for eight or nine years—was an interpreter four or five years.”

In 1829 the Legislature authorized the canal commissioners, Dr. Gershom Jayne of Springfield, Edmund Roberts of Kaskaskia and Charles Dunn of Pope, “to locate the canal, lay out towns, sell lots and apply the proceeds to the construction of the canal.” They sent here James Thompson, who surveyed and platted what afterwards became known as the “Original Town of Chicago,” locating it on Section 9, Township 39 north, Range 14 east. It extended from State to Desplaines and from Madison to Kinzie. The plat is dated August 4, 1830. Colbert's “directory” thus summarized the town at this date: Taverns—Elijah Wentworth, west of the river near the fork; Samuel Miller, north of the river at the fork; Mark Beaubien, south of the river and east of the South fork. Indian Traders—Robert A. Kinzie, near Wentworth's tavern; Leon Bourisso, just south of Beaubien's tavern; a log trading house near the foot of North Dearborn street; J. B. Beaubien, just south of the fort. Butcher—Archibald Clybourn of the North branch, about two miles from Wolf Point and west of the stream. James Kinzie, Rev. William See and Alexander Robinson and their families resided on the West Side near Wentworth's tavern. David McKee and Billy Caldwell were on the North Side near "Cobweb Castle," which was then vacant. Gholson Kercheval, Dr. E. Harmon and James Harrington were also here. At an election held at the house of James Kinzie on August 2, 1830, this, the First election precinct of Peoria county, polled the following vote: Jonathan N. Bailey (first postmaster) lived in part of old Kinzie house; John B. Beaubien, Medore B. Beaubien moved to Kansas; Leon Bourrassea (Bourisso); James Brown; Billy Caldwell (Indian chief); Jean Baptiste Chevalier; John L. Davis, a tailor, moved to Milwaukee; Russell E. Heacock lived near Hardscrabble; John S. C. Hogan; James Kinzie, see elsewhere; B. H. Lawton or Laughton lived at what is now Riverside; Joseph Laframboise, a Frenchman with an Indian wife; Stephen Mack, clerk of the American Fur Company; John Mann; Daniel McKee, agency blacksmith, moved to Aurora; Alexander McDale; Rev. William See, blacksmith also; Stephen J. Scott; Joseph Thibaut; Daniel Van Eaton; Rev. Jesse Walker, from Peoria, in missionary work; Peter Frique; Mark Beaubien; Laurant Martin; Jean Baptiste Secor; Joseph Banskey; Michael Welch; Francis Ladusier; Lewis Ganday; Peresh Le Clerc, Indian interpreter.

Wolcott's addition on the North Side was bought in 1830 for $130; in 1854 it was valued at $250,000. Walter L. Newberry bought forty acres of Thomas Hartzell in 1853 for $1,062; in 1854 it was valued at $500,000, and Mr. Newberry still owned the most of it. On it was Newberry's addition. In 1834 half of Kinzie's addition, all of Wolcott's addition and all of Block 1 of the Original Town were sold for $20,000; in 1854 they were valued at $3,000,000. Every foot of land showed a proportionate increase at the latter date.

Ellen Hamilton, daughter of Richard J., was born in Fort Dearborn early in 1832. At this date, Elijah Wentworth and family lived in a log house owned by James Kinzie and kept tavern there. James Kinzie was here with his family, also William See and family, and Alexander Robinson and family. On the North Side was Samuel Miller and family, and with them was John Miller, a brother. East of the South branch, at the forks, was Mark Beaubien and family, who kept tavern; above him, on the South branch, was Bourisso, an Indian trader. Between Mark Beaubien and the fort—on the South Side—there were no houses except a small log cabin near the foot of Dearborn and used as an Indian trading house. Near the garrison and south was J. B. Beaubien's family, connected with the American Fur Company in the Indian trade; near his residence was his store; farther south was a house then unoccupied. On the North Side, opposite the fort, was the Kinzie home; farther west, on the North Side, was what had been the government agency house, "Cobweb Castle." Dr. Wolcott had died there the fall of 1830 and had occupied this place, but it was now vacant. In its vicinity were several log buildings for a blacksmith, an interpreter and others of the agency—the blacksmith, David McKee, and Billy Caldwell, head chief of the Pottawatomies, Ottawas and Chippewas. He was interpreter. Col. Thomas J. V. Owen succeeded Doctor Wolcott as Indian agent, but had not yet arrived. Gholson Kercheval was a sub-agent. Dr. E. Harmon and James Harrington were here and were making claims on the lake shore. About twelve families in all lived here in the Spring of 1831.

The two schooners "Telegraph" and "Marengo," which arrived here in 1831, came loaded with emigrants, the preëmption law being the inducement. The former came from Ashtabula, Ohio, and the latter from Detroit. The first deed on record from Governor Reynolds to Robert Kinzie, assignee of B. B. Kercheval, conveyed Lots 5 and 6, Block 29, Original Town, for $109; it was recorded on December 2, 1831, by R. J. Hamilton. Wolf Point was on the West Side at the juncture of the two branches of the river. In 1831 there was considerable rivalry between the "Point" and the "Lower Town," near the fort. P. F. W. Peck, who had come here first in 1831, opened a store in the Miller building on the North Side at the juncture, but in the Fall of 1832 erected a frame building on the southeast corner of South Water and La Salle streets. Lumber was brought here from Plainfield, forty miles southwest.

The important questions at Chicago during the first six years of the organization of the county were the following: Postoffice, land office, a newspaper started, formation and organization of the county, with Chicago the county seat, war of 1832, first work of the harbor, first vessel over the bar, packing trade, schools and religious societies, sale of school lands, disposal of wharf rights, incorporation of Chicago, first work on the canal, drawbridges, stage line to the interior, land and lot speculation, immense travel of emigrants, pork packing, corporate limits bounded by State to Desplaines and Madison to Kinzie—about three-eighths of a square mile.

Upon the organization of Cook county, Mark Beaubien gave a bond for $200 for his ferry license, and agreed to carry free all residents of the county; he used a scow that cost him $65. In 1831 a wooden bridge that cost $486.20 was built across the North branch at North Water street; that amount was raised by popular subscription. About the same time another was built across the South branch, about half way between Lake and Randolph streets. The Pottawatomies subscribed $200 toward this bridge. In the Fall of 1831 there were seven taverns—that number being filled constantly with the numerous settlers and travelers. Wolves were were numerous and visited all parts of the town at night. The Indians were threatening; in May, 1832, there were five hundred persons in the fort. Upon the organization of Cook county in 1831 Richard J. Hamilton became county clerk and recorder, and later judge of probate, treasurer and commissioner of schools. The first postoffice was established in the spring of 1831, with Jonathan N. Bailey postmaster.

In 1832 the schooner "Austerlitz" brought from Detroit one hundred barrels of coarse and 120 barrels of fine salt—received by Newberry & Dole, and the same year the schooner "Napoleon" brought forty-one barrels of fine salt from Detroit. In 1835 Doctor Wheeler bought all the salt here and after navigation closed sold it at $8 per barrel. In 1852 the salt receipts were 92,907 barrels; in 1858 they were 333,983 barrels.

"At a meeting of the citizens of Chicago, convened pursuant to public notice given according to the statute for incorporating towns, Thomas J. V. Owen was chosen president and E. S. Kimberly was chosen clerk. The oaths were administered by Russell E. Heacock, a justice of the peace for Cook county, when the following vote was taken on the proposition of incorporating the town of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois: For incorporation, John S. C. Hogan, C. A. Ballard, G. W. Snow, R. J. Hamilton, J. T. Temple, John Wright, G. W. Dole, Hiram Pearsons, Alanson Sweet, E. S. Kimberly, T. J. V. Owen, Mark Beaubien—12. Against incorporation, Russell E. Heacock—1. We certify the above poll to be correct.

(Signed) T. J. V. OWEN, President.

ED. S. KIMBERLY, Clerk."

This election record was not dated, but Mr. Kimberly afterward said it was held about twenty days before the election.

On August 10 the election of Trustees was held, with the following result: T. J. V. Owen, 26 votes; George W. Dole, 26 votes; Madore B. Beaubien, 23 votes; John Miller, 20 votes; E. S. Kimberly, 20 votes. On the 12th, at its first meeting, the board elected Colonel Owen president and appointed Isaac Harmon clerk. In September, 1833, George W. Dole was appointed town treasurer; Charles H. Chapman was appointed ferryman. On November 6 the town limits were made to embrace the following tract: Bounded south by Jackson street; west by Jefferson and Cook; north by Ohio; east by the lake on the north side and by State street on the south side. In November Benjamin Jones was appointed street commissioner, and in December George Snow assessor and surveyor, and John Dean Caton town counsel.

In 1833 a second ferry was started. Work on the piers and harbor was begun with an appropriation of $30,000. A brick building was erected at North Water and State streets. A clumsy drawbridge was built at Dearborn street, and a board of health was organized. This year the first considerable fire occurred. A town well was dug. Over two hundred frame buildings were erected this year (1833). A jail was built and a stage line to Ottawa was opened. The Democrat, founded by John Calhoun, was started in November. This was the banner year for development thus far.

The Democrat of November 26, 1833, said: "The rapidly increasing importance of Chicago in a commercial point of view calls aloud for the speedy commencement and completion of the long contemplated canal, or railroad, which is to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Illinois river. * * * To the rushing flood of population that is constantly pouring in upon our western borders, we have never given full faith and credit. We have supposed it but the fruit of an overheated brain. We have disbelieved; we have doubted. But our disbelief has been converted to belief. The reality is before us. Chicago, nay, the very spot of ground where we are now writing, a few months since was the abode of the savage, and where are now seen a long line of habitations for white men, a short time ago was unoccupied save by the wigwam of the Indian. The change has been wrought by magic. More than eight hundred souls may now be found within the limits, that within a few short months since included less than one-tenth that number. * * * Even in the present infant state of the place, we are informed upon the most unquestionable authority that one single mercantile house in New York has sent to Chicago during the past year goods the import duties of which were $35,000. What then will be the limit to commerce when our population shall have increased (as it surely will in a short period of time) ten fold; and when the harbor, which under the fostering care of the Government has already been commenced, and is yet in progress, shall be completed. * * * Two recent events have contributed to diffuse a more accurate knowledge of the resources and prospects of this locality—the late treaty with the Indians and the sale of school lands."

A remarkable fact about Chicago is that at no time in its history has it stood still; all other towns but Chicago have had their "ups and downs." The principal cause of this fact was the rapid settlement of the western country adjacent to Chicago and the facilities of inter-communication. As early as December, 1833, a permanent mail route between Chicago and St. Louis was projected. The route was in operation by January 1, 1834. Continuing until nearly the middle of December, 1833, the packet boat plied between Chicago and St. Joseph. In December, 1833, the Chicago Polemical Society was organized; J. B. Beaubien was its first president. By 1833 over 1,000 miles of railroad had been projected in this state. In December, 1833, the mail route between Chicago and Green Bay was discontinued by order of the Postmaster General. On December 24, 1833, the Chicago Temperance Society was organized; J. Watkins was secretary. In the fall of 1833 Elijah Wentworth opened a tavern on Flag creek, eighteen miles southwest of Chicago on the Ottawa road. Early in January, 1834, a man was frozen to death on the prairie between Chicago and Blue Island and was devoured by wolves.

On Saturday, January 11, 1834, a mass meeting of the citizens was held at Steele's Eagle hotel to petition Congress for the completion of the post route from Detroit to Chicago. John Beaubien presided and J. Dean Caton was secretary. Post coaches carried the mail from Detroit to Niles, whence it was brought once a week over a very difficult route to Chicago.

"Chicago, December 4, 1833."

"The spring of 1833 may be marked as a new era in the history of Chicago, and, in fact, all the northern part of the state, or indeed that may be referred to as the commencement of their improvement. At that time Chicago did not contain more than five or six regular stores and now may be counted from twenty to twenty-five; then it did not contain more than one hundred and fifty inhabitants; whereas now there are from eight to ten hundred; then it did not contain more than thirty buildings, now may be seen more than one hundred and eighty. During the past summer (1833) eighty vessels have arrived, bringing goods and prosperity to a vast amount, yet notwithstanding these immense importations during the past season, hardly three good assortments could now be made in this place. After the fall stock of goods had arrived, every store was crowded to excess—now they look quite empty. But the mercantile business has not alone flourished; indeed that in the business of Chicago has been but of small moment. Building and real improvements have been the order of the day. To describe the want that has been for building material and mechanics would be only to excite incredulity. . . . The harbor which is now in progress at this place, it is confidently hoped, will be so far advanced in the early part of the season as to admit vessels into the river, when the danger that has hitherto existed to vessels laying in the offing to discharge and receive their cargoes will be remedied. Then our advancement will receive a new impulse. . . . Most of the town is now in the hands of individuals, besides all laying north of the river, between the North Branch and the lake and west of the North Branch. The school section which lays on both sides of the South Branch, most of which is in town, was sold in the latter part of October last, placing the largest portion of the town in a tangible condition," said the Democrat, January 28, 1834.

But notwithstanding this big increase, the town could not borrow $2,000 for one year at 10 per cent. People could do better in land and lot speculation. But laws, streets, repairs and drainage required attention. At the fort the county commissioners met and the judges held court there. All shows that the officials were energetic and vigilant. Mud holes were labeled "bottomless pits" by wags amid jibes and jeers. The officers could do little and resigned in June, 1833.

Before 1834, hardly a building devoted to business stood south of the river. In 1834, Thomas Church erected a store on Lake and then others came rapidly. Ira Couch conducted the Tremont House. Mark Beaubien's ferry and one at Dearborn street were the only two. A bridge was soon built at or near Dearborn street. It was torn down owing to jealousy and one was built at Clark street. In 1834 Capt. R. C. Bristol, in the brig "John Kinzie," took a cargo of 2,000 bushels of wheat from St. Joseph, Michigan, to Buffalo. It is claimed that this trip was made before that of the "Post Boy." Late in May, 1834, the schooner "Post Boy," Capt. Jeremy Hickson, left Michigan City for Buffalo with a cargo of wheat owned by G. W. Harrison, of La Porte, Indiana, and shipped by Samuel Miller, of Michigan City. The vessel reached Buffalo in June. The wheat, which had cost Mr. Miller 50 cents per bushel, brought 75 cents per bushel at Buffalo.—(Daily Democrat, April 13, 1849.)

"Chicago Harbor.—Owing to the heavy rains that fell on Friday last, the Chicago river was swollen to an unusual height. At sunrise on Saturday this great volume of water had forced a passage over the bar at the mouth of the harbor that is constructing, and notwithstanding the great impediments which it met from the large quantities of ice in the sand, it progressed with such astounding rapidity that by evening a channel was cleared about eighty feet in width and from seven to eight feet in depth. Nearly all the water from the river now passes into the lake through this new channel, which from the effect of the pier that is thrown across the old channel of the river on the south side of the harbor, it is confidently hoped will be kept open. This is a most fortunate occurrence, not only for the citizens but for the Government. The hands employed at the harbor were very actively engaged during the day rendering what service they could in aiding the operations of the current. The amount of sand and gravel removed by the force of the stream is immense, and but for this most fortunate occurrence would most probably have required the labor of an hundred hands for some time to effect what was done by the water in a few hours. Vessels will now be able to discharge their cargoes with more facility than formerly."—(Democrat, Tuesday, February 18, 1834.)

"At a meeting of the citizens of Cook county held at the Eagle hotel, February 15, 1834, Dr. J. T. Temple was appointed a delegate to the convention to be held at Rushville to determine a new capital for the state. It was "Resolved, That said delegate be instructed to oppose to the utmost of his ability any measure that may tend to connect the location of the seat of government with the question of the construction of a canal or railroad between the Illinois river and Lake Michigan." The following citizens were appointed a committee to draft a petition to Congress on the subject of preëmption rights to present and future actual settlers. J. D. Caton, R. J. Hamilton, J. H. Collins, E. S. Casey, Giles Spring and R. T. Kinzie. This petition to Congress recited that the public lands of Cook county had not yet been offered for sale by the general government, owing to the fact that the survey of the same had not been completed; that the said lands, being very rich, had been settled upon by permanent residents who expected to be protected as other localities had been by suitable preëmption laws; that failure to complete the survey and place the lands in market was retarding the settlement and development of the country; that justice toward this hitherto neglected portion of the state, to the infant town of Chicago and to your petitioners, demands reasonable despatch to encourage emigration and the settlement of the said lands." Of this meeting, J. V. Owen was chairman, and P. F. W. Peck, secretary.

"The United States is now constructing a harbor by making a passage through this bar into the Chicago river and fortifying the sides with piers to protect the channel from the winds and ice. When this work shall be completed the channel between the piers and the Chicago river will itself form the best harbor in all the northern lake country, as the river is from fifty to seventy-five yards wide and from fifteen to twenty-five feet deep, forming a great natural canal."—(Democrat, January, 1834.)

"Chicago must eventually become the greatest place for business and commerce in all the Northwest. Already it is a great thoroughfare for so new a place. Merchants through the northern portions of Indiana as far south as Terre Haute; those of Edgar, Vermilion, Champaign, Iroquois, and all the northern counties in Illinois, with the adjacent territory, now receive their goods through this channel. Schooners are the principal vessels that now navigate Lake Michigan. In 1831 the number of arrivals was seven; in 1832, about forty-five; during 1833, about one hundred twenty. More than one hundred dwelling houses, stores and shops were erected during the summer of 1833. There are about thirty stores, some of which do extensive business. Three houses for public worship were built in 1833. A respectable academy is taught by a gentleman and lady."—(A letter in the Democrat, dated February 17, 1834.)

"Emigration to this place has commenced in earnest. Within the last ten days over one hundred persons have arrived by boat and otherwise, and it is with pleasure that we witness the arrival at our wharves of articles of which we have been deprived for some months past. There are now three vessels engaged to supply this place with lumber, which gives new life to the business appearance of the town."—(Democrat, April 30, 1834.)

"It is with pleasure that we witness the continued influx of emigration that is rapidly pouring into this place. As near as we can ascertain from two hundred and fifty to three hundred persons have arrived here within the last week, and rumor says that thousands are on their passage to this state, the garden of the West."—(Democrat, May 31, 1834.)

"We have lived our whole life in a flourishing town in New York and it seems that hardly so great a change has taken place there since our remembrance as we have witnessed in Chicago in the past six months. We dare not venture on anticipation of the future. Reason looks on in astonishment and all calculation is abandoned. Since emigration commenced this spring, we hesitate not to say that more than one thousand emigrants have arrived, intending to settle in Chicago or the country back. We are happy to say that the emigrants appear to be wealthy, enterprising and industrious. Such inhabitants constitute the wealth of a country."—(Democrat, May 28, 1834.)

"We feel again called upon to advert to the still increasing tide of emigration that is constantly flowing into the northern part of the state. Hardly a vessel arrives but that is literally crowded with emigrants, and the stage which now runs twice a week from the East is also thronged with travelers. The steamboat "Pioneer" which now performs her regular trips to St. Joseph, is also a great accommodation to the traveling community. Loaded teams and covered wagons, laden with families and goods, are daily arriving and settling upon the country back."—(Democrat, June 11, 1834.)

On January 2, 1834, a Mrs. Smith, of Blue Island, was frozen to death on the prairie about a mile and a half from her home. When found she had been torn to pieces by the wolves; she left five children. In January the Polemical Society debated the question: "Has the Congress of the United States Constitutional Power to Make Internal Improvement?" John A. Clark was now secretary of the society. Lieut. J. Allen, of the U. S. army, became superintendent of the harbor in January, 1834.

The Northeast Land district of Illinois was created early in 1834; it embraced all east of a north and south line between Ranges 3 and 4 east; headquarters were fixed at Chicago. On February 15, 1834, an adjourned meeting, held at Steele's Eagle hotel, decided to elect a delegate to the Ottawa convention pledged to work for "the immediate construction of a communication either by a canal or railroad between Lake Michigan and the Illinois river." A writer in the Democrat thus expressed himself: "The long contemplated but hitherto worse than neglected Illinois and Michigan canal." Joseph Duncan, representative in Congress, wrote in February, 1834, that a bill had been reported appropriating $32,800 for carrying on the work of improving Chicago harbor. Saganaskee swamp was a well known locality west of the head of the South branch in early years. On March 4, 1834, Lieutenant Allen advertised for written proposals to supply oak timber for the Chicago harbor—10,000 feet of squared logs, 350 feet of round logs for ties and fifty round logs for piles. Mark Noble, Senator, published a notice in January, 1834, that he would prosecute all trespassers on the west half, southwest quarter, Section 4, Township 39 north, Range 14 east, where the steam saw mill stood. This tract was on the North Branch. Railroads from Chicago to Milwaukee and from Chicago to Ottawa were talked of in 1834. It was noted in the spring of 1834 that Michigan and other states eastward, through envy, did all in their power to prevent emigrants bound for Chicago from going to their destination. Chicago and vicinity were "represented as being a low, wet, sickly and barren country, destitute of every attraction that can invite emigration."

"Chicago.—Our town is building up rapidly. Since spring commenced there have been built upwards of seventy-five buildings, and among these we note some substantial ones of three stories high, and the commencement of two or three others for stores of three stories. Emigration is still increasing and has increased one-half since last year, having already a settled population of at least 1,500 and the country is filling up in like proportion. Rents are high and lots rent on the principal street for $3 a foot front. The commercial business is by no means contemptible, for already has arrived nearly as great a number of vessels as arrived during the whole of last season.”—(Democrat, June 18, 1834.)

S. J. Gunderson

“Lithographic Maps of Chicago.—Mr. John H. Kinzie procured while in New York a few lithographic maps of this town. They are beautifully executed and contain the Town Plat, together with the School Section, Wabansia, and Kinzie’s addition.”—(Democrat, June 18, 1834.)

Referring to the growth of Chicago, a writer in the Democrat of June 18, 1834, said: “In a few months we have seen the number of buildings double, and even yet there are not houses enough to contain our population. What Chicago will be by the close of navigation we can only conjecture. The country immediately around us is filling up in proportion. From the country of the Wabash alone, there are frequently in town at one time from twenty to thirty wagons loaded with breadstuff, and the necessary products, some of them brought from a distance of a hundred or a hundred and fifty miles over a road so notoriously bad that it often requires eight yoke of oxen to draw a single wagon. We, in turn, send them back salt and merchandise of every description. A railroad from Chicago to Vincennes should be built. Let our citizens and those of the Wabash unite at once in a work so much to their mutual benefit. There should be no delay or postponement. The railroad will not build itself. If there is that inaction among us regarding works of internal improvement of such vital interest to us as we have seen displayed on the subject of the Illinois and Michigan canal, we will soon win the name once bestowed for the like cause in reproach upon North Carolina, the ‘Rip Van Winkle of the Union.’”

“Our citizens were not a little delighted on Saturday morning last by a sight as novel as it was beautiful. About 9 o’clock their attention was arrested by the appearance of the splendid schooner ‘Illinois’ as she came gliding up the river into the heart of the town under full sail. The ‘Illinois’ is a new vessel of nearly one hundred tons, launched this spring at Sackett’s Harbor, New York, is a perfect model of a schooner, and is commanded by Captain Pickering. Her top masts were covered with flags and streamers and her canvas was all spread to invite the gentle breeze. The banks of the river were crowded with a delighted crowd, and as she reached the wharf of Newberry & Dole, where she first stopped, she was hailed with loud and repeated cheers. Her decks were immediately crowded by the citizens, all anxious to greet her gallant commander with a warm and hearty welcome. The drawbridge was soon raised and she passed into the upper end of the town and came to at Ingersoll's wharf in front of the Western Stage house. On her passage up the river more than two hundred of our citizens were on board."—(Democrat, July 16, 1834.)

Although the article does not say so, this was the first lake vessel to sail up the Chicago river. On Monday night following, the schooner "Philip," Captain Howe, also entered the river, and on Tuesday discharged her cargo at the wharf of Newberry & Dole.

"Chicago Harbor.—This work is now in rapid progress and never has it before presented so busy and active a scene as at the present time. About one hundred hands are employed upon this work and more are still wanted. The North pier is rapidly extending into the lake and as soon as it shall be built across the sand bar lying opposite the mouth of the river, so that the channel shall be protected from the northeast winds, we may soon expect to find it of sufficient depth to admit vessels of the larger class into the river. Under its present very active and efficient superintendent, Lieut. J. Allen, much may be expected this season."—(Democrat, August 13, 1834.)

"Mails.—The apathy prevalent among our citizens is astonishing, with a population of over two thousand five hundred, dependent upon the postoffice in this town; with the business transacted equal to some places where a semi-daily mail is required; with a garrison of troops; with important public works in progress; with an Indian agency through which the Government is now negotiating the ratification of a treaty; with all these it is a matter of astonishment that the people should feel such indifference on the subject of mails."—(Democrat, August 13, 1834.)

"Chicago Piers.—Since the commencement upon the United States piers this work has progressed rapidly. The pier on the north side has been extended into the lake six hundred feet and to near eight feet of water. This pier is to be finished thus far before it is extended farther. Much credit is due to Lieutenant Allen, the superintendent, in forwarding this work."—(Democrat, October 1, 1834.)

In the summer of 1834 Chicago began to be visited once a week by the steamboat "Uncle Sam" from Buffalo. The steamboat "Pioneer" plied regularly between Chicago and St. Joseph. Four to five schooners ran regularly across the lake. At this time, also, the stage began to run twice a week between Niles and St. Joseph. The steamboat "Pioneer" was wrecked near St. Joseph in July, 1834, but the passengers were saved by the "Marengo." A bill in the Legislature in 1833-34 proposed to incorporate the "Michigan and Illinois Railroad Company." The trustees of Chicago elected in 1834 were John H. Kinzie, Gurdon S. Hubbard, J. K.

Boyer, Ebenezer Goodrich and J. S. C. Hogan. In August, 1834, four-horse post coaches ran twice a week between St. Louis and Chicago; the route ran through Ottawa, Peoria and Springfield. A big mass meeting at the "Methodist Chapel" on October 4, 1834, appointed a committee of thirty to collect facts in regard to "a canal or railroad and an extension of the post road beyond Ottawa."

On October 6, 1834, it was reported that a black bear had been seen in the woods on the South branch above Madison street. Many went out and finally located bruin in a big tree. A shot brought it down, but two more shots were required before it was dispatched. This little adventure stirred the hunting instincts of the inhabitants, who thereupon determined to have a wolf hunt. Three or four divisions were formed and many of the animals were routed out—one took to the lake when surrounded; another was driven into the town and was killed by an officer of the fort with a sword. About twenty wolves were slain.—(Democrat, October 8, 1834.)

In March, 1834, a water front lot sold for $3,500—Lot 4, Block 17, near all the business houses. Merchants did not want back lots. The lot was 80 by 150 feet. "I think father will not give half that for it. But his ideas do not keep up with property in Chicago. I am sure that lot will fetch $5,000 in less than three months. What makes me think so is, there are a great many merchants coming this summer. . . . Last evening I made another bargain for ninety and one-half acres of land, for which I am to pay $3,500, the same sum that the town lot cost; seventy-three acres lie on the North Branch of the Chicago river."—(A young land speculator's correspondence in 1834.)

In 1832 the above lot had been sold for $100. The young man who paid $3,500 for it in 1834, sold it fifteen months later for $15,000. In June, 1835, the fight for government land at $1.25 per acre was hotly contested. In 1836 the rush was nearly as great. All money went to the government for land; promissory notes circulated as money. A hundred emigrant vessels arrived between April and September 1834; besides many persons came by land. In the fall of 1834 the village population was a little over 1,500; in November, 1835, there were 3,265 by the census and 9,773 in Cook county. Most all of them were valid settlers.

In November 1834, the gamblers here began to be a serious menace to the peace and quiet of the town; thus far no ordinance checking them had been passed. On November 18, 1834, Billy Caldwell, chief of the United Pottawatomies, Ottawas and Chippewas, married in Chicago Sangua Le Grand, a Pottawatomie young lady. In December, 1834, proposals to carry the mails between Chicago and Green Bay, once a week on horseback, for three years, were called for. In December, 1834, the Democrat, the only newspaper here, ran out of paper and as no more could be obtained, the issue was stopped until May, 1835. On Monday, June 15, 1835, the public lands of Cook county were offered for sale and the offer remained open for two weeks. Emigration into this part of the state was so immense in 1835 that Chicago was often out of provisions; flour was $12 per barrel in June; corn $1 per bushel; oats, 62 to 78 cents; wheat, 63 to 69 cents; beef, 4 to 6 cents a pound; butter, 20 to 25 cents a pound; potatoes, $1 to $1.50 per bushel. In 1835 a new mail route ran from Chicago to Galena via Naperville. The first annual fair of the ladies of the Protestant Episcopal Church was held June 18, 1835. At this time the streets and open lots were so filthy that a mass meeting of the citizens requested the officials to "clean up." At the meeting were Messrs. Hubbard, Curtiss, Peck, Morris, Fullerton, Sweet, Temple and King. By June 24 flour was $15 to $16 per barrel; there was no corn in the market.

"Everything about our town looks flourishing and prosperous. Whichever way we turn our eyes encounter new buildings and new business—all giving evidence of an accession of population and enterprise hitherto unknown even here. Several things, however, require immediate attention. First, the gutters ought to be drained and the sunken spots in the vacant lots and about the buildings should be drained or filled immediately. Health is the first consideration; second, is it not time that something was done to protect the town from the ravages of fire? So far as we are advised, there is not even a fire bucket in Chicago."—(Democrat, May 20, 1835.)

"On Monday morning last we counted twelve vessels anchored off our harbor from the lower lakes, all, we believe, loaded with merchandise for this place. We would like some of our southern fellow citizens who are opposed to a canal just to drop in upon us and see how we are doing things up about this time in Chicago. We apprehend some of our farmers below would begin to think it was time for them to have some convenient way of getting their produce to a market where flour brings $10 to $12 per barrel and other things in proportion, and where they can obtain merchandise a little cheaper than at any other place in the country."—(Democrat, June 10, 1835.)

"We have heretofore called the public attention to the deplorable state of Chicago as regards filth. Every day the situation of our streets and the vacant lots is becoming worse and nothing is done. . . . Our streets would disgrace a piggery. The vacant lots and places about buildings abound with holes filled with green putrid water and decaying vegetable matter. The atmosphere has already become poisoned. . . . Is there no time—no care in the community—for these things? Is the reputation of Chicago for health, and the lives of the people thus negligently to be fooled away? The corporation have the necessary power to act if they will exercise it; and if they do not the community ought to take the matter into their own hands. Our town still continues healthy, but we warn our fellow citizens that they may expect sickness and the pestilence. To the crowded streets and dwellings may be superadded the immense congregation of strangers crowding every room of our public houses and every room in which they can obtain accommodations, even to the extent of sleeping on the floor.”—(Democrat, June 10, 1835.)

By act of February 11, 1835, John H. Kinzie, Gurdon K. Boyer, John S. C. Hogan and others, were “constituted a body politic and corporate to be known by the name of the Trustees of the Town of Chicago.” They and their successors were made perpetual. The corporate powers and duties of Chicago were vested in nine trustees to be elected annually. They were given large powers for the government of the town. The other officers were to consist of one clerk, one treasurer, one street commissioner, one assessor and collector of taxes, one surveyor, two measurers of wood and coal, two measurers of lumber and two measurers and weighers of grain. The corporation was divided into three districts as follows: “All that part which lies south of the Chicago river and east of the South branch of said river shall be included in the First district. All that part which lies west of the North and South branches of said river shall be included in the Second district; and all that part which lies north of the Chicago river and east of the North Branch of said river shall be included in the Third district. The taxes for each district were to be collected and expended independently, but all elections for trustees were to be by the whole town.

“Land Sales.—For a few weeks past our town has been the scene of extensive land operations. Great speculations have been made in Chicago town lots as well as in the lots of other towns which are as yet unknown to fame. If our land speculators have not the facilities of the genii of the Arabian Knights Entertainment for bringing flourishing towns and villages into existence at a word, they certainly possess an art unknown even in fairy tales of spreading them out on paper. We have no seven days’ wonder, each town has had its day, and each day has had its town; and so voracious has been the appetite for land speculations in this flourishing section that all have found ready purchasers at prices exceeding, we believe, the highest expectations of the proprietors. Very heavy sales have taken place in the town lots of Chicago. Vendors of one day have offered the next 20 to 25 per cent advance for cancellations. Indeed the advance in the price of town lots in Chicago is wholly unprecedented. What was six months since one thousand dollars in value of land in town is now four and five times that value. . . . We have been gratified at the respect which has been had for the claims of the settlers upon their lands—especially by speculators from abroad. Lynch's law is the best of preëmption laws. It saves a world of hard swearing and fraud, and accomplishes the same object with half the trouble and expense."—(Democrat, July 18, 1835.)

A new board of trustees was elected July 10, 1835, and they constituted a board of health with extra police powers. Gaming houses, the sale of liquor on Sundays, firing guns and pistols within the corporate limits, etc., were prohibited. Bonds were exacted of fiduciary and other officials. Cemeteries were located at Wabash and Twenty-third street and at Chicago avenue and the lake shore on the north in 1835. It was not dreamed that the town would soon go far beyond those points. On August 22, 1835, the American was established. Public buildings, a small pound, a small brick house for county officers and their records, an engine house, a jail of logs (all in the courthouse square), a fire engine costing $896.38, an engine company, a hook and ladder company, of which all leading citizens were members, were among the advances in 1835. On February 11, 1835, the corporate limits were extended to include all east of State from Twelfth and Chicago avenue to the lake, including the Reservation, which was subject to government control. Business was excellent but city and state finances were alarming.

The first fire department was authorized September 19, 1835, by the following resolution: "Resolved, That the president order two engines for the use of the corporation, of such description as he shall deem necessary, and also 1,000 feet of hose, on the credit of the corporation." James H. Collins, attorney, was paid $5 fee for his opinion concerning leasing the river front lots. His opinion, despite protracted legal controversy at a later date, held good. John Dean Caton's bill for counsel fees and services in 1833-34 amounted to $75.

"Fire! Fire!—The citizens of the town of Chicago are requested to meet at the Methodist Church tomorrow evening, Wednesday, October 29, to take into consideration the formation of an engine company, hook and ladder company and the further prevention of fire."—(Democrat, October 28, 1835.)

"We should be wanting in our duty to the officers engaged in the work, were we not to notice the great improvements which have been made in the streets of our town the past season. They are alike creditable to this new place and the officers engaged in superintending them. We have not as yet paved streets; but one year since we had nothing in the shape of a street in this place beyond the sticking up of stakes, and here and there a building on the line showing where a street was intended to be. Now the principal streets are well turnpiked, and so graduated and ditched as to drain them thoroughly."—(Democrat, October 7, 1835.)

Fractional Section 10, Township 39, Range 14, on which stood

Fort Dearborn, was reserved for military purposes in 1824. Several bold attempts were made to fasten preëmption claims in this land—both at Palestine and at Danville when those towns had jurisdiction of the lands in this quarter; but such attempts were repelled and discountenanced by the General Land office. This region was detached from the Danville section and made a part of the Northeast Land district. The fact that the above tract was reserved was heralded everywhere, yet private persons in Chicago tried to fasten preëmption claims on the same. "It is surprising that in the face of all the circumstances, the Land Offices of Chicago should have admitted this tract of land (represented to be worth from half a million to a million dollars) to be entered on the allegation of a preëmption right. Such a reprehensible and preposterous act, originating in whatever cause it may, is, of course, of no sort of validity. As soon as the fact was ascertained, the officers were instantly ordered to cancel the proceedings, and the Receiver has been directed to refund the amount of purchase money (a little less than one hundred dollars) paid by the alleged preëmptor. I request you will have the goodness to cause this letter to be published in the town of Chicago, in order to guard the public against imposition."—(Extract from a letter dated September 14, 1835, signed by Ethan A. Brown, commissioner of the General Land office, and addressed to a gentleman in Chicago. Published in the Chicago Democrat, October 7, 1835.)

It was predicted by the Democrat that Fort Dearborn would be abandoned within a year. It was recommended that the citizens should assemble and petition Congress for a grant of the land of this tract. The paper said significantly: "There are many peculiar reasons why the general government should pursue that course in the present instance.

A big meeting to petition Congress to grant the city the Fort Dearborn reservation was held November 2, 1835, at the Presbyterian Church. Three of the resolutions were as follows: "Resolved, That a grant of the said Military Reservation shall be applied for upon the express condition that twenty acres, parcel of the said reservation, to be taken from the center thereof in a block having four sides of equal dimensions as nearly as may be, one of which shall be fronting upon Lake Michigan—shall be reserved in all time to come for a public square, accessible at all times to the people, and also upon the condition that if the said public square shall at any time be built upon, then the same shall revert to the general government and cease to be the property of the town of Chicago. Resolved, That the said reservation shall be applied for to the end that the same (save so much thereof as may be reserved for a public square as aforesaid), may be sold by the corporate powers of the town of Chicago at their discretion, and that the proceeds therefrom may be appropriated to the uses of the said town. Resolved, That if the County of Cook shall fail to obtain the right of preëmption to one quarter section of land by virtue of the act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1834, then the said corporate authorities of the town of Chicago shall contribute out of the proceeds of the said reservation a sum sufficient to erect a court-house and common jail for the said county." Hiram Hugunin was chairman of this meeting and H. B. Clarke secretary. Ebenezer Peck, H. B. Clarke, J. C. Goodhue, Eli B. Williams and Walter Kimball were appointed a committee to draft a memorial to Congress to the above effect.

In November, 1835, the Board of Trustees of the Town of Chicago selected the following persons to constitute a hook and ladder company: John L. Wilson, E. C. Brackett, J. Holbrook, T. Jenkins, T. F. Spalding, I. Cook, George Smith, J. J. Garland, J. K. Palmer, P. F. W. Peck, Thomas S. Eells, Joseph L. Hanson, S. B. Cobb, James A. Smith, John R. Livingston, Henry G. Hubbard, Thomas J. King, N. L. F. Monroe, J. K. Botsford, G. W. Snow, G. W. Merrill, Joseph Meeker, Samuel S. Lathrop, Thomas S. S. Hyde and J. McClure. Early in November, 1835, full ordinances for the control of fires were passed by the town board. A fire department was erected, to consist of a chief engineer, two assistants, four fire wardens, in addition to the trustees, and such fire engine men, horsemen, hook and ladder men, and ax and saw men as might be appointed from time to time by the trustees. The firemen were divided into companies. The board of trustees had full power to organize an efficient fire fighting department.

"The Board of Trustees have at length decided upon leasing the wharfing privileges of the town, in pursuance of the authority granted by their act of incorporation; this is a judicious step, and calculated to advance the interest of the town and promote its commercial prosperity, and we doubt not that it will meet the concurrence of a large majority of the citizens. A few, we understand, are opposed to the proceeding."—(Democrat, November 18, 1835.)

Leasing the wharfing privileges in Chicago for nine hundred and ninety-nine years was advertised for sale, November 23, 1835; terms, one-fourth down and the remainder in three equal annual installments, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. Owners or occupants of the lots fronting the river were given the preference at a minimum price fixed by the board. This lease was applicable to the Old or Original Town of Chicago. Such of these leases as were not taken by the owners or occupants of lots were to be sold at auction to the highest bidder. The privilege was to extend forty feet in depth toward the river, bounded by the river and its two branches, "and on the other side by North and South and West Water streets, which said streets are to be and to remain open eighty feet in width, as is set forth and exhibited by a plan prepared by Edward B. Talcott, town surveyor."

"On the morning of the 21st ult. a handbill was issued from the office of the American calling a meeting of the citizens at 11 o'clock to take into consideration the measures adopted by the trustees for the sale of wharfing privileges. Everything was cut and dried beforehand by the opponents of the measure; resolutions were drawn, speeches prepared and recruits drummed up from all quarters of the town. The meeting was one of the largest ever held in Chicago and the subject was debated from 11 to 1:30 by Messrs. Spring, Richards and Moore, opposed to, and Messrs. Collings, Peck and Temple, in favor of, the measures of the trustees. The meeting adjourned sine die, but adjournment was opposed. In the evening handbills were again issued calling upon all opposed to the measure to meet that evening at the Presbyterian Church. About forty (four of whom, by the way, were blacks) assembled and passed the resolutions which had been discussed in the morning. A long remonstrance was also drawn up and circulated for subscription. The American said: 'By Tuesday evening over two hundred names (about one-half the legal voters of the town) were affixed to the remonstrance.' We have read the signatures attached to the protest, and assert that not more than one-half are legal voters of Chicago, nor is 'two hundred about one-half the legal voters of the town.' A large number of the signers are minors, and several are not residents of Chicago at all. Is this the way to arrive at public opinion upon an important subject? As a matter of fact the act incorporating Chicago as a town gave the trustees power 'to lease the wharfing privileges of said town, giving to the owners or occupants of the lots fronting the river the right of preference of such privileges.' . . . 'It is detrimental to the future interests of the town,' says the American. What, $100,000 detrimental to the town! Commend us to such detriments every day of our lives. Who are they that are opposed to the trustees on this question? Those who could not make great speculations out of the wharves and those who are the owners of water lots and other property in Kinzie's addition. These are the men who squirmed under the act of the trustees—who wished to monopolize all the storage and wharfage and deprive other parts of the town of an equal and just participation in these privileges. The measure, however, has been carried through and the trustees have been sustained by the voice of the people."—(Democrat, December 2, 1835.)

On November 14, 1835, the town trustees resolved to sell the wharf rights, which for some time had been yielding a good revenue; there was no immediate necessity for selling and the act was greatly deplored as the rights grew in value rapidly with the years. A covenant lease for nine hundred and ninety-nine years was decided upon, the lessee to erect docks within two years and the town to dredge the river ten feet deep within four years. The prices of lots were as follows: North Water street $8.50 to $15 per front foot; South Water street $25 per front foot; West Water street, $18 per front foot. It was assumed at the time and generally believed ever since that this sale of the wharfing rights of the town was dishonest, but the sale was valid and held good in law.

A very severe storm on the lake, late in November, 1835, wrecked the schooners "Bridget," "Austerlitz," "Marengo," "Utica," "Chance," "Lafayette," "Swan" and "Lady." "Utica" was owned by A. Clybourn. Newberry & Dole lost over $25,000 worth of goods in the "Austerlitz."

"The Cry Is Still They Come.—The tide of emigration which is flowing in this season, far exceeds that of any former period. The floodgates of enterprise seem to be let loose upon us. In addition to the actual emigrants that are now pressing into this region, the approaching land sale is bringing into our town a crowd of strangers and capitalists. Strangers to the amount of some hundreds fill our public houses and streets; our wharves are covered with men, women and children, just landed from the vessels, and even some storehouses have been thrown open to receive the unsheltered emigrants. Some build tents upon the spot where they are landed from the boat in the middle of our streets, then raise them, and move on. Cook county, which two years ago exhibited a few scattered dwellings along the groves or by the streams, is now rife with thriving settlements; and some smart villages have arisen, too, as by enchantment. The solitary inhabitant of a grove has seen a community suddenly gather round him. Some schools are actually in successful operation, where a year since was but a solitary emigrant."—(American, June 13, 1835.)

"The amount of money received at the land office in this town for lands sold from May 28 till the close of the sale, is a little over $386,500, of which about $353,500 was for lands sold at auction and the balance under the preëmption law."—(American, July 18, 1835)

"Up to September, 1834, that office (school commissioner) has in all yielded me in all but about $200. Up to the present time the gross receipts of the office of notary public have probably not exceeded $50. The judge of probate's fees since the appointment in this county have not amounted to more than $50; and I have not realized from all these offices, including that of recorder, more than $1,500."—(Hamilton in American, August 1, 1835.)

"We have seen during the past week fourteen vessels lying together at our harbor, principally of the large class of schooners, bearing each one hundred tons burden, while nine more, all freighted for this port were on their passage from Mackinac."—(American, September 19, 1835.)

An ordinance passed in August, 1835, levied a fine of $10 for burials within the corporate limits—cemeteries north and south of the city had already been laid out. A juvenile sewing society of the Presbyterian Church raised $150 from March to September, 1835. In September, 1835, goods arrived here by schooner twenty days from New York, and came addressed to all parts of the West—Crawfordsville, Indiana; Terre Haute, Indiana; Peoria, Illinois, and even Galena. G. S. Hubbard ordered on his own responsibility the first fire engine brought to Chicago—summer of 1835. The first meeting of the Chicago Bible Society was held November 25, 1835. The American of December 5, 1835, said that during the previous spring flour sold here as high as $20 to $25 per barrel; in December, 1835, it sold at $12; salt was $8. During the summer of 1835, when salt was low, Michigan City speculators bought all the salt in Chicago—about 3,000 barrels—paying from $3 to $6, expecting to corner the market during the succeeding winter; but the citizens here had provided themselves with a goodly supply, so that in April, 1836, the speculators were forced to sell their stock for about $2.50.*

Before July, 1835, a reading room had been established. In the fall of 1835 there were many "land floats" in the county. On September 3, 1835, Lieutenant Allen called for twenty carpenters and forty common laborers to work on the harbor. In September, 1835, it was announced that coaches from Chicago to St. Louis would run through in five days by daylight. J. T. Temple & Co. were mail contractors between Chicago and Peoria. The dwelling formerly occupied by Joseph Laframboise was burned down in October. Mr. Hugunin's residence, near town, was burned during a prairie fire. Twenty tons of coal were received by vessel from Albany in October, 1835. At this time John S. C. Hogan was postmaster. Two newspapers, Democrat and American, were being issued.

The public sale of lots in Calumet in the fall of 1835 was postponed several times. So great was the demand for building material in the fall of 1835 that W. B. Ogden and W. L. Newberry advertised for one million brick and two hundred thousand feet of pine lumber to be delivered early in 1836, for which cash would be paid. John Ludley established a soap and candle factory in 1835. Elston & Chever had a soap and candle factory on the north side near the Point. In November, 1835, Capt. Joseph Naper was active in the formation of a new county to be carved from Cook—Du Page. Chicago citizens remonstrated against a division.

The census of November, 1835, showed that Chicago had a population of 3,279. There were here 44 dry goods, hardware and grocery stores; 2 of books, 4 druggists, 2 silversmiths and jewelers, 2 tin and copper factories, 2 printing offices—Democrat and American; 1 steam saw-mill, 2 breweries, 1 iron foundry, 4 storage and forwarding houses, 8 taverns, 1 lottery office, 1 bank, 5 churches, 7 schools, 22 lawyers, 14 physicians, a lyceum and reading-room. During 1835 nine brick buildings were erected, among which was a tavern three stories high, and a county clerk's office. The foundations of two churches (Episcopal and Baptist) were laid, but could not be completed for want of material, which ran short. The Democrat said on December 9: "It is well known that the reason why a greater number of brick buildings were not erected the last season was owing to the want of materials of a proper quality." In 1835 Congress was petitioned to build a harbor at Calumet. The lot at the corner of South Water and Dearborn streets, called "Dole's Corner," was sold in December, 1835, for $25,000. In the preceding March it had been sold for $9,000. For Hogan's block $100,000 was offered and refused in December, 1835. As late as December 30, the prairies around Chicago were still burning. A young Men's Temperance Society was organized December 19, with Thomas Wright president. On December 30, flour was $12 a barrel; salt, $7.50; corn, $1.25; wheat, $1 to $1.25. In December, 1835, the residents of Joliet petitioned for a division of Cook county—wanted a new one, to be called Will.

At the close of 1835 the piers forming the artificial harbor had been extended nearly 500 feet, enclosing a channel 200 feet wide, varying from three to seven feet deep. "In their present incomplete state (the piers) great protection has been afforded to the increasing commerce of the place, and as many as five schooners have at one time discharged their cargoes under their shelter. Since the opening of navigation to the 30th of September, upwards of two hundred vessels have arrived at this port."—(Democrat, January 13, 1836.) "From a circular published in the Alton Spectator, we learn that the number of wagons to the upper Wabash from Chicago, freighted with dry goods and groceries, during the past year (1835) amounts to 2,000."—(Democrat, December 30, 1835.) "A lot fronting one hundred feet on Dearborn street, about fifty-five feet deep next the corner of Water street, was sold a few days since for $11,000."—(American, October 17, 1835.) "Five hundred barrels of flour were received here this week by the way of the lakes by Newberry & Dole, every one of which was sold to the citizens before it was removed from the wharf for $9 per barrel. It is a fact creditable to the proprietors that they refused $9.50 per barrel by the quantity, laudably preferring to afford it to those who wished it for domestic purposes at $9, than by putting $2.50 more into their pockets and subjecting the citizens to the necessity of paying $10."—(American, November 14, 1835.)

The bridges were unwieldy—were mostly floats sliding to one side to admit vessels. On Lake and Randolph streets were considerable grading and macadamizing. The water works consisted of a hogshhead on wheels, with a faucet for buckets and a price to the driver. In 1836 the exports were $1,000; imports, $325,203; they were little in 1835, and nothing before 1835. The Legislature granted Chicago the right to borrow $50,000, but the branch of the state bank here refused to loan. William B. Ogden, for the town, tried elsewhere, but could not raise the cash.

"The amount of business transacted by the merchants of Chicago this season is among the multiplying evidence of our prosperity. There are those who call Chicago a fiction and her realities ideals. It is estimated by good judges that the amount of capital invested in goods purchased at the East during the present season and sold here, and still selling, is $600,000. There are forty dry goods merchants and druggists, many of whom have been trading upon a capital of $20,000, and some $30,000. Add to this $200,000 as the amount of produce and other articles not before included passing through their hands and we have a sum total of $800,000."—(American, November 28, 1835.) "Masons and bricklayers will be wanted in any number next season in Chicago. Brickmakers, in particular, as the present scarcity of brick is a great obstacle to builders. Three brick churches and many large brick stores are to be built next summer."—(American, November 28, 1835.) "The number of arrivals of vessels and steamboats in Chicago from the opening of navigation this season to the 26th of November is 235. Last season, as near as we can recollect, it was 176. The vessels this year have doubled the burden of last year. And our store-houses show that the amount of tonnage received this season exceeds by more than five times the amount of last year."—(American, December 5, 1835.)

"A fire or two more is necessary for the benefit of Chicago. Nothing is done toward preparing for the protection of the town. The engines ordered by the corporation, of course, cannot be here till next year, and no efforts are made, as we understand, to fit and man the one already in town, for use in a sudden emergency. Why is not the fire company in preparation and training for service? What has become of the hook and ladder company?"—(American, December 12, 1835.)

"Our citizens look forward with considerable anxiety to the action of Congress upon their petition to obtain a grant of the site of Fort Dearborn. It becomes them to keep an eye upon this matter, as the present claimant has sold to a large number of individuals here and elsewhere, who will not remain inactive while there remains the least hope of success. Judging from the past policy of the Government as regards reservations, its freedom from debt, the importance of Chicago, and the real injury she has sustained by the withholding from market the canal lands and the reservation itself, we have but little doubt of our corporation obtaining it. The value of the reservation can be of but little consideration with the Government, while it would be of the utmost importance to Chicago. By the way, what has become of the memorial to Congress?"—(Democrat, December 9, 1835.)

"Colonel Beaubien, the claimant and occupant of the 'land,' was emphatically the 'pioneer' of this youthful city, which has sprung up as if by the act of the necromancer to its present unparalleled prosperity. No collateral considerations of public convenience or common weal should be suffered to meddle with the intrinsic merits of his title. And surely the accidental value and importance of the land which is acknowledged to be owing to the enterprise of our citizens should not be urged as an objection against the strong claim of an individual who was enduring the privations and gloom of that wilderness when it commenced its transit into the present Chicago. Appeals to public interest and public power are always formidable and often hazard, if not forever bar, the most valid rights of individuals; and private prosperity is thus often sacrificed on the rapacious altar of public aggrandisement. As the claim of Colonel Beaubien is contested, the strict and uncompromising principles of law should prevail and shut out all extraneous considerations."—(Correspondent in Chicago Democrat, December 16, 1835.)

The following points were discussed in a reply in the Chicago American to the claims of Colonel Beaubien to the Fort Dearborn Reservation: That the citizens had no controversy with Colonel Beaubien; that his claim was a question between him and the Government; that the evidence in the case was sufficient to satisfy anyone that his claim would not be allowed; that the tract as early as 1824 had been reserved by the Government for military purposes; that several attempts had been made before by Colonel Beaubien to claim the tract, both at Palestine and later at Danville, but the claim had been rejected; that Colonel Beaubien, by counsel, had applied to the district court of the United States for the district of Illinois for a writ of mandamus, requiring the land officers at Danville to show good and sufficient cause why his preëmption claims should not be granted; that the refusal of the land officers had been sustained by the court; that the notoriety of the fact that this portion was a reservation was the occasion of not giving express instructions to the officers at Chicago when this land district was detached from Danville; that this was not a controversy where public good was brought to overpower private interest, because the Government owned the land and Colonel Beaubien did not, nor had the right of preëmption, though he occupied the land, as the tract was a reservation; that therefore the citizens did not ask for the grant in preference to Colonel Beaubien, but asked it from the Government, whose property it was in fact; that in addition the citizens desired the grant as a public good.

By act of January 16, 1836, the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company was incorporated. William Bennett, Thomas Drummond, J. C. Goodhue, Peter Semple, J. M. Turner, E. D. Taylor and J. B. Thomas, Jr., were appointed commissioners to receive stock subscriptions. The Chicago Marine and Fire Insurance Company was incorporated in 1836.

"We regret to learn that it is probable that the county of Cook is likely to be divided; we say regret because we think it is too soon to divide the county and because we are afraid that it will diminish our political influence in the state. We are told that the new county is to be named Wills."—(Democrat, January 20, 1836.)

"On Wednesday last our citizens received the joyful news that the bill providing for the construction of the Illinois and Michigan Canal became a law by a vote of 18 to 7 in the Senate, and 38 to 16 in the House. The town was immediately illuminated and guns were fired at intervals during the evening. On Thursday at twelve o'clock fifty-six guns were fired in honor of the senators and representatives who had voted for the final passage of the bill. At three o'clock a large number of our citizens without distinction to party sat down to a dinner prepared at the Tremont House, where appropriate and patriotic toasts were drank in honor of the joyful event. In the evening a second illumination took place, more brilliant than the first. The whole was closed with a ball at the Sauganash Hotel on Friday evening. We will not attempt to describe the joy that pervaded all classes of our citizens upon receipt of the intelligence that the question was finally disposed of to the satisfaction of all. The canal which had excited public attention for fifteen years was to be commenced and the system of internal improvements in Illinois had received a new impulse which was to render her a great and powerful state. The cares, labors, anxieties and disappointments of the past were forgotten in the joyful anticipations of the future and the utmost hopes and expectations of the prosperity of Chicago were to be realized. And well might our citizens rejoice. To this event they have looked forward with anxiety, as upon it depended the prosperity of their town."—(Democrat, January 20, 1836.)

The Democrat denounced the act approved January 15, 1836, concerning the wharfing privileges at Chicago. "It will be seen from a slight inspection of this law that it aims a deadly blow at the most valuable and important commercial portions of the Original Town of Chicago, while at the same time it basely and wantonly attempts to assail the property and vested rights of the lessees of the wharfing privileges by declaring that all buildings that may be erected between the south line of South Water street and the north line of North Water street shall be considered public nuisances and liable to be abated. The act professes to give the trustees the power to lease wharfing privileges, while the proviso declares they shall lease no privilege opposite to the lots owned by individuals or by the state, thus leaving nothing to be leased, or nothing for this power to act or operate upon. The object and design of this law cannot be mistaken. They are too palpable to require comment. This is the second time that this charter has been altered in less than one year without the knowledge or consent of the citizens of this town. . . . We know full well that what has been done was caused by the application and management of some four or five of our citizens who have had the hardihood to intermeddle in the private affairs and with the private property of their fellow citizens and to attempt to prostrate the corporate powers of the town it is feared for unjustifiable and unworthy purposes. It is proper that these gentlemen should be known and their conduct and motives duly understood and duly appreciated. The act which was procured last year and under which the present trustees had leased wharfing privileges was drawn up by John H. Kinzie; and the clause conferring the power to lease was inserted, if not by him, at least with his knowledge and consent. Gurdon S. Hubbard was also privy to it. These gentlemen were then members of the board of trustees and this clause was inserted in order to obviate all doubts which before had existence in reference to the right to lease.”—(Democrat, February 24, 1836.)

By the act of January 18, 1836, the Chicago Hydraulic Company was incorporated with James B. Campbell, Gholson Kercheval, Robert A. Kinzie, Richard J. Hamilton, Henry G. Hubbard, David Hunter, Peter Cohen, Ed. W. Casey, Gurdon S. Hubbard, G. W. Dole, John H. Kinzie, William Forsythe and Solomon Wills as corporators. They were authorized to take the necessary steps to supply Chicago with Lake Michigan water—build fountains, reservoirs, lay pipes, conduits, use the streets, etc.

The act of 1835 empowered the trustees to lease the wharfing privileges of the town without restricting the duration. The trustees under the charter prepared to widen the river to 200 feet and to lay off wharfing lots on each side of the river, leaving South Water street and North Water street eighty feet wide. Leases were granted for 999 years. “The present trustees, whose conduct has been so severely censured by certain individuals interested in Kinzie’s addition, merely put in operation the machine which had previously been provided for use. It worked well; and had the inventors been permitted by the people of the town to use it to subserve their own purposes, probably no alteration would have been deemed necessary. When, however, they discovered that leases were to be given for long periods, by which the lessees would be placed in a condition to compete in some measure with the proprietors in Kinzie’s addition by erecting wharves and storehouses on the water, the alarm was sounded.

William Busser,

The trustees were charged with usurpation, with leasing property which did not belong to the town, with squandering property which had been given to the town, with leasing property which belonged to individuals—which belonged to the state—to the canal fund—to the public at large. And yet these contradictory charges related to the same property. A bill was filed, an injunction served upon the board, and finally the law to lease was repealed under the pretence of amending the charter. Can any unprejudiced mind mistake these last maneuvers? If no leases could be given, or those only of five years duration, permanent improvements would not be made on the lands lying between the river and the north and south lines of South and North Water streets. Business men would thus be forced to seek places where these difficulties did not exist; they would at present be compelled to purchase or lease in Kinzie's addition or go up the Branches above the original town. It has, however, been suggested by way of defense that the health and beauty of the town would be injured by the erection of lines of warehouses along the river. But are not warehouses to be built adjacent to the river on the addition and on the reservation opposite, as also up both Branches? And is not this common in all commercial towns? . . . The plan adopted by the board contemplated the dredging of the shallow parts near the banks to the depth of ten feet."—(Democrat, March 2, 1836.)

On February 13, 1836, the trustees of Chicago gave notice of the dangerous condition of the bridges over the Chicago river—would not be responsible for injuries or accidents. A meeting on Des Plaines river at the office of H. Kennicott was held February 27, 1836, to consider building a plank road to Chicago on the county road recently laid out. Richard Steele was chairman and S. M. Salisbury secretary. A committee of seven to circulate a subscription list for the funds necessary was appointed and R. J. Hamilton, J. Filkins, A. I. Walls, E. Haddock, Mark Noble, Jr., and Rufus Scales were appointed to attend the matter. It was "Resolved, That whatever sum of money may be raised by said subscription shall be appropriated for improving said road; and if the sum raised shall not be sufficient to effect the completion of the whole route it shall be laid out in improving the worst places." Chicago was expected to assist.

"Real Estate.—Several large sales in town property have been made during the last two weeks, one of which amounted to $96,700, one-fourth of which was paid down. It was predicted last year by many that the prices of Chicago property were higher than they could be sustained, notwithstanding which real estate has been steadily advancing and has been sought after with avidity. The sale of canal lots in June offers the greatest inducements to capitalists for the investment of their money."—(Democrat, April 27, 1836.) "The canal commissioners have already commenced making the tow-path upon the east side of the South branch. It is truly gratifying to know that this work has commenced. We learn that several individuals have associated themselves together for the purpose of starting a canal packet boat on the river, as soon as the tow-path shall be completed, which it is expected will be about the 15th or 20th of June."—(Democrat, May 4, 1836.)

"Prosperity of Chicago.—The spirit of enterprise is working wonders in this town. The cutting out and leveling of new streets—the active preparations for extensive building—the spade, the plow and the scraper, daily employed by scores of industrious hands, in making the rough places smooth and the crooked places straight—the piles of lumber lying at intervals waiting for their turn to be moulded into the 'habitations of man,' and all the well-directed attacks upon the remaining features of the wilderness—are signs cheeringly full of the present energy and future greatness of this young queen of the West."—(American, April 30, 1836.) "Charge Specific.—The mail arrived at the postoffice on last Thursday evening at half past six o'clock and was not opened for delivery until half past eight o'clock on Friday morning, being fourteen hours from the time of its arrival until it was ready for delivery."—(Democrat, May 11, 1836.) "Launch.—The sloop 'Clarisa' was launched on Thursday last (May 12, 1836). As this was the first vessel that was ever built in our harbor, a large number of spectators were present to witness the event."—(Democrat, May 18, 1836.)

"The stores of our merchants, just before the opening of spring navigation, have heretofore generally presented a beggarly account of empty shelves, but we must remark that the amount of stock brought into this town has not been very extensive in comparison with the demand. The growth of Chicago has so wonderfully exceeded the most sanguine expectations that the scale of calculations for the wants of the inhabitants has proved imperfect and contracted. The average cost of transportation from New York is $1.50 per cwt. and the time varies from eighteen to twenty days. The brig 'Indiana' arrived here on the 23rd of May last, bringing goods in seventeen days and a half, including time lost in transshipments, etc. The sales are generally cash, and the payment of debts contracted with our merchants, for the most part, is prompt and certain. Stores and business stands are in great demand. Many goods are sold at wholesale. Nearly all the mercantile establishments of any importance make extensive sales to the traders of the interior and especially from the Wabash, and many country branches are carried on and supplied by Chicago merchants."—(American, July 9, 1836.) "The most prominent nuisance is a pond on Lake street, corner of La Salle, in the very heart of the city, and inhabited by FROGS. It smells strong now.

Cannot the hole be filled up? If any of the trustees are fond of frog music, they can enjoy a most delicious treat by taking a seat on the doorsteps of this office at the hour of sunset.”—(American, July 9, 1836.)

The trustees offered $25 in January, 1836, for the best plans of a drawbridge to be built across the South branch at Randolph. Regular stages ran between Chicago and Detroit. Hiram Pearsons and Richard J. Hamilton, proprietors, offered 100 lots in Canalport for sale at public auction at Garrett's auction room in January, 1836. Canalport was at the head of navigation of the South branch and at the point where the canal touched the river. The Chicago Athenæum was organized February, 1836, with R. J. Hamilton president and John H. Kinzie secretary. At this time the citizens held a public meeting and requested the trustees to build a bridge across the river at Randolph street. Work on the canal was advertised to commence in the spring of 1836, greatly to the delight of all Chicago. Sections were then to be let to contractors. David Carver advertised that he would saw lumber to order, and would run a weekly vessel between Chicago and Grand river, Michigan. The Chicago Marine and Fire Insurance Company was founded in February, 1836; also the Galena & Chicago Railway. In March, 1836, Captain Tolcott reported that the southernmost point of Lake Michigan was 41 degrees, 37 minutes, 7 seconds north latitude. Claim jumpers gave the preëmptioners much trouble at this time.

In April, 1836, the trustees resolved to build two bridges, one at Randolph street and one at Kinzie street. Early in 1836 the canal commissioners laid out fractional Section 15 (south of Madison and east of State) into lots and streets, to correspond with others on the school section and the Original Town. Everybody liked Michigan avenue and gave Mr. Archer credit for its design. Sealed proposals for the construction of sections of the canal were called for in April, 1836. The license for a turnpike from Randolph street to Laughton's Ford, on the Des Plaines, was granted in June, 1836. The American announced in March, 1836, a semi-weekly edition soon to be issued, Thomas O. Davis, editor. In May, 1836, John Calhoun offered for sale a one-half interest in the Chicago Democrat. At this time John H. Kinzie lived on the North branch, five miles from Chicago. W. L. May, in Congress, called attention to the fact in the spring of 1836 that during 1835 eight or ten vessels laden with merchandise and produce had been lost on Lake Michigan owing to the lack of suitable harbors. At Chicago he said the sand bar at the mouth of the river was a serious obstacle; a dredging machine costing $12,000 would have to be bought.

At a meeting of the mechanics of Chicago on May 14, when H. Volk was chairman, it was resolved, “That ten hours be considered sufficient for a day's work;" "That we pledge ourselves to abide by the foregoing resolution." About forty mechanics signed this agreement. In May, 1836, W. B. Archer, acting commissioner on the canal, called for forty laborers at $20 per month. They were asked to report to Major Hackleton at his camp near Saganaskee Swamp, twenty miles from Chicago.

A public sale of lots in Calumet was again advertised for June 11, 1836, by E. K. Hubbard, George W. Dole and Lewis Benton—200 hundred at auction. A survey of that region had been ordered by Congress and was in progress at this time. Roads had been built, streets laid out. Thornton, Athens and Manchester villages had recently sprung into life in that part of the county. It was declared that canals there were bound to be built—one from Kankakee river to the "Calamic" and another from Des Plaines river to the same. It was noted that in that region were Grand Calumet river and Stony, Thorn, Hawk, Deep and Salt creeks. In June, 1836, the canal commissioners offered for sale 571 lots valued at $1,464,900. The Democrat expressed the opinion that this valuation was much too high. The amount realized was $1,619,848, with fully $200,000 worth remaining unsold. The land thus offered for sale embraced every alternate section of a tract twenty miles wide and about nine miles long, with the canal in the center. The sales in Chicago amounted to $386,500. The sale was considered the correct test of the value of Chicago property—prices being higher than the high valuation of the commissioners. The school commissioner offered at public auction a number of school lots before the canal lots were put on the market, hoping thus to get a better price. The old Steamboat Hotel was renamed American by W. McCorriston. Up to 1836 Chicago en masse had not yet formally celebrated the Fourth of July.

In the spring of 1836 a post route from Chicago to Galena via Elgin was put in operation. In April, 1836, flour was $10 to $12; pork $20 to $22; fresh beef 10 cents per pound; ham 12½ cents; eggs 37 cents a dozen; potatoes $1.25 a bushel. On June 8, 1836, Joel Manning, secretary of the canal commissioners, called for 10,000 laborers for the canal; at the same time he offered for sale all the unsold canal lots in Chicago; also the town lots on fractional Section 15—the sale to take place June 20, one-fourth down and the balance in three annual installments at 6 per cent. He said: "Section 15 is a dry ridge commencing near the harbor (at Madison street) and extending south one mile along the shore of Lake Michigan." At a ladies' fair held in the Lake House late in June, 1836, over $2,000 was realized for the construction of a new church. The prosperity of Chicago at all times kindled the envy of every Western city of importance. It was declared in the summer of 1836 that prices of lots were so high that rents would not pay a satisfactory per cent to the owner. The newspapers here refuted this assertion. It was shown that a store and lot on Lake street that sold for $8,000 had rented for $1,000. Other similar instances were cited.

In May, 1836, a mass meeting was held and a committee of fifteen appointed, to prepare a plan for celebrating the commencement of work on the canal. R. J. Hamilton was chairman and Giles Spring secretary. The committee were as follows: George W. Dole, W. B. Ogden, Ashbel Steele, F. C. Sherman, Francis Peyton, J. B. F. Russell, R. J. Hamilton, L. T. Jamison, Hiram Hugunin, J. B. Campbell, J. E. McClure, Gholson Kercheval, J. H. Kinzie, Giles Spring and N. J. Brown. At eleven a. m. on July 4, 1836, the steamboat "Chicago," loaded with people, left the bridge at Dearborn street and moved up the river, followed by the schooners "Sea Serpent" and "Llewellyn" and other lighter craft, drawn by horses. It was a beautiful day and music added to the attractiveness and joy. Upon the arrival at Canalport the large assemblage first listened to the reading of the Declaration of Independence by Judge Smith and then to a suitable address by Dr. W. B. Egan, orator of the day. This ceremony occurred at Canalport. The crowd then marched to where the excavation had been commenced and there Colonel Archer, acting commissioner, delivered a short address and then broke ground amid the cheers of the spectators. Short speeches by Judges Smith and Brown of the Supreme Court were then delivered. G. S. Hubbard also spoke. The American of July 9 said: "Colonel Hubbard in an impressive manner contrasted the condition of this place and the northern part of Illinois, eighteen years ago, when he first ascended the Chicago river in a canoe." After a sumptuous dinner served to all by a special committee, the assemblage returned to their homes. The American said: "The steamboat Chicago, on her way down, was assailed by a small corps of Irishmen, who, stationing themselves at the stone quarry on the banks of the river, showered full volleys of stones amid the thick crowd of ladies and gentlemen on the upper deck. The order was immediately given to land. Some fifty passengers leaped ashore, some with bludgeons and to some furor arma ministrat. The assailants were soon led, covered with blood and wounds, captive to the boat, where they were safely lodged in the hold and brought into town."

In July, 1836, the sum of $120,000 was subscribed in one day by a few citizens of Chicago, to be used in building the steamboat "Illinois," the construction to be by Captain Case of Buffalo. Early in August, James M. Strode became register of the land office here. During July and August the authorities effected large improvements in grading, sidewalks, filling, etc. The canal lots which were forfeited were resold September 5, and brought less than the appraisement. The times were dull. Late in August, 1836, $61,000 was paid here in annuities to Indians. In the fall of 1836 it was noted that citizens at their own expense put down sidewalks in front of their own residences.

A city charter began to be talked about as early as August, 1836, and began urgently to be demanded in September. The Northern Baptist association was held here on September 21. About this time, day after day, the sky was black with countless wild pigeons and the roar of their wings was incessant. They were shot by everybody, but it made no difference in the number or the ranks. The people sang:

"When I can shoot my rifle clear,
At pigeons in the skies,
I'll bid farewell to every fear,
And live on good pot-pies."

"Everything in and about Chicago presents an appearance of bustle and business never before witnessed on the shores of Lake Michigan. Our harbor is filled with shipping, an average of from twenty to thirty being discharged here every day for two or three weeks past. Occasionally we have had two or three of the largest steamboats from the lower lakes lying at the pier together. The only limit to the building and improvement of every kind is the supply of labor and materials. Everything connected with labor and materials bears an exorbitant price, and the most important building materials cannot be procured at any price. Fifteen minutes' walk in our streets or a single look at our harbor and wharves and into our stores would be sufficient to remove the doubts of the most skeptical as to the present business and future growth and prosperity of Chicago."—(Democrat, June 29, 1836.) "The citizens of the town of Chicago remained idle observers of that day (Fourth of July) on which half a century since our forefathers staked their lives, their honor and their fortunes for the purchase of liberty."—(Democrat, July 6, 1836.) "The whole number of lots to be offered is 571, which are valued by the commissioners at $1,464,900. We think the valuation in general much too high and are strong in the belief that a considerable portion will remain unsold for this cause." Reference was made to a sale of lots by the canal commissioners. "The amount of sales of the lands by the board of canal commissioners, lying in the Original Town and on fractional Section 15 adjoining, aggregates the sum of $1,619,848. There still remain unsold, as estimated, lots to the amount of $200,000, making, with the interest that will accrue, nearly $2,000,000 which will be realized by the sale of the lots in the town of Chicago alone towards completing the Illinois and Michigan canal. With these prospects, who will longer doubt of the utility of at once commencing a ship canal?"—(Democrat, July 13, 1836.)

A traveling circus here in September was crowded to suffocation afternoon and evening. During a terrible gale October 3, 1836, vessels in and off Chicago harbor suffered an estimated loss of from $150,000 to $200,000. All vessels at the pier were more or less damaged. The schooner "Van Buren" was wrecked and ruined; the "Harrison" was seriously damaged; the "Celeste" was dashed ashore and greatly damaged; the "Erie" the same; the barque "Detroit" was badly damaged; the schooner "Sea Serpent" was totally wrecked; the sloop "Clarisa" was damaged, etc. "For the above pithy epitome of losses we may thank the Twenty-third Congress of the United States. Instead of appropriating funds for the completion of the harbor, at an early stage of the session, they frittered away their time in fruitless discussions, and at the very last moment of the session voted us about one-half the amount asked for and required. For many weeks, by good working weather, affairs remained in statu quo, and now when our harbor ought to be accessible, and as safe as any in the country, our merchants are made to sustain tremendous losses on account of the inactivity of our servants in Congress. The case admits of no apology—of no palliation. It is the result of gross and unpardonable negligence."—(American, October 8, 1836.)

"Court House.—The citizens of this place feel severely the want of a proper place for holding court. Hitherto we have been indebted to the courtesy of the trustees of our churches for the accommodations of the circuit court. . . . We are happy to learn that it is in contemplation to apply to the next Legislature for an appropriation toward accomplishing the object in question in a manner worth the splendid prospects of our growing town. In connection with this subject we would suggest that a lot fronting on the public square should be purchased for the purpose. The system now adopted of placing the public buildings on the ground set apart for the square appears very narrow and in bad taste. The Record office, the jail, the alms house and the engine house already disfigure this ground, and a few more public buildings would completely shut it out from view. We trust, therefore, that the new building may be an ornament, not an eye sore."—(American, October 15, 1836.)

In October, 1836, three newspapers were conducted here—Democrat, American and Commercial Advertiser. The Illinois Packet Boat company was in operation here in October, 1836. In November the Chicago Lyceum resumed its debates. In November, it having been proposed to form a new county with the Naper settlement as a nucleus, the newspapers and citizens vigorously opposed any further division of Cook county. Late in 1836 Lyman Gage erected a steam flouring mill on the South branch about one hundred rods above the Randolph street bridge.

"Mr. Editor: Would it not be desirable for the trustees of this flourishing place to construct foot bridges at the intersection of the principal streets, or declaring their design to leave them as they now are, give some of our enterprising citizens an opportunity of applying for licenses to establish ferries at the different routes of intersection?"—(Jotham in Chicago American, November 12, 1836.) "In 1836 the most notable structures erected were Steele's block of four-story brick stores on Lake street; Harmon & Loomis' block of four-story brick stores on Water street; the Episcopal brick church; some ten or twenty fine two to four story brick stores in various parts of the town; about twenty large two and three story wooden stores; a steam flouring mill with two run of stone; from 100 to 150 dwellings of all descriptions, from the humble wooden cottage to the splendid brick mansion;" the streets were thoroughly turnpiked.—(American, December 10, 1836.) "In 1833 there were but four arrivals from the lower lakes—two brigs and two schooners, say 700 tons. In 1835 there were about 250 arrivals, nearly all of which were schooners, averaging about ninety tons each, or 22,500 tons in all. In 1836 the first arrival was on the 18th of April. From that time to the first of December (226 days) 456 vessels (forty-nine steamboats, ten ships and barges, twenty-six brigs, 363 schooners and eight sloops) arrived, aggregating 57,550 tons. Is there any other town within the borders of our Union which can boast of as large an increase in commerce? We challenge!"—(American, December 10, 1836.)

The canal road extending from Chicago to Joliet cost $40,500. From State street to the Summit the distance was thirteen miles; to the Desplaines—Saganaskee Swamp, twenty-three miles; to Lockport, thirty-two miles; to Joliet, thirty-six and a quarter miles. Late in 1836 the troops were finally withdrawn from Fort Dearborn.

"That the size of the harbor must be increased there can be no doubt. Two ways present themselves to effect this object: One by a breakwater in the lake, thus forming an external harbor; the other that of enlarging the river by excavation."—(Writer in Chicago American, December 10, 1836.) "I went to Chicago a few days since and purchased two barrels of mess pork at the highest price and had them shipped to this place. One of them I sold without opening, the other was sold out by the pound. When the latter barrel was about two-thirds gone, the clerk sold out of it six tails and declared that there were nine left in the barrel. A few days afterwards one of my customers proposed buying the pork for the sake of getting the barrel. I took him into the back store and showed him the barrel. He picked out from one side fifteen tails and said it was enough—he was satisfied. There having been considerable talk and excitement made about it, we finally concluded to take an inquest over the tails of the deceased, and the next day the neighbors were called in and upon careful examination there were found to be thirty-nine tails left, making in all forty-five tails in one barrel of mess pork. Among those there were a great variety, some short and some long, some spindling and some stubbed, many that reached clear round the sides of the barrel, some that would make good whistles, and a few that appeared to have been drove in."—(Ichabod in Milwaukee Advertiser, December, 1836.) "New subscribers to Chicago papers are increasing so rapidly that the proprietors have been compelled to borrow paper to satisfy the demand."—(American, February 25, 1837.)

In January, 1837, the steamboat "Illinois" was being built at Newberry's shipyards, Detroit. On January 21, an urgent call was made upon the citizens for a draft of the proposed city charter, and they made haste to comply so as to accomplish that object before the Legislature adjourned. Late in 1836 the canal commissioners reported that the canal would cost—Summit division, $5,871,325; Middle division, $1,510,957; Western division, $1,272,055; total, $8,654,337. The Illinois Central Railway was up for consideration in January, 1837. In January, 1837, an almshouse or poorhouse stood on the public square. In 1837 the appropriation for Chicago harbor was $40,000; for Calumet harbor $20,000. In February, 1837, the Legislature authorized the formation of a cemetery association here. In March the citizens subscribed $36,000 toward a steamboat to ply between St. Joseph and Chicago. The organization of Rush Medical College in March, 1837, was an important event. In the spring of 1837, William B. Egan was asked to run for Mayor of the new city, but declined. John Wentworth, for many years afterward the most powerful factor in local politics, became the owner of the Democrat in 1837.

"Illinois and Michigan Canal.—Contracts to the amount of about $1,000,000 were made by the commissioners on Saturday last and at about $60,000 less than the estimated prices. Laborers to almost any number can now find employment in the different sections of the line and receive high prices. Several thousand are wanted immediately."—(American, May 27, 1837.)

The Cook county congressional vote in 1838 was: Democrat, 1,324; Whig, 1,032. By act of July 21, 1837, special provision for the sale of canal lands was made. The canal commissioners were authorized to enlarge the natural basin at the confluence of the North and South branches of the Chicago river, and Block 7 of the canal lots in the city of Chicago was reserved from sale for the purpose of exchanging the same for Block 14, which would be removed in the proposed enlargement. Block 14 was appropriated for the uses of the basin. Both blocks were to be appraised and the exchange was to be made if the owners of Block 14 were willing.

On October 26, 1836, the first steps to obtain a city charter were taken. The town before had been divided into three districts.

The president of the meeting invited people to select the following three representatives of each district to consider the question: First district, Ebenezer Peck, William Stuart, E. W. Casey; Second district, J. D. Caton, Mr. Chadwick, W. Forsythe, Third district, John H. Kinzie, W. L. Newberry, T. W. Smith. These delegates and the board of trustees met November 25, in the trustees' room opposite the Mansion house, and resolved "That it is expedient for the citizens of Chicago to petition the Legislature for a city charter." A commission of five, two members of the board and one from each district, was appointed to prepare a city charter. E. B. Williams, president of the meeting, appointed for District 1, Ebenezer Peck; District 2, J. D. Caton; District 3, T. W. Smith, and also Bolles and Ogden of the board. The committee met December 9, and Ebenezer Peck, Esq., presented the draft for a city charter. It was adopted with some changes and 500 copies were ordered printed. This charter was duly presented to the Legislature and passed by that body on March 4, 1837.

The first election of city officers was held on the first Tuesday of May, 1837, and resulted as follows: Mayor, William B. Ogden; aldermen, First ward, J. C. Goodhue; Second ward, J. S. C. Hogan; Third ward, J. D. Caton; Fourth ward, A. Pierce; Fifth ward, B. Ward; Sixth ward, S. Jackson. John Shrigley was elected high constable at the first meeting of the Council, and Norman B. Judd city attorney. The total vote for Mayor was 703, as follows."—(Democrat, November 30, 1851.)

1839, Benjamin W. Raymond.	1848, James H. Woodworth.

In 1821 fractional Section 10 contained 165.36 acres, and fractional Section 15 contained 159.45 acres, both of Township 39 north, Range 14 east, and they were surveyed and platted. On September 30, 1824, the Secretary of War requested the commissioner of the general land office to reserve the land occupied by Fort Dearborn. On October 1, the general land office notified the Secretary of War that it had directed that a portion of fractional Section 10, Township 39 north, Range 14 east, containing 57.50 acres and "within which Fort Dearborn is situated be reserved from sale for military purposes." On June 6, 1837, the above reservation was surveyed into streets, blocks and lots by Asa F. Bradley, city and county surveyor, under the directions of Mathew Burchard, agent and attorney for the Secretary of War.

The whole of fractional Section 15, Township 39, Range 14, was selected for the Illinois and Michigan canal under the act of March 2, 1827. On February 4, 1837, the surveyor general designated the sandbar as an addition to fractional Sections 10 and 15. This sandbar contained 37.78 acres and was entered by Mark Noble, Sr., and Mark Noble, Jr., on May 31, 1836, but the entries were cancelled and the money refunded. The land belonged to fractional sections 10 and 15. In front of section 10 were 26.17 acres, and in front of Section 15 were 11.61 acres. The survey of the bar was unwarranted.—(House Reports, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Vol. III.)

Fort Dearborn reservation was bounded east by the lake and south by Madison street. A small piece of ground between Madison and Randolph, east of Blocks 12 and 15, was called public ground. Michigan avenue, ninety feet wide, was extended through Fort Dearborn addition. In 1839 the public land east of Michigan avenue was nearly eight hundred feet long, fifty feet wide at Randolph and about one hundred feet wide at Madison. In 1852 the land was only 22½ feet wide at Randolph and nil at Madison. The Illinois Central railway was to occupy a strip 300 feet wide built on piles in front of Sections 10 and 15, providing they would build a breakwater. The inner line of the right of way was located four hundred feet east of the west line of Michigan avenue. The government had no title to the bed of the lake nor to the bed of the river.

On May 2, 1838, the following petition was addressed to Congress by the officials of Chicago: "The petition of the Mayor, Aldermen and citizens of the City of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, respectfully sheweth, that the military reservation upon which Fort Dearborn is situated at the mouth of Chicago river being the south fraction of Section 10, Township 39 north, Range 14 east, containing about fifty-four acres, has become useless for a military post. Your petitioners further show that the said military reservation adjoins the city of Chicago and its value above the minimum price of government land has been principally occasioned by the enterprise and expenditures of our citizens in building up and improving the city of Chicago. Your petitioners further show that, so far as they are informed, it has been the practice of the general government to grant military sites, which have become useless in the Western states, to the cities or towns within which they are located. Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that an act may be passed granting the said reservation to the corporation of the City of Chicago, or that the said corporation may be allowed to enter the same at the minimum price of public land, and your petitioners will ever pray, etc."

There were also here 104 transient sailors. In 1837 there were 4 warehouses, 398 dwellings, 29 dry goods stores, 5 hardware stores, 3 drug stores, 19 grocery and provision stores, 10 taverns, 26 groceries (wet), 17 lawyers' offices and 5 churches, with about 150 children in school. The city was bounded south by 'Twenty-second street; north by North avenue; west by Wood street, and east by the lake.

In the crash of 1837, the peltry trade ran low; emigrants were not so many and produce in part went elsewhere. There was no money; people lived on the harbor laborers' and canal laborers' wages. There were 450 buildings in 1837. By 1842 there were 1 brick store and 78 brick houses, 1,061 frame houses, 224 other structures of logs, etc., in all 1,364. By 1842 over sixty business houses had become bankrupt. But growth was steady—firms went down, individuals passed on, but others took their places. The growth was like that after the great Chicago fire. During the panic real estate stood still; banking was abolished in the state unless secured. In 1840, George W. Dole built at the junction of the branches, out of timber cut ten miles up the North Branch and hauled in with teams, the first considerable vessel constructed at Chicago, a side-wheel steamer named after himself. Like all Western cities, Chicago has had her reverses. In 1835-36 real estate had a fictitious value. The whole country was mad with the spirit of speculation. When the crash came, in the latter part of 1837, hundreds in this city found themselves bankrupt. Real estate remained stationary.

"What a change! In the month of November, 1831, the first frame house was erected in Chicago. But seven years have passed onward to the tomb of time, and a small United States fort with its little garrison, disputing the ascendancy with the untutored Indian, has been surrounded with a bustling city of 6,000 (?) inhabitants. The frail canoe of the savage that then dimpled in undisturbed supremacy the modest waters of Skunk creek and the shores of Lake Michigan is now succeeded by roaring steamers, with their 700 tons and high masted vessels with their thousands of freight. The creek has become a river and from its mouth the merchandise of the far Eastern ports, transported over our great lakes, is discharged into our capacious warehouses for the traffic and consumption of a city and an extensive country rapidly filling up around it. . . . Hard times, or easy times, blue devils, or what not—say what you will—feel how you will—Chicago is a wonderful city.”—(American, April 12, 1839.)

“Business statistics of Chicago: We present the following table of the business establishments in Chicago and challenge any place of its age to beat: Seventy-eight dealers in merchandise, 2 wholesale dealers in merchandise, 1 bank, 2 broker’s offices, 2 flour mills, 1 sash factory, 1 iron foundry, 1 brass foundry, 4 markets, 10 taverns, 5 forwarding houses, 12 tailoring houses, 8 lumber merchants, 2 printing houses, 3 auction rooms. ‘No establishments where liquor is solely or principally retailed or distilleries are included in the above list.’ The business of the city has heretofore employed about twenty draymen.”—(American, April 19, 1839.)

“Our streets are becoming quite respectable—no instances of horses and oxen being lost entirely during the past day or two. We hate to expose the infirmities of our streets to our strangers, but it is the duty of a paper to produce as much reform as possible.”—(American, April 10, 1839.)

The steamboat “James Allen” was built in Chicago in 1838; James Stuart was captain. In April, 1839, the steam packets running between Chicago and Buffalo were “Thomas Jefferson,” Thomas Wilkins, master; “James Madison,” R. C. Bristol, master; “Buffalo,” Levi Allen, master; “Illinois,” Chelsey Blake, master. The first issue of the American appeared on April 9, 1839, with William Stuart, editor and proprietor. It spoke of Chicago as the “Queen City of the State” and said: “This paper will be devoted principally to the commercial and business interests of Chicago.” In April, 1839, the citizens interested put in operation a ferry across the river at State street; a scow was used and the expense was borne by subscription. The American of April 20, 1839, spoke thus derisively of the muddy streets: “The ludicrous antics, which have this season been exhibited in the mud by horses, oxen and men would well embellish the frontispiece of a sporting journal and furnish capital subjects for the cutting art of the inimitable Cruickshank.”

street, beyond the school section, we observed that a considerable portion of the rich prairie, which in the eventful days of speculation was staked out and held as thousand dollar city lots without bringing in a cent, is now plowed up for potato patches and purposes of cultivation. This is right. When in the course of a few years these lands which now lie in the suburbs, shall be wanted for the building purposes of the city, they will not be injured by their present uses.”—(American, April 22, 1839.) “We are glad to see a commendable rivalry in our two ferries for the convenience of our citizens. A footpath of boards has been made on the south side of the State street ferry, on the right hand side, which will be very convenient for passengers when waiting for the scow, preventing them from being crowded by the teams. The street commissioner, under the instructions of the Common Council, has provided a small ferry room and two lamps for the city ferry at Clark street.”—(American, April 22, 1839.) “When Daniel Webster was in Chicago, Mr. B., a well known citizen, upon being introduced to him, addressed him as follows: ‘I have read your spelling-book and dictionary, Mr. Webster, but I never before had the pleasure of your acquaintance.’”—(American, April 22, 1839.)

The government, having settled the claim of Colonel Beaubien on the Fort Dearborn reservation adversely to him, offered the lots for sale in 1839. The land, with the exception of the block including the lighthouse and such adjacent lots as the agent should deem proper to retain for the use of the government, was to be sold for cash under sealed proposals—not at public auction. The sale was set for the second Monday in June. The American of April 25 said: “We may safely say that the citizens of Chicago will have no money to spare for the purchase of these lots. The consequence is that if sold in June they will be bought by non-resident capitalists on speculation and held for the most part unproductive and useless in the hope of future advances on the investment. Believing that the intended sale will work a serious injury to the general interests of Chicago, we hope that our citizens will respectively remonstrate with the Government against its occurrence. We yet hope that the Government will be induced to review its action in this matter and will grant the land for the proper purposes and uses of the city. But if this expectation shall prove a delusion, we yet finally trust that Colonel Beaubien, the old settler, now deprived by the decree of the highest legal tribunal in the land of the other title of the old preemption, will be permitted by the magnanimity, if not the justice of our great nation, to retain in peace, through the brief remnant of his days, his old homestead which he has occupied for so many years, through scenes of savage wars, massacres and carnage, long ere Chicago was.”

“As Judge Burchard, the government agent, has ample power, according to the advertisement of sale, to reserve, if not donate, portions of the reservation grounds, we hope he will be induced to reserve enough for a city common or square of that portion which extends along the shore of the lake for about half a mile, and which the lake, in defiance of the Government reservations or private claims, is fast appropriating to its own extensive domain. . . . State street and Madison street, which divide the old town from the school section, also require a set off of lands, for the purpose of widening and uniformly straightening them throughout their extent.”—(American, May 28, 1839.)

Sealed proposals for construction work on the Illinois Central railroad were called for in April, 1839. In the spring of 1839 the superintendent of construction of Chicago harbor was instructed to spend until July only enough on that work to save what had already been done from damage; it looked as if appropriations were to be cut off. The Lake house was ready for occupancy in June, 1839. It accommodated 200 persons, was located on South Water street and Michigan avenue and commanded a fine view of the lake. In 1839, “the magical days of ’35” were referred to. The “Great Western,” built at Huron, Ohio, was 781 tons burden and 186 feet long. The American of May 22 said: “What city would not be proud of such arrivals as the “Illinois” and the “Great Western.” During the summer of 1839, outside newspapers admitted that great advancement in growth and morals had been made in Chicago. At this time the state was bankrupt and work on the canal had been stopped. There was a general movement in all parts of the state in opposition to all internal improvements until the state could readjust its financial affairs.

“When the mammoth system was first adopted and commenced, we were heartily in favor of it, and advocated its vigorous and impartial prosecution. Our pride as a citizen of a young giant state was heartily enlisted. What state could show such an advance? All went on finely. Deceptive calculations were made and generally believed to show the practicability and profit of the system. Money appeared to be plenty. The school, literature and other funds of the state, were silently borrowed from, to pay the expenses and sustain the credit of the state, and without a resort to taxation. But this delusion could not long continue. By the new revenue law the people were forcibly and feelingly appealed to through their pockets. The imposition of this tax, though collected, as the act represents, expressly to defray the expenses of administering the government, and not to be applied to the payment of the interest on the internal improvement moneys, has set the people to thinking on the affairs and financial conditions of the state; and in this county the people are in favor of a speedy action of the Legislature in classifying or modifying in some just and equitable manner the internal improvement system.”—(American, May 29, 1839.)

About June 1, 1839, Judge Burchard, in spite of the expressed wishes of Chicago for a postponement, began laying out the Fort Dearborn reservation into lots. The County Commissioners asked to have the sale of lots postponed; two petitions of the citizens prayed for the same, but the sale continued for the reason given by the Secretary of War "that after an attentive examination of the subject and a respectful consideration of the reasons assigned for suspending the sale, he is of opinion that it cannot be done without injury to the public service." The American was so indignant that it was imprudent enough to say editorially: "We must confess that we think there is now strong ground for the opinion generally entertained in this city, that the President and Cabinet are connected by some direct or indirect partnership with an Eastern speculating land company in the purchase of these lots at a nominal price." The American stated the case thus: "What are some of the facts in the history of this whole case? Many years after Colonel Beaubien had paid for and obtained his preëmption from the Government land agents in Chicago, Murray McConnell sued out a writ of ejectment in the Cook Circuit court against Major Wilcox, then commander of the fort, to obtain possession of one of the lots deeded to him by Colonel Beaubien. Judge Ford, on the principles and rights of the case, decided in favor of Colonel Beaubien's title, but on other grounds against the action. On error, the Supreme court in a long and able argument, sustained the action on all points. On writ of error the Supreme court of the United States have recently reversed this decision with costs and decided against the preëmption. But in the meantime the United States, as plaintiffs, have filed a bill in chancery against Colonel Beaubien and his confederates, the Government officers and agents, to vacate the certificate of preëmption on allegations among others of fraud in their own agents—which suit is still undetermined."

In spite of the wish of nearly every citizen that Colonel Beaubien should not be bid against on his home lots, 21 and 22, Block 4, James H. Collins, attorney, outbid him and secured Beaubien's home. A public meeting, of which W. H. Brown was chairman, and John H. Kinzie and Julius Wadsworth, secretaries, was called at the City Saloon and the act of Mr. Collins was roundly denounced. The following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, That we sympathize deeply with Colonel Beaubien in this attempt to rob him in the decline of life of the graves of his children and the home which he has so long occupied. Resolved, That the individual, James H. Collins, who bid unconditionally against and over Colonel Beaubien for the premises aforesaid, has outraged public opinion and feeling, no less than the better feelings of human nature. Resolved, That the man who would thus render houseless and homeless this old man . . . deserves now the execration of all honest men and should be admonished of the claims which retributive justice may have upon his own old age. Resolved, That the bid of the individual referred to should, under the circumstances, be declared by the Government agent, Judge Burchard, to be insufficient, inasmuch as there was no competition."

A committee consisting of William H. Brown, John H. Kinzie, Walter Kimball and Gurdon S. Hubbard was appointed to wait upon Judge Burchard with the view of having him declare the bid insufficient. This was done, but the judge stated that the bid of Mr. Collins had already been accepted. In the end Colonel Beaubien lost his home.

In May or June, 1839, General Thornton took $500,000 worth of the canal bonds to Lockport to be sold to retire the canal scrip recently issued. The American of June 7 said: "It can be proved that Charles Butler, Esq., of New York, would probably have in this city, by his agents or otherwise, a large amount (say $75,000) of money for investment in these lands. Charles Butler, it is generally known, is a brother of Benjamin F. Butler, the Attorney General, law pupil, political foster child and bosom friend of Martin Van Buren; and last, but perhaps not least, one of the counsel who argued in the Supreme court of the United States the Beaubien case in behalf of the Government. It can also be proved that Benjamin F. Butler invested or caused to be invested of his funds, $2,500 in the purchase by the North American Land Company of their lands in Kinzie's addition to the city. It can also be proved that the same Benjamin F. Butler, in the year 1836, in the city of Albany, declared on a certain occasion that the Frenchman (meaning Colonel Beaubien) could not get the reservation. Are these some of the 'important and imperative reasons' which compel the Secretary of War at the instigation of the President and Cabinet to persist in the sale?"

"Opinion of Justice Barbour.—"We have reason to believe that the opinion of Justice Barbour in the Beaubien case was made up and written in advance of the legitimate action of the court upon arguments of counsel. That it was an opinion corrupt in its origin and political in its end and aim—sustained at last by only a bare majority of the court—a majority of 5 to 4—the eminent Justice Baldwin being among the number who pronounced it an outrage against law and right—an opinion which, on the principle and right of the case, astonished Webster and the other eminent counsel employed in behalf of Colonel Beaubien."—(American, June 8, 1839.) "Lots 21 and 22, in Block 4, are covered in part by a building belonging to Colonel Beaubien, who, should he become a purchaser, will be allowed a credit under the discretion stated in the advertisement."—(Statement of M. Burchard concerning the sale of Fort Dearborn addition.) "I observe that there is a general and increasing sympathy for Colonel Beaubien, and I think that the people of this city would be pleased to see him obtain a few lots upon reasonable terms. Three lots are mentioned as the number he ought to be allowed to purchase. . . . The Colonel has lived upon the reserve for the last twenty-two years, feels himself at home upon it, and has once purchased and taken his certificate for the same land. . . . The Colonel is far advanced in the decline of life and has a large family dependent upon him for support.”—(A citizen in the American, June 12, 1839.)

During the summer of 1839 a steamboat left Chicago every alternate day. In July the old Dearborn street bridge that had served such good purposes was nearly ready to fall in pieces. Mr. Keenan had excellent vapor baths at Wells and Lake streets. In July, 1839, General Scott, who was here in 1832, again visited the city. The American complained that Chicago business men were poor advertisers. The people who first came to Chicago did so primarily to make money, because Chicago was advertised in the East as the coming metropolis of the West, the center of a splendid commercial empire. Even up to August, 1839, the citizens of Chicago obtained their water from wells or bought it of carriers who secured it from wells or the lake and peddled it through the city. It was brought around in barrels two or three times a week and sold at a rate that amounted to a considerable annual tax. The Hydraulic Company, which had been chartered in January, 1836, and to which the people had long looked with high hopes, was still inactive in August, 1839, though the act creating that company required that operations should be commenced within four years. At this time Frink & Bingham, stage operators, carried passengers from Chicago to Galena, 160 miles, in two days, for $12.50. By August, 1839, cottages and business blocks were going up in many places on the reservation.

In June, 1839, the steamer “Illinois” covered the distance from Detroit to Chicago in fifty-six hours—the quickest trip thus far ever made. The American of June 1, said: “We have now a steamboat from the lower lakes almost once a day. The ‘General Wayne’ left us last night and the ‘Constellation’ came in its place.” Steamboat runners became such a nuisance here at this time that they were prohibited from plying their occupation. During the month of May, 1839, the vessel arrivals numbered 101, of which thirty were steamboats. In June, 1839, large numbers of Irishmen arrived here to secure work on the “Canal.” The Illinois State lottery, Liberty Bigelow, agent, had a drawing here on June 12, 1839; total to be drawn, $399,432. This lottery was authorized by the Legislature for the purpose of draining the lakes and ponds in the “American Bottoms” on the Mississippi river. In June, 1839, the old wind grist-mill was still standing, or rather leaning, on the reservation tract; the old bake-house still stood near the mill. There never yet had been held in Chicago a general celebration of the Fourth of July; in 1839 about 300 Sunday school children marched through the streets to the City Saloon, where they were addressed by Rev. Mr. Borien, Rev. Mr. Hinton and William B. Ogden. This was the extent of the celebration. In July business was very brisk, though money was scarce. Two large three-story brick buildings were going up on Lake street and Colonel Reed was erecting a large forwarding house on Fort Dearborn reservation. The funeral of Rev. Mr. Borien, Methodist, in August, 1839, was the largest ever here up to that date.

"Chicago has been appropriately called the Venice of the West. It is not now probably as much deserving that title as in the early days of the settlement, when it was reported that speculators had to examine their lots in boats. But still the bridge at the lower part of the city is nothing but a bridge of sighs; the timbers are all removed and the last (we hope) two hundred dollars paid by the city for removing the old abutments and piles. To strangers and the great portion of business men of the city who have to cross the river, there is nothing but a bridge of sighs, or rather sighs for a bridge. The question of a bridge or no bridge has been variously decided by our Common Council as a bridge or anti-bridge majority happened to be present. It has been the bone of contention for many weeks to the delay of other business. Receiver Prescott seems to be the champion of the anti-bridge party. The present ferry scow is a miserable thing—water-soaked and altogether too small and slow for the business it has to do. How are the citizens to cross the river when the ice is too weak for the foot passengers and too strong for the scow? How much loss of property and loss of life will it require to convince the city that a rope scow will not answer?"—(American, August 26, 1839.) "The Velocipede.—We omitted yesterday to announce the important intelligence that this well-known craft had been removed from State to Dearborn street where she is now constantly plying across the river, rope and other vessels permitting. The crew appears to be increasing, owing, we presume, to the eligibility of the new location."—(American, August 29, 1839.) "Chicago will be an exporting city this year and 'astonish the natives.'" The way the wheat from our fertile prairies is pouring into our forwarding houses and store-rooms is a caution to all speculating monopolists. This will be better ballast for vessels bound East, than sand, gravel, stones, and such like commodities."—(American, September 12, 1839.)

"The Velocipede Outdone.—Owing to the unseaworthiness of this celebrated vessel, its commanders for the last week or two have been compelled to interdict the passage of carts, teams and beasts of burden and to confine her accommodations to foot passengers. This edict has resulted much to the injury of our draymen, who form a numerous and respectable portion of our laborers and of teams generally, whereby the business of the city on the north side of the river has been considerably embarrassed. Wherefore these evils are no longer tolerable or to be endured; and therefore an opposition craft, newly rigged and manned, has been this day started at the old moorings at the foot of State street for the passage of teams and the general convenience of the city. We have examined the new craft, and her hull and rigging seem to be sound and seaworthy. Her new and unbroken planks present a clean and comfortable appearance, and we consider the Swiftsure a decided improvement on the Velocipede. The vessel we understand is principally owned and started by G. W. Dole, Esq., who is always in such matters a forwarding man."—(American, September 16, 1839.)

"The Modern Venice.—We have compared Chicago to the old city of Venice. As the latter was to the Adriatic so is Chicago to Lake Michigan. During the embarrassments arising from crossing our river, we have often thought that if we could not have canals ramifying throughout our city (which could be built at a comparatively small expense), we could at least have gondolas beaked with shining steel a la mode Venice, so that each one could cross or travel up and down the river at his own convenience. But since we have now two ferries, the necessity for such improvements is not so great."—(American, September 22, 1839.)

"The Chicago and Galena Railroad.—Every day convinces us more and more of the passing importance of the immediate completion of this work. No one can see the immense number of loaded teams dragging their slow length along through the low the wet prairies from the city to Berry's Point without being impressed with the necessity of this railroad. . . . The Chicago and Galena railroad, or at least that portion of it extending as far as Rock river, should be built without delay. We understand that it is to be again commenced and finished over our nine mile marsh next summer."—(American, October 19, 1839.) "Wheat.—Winter wheat of first quality is now selling at Chicago at 75 cents. First rate spring wheat at 50 cents—but little bought. Poor spring wheat not wanted. The quantity of wheat coming in from the country exceeds all expectations."—(American, October 24, 1839.)

It was stated ostentatiously that on one day in October, 1839, Gurdon S. Hubbard bought 800 bushels of wheat at 5 shillings 6 pence per bushel. In 1838 a vessel brought from Ohio to Chicago, in part, a cargo of 700 barrels of flour, could not sell the same and took it back; this was the turn of the tide of trade. In the same year (1839) Giles Williams shipped from Chicago the first cargo of wheat. On October 8, 1839, Newberry & Dole shipped 1,678 bushels of wheat by the brig "Osceola," Francis P. Billings, master. Other shipments the same year raised the total to 3,000 bushels. After that the advance was rapid. But the older packing trade did not drop off. William Lill established the Chicago Brewery in 1839. His company was incorporated 1865.

The steamboat "Great Western" was destroyed by fire at Detroit in September, 1839. At this time the leading hotels here were as follows: United States, at the forks; Lake, at the corner of South Water street and Michigan avenue; Shakespeare, on the corner opposite the Lake house; City, at the corner of Clark and Dearborn, near the postoffice, bank and stage office; Sauganash, at the corner of Lake and Wells. The latter charged $3 per week for day board. Think of it. Immense quantities of buffalo robes were offered for sale by the merchants, and nearly every family had one or more. In September government land in what is now Du Page county was sold here to the amount of $90,000. The ferry at Dearborn street was giving good service in 1839. On October 9, the American enumerated the city nuisances categorically as follows: 1. Swine—streets full of them. 2. Cows with bells—a great bore. 3. Rowdies, blacklegs and other species of loafer—drinking, swearing, fighting and blocking the sidewalk. Both 1838 and 1839 were dry and hot, according to the American. There were many protests against the present cemetery in 1839, and demands for a new and better one. On Sunday, October 27, 1839, eighteen buildings, including the Tremont house, were burned down at Lake and Dearborn streets—about half a square, valued at $60,000. Late in October the Council decided to build a market house on State street between Lake and Randolph, at a cost not to exceed $850; Joseph Blanchard was the builder. The market was to be leased to one man who was permitted to sublease to others. The first steamboat arrival in 1838 was the "Pennsylvania" on April 26; first in 1839, "Columbus," on April 30; first in 1840, "Chesapeake," on April 11. Every spring the cry "A boat is in!" brought everybody to the river. It meant new, fresh goods, the opening of the spring commerce of the lake, and general activity and prosperity.

COOK COUNTY AND CHICAGO

1840-1850

THE City Council and Mayor of Chicago petitioned Congress under date of January 14, 1840, for an appropriation to protect the shore line from the encroachments of Lake Michigan.

Land accumulated on the north side of the piers but was washed away on the south side. Help was asked partly on the ground that the city was poor, with small taxable property. But they did not ask for a money donation—only for the donation to the city of that portion of Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago reserved for lighthouse and other purposes, “at the late sale of the reservation made by Judge Burchard for the Secretary of War;” except what was needed by the Government. This petition was signed by B. W. Raymond, mayor, and by the following aldermen: First ward, J. A. Smith, O. H. Thompson; Second ward, Eli S. Prescott, Clement Stone; Third ward, William G. Stowe, Ira Miltimore; Fourth ward, John Murphy; Fifth ward, John E. Wilson; Sixth ward, B. S. Morris. At this time also Eli S. Prescott wrote to Judge M. Burchard at Washington, urging such a donation. He wrote: “We want it (the land donation) to aid us in erecting a barrier against the encroachments of Lake Michigan upon our town. Unless something protective is immediately done a large part of Fort Dearborn addition will soon be known as the bottom of the lake. The fall storms have made the most tremendous and frightful inroads upon us.”

At this time also Walter L. Newberry of Chicago addressed a letter to Hon. R. M. Young of the United States Senate, likewise urging that Congress should take some action to protect the shore line along Lake Michigan. Unless some such action was taken at Chicago, he wrote, “the city of Chicago, with its rapidly increasing commerce, of which the whole state ought to be justly proud, will be destroyed. The piers of our harbor are not yet sufficiently extended into the lake to prevent the formation of bars across its mouth; such a bar was formed last winter and the harbor would have been blocked up had the bar not been removed. When these piers are once extended as far as was originally intended this difficulty will be obviated.”

“Memorial of a Number of Citizens of Chicago, Illinois, Praying to have that Place Constituted a Port of Entry.

“We, the undersigned masters, owners and citizens of Chicago, recommend to the Honorable Messrs. King and Norvall, and others, committee on commerce of the United States Senate, that this should be made a port of entry, in consequence of the great delay and expense arising to captains and masters of vessels in going from here to Detroit to procure their licenses, as the commerce of this place demands it to be made a port of entry, and further pray not:

People were very impatient for the opening of the new Clark street bridge. "Clark Street Bridge.—The erection of this bridge has commenced today by the driving of piles. We believe that all opposition of any consequence to this location has been subsided and the citizens are now in a fair way to have a good and convenient bridge across the main river."—(American, April 18, 1840.)

The American of May 9, 1840, said: "The 'Illinois' made her passage from Buffalo to Chicago during inclement weather in the remarkably quick time of less than five days." William Stuart, editor of the American, was fined $100 for contempt of court by Judge Pearson in May, 1840. John Wentworth was also cited to answer to the charge of contempt. Both editors had commented with too much freedom in regard to the John Stone murder case. Stuart charged that Wentworth, one of the jurors, wrote articles for his paper concerning that case while serving as juror.

It was said of the new ferry running at State street that "it is a decided improvement on the old Swiftsure line." Greatly to the damage of the harbor here and to the regret of all the people, "Congress in 1840 failed to pass an appropriation for continuing the work on the piers. In 1840 a gentleman went from Chicago to New York in six days. He took the steamboat to Buffalo, thence went by railway and steamboat to Lewistown and Syracuse; thence by railway to Albany; and thence by steamboat to New York. "This is indeed rapid traveling, and is a remarkable commentary on the past and on the still greater improvements of the future. Six days from Chicago to New York! Only think of it!"—(American, August 14, 1840.)

In 1840 the sand-ridge road (wherever it may have been) was being built. There was a tri-weekly stage line from Chicago to Dixon's ferry—fare $6. In August the American called for butter, eggs, flour, wood and produce on subscription. It said: "Four splendid brick fire-proof stores have been erected on the site of the old Tremont house on Lake street. . . . It is creditable to the enterprise of Chicago to find the whole burnt district built up and occupied by our merchants. We wish them all success." General Thornton negotiated the canal loan in the East at 85 cents on the dollar. On September 29, much to the regret and indignation of all Chicago, the implements for improving the harbor were sold at public auction. The sale resulted as follows: 1 pile driver, $45; 1 hammer, $4; 1 nippers, $8.50; 1 deck scow, $47.50; 1 deck scow, $22.50; 1 crane scow, $15; 1 crane scow, $18.50. The pile-driver alone had originally cost about $700.

"Ordered, That the prayer of the petition of J. Y. Scammon and others, a committee appointed by the citizens of Chicago to procure subscriptions for the purpose of raising a fund to protect the public grounds in the Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago, and also to petition the Common Council to issue certificates of stock to the amount subscribed to the persons so subscribing, payable in five years, be granted."

The Commercial Advertiser, a Whig journal, had ceased to be issued before the summer of 1840. There was a military band here in 1840; also a military company called the Chicago Guards. A national bankrupt law was demanded by the newspapers. A motion to repeal all laws for the completion of the canal was made in the Legislature in December, 1840. In a big fire about this time at Lake and La Salle streets the stock on hand of "Scammon's Reports" was burned.

"A vast quantity of pork was brought to our market last week by our enterprising Hoosiers and Suckers, and of superior quality. About one hundred tons have been sold here and exchanged for articles of merchandise at prices ranging from 2½ to 3½ cents."—(American, December 29, 1840.) Concerning a small fire, the American of February 9, 1841, said: "The prompt exertions of engine and hook and ladder company No. 1 were worthy of all praise. They were at the scene of destruction at the first alarm and were unusually efficient. The new institution of the Fire Guards also rendered well-timed and valuable aid and evinced the importance and need of that public spirited corps of young men."

The act of March 1, 1841, repealed portions of the act of March 4, 1837, concerning the incorporation of Chicago. It was provided that every person voting for mayor, aldermen, assessors and other officers should be actual residents of the wards where they voted, but need not necessarily be freeholders. All sales of real estate for taxes or assessment were transferred from the city attorney to the city collector. A city marshal was to be elected annually. One assessor instead of several was provided for. The City Council were empowered to inflict penalties for non-compliance with ordinances relative to regulating, restraining or licensing the sale of liquors.

In 1841 the warehouses had only a mule lift on the roofs; in 1851 the first steam elevator was built. Under the act of February 27, 1841, all persons who had purchased canal lots in Chicago in 1836 were relieved—were permitted to pay for such portions as they desired and could relinquish the balance.

"Sport! Sport!"—A company of hunters in pursuance of a proclamation duly made out went out yesterday with pistols, etc., and after a hunt of six hours returned with six deer and four wolves. This noble success cannot be doubted when we state that our active officer, Hunt-oon was one of the party. Where is our share of the bounty? We will take a piece of the venison in lieu of a wolf's scalp."—(American, February 3, 1841.)

"Last year when the Whigs had the power in the Common Council, the actual expenses of the city were $6,582.80, and at the end of this year the excess of receipts over actual expenses was $2,076.20. This year under the 'reform' administration of the Locofocos, who promised to conduct the affairs of the city so economically, what are their expenses? $7,494.44—about a thousand more than last year under the extravagant administration of the Whigs. The same old debts remain, and new liabilities have been created until the city is almost hopelessly insolvent."—(American, February 26, 1841.)

"To those who love proportion there must be a great symmetry between our state, county and city governments. All are embarrassed and the paper of all is at a discount. The city and county are constantly talking about retrenchment and reform, but still contrive to keep up, if not increase, all their former embarrassments and flood the community with their orders, which are merely bought up and used at a large discount when any one is compelled to pay a city or a county debt. The system of issuing orders 40 or 50 per cent under par for the expenditures of the city appears to us to be a ruinous policy. Laborers and others will not work at the usual rates for a corporation that will pay them but 50 cents on a dollar, as they will for an individual who pays them promptly in current funds. They cannot afford to do so, neither does justice nor the custom of the trader require it. It is therefore now pretty generally understood that the city and county have to pay the discount on all the expenditures to which they are subjected—for the price will be and should be as the pay. The work which in these times would cost them $1 in prompt cash funds now costs them $1.40 or $1.50. Would it not be better to borrow money at the highest legal rates of interest (if it could not be procured for less) for the purpose of keeping the orders at par and protecting their credit from dishonor? By the recent act of the Legislature amending our city charter, it will be seen that power is given to the County Commissioners to borrow money for the county at a rate of interest not exceeding 8 per cent. The county may be able "to call spirits from the vasty deep," but the question is whether they will come at its bidding. The attempt to borrow money at that rate should at least be tried—however dark may be the prospect of success."—(Chicago American, April 7, 1841.)

In June, 1841, the Chicago Hydraulic Company elected B. S. Morris president, B. W. Raymond, E. S. Prescott, S. L. Sherwood and E. S. Wadsworth, directors for the ensuing year. The American of June 8 said: "The works are now in a very forward state, a powerful and excellent engine is ready for operation, and it is supposed that the company will be able to supply the business parts of the city with good pure lake water by September next."

"What are the prominent facts in relation to the present Clark street bridge? After it was found that public opinion was averse to the existence of a bridge as low down as Dearborn street, and that ferries were found both inconvenient and expensive, less than one year since, a bridge was built on Clark street upon a plan which obviates all objections on the score of interrupting navigation. The funds to build the bridge were raised by persons interested in having a bridge on Clark street, by subscribing to a city 7 per cent stock at par. This stock if thrown on the market would not have sold for more than 50 or 60 cents on the dollar, and, of course, more than one-third of such person's subscriptions was a donation. Can it be supposed that those persons would have made this donation to build a bridge that was to be removed in less than a year? And is it not a palpable breach of faith in this city to accept those donations and then to take away the benefits they were made to secure? The question of the location of bridges in our city has always been an embarrassing one and productive of much ill feeling in different sections of the city."—(American, May 1, 1841.) This article was written when the City Council was considering relocating the bridge on the main river.

"Our city is becoming justly famous for her excellent beef and pork. The specimens exposed in our stalls and houses stick out with fatness."—(American, May 12, 1841.)

There were about a dozen fires in the fall and winter of 1840-41. John Wentworth was commissioned colonel in the militia about this time. The fire officers in 1840 were A. S. Sherman, chief engineer; S. B. Collins, first assistant; S. F. Galf, second assistant. "This magnificent steamer, the 'Great Western,' the largest on our waters, again arrived at our harbor yesterday, and rode smoothly over the bar to her landing at Smith and Webster's. The appearance of such a boat so far up South Water street was cheerful indeed, and shows that our noble little river is yet destined to be gummed from point to point and shore to shore with the floating palaces of the immortal Fulton. Captain Walker is commanding."—(American, May 12, 1841.) In March, 1841, the Common Council petitioned Governor Carlin to call an extra session of the Legislature to consider the canal question. The road to Perry's Point was in progress of construction in April, 1841. Countless millions of wild pigeons darkened the sky in April. At a large temperance meeting held here April, 1841, on hundred and forty new converts signed the pledge under the vivid and brilliant address of Judge Robbins of Springfield. The New York Tribune, Horace Greeley, editor, began to come here in the spring of 1841. The first boat of the season, "Great Western," arrived here April 26, 1841. Judge Smith opened court under the new judiciary act in April.

"Business of Chicago.—Never have we seen more gratifying spectacles than those which our streets have of late presented from the wheat trade. So much have we to cheer us—the gloom which hung over our city has to so great an extent been removed that we can scarcely pass through its business portions without a thrill of delight. Boxes, barrels, stoves, crates, ploughs and almost every-conceivable species of merchandise, line our sidewalks. All sorts of vehicles, from the lightest buggy driven by the spruce cit in tight pants, to the heavy wagon of the Hoosier, the body of which more nearly resembles a whaleboat than anything else we can liken it to, choke up the streets. Then the stores are thronged with customers, the hotels with travelers, and the walks with persons passing to and fro, while the enlivening 'yo heave ho' of the sailors resounds from the brigs, steamboats and other vessels at our wharves. Some idea may be formed of what we are doing from the fact that we have not vessels enough to take away our wheat. Chicago is itself. The tide of prosperity is again setting in, and every man among us of ordinary prudence and industry, will soon cease to complain. We have seen nothing in our city for years like the animated spectacle of South Water street during Saturday of last week."—(American, September 1, 1841.) "Ship ahoy!—Vessels wanted.—We are without vessels to carry our wheat and other produce to Buffalo. Team after team has been pouring in—our streets are fairly blocked up—our warehouses are filled to their utmost capacity—we are one immense granary. There has never been so much business doing in Chicago as at the present moment."—(American, September 2, 1841.)

"What a source of business and of wealth will the lakes not become when their broad bosoms shall be whitened by myriads of sails and Chicago—proud and flourishing Chicago—shall number a population of some 40,000. That we shall reach this number there can be no possible question."—(American, September 7, 1841.) "Balance of Trade.—It was scarcely but yesterday that we imported nearly every necessary of life into the northern part of this state. Not only did we get our dry goods and groceries from the East, but also our flour, our beef and our pork. In 1837 flour readily brought $13 per barrel in Chicago. The consequence was that we were always exposed to a ruinous rate of exchange. . . . Now, however, our tide is about to change. Our own products and our own vessels are daily leaving port for the East. Grain of all kinds is coming into our city in such quantities that we absolutely have not vessels enough to carry it away—the streets are choked with it. Clouds of dust on every avenue by which the city can be approached, and extending as far as the eye can reach, announce the advent of our industrious yeomanry, with trains of wagons overflowing with grain and often fifteen or sixteen in number."—(American, September 8, 1841.)

Camps of wheat wagons were to be seen all over the city. Nearly all the wagons had white covers. The men did their own cooking over camp fires and slept in their wagons. It was said that the suburbs was "one great encampment." "This absolutely makes Chicago the market at this very time of about one-half of the state of Illinois, a large portion of Indiana and a very considerable part of Wisconsin," said the American. "Our merchants took in more cash during the last four days of the past week than they have done before in the same period. This fact and the number of buildings now being erected show that Chicago is marching onward with giant strides. Our prosperity cannot again be checked."—(American, September 13, 1841.)

The stoppage of work on the canal in 1841 and the consequent discharge of hundreds of employes brought hard times upon this community; many were given work on buildings going up in the city. The time between Galena and Chicago was cut down one day by Frink, Walker & Co.'s mail and passenger line in June, 1841—fare $10. In 1841 the "Great Western" had its own band aboard—probably the first vessel on the lakes to practice this innovation; it carried excursion parties to Michigan City. The "Chesapeake" also took excursion parties across to St. Joseph and had music and dancing—remained away over night. The splendid new Tremont house at Lake and Dearborn streets was opened ready for business on May 27, 1841. On August 1, 1841, William Stuart severed his connection with the Chicago American and Harmon and Loomis succeeded to its management. Mr. Stuart had been appointed postmaster.

"Chicago.—Notwithstanding the stoppage of the canal and the pressure of times, Chicago is steadily increasing in wealth and in population. Our streets are extending, new ones are being made, and buildings are erecting, all things considered to a surprising extent. The reservation will soon be covered with fine houses and our blocks will be full and compact. Speculation has received its deathblow, but still never did a city afford better opportunities for judicious investments than does Chicago at this very moment. With or without the canal we are destined to be a large city, but this will be finished comparatively soon. Our stores are thronged with customers and our streets present a busy spectacle. Team after team whips in with the golden wheat and sells to ready and eager customers. We have spirit, enterprise, great natural advantages and resources; we want capital only."—(American, August 13, 1841.)

"Shipments by the Lakes.—Our citizens generally were struck with Saturday's indications of a comparatively new branch of trade. The steamer 'Missouri' on that day discharged large quantities of merchandise destined for different points at considerable distance from Chicago to the South, West and Northwest. Box after box, bale after bale, crates, barrels, etc., were tumbled on the wharf from this boat, marked Springfield, Potosi, etc. The latter place, we believe, is on the upper Mississippi. The Galena merchants and others in that section of country directed their attention to this matter sometime since with great advantage to themselves, no doubt, for merchandise landed in our city directed to that quarter is exceedingly common. Western men are getting their eyes open to the importance of the Western route. The advantages attending transportation by way of Chicago are so manifest that it is almost unnecessary to enumerate them. It is well known that teams leave our city every few days loaded with goods for Indiana. If the merchants of Western Indiana prefer this route it is obviously the best for those who have stores in the west and south."—(American, October, 1841.)

"Notwithstanding the decline in the price of wheat, our business continues to be of the most cheering nature. Our merchants sell almost entirely for cash and at fair profits. Business was never upon so good a footing in this place as it has been for two or three months past. It has been insinuated that much of the trade of Chicago during the past season has been mere speculation. Equally such then has been the business of Buffalo or Boston or any other city of the Union. We venture to say that a thousand dollars would cover all the losses sustained by our citizens during the past season. It is difficult to conceive of any operations partaking so little of the nature of mere speculation as our own. Substantial bags of wheat are hoisted into our storehouses or placed in the holds of our vessels, and good money is received in return. If this be speculation it is such as the shade of the great economist, Benjamin Franklin, itself would indubitably approve. It is perhaps sufficient to say that merchants from different sections of the country are constantly moving into and establishing themselves in our city."—(American, October 23, 1841.)

Perpetual motion was claimed to be invented here in 1841 by Jonathan Bolthead; he showed his machine and it seemed to do what was claimed. On August 16, 2,503 bushels of wheat were received at Chicago storehouses. As a matter of fact the wheat trade of 1841 revived Chicago from the lethargy and despondency suffered at that time. In August the average price paid was about 87½ cents. On August 30, the price jumped to $1. Teams poured in from 200 miles distance. They came in groups in order to assist one another through mud holes. Sometimes over a score stood in line waiting their turns to unload. On September 3 the price was $1.03. Herds of cattle began to appear here in September for the slaughter. At this time the roads were excellent. On September 8 wheat fell to 95 cents. Work on the harbor had been suspended so long that a sand bar began to form across the entrance and vessels found it difficult to pass. On September 11 wheat jumped to $1.10 and 11,000 bushels were bought at an average price of $1.05. The American said: "On the whole it was a week of unusual excitement." The Clark street bridge was a godsend at this time; a constant stream of vehicles and pedestrians poured across it all day and far into the night; 131 vehicles crossed in one hour by count. On September 24, upon the arrival of the "Great Western" from Buffalo with news of a big drop in prices wheat fell from 92 cents to 75 cents, but recovered to 85 cents. "Our harbor is now a forest of masts—we counted yesterday forty vessels lying at our wharves; of this number two were steamboats, four brigs, twenty-nine schooners and five sloops."—(American, October 4, 1841.)

It was learned that Billy Caldwell, the Indian chief who cut an important figure here before 1835, died at Council Bluffs on September 28, 1841. He was called Sauganash, which was the Potawatomie term for whitemen. On October 23, wheat was 62½ to 65 cents. The Hydraulic Company offered to furnish the city with water if the latter would remit their water tax; the offer was considered.

"Chicago Fire Guard.—This is a corps which should receive every encouragement from the city authorities and all possible aid from our citizens. It is a most praiseworthy institution. Those gentlemen who were instrumental in its establishment are entitled to the thanks of the community. We fearlessly hazard the assertion that in a place that has but few engines, a body of this character is quite as useful as firemen themselves."—(American, November 20, 1841.) "Our Harbor.—As the session of Congress approaches it behooves us to take some steps with regard to an appropriation for our harbor. If none be needed at present for the extension of the piers, it is absolutely necessary that some provision be made for dredging the bar, which is already a formidable obstruction and may become by another season a serious impediment to our commerce."—(American, November 26, 1841.) "That noble avenue—Lake street—with South Water street and the cross streets, are thronged continually with sleighs and sleds loaded with pork and thronged to such a degree that a stranger might well suppose we were holding a fair. We do not embellish when we say that some of our streets are so crowded with teams that it is difficult to pass through them. On these streets, as far as the eye can reach, is a dense mass of teams, men and pork. The wheat business did much for us, but the pork will certainly enable us to save our bacon. we are literally going the whole hog.”—(American, December 31, 1841.)

In November, 1841, the Council bought the hydrant already in use and ordered the purchase of five more. The city at this time contracted with the Hydraulic Company for water to be supplied through hydrants in case of fire. The temperance question was an important one here in 1841; it was one of the great waves of reform that swept the country in early years. Lecturers thundered from rostrum and pulpit; societies were formed, and hundreds signed the pledge. In January, 1842, the Washingtonians took possession of the city; the Washington Temperance Society, the Chicago Temperance Society and the Juvenile Temperance Society were formed. Alcohol was tried for murder in the Methodist Church and convicted; prosecutors—Goodrich, Manierre, Hamilton, Strode, H. Brown and Ogden; defense—Freer, Huntington, Collins, Butterfield, Phelps and W. H. Brown. Notwithstanding the large numbers of hogs received here in November, buyers advertised for more, and also for corn. Preëmption claimants above the northern Indian boundary line were permitted to come forward in January, 1842, and prove their claims. The newspapers sharply criticised the condition of the city cemetery, saying it was situated on the “sandy and bleak lake shore,” was neither fenced nor improved and had no trees nor shrubbery. The citizens held a meeting to devise measures for the improvement of the cemetery. Gale’s book store was an early landmark.

The fire department at this time had engine No. 1; engine No. 2; hook and ladder squad; bag and basket squad, and the bucket squad No. 1. The city receipts for the year 1841 were $9,367.63, and actual expenses $4,842.89. The South branch bridge cost $362.84; the Clark street bridge, $667.11; the State street ferry, $28, and the fire department, $177.63. The total city liabilities were $12,233.40, and the resources, $5,323.39. The Mechanic’s Institute, organized February 17, 1842, made annual exhibits for many years and did much for the arts and trades. Charles M. Gray was president, David M. Bradley, secretary, and S. J. Sherwood, treasurer. The first vessel arrival in 1842 was the schooner “Drift,” from the Calumet, on March 7. The Council in March, 1842, recommended that the school inspectors select four lots to be set aside until school houses could be built upon them. G. A. O.

STATE'S ATTORNEY AND PRINCIPAL ASSISTANTS.

Beaumont was first commissioner for Cook county under the new general bankrupt law. The big wheat trade of 1841 forced buyers here to build large warehouses during the winter of 1841-42. H. Norton erected one on the reservation 100 by 40 feet, and four stories high on the river front and three on the rear; this was regarded as a large structure. The American thus spoke of it:

"It is seen to great advantage from its commanding position and is truly a splendid building, being one of the very best upon the lakes, and constructed in the most substantial manner. The work in this warehouse will be performed by horses. The wheat, instead of being shipped from it by the usual slow and tardy process, will, after being raised to the upper story by means of elevators, not unlike the revolving buckets of the dredging machines, glide thence into the hold of the vessel in double-quick time."—(American, March 18, 1842.)

In his inaugural address B. F. Raymond, mayor, said that "during the past years the receipts had exceeded the expenditures by about $3,000; that the actual liabilities during the year of the city were $12,233; that owing to the hard financial times rigid economy must be exercised; that the amount of city orders then in circulation did not exceed the amount of resources in the treasury; that it was not advisable to consider changing the Clark street bridge to Dearborn street; that inquiry should be made as to the wisdom of forming another hook and ladder company, as there was then but one, with two engine companies; that the Hydraulic Company would be ready in May or June to supply water in case of fires; that the desecration of the Sabbath should be discontinued; that upwards of four hundred scholars had received instruction at the free public schools; that while there was on hand $2,500 of the school fund, yet the interest would probably not be sufficient to meet the expenses of the coming year and a small tax might be necessary; that the greatest want then was "convenient and comfortable schoolhouses;" that the citizens were to be congratulated "upon the decided and marked improvement in the morals and peace of the city within the past two months, and that this improvement you will all recognize and acknowledge at once as produced by the Washingtonian Temperance Society."

The farm known as Cottage Grove situated three and a half miles south of Chicago was advertised for lease in March, 1842. At this time there were about 100,000 bushels of wheat in the warehouses. The city water rates in March, 1842, were as follows: Family of five persons per year, $10; office, store or shop, $6; family of six to nine, $12; family of ten to sixteen, $18; tavern, hotel or public house, $50 to $200; livery stable, $40 to $100; public baths, $50 to $150. The water was to be conveyed from the main pipes to the residences. The steamer "Chesapeake" arrived from the lower lakes on March 27, 1842—the earliest arrival thus far. It was advertised that a daily and weekly paper, to be called the Quid Nunc, would be started here at this time by William Ellis, Robert Fergus and David D. Griswold. On April 8, 1842, the American said: "We counted yesterday twenty-one vessels lying at our wharves. The larger portion of them were of good size. This, for the season of the year, was altogether an unusual spectacle. It will be found difficult, however, to obtain cargoes, and freights in consequence are low."

The winter of 1841-42 was famous for the moral advancement made here. Three or four temperance societies were conducted; lectures before the Young Men's Association and the Lyceum were delivered, and concerts and socials improved the taste and manners of the people. The music in the schools, public baths, improved streets, city water, better health—all added to the advancement. The American said: "It is a source of high enjoyment to make the contrast between former winters and the one just past." On April 19, all citizens were requested to turn out with shovels and hoes and inclose the public square with fence and a double row of trees.

"The Public Square.—The fence around the public square on Clark street stands like a good many politicians we wot of, but half whitewashed, notwithstanding the ardor with which the work was commenced. We hope that faithful public servant, Henry Brown, Esq., will not remit his exertions until he has fully carried out his original designs with regard to this matter. To that gentleman belongs the credit of a great public improvement by far too long neglected."—(American, May 5, 1842.)

In May, 1842, J. Y. Scammon and William H. Davis petitioned the City Council to permit them to cultivate the vacant ground on the public square, and their prayer was granted. At this time the Council viewed and surveyed a road extending up the North branch—presumably Milwaukee avenue. The Council met in Mrs. Chapman's rooms at this date. The act of February 10, 1837, granted a tract of land to Chicago for burial purposes, providing the city should have the right to purchase for such purpose the east half, southeast quarter, Section 33, Township 40 north, Range 14 east. In May, 1842, it was resolved "to pay the state what said tract should be valued at whenever the canal lands in the vicinity of Chicago should be offered for sale." After May 5, 1842, no person could run a ferry on the Chicago river or its branches without a license. At this time there was much excitement here over exhibitions of animal magnetism, since called hypnotism; it is amusing to read the press comments. On May 16, the citizens held a public meeting to raise funds with which to dredge the harbor. At that date the "Great Western" and the "Wisconsin" could not, did not dare, come in, and so were anchored outside. Vessels entering the river adopted the custom of backing in to avoid having to turn when coming out; they had rudders at the bows. The American, May 24, said: "Much to the gratification of our citizens, the works of the Chicago Hydraulic Company are at last in successful operation." "Our Port.—The time has arrived, beyond all question, when Chicago should be made a port of entry. We trust that our representative in Congress, the Hon. John T. Stuart, in particular, will give especial attention to this matter. Our commerce is so rapidly increasing, and is even now so great that there is nothing to excuse the slightest delay. The third port in rank on the lakes should hardly be overlooked. In addition to the very considerable number of arrivals and clearances at and from this port daily during the season of navigation, it must be borne in mind that vessels of the largest class are owned by our citizens and that our flourishing business renders it certain that the number owned by them must increase every year."—(American, May 25, 1842.)

"Chicago Harbor.—The channel at the entrance of our harbor has been so plainly marked out by buoys located by Mr. N. Scranton, that mariners who carefully observe them cannot fail to avoid the bar."—(American, June 7, 1842.) "The commencement and completion of the Hydraulic works was regarded by many as a hazardous experiment. It is a great public improvement and has already proved to be of decided utility. We notice that the water as drawn from the faucets is decidedly pure and transparent. The whole outlay of the company has been about $24,000. A large two-story brick building has been erected, with a pier running into the lake. The steam engine is twenty-five horsepower. The working barrel of the pump is fourteen inches in diameter and forty-four inch stroke, double action. The suction pipe—the pipe by which the water is drawn from the lake—is also fourteen inches in diameter and 320 feet in length. The pump raises upwards of twenty-five barrels of water per minute, thirty-five feet above the level of the lake. There are two reservoirs, each of the capacity of 1,250 barrels, only one of which is complete. A space of about fifty minutes is required to fill a reservoir—equivalent, of course, to raising 1,250 barrels in fifty minutes. The reservoir is of sufficient elevation to throw the water into the second story of any building in the city. About two miles in length of pipe are now laid down. The machinist who made the system successful is Ira Miltimore."—(American, June, 1842.)

"The dredging machine is now actively in operation between the piers under the direction of Captain Leavenworth, and it cannot be long before we shall have a good and safe channel in that part of our harbor. It is due to our public spirited citizens to say that the expense of this vital improvement is solely defrayed by them. Congress contributed nothing toward it."—(American, June 25, 1842.) "Wool.—This may be considered the first season in which wool of Illinois growth has been brought to this market. A trifling quantity was exported from Chicago last year. In this season up to the present time four or five thousand pounds have been received, and we perceive that the quantity brought in by our farmers is gradually increasing. A woolen factory has recently been erected at the village of St. Charles, on Fox river. B. W. Raymond & Co., of this city, pay precisely the same prices for wool that are paid at the East. The prices are as follows: Native quarter blood, 18 to 20 cents; half to three-quarters blood, 23 to 28 cents; full blood, 30 to 32 cents; three-quarters to full blood Saxony, 33 to 38 cents."—(American, June 27, 1842.) "Travelers.—Our city is now thronged with travelers both from the East and South, more especially, however, from the latter. Summer has come at last. Chicago itself is a place where the traveler may pleasantly sojourn if he be so inclined. We have good hotels, fine vehicles, fine baths, good churches, well filled stores, amusements, incident, pretty women, intelligence, choice spirits—in a word, all the appurtenances of a great city—in fact, we are New York in miniature."—(American, June 28, 1842.)

"All interested in the prosperity of Chicago will not soon forget that while President, Mr. Van Buren ordered the sale of the pile-driver and other machines and utensils employed in the construction of the piers, thus declaring in the most unequivocal terms, that he was opposed to the construction of an artificial harbor at this place. Those machines, as it is well known, were sold for a mere song. Mr. Van Buren gave further evidence of his regard for the interests of the West by ordering other like disgraceful proceedings at other points on the lakes. The people of the West remembered these things in the Tippecanoe campaign."—(American, July 19, 1842.)

Sauganash hotel was at East Water and Lake streets; United States hotel at Wolf Point, near the Randolph street bridge; City hotel, corner Clark and Randolph. The steamer "Great Western," Captain Walker's band on board, advertised a two-hour excursion at 50 cents, to raise funds for the improvement of the harbor. Great complaint concerning the condition of the harbor was made in June, 1842; two vessels were lying outside stranded. Flying before heavy winds from the north, vessels had to make Chicago harbor or be dashed on the shore. On June 10, 1842, wheat was 92 to 98 cents. The steamer "Huron" plied regularly between St. Joseph and Chicago in June, 1842—fare, $3. To go to Detroit—first by boat to St. Joseph, thence by stage to Jackson, thence by rail to Detroit—fare, $12. The big first-class steamers here in June, 1842, were: "Chesapeake," Captain Howe; "Madison," Captain Fagden; "Wisconsin," Captain Randall; "Great Western," Captain Walker; "Bunker Hill," Captain Nickerson; "Missouri," Captain Wilkins; "Illinois," Captain Allen; "De Witt Clinton,"

Captain Squiers. All were combined freight and passenger boats of from 550 to 800 tons burden, and all made Buffalo. Ex-President Van Buren was fittingly received here in June, 1842. In his welcoming speech Mayor Raymond referred to the fact that Congress had neglected to provide for the completion of the harbor; Mr. Van Buren had nothing to say in answer. The first issue of the Quid Nunc, a neutral newspaper edited by D. S. Griswold, appeared July 4, 1842. N. Scranton, August, 1841, after an expense of $300, began to run his ferry across the Chicago river; he stated in July, 1842, that thus far it had not made expenses and that he would be compelled to cease operating it if his license were not reduced to $100 per year and he be permitted to charge one cent toll for each person except ladies. He built a pleasure boat called "Commodore Blake." In July, 1842, Alexander Stuart sold the American to Buckner S. Morris; W. W. Brackett remained its editor. "Wheat.—About 200,000 bushels of wheat have been exported from this city since the opening of navigation of the present season. They have been accompanied by large quantities of oats, corn, hides and flour and a considerable quantity of wool."—(American, July 23, 1842.) The Michigan Central was built from Detroit to Ypsilanti in 1842; by 1847 it had reached Kalamazoo and the track was laid with strap iron. In 1847 it was completed to New Buffalo, and in 1852 reached Chicago.

"Sales of the Chicago Land Office.—About 115,000 acres of land were sold at our land office in May and June last. Those lands were all within comparatively a few miles of Chicago. Of this large amount not one acre was purchased by a speculator. The whole of it was entered by farmers with the exception of perhaps a few tracts bought by individuals living in the city, but nevertheless to be devoted to farming purposes. Eight or ten years only have passed since these tracts were portions of an absolute wilderness, the abode of the red men and cheerless in all but its luxuriant vegetation to the white. How marked the contrast now." (American, August 5, 1842.) "Wheat.—Our streets have been pretty well filled with wheat wagons today. Large arrivals are anticipated, notwithstanding the low prices. The receipts this morning were about 4,000 bushels. A large number of vessels are lying in port waiting for cargoes and business generally is somewhat more animated than it has yet been this season."—(American, August 15, 1842.) "Our wheat trade is again under way. Prairie schooners from all parts of the country are bringing in their rich freights; clouds of dust herald their approach from afar and in all directions. Many of the Hoosier teams are provided with bells suspended from an arch or otherwise after the manner of Russia. Trains of from thirteen to twenty wagons are now familiar spectacles. We noticed sixty-two wagons with their white tops yesterday afternoon in one encampment. We understand that a train of eighty wagons loaded with wheat and apples is on its way to this city.”—(American, August 22, 1842.)

“Wheat.—Though the price of wheat is lower than it has been we are doing an excellent business in this line. More wheat is being brought to this market than there ever has been before. Seven thousand and thirty-eight bushels were received into our warehouses on yesterday, and our daily receipts cannot be very far from this amount. This quantity is no doubt the largest ever brought into the city in one day.”—(American, September 6, 1842.)

In 1842 nine steamboats of the largest class plied between Buffalo and Chicago. There were eight common schools, six or seven private schools and eight organized churches here. A new wooden hydrant on Clark street, in August, 1842, was considered better than the old brick one. At this date plank sidewalks were being built in all parts of the city; often the authorities put them down and assessed the cost to the owners. Late in August wheat was only 60 to 65 cents. The market was full of apples and peaches. Prof. Morse’s new and wonderful telegraph attracted attention here in August; its vast importance was recognized and commented upon. From August 28 to September 2 the wheat receipts fell off vastly—the price was not attractive—62 cents. A turnpike was to be constructed from Chicago to Berry’s Point and the Sand Ridge toward the Des Plaines river. By September 19 wheat had fallen to 50 cents—receipts, from 5,000 to 7,000 bushels daily. In the American of September 29, 1842, is an account of the duel between Abraham Lincoln and James Shields. W. W. Brackett withdrew as editor of the American October 8, 1842; B. S. Morris, owner, announced that if he could not sell the paper within two weeks he would discontinue it; not succeeding, it was stopped.

“Chicago to Detroit.—Through in thirty-nine hours (running time) by the Central Railroad Mail Line, being thirty-six hours quicker than by the lake route. The steamboat will leave Chicago daily (Sunday excepted) at 8 o’clock A. M., arriving at St. Joseph, sixty miles, at 4 P. M. same day; leave St. Joseph at 5 P. M., in coaches, arrive at Jackson at 7 P. M. next day; leave Jackson on railroad cars at 8 A. M. and arrive at Detroit, eighty miles, at 2 P. M. On arriving at St. Joseph from Detroit passengers go on board a steamboat, which brings them to Chicago, thus avoiding any delay at St. Joseph. This route was established at great expense in 1842 and its success warrants the proprietors in extending the facilities for 1843.” “This sounds strange to those of our readers who are accustomed to step into luxurious coaches in Chicago at night and awake in Detroit in the morning.”—(Annual Review of Chicago, January, 1856.)

Under the act of March 4, 1843, it was provided that the act to open a new street in Chicago should not be construed to affect the rights of the state or of the canal fund to the strip of land lying south of North Water street and the Chicago river, commonly known as the wharfing privileges, nor prevent the state or the city from excavating its banks, nor in any way affect the title of the state or canal fund to the land or lots lying south of said street and between it and the river.

In June, 1843, the Chicago Express was conducted by William W. Brackett. In May, 1843, the City Council ordered that there should be no further burials in the old cemetery. At this time the mayor was authorized to borrow $5,000. Much concern regarding the attitude of Wisconsin and Milwaukee toward Chicago and Illinois was manifested here. Wisconsin saw the growing importance of Chicago and realized that the growth of this city and Illinois would be largely at her expense. Before 1843 she had tried to separate the northern part of Illinois and attach the same to herself, but had failed. She had endeavored to secure a canal from Green Bay to the Mississippi, but had likewise failed. She now, in 1843, saw with jealous eyes the coming railways, and hence the future commerce of the great West surely and rapidly centering in Chicago, greatly to its own growth and prosperity, but again all her efforts to thwart the inevitable were abortive. She endeavored to secure emigrants by tales of Illinois debts and hard lines. The Express here said on July 1, 1843: "What is still better, these emigrants perfectly understood the motives and designs of the Wisconsin rumors in their damning fabrications with regard to our state debt, etc. The despicable trick now being fully exposed, emigrants are pouring into the northern part of the state as of yore. We are much gratified ourselves at this, as in addition to other matter, we predicted it before the opening of navigation. According to an accurate calculation we have made, over a thousand emigrants must have arrived at this place during the present week. Nearly every sail vessel brings more or less, in addition to those brought by steamboat and by land."—(Express, July 1, 1843.)

The act of January 21, 1843, provided that so much of the act of 1837, incorporating Chicago as included within the city limits the west half of Section 20, Township 39 north, Range 14 east, should be repealed. Under the act of February 8, 1843, the Common Council of Chicago were authorized to lay out and make Madison street eighty feet wide by taking portions off from the south side of the lots on the north side of the street and by paying the owners for the same.

In May, 1843, a committee of the City Council reported that many wharfing privileges had never been leased; steps to secure a revenue therefrom were taken. Mark Skinner was secretary of the school inspectors in June, 1843. At this time John Wentworth continued to be editor and proprietor of the Chicago Democrat; its motto was "Our Country and Its Settlers." The remaining canal lots sold in October, 1843, brought unusually high prices, showing how the public regarded real estate here. Rush Medical College began to be a power here in October, 1843. On November 6 wheat was 58 to 60 cents, and corn 37½ cents. Chicago, like all other cities of this period, was forced to remain more or less inactive during five or six months of each year, owing to the lack of railways to transport products and supplies during the long winters. It was a condition that forced the whole country to hibernate for a considerable portion of the year, until railways came to remove the restriction and nearly double commercial life. The inspector of this port in 1843 was E. Johnson. From February 25, 1843, to February 14, 1844, there was received from licenses, $1,208; city tax, $7,651.21; cemetery, $195; dog tax, $27; fines, $118. Among the items of expense were lumber, $86.34; Clark street bridge, $932.36; South branch bridge, $605.13; Elections, $58.50; Council room rent, $85; safe clerk, $80; fire department, $1,460.03; city officers, $1,198.74; printing, $343.17. At this time the liabilities of the city were: Orders not canceled, $536.50; orders issued from 1837 to 1840, and probably destroyed, $427.47; thus scrip in circulation, $109.03; interest on Clark street bonds, $122.22. The immediate liabilities were: Due Strachan and Scott, $5,000; bonds for Clark street bridge, $3,000; bonds for barrier on the lake shore, $917.62; bonds for city market, $200; total liabilities, $9,367.88. The resources were: Cash in treasury, $1,398.91; due from auctioneers, $325; due from cemetery, $431.11; due from late municipal court, $400; due from A. Clybourn, for market, $66.66; due from J. Curtiss, late city clerk, $92.33; personal tax uncollected, $128.99; from school fund, $33.55; from judgments, $114.

"The City Cemetery.—No act passed by the present council reflects so much honor upon each of its members separately, as the respect it has shown in its deliberations in regard to the burial of the dead. How the mayor of our city in 1842 could look on and see the coffins of our citizens lying exposed on the top of the ground and their bones bleaching on the lake shore and make no effort in regard to the matter is a mystery."—(Democrat, February 28, 1844.) "Improvement.—Our city has never improved faster than during the present season." The Democrat of August 21, 1844, noted the following improvements: A block of six brick stores, three stories high, built by Page & Updike, at Lake and State; two brick stores, by Peacock & Thatcher, at Lake and Franklin; two brick stores by F. G. Blanchard near Lake and Franklin; three stores on Lake between State and Wabash; a large warehouse, by Wadsworth, between Clark and LaSalle on Lake; a large warehouse by R. C. Bristol opposite Sauganash hotel; a warehouse at the corner of South Water and State; a Universalist Church on Washington, an Episcopal Church on Madison; improvements on the Catholic Church at Wabash and Madison. Private houses have been and are still going up almost without number."—(Democrat, August 21, 1844.)

In the fall of 1844, the city was engaged in planking Lake and other streets. The News was started here in December, 1844, by Z. Eastman, editor and publisher of the Western Citizen, the leading Abolition newspaper of the West. "It commends itself to the patronage of all Liberty party men," said the Democrat of December 1, 1844. Engine company No. 3 was organized by the Council in December, 1844. "City Orders.—It is said by one who knows that there is no money in the city treasury, although there have been fourteen thousand dollars collected by the city collector; consequently city orders are hawked about at 10 cents below par. Where is the money?"—(Democrat, December 11, 1844.)

The opening of the new building of Rush Medical College in December, 1844, was an important event. Of Doctor Brainard, who delivered the opening address, the Democrat said: "He may almost be said to be the founder of the institution." At this time there were about forty students. On January 6, 1845, a general meeting of the citizens was held to consider the question of postage reform. Col. R. J. Hamilton, Charles H. Larrabee and Dr. C. V. Dyer were appointed committee on resolution, one of which was, "That it is imperatively demanded of the representatives of the people assembled, so to modify and reduce the present rates of postage, as to operate more equally upon all classes and be less burdensome upon the industry of the country." The meeting recommended the abolishment of the franking privilege and a schedule of postage rates on all mail matter. J. H. Collins was chairman of the meeting and M. D. Ogden, secretary. Owners of city lots were required to build sidewalks adjoining their property. The Masons and Odd Fellows were growing rapidly here and becoming a factor in politics and social life. The Norris directory in 1844 showed the following population: White males, 5,730; white females, 4,378; colored persons, 143; transitory persons, 584; total, 10,835. There were 972 Irish, 531 Norwegians, 1,053 Germans, and other foreigners, 683. There were 43 lawyers, 28 physicians, 17 clergymen, 36 printers, 18 hotels and about 300 dealers in the various sorts of merchandise.

The act of March 1, 1845, incorporated the Lake Michigan Hydraulic Company, the incorporators being Thomas Dyer, William B. Ogden, William E. Ives, Walter L. Newberry, Henry Smith, Mahlon D. Ogden, John H. Kinzie and John B. Turner. The object was to supply only the North Side with the water of Lake Michigan, and the company was authorized to construct the necessary works on the North Side. This act was not to take effect if the other Chicago Hydraulic Company then in Chicago should within six months commence the necessary works to supply the North Side with water. The act of March 3, 1845, provided that Block 15, in the Original Town of Chicago, should be appropriated for public use, the same as Block 14 has been under the act of July 21, 1837. The commissioner or trustees were directed forthwith to exchange Block 14 for Block 7, as had been provided. The act of March 3, 1845, provided "That a strip of land sixty feet in width from the east side of Section 9, Township 39 north, Range 14 east, commencing at the southeast corner of said section, thence sixty feet west, thence north parallel with the north and south line of said section, to the south bank of the Chicago river, be and the same is hereby declared a public highway and a part of State street in the City of Chicago."

In January, 1845, street names were ordered put on street corners. An outer harbor to be built was strongly talked of in January, 1845. The great Morse telegraph for Chicago was considered at this period. Prior to January, 1845, government appropriations to the amount of over $222,000 had been made for Chicago harbor.

"Many of our citizens believe that so far as the business and growth of Chicago are concerned, the completion of the canal would be detrimental. They reason in this wise: The vast and rich country around this city is now compelled to bring its produce here in teams and can find no other place of sale, and the transportation of staple articles to the interior is now so expensive that they can always be afforded here cheaper than at any other place in the interior, and therefore the produce thus brought here is exchanged for merchandise and the exchange and trade secured to this city. Whereas, they say, if the canal were finished, at all places on the canal and Illinois river the wheat and other produce would be sold, salt and other staple articles received in exchange, with the difference of canal transportation only, which would be so slight as to prevent a resort to our city for these exchanges. . . . One thing is certain: That amidst all the revulsions and the depressions of business, Chicago, without the canal, has steadily progressed in business, population and wealth, whilst many other places have gained nothing, to say the least."—(Journal, July 21, 1845.) "The ice has accumulated in the north pier nearly 'mountain high.' The frail appearing lighthouse (constructed of pine scantling on the principle of the cast iron edifices) on the extreme end, though banked up nearly half its height with the frozen spray, stands perfectly erect and defies old winter's blasts. To those of our citizens who admire magnificent winter scenes, we say wrap yourselves warm and take a walk down the south pier when the tempest rages and witness one."—(Journal, February 6, 1845.)

A large meeting of joy and congratulation was held in March, 1845, when the news was received that the Legislature had passed the revenue law, which provided for the completion of the canal.

F. C. Sherman, Norman B. Judd and Isaac N. Arnold were members of the Legislature from this county. The meeting passed this resolution: "That we hail the passage of a revenue bill as a measure by which our state will resume her position among the foremost of the Union for integrity, honor and justice." A canal meeting was held in Lockport in March, 1845—the first in several years; constructive work was about to be renewed. "Although our young and thriving city has increased in wealth and population with great rapidity since we date its birth, it has not been without its reverses. When in the memorable times of '36 speculation and the wild hazard of sudden gain flitted over the land, it swept in its desolating course over us with peculiar force as over a devoted city of the plain. When reverses came upon our business men, it was almost a universal crash and ruin followed—few of the old settlers—those who had borne the heat and burden of the day—were enabled to regain themselves—before a second wave in the tide of emigration succeeded the first and when a third and fourth came it found the thrifty mart of Northern Illinois the great commercial city of a bankrupt state."—(Journal, March 27, 1845.)

The Custom House was established here in 1846. Before that Chicago was in the Detroit collection district. Milwaukee was attached to Chicago, but was separated in 1850. "Our Streets.—Under the direction of Mr. Dean, our street commissioner, Clark street is assuming a better appearance, and our sidewalks in different parts of the city are being made passable. The uniform grade, where uniformity is possible, is being established, which will render walking, especially after dark, an undertaking less dangerous to life and limb."—(Journal, April 11, 1845.)

"In the formation of the bars in Chicago harbor the point at which they commenced has in every instance in which it has been observed, been about 1,500 feet south of the piers, and in a direction at right angles to them; they have then traveled up to the piers. Until the direction of the north pier was changed (1839) the direction of the bars was due south nearly. After 1839 the north pier being changed to the north, the direction of the bar formed (still at right angles to it and its new direction) was southeast, but it commenced as the others had done, to the south, and traveled up to the north pier in 1843. An inspection of the map will show that since the circular form was given to the north pier the course of the deposits was changed entirely. There is no indication of the commencement of a bar to the south, but the new formation appears to have begun on the north side and at the end of the north pier and to follow the curved form of that pier. It has not yet reached a point to affect the entrance and probably will not during the present season."—(Report on the Chicago Harbor, January, 1846.)

"For the benefit of the Illinois delegation who voted against our harbors and all others interested we would state that the Constitution as they understand it is now safe. All our materials have been sold at about one-fifth of their original cost, no more work will be done, and our harbor will be destroyed as fast as the wind, the sand and other causes can do their work. In a few years the wound which General Jackson inflicted on the American Constitution, by signing a bill for the Chicago harbor, will be healed and things will be as they used to be when the people had no harbors."—(Democrat, September 25, 1846.) "The first store built on Lake street of this city was erected twelve years ago, by Thomas Church, Esq. It was a wooden building and known as the 'land office store,' the register's office being kept in the upper (second) story. The lot on which it stood has a large brick store on it now and is occupied by Messrs. Neef and Church. Let people look up and down Lake street now and count its hundreds of mercantile establishments—let them do this remembering that only twelve years ago the first store was erected, and then make themselves believe that this is not a great city—a great state—a great country—if they can."—(Democrat, September 30, 1846.)

The city tax in 1846 was $2\frac{1}{2}$ mills for city purposes and 1 mill for school purposes; total city, \$11,306.75; school, \$4,519.05; total, \$15,825.80. "The jail is certainly an ornament to the city. Resembling a number of woodsheds and corncribs most crazily clustered in a huge whitewashed pound with a haystack sometimes lifting its majestic dome over all like an oriental mosque, it has an air highly rural and delightful."—(Journal, August 6, 1847.) In May, 1846, city scrip was quoted at 10 per cent discount; canal scrip, 20 per cent discount; county orders, 10 per cent discount.

In the spring of 1846 the undersigned ship owners and masters of vessels navigating the lakes memorialized Congress not to constitute the harbor of Chicago a port of entry and submitted the following facts: That the home carrying trade warranted the request, "being unrivalled in the history of commerce in its annual increase," as shown by the imports and exports for the past six or seven years; that the opening of this port probably "would have the direct effect to admit British bottoms to all the benefits of the carrying trade now exclusively enjoyed by our own citizens and foreign shipping to a full competition with American bottoms detrimental to American commerce and interests; that the British, having the exclusive navigation of the St. Lawrence, would likely be able to control effectually the carrying of all the products of this and neighboring states seeking a foreign market"; that "in consideration of the above views entertained by your petitioners they deem it a duty to themselves and to the general interests of the commercial portion of our citizens navigating the inland waters of the United States to request that the bill making Chicago a 'port of entry' may not be allowed to pass the Senate of the United States."

"If it be correct that British vessels have an equal advantage with our own by making Chicago a port of entry, I am opposed to the measure.—Charles Walker."

"The Central Michigan Railroad Company are going ahead this fall and winter and are determined to complete the road by the opening of navigation in the spring. If so it will bring about a great revolution in traveling to the East. It is rumored that the company wish to run around the foot of the lake and come directly here."—(Weekly Democrat, October 6, 1846.)

On October 20, 1846, the magnetic telegraph was exhibited at the Mechanics institute. A combination to keep down the price of wheat was formed here in 1845. Those connected with the movement agreed that on a certain day the price should be 6 to 8 cents lower than the fact, and gave a reason "freights are higher," "money is scarce," etc., and cited the Board of Trade as authority. One merchant proved traitor to his fellow conspirators, paid 2 or 3 cents more than the price agreed upon, and thus bought all there was in the market. At this date wheat was 50 to 56 cents a bushel. In January, 1847, "vapor of sulphuric ether" was administered here by Doctors Kennicot and Brainard. There were splendid snowdrifts and excellent sleighing here in January and February, 1847. In 1847 the City hotel became the Sherman house.

It was in April or May, 1847, that John Wentworth began the construction of "Jackson Hall," which later became well known as headquarters of the Democrat and of Democracy. A small paper—the Porcupine—sold for $105, the Visitor getting the type.

In May, 1847, a brig and a schooner were forced to remain outside of the harbor, owing to the bar at the entrance. Three new bridges were being built in May, 1847—at Randolph, Madison and Wells streets. At this time the City Council removed their offices from the corner of Dearborn and Randolph to Robbins' exchange building. The old Chicago Temperance house, established here in 1842, was renovated in May, 1847; it stood on LaSalle street. The Mechanics' Institute was five years old in 1847; its first big fair was held this year and was pronounced a success. "Our city has assumed unwonted life and animation. Our streets are full of carriages; our river is full of vessels and our walks are loaded with goods, wares and merchandise of every variety."—(Democrat, May 13, 1847.) Chloroform was introduced into Rush Medical College in January, 1847. In June, 1847, Chicago had but one military company, but the fire companies were several and a credit.

The River and Harbor convention assembled here on July 5, 1847. One of its leading objects was to force the government, through public opinion, to the policy of assisting in the construction of certain public improvements such as rivers and harbors. Chicago had thus been assisted under Jackson, but Van Buren had taken a different view and Tyler and Polk had vetoed river and harbor bills, leaving Chicago and other Western cities to improve their own harbors. The convention surpassed in size and influence the wildest dreams of its promoters. A week before the opening day the crowds began to arrive and soon all hotels and nearly all residences were filled to overflowing. The occasion was deemed so important that nearly one hundred editors from all parts of the Union were in attendance, among whom were Horace Greeley and Schuyler Colfax. Chicago made special and herculean efforts to clean up and otherwise to get in presentable condition. An immense tent was erected on the public square and there the proceedings were held. As the delegations arrived they were met by the authorities with an escort of militia and fire companies and conducted to the public square. At Rathbun's hotel, New York, on September 28, 1846, the plan had originated, and on that occasion the following committee had been appointed to carry the movement into effect: James L. Barton, of Buffalo; John W. Allen, of Cleveland; Augustus S. Porter, of Detroit; William Duane Wilson, of Milwaukee; Byron Kilbourn, of Milwaukee; William B. Ogden, of Chicago; S. Lisle Smith, of Chicago, and A. B. Chambers, of St. Louis. James L. Barton was temporary chairman and Edward Bates, of Missouri, permanent chairman. Among the great men present were Thomas Corwin, Thurlow Weed, Abraham Lincoln, Solon Robinson, David Dudley Field, N. B. Judd, H. J. Redfield, Andrew Stewart, J. C. Wright, John C. Spencer, T. Butler King, H. C. Blackburn and William M. Hall. There were read to the convention letters from Silas Wright, Thomas H. Benton, Henry Clay, Martin Van Buren, Lewis Cass, Thomas H. Curtiss, Joseph Grennell, Bradford R. Wood, Alpheus Felch, George P. Barker, Washington Hunt, Daniel Webster and Morgan Bates. The man who really was the cause of the convention was William M. Hall, of Buffalo, who had traveled through the West and had seen the results of a lack of suitable harbor improvements. He it was who called the meeting at Rathbun's hotel in New York, on which occasion he advocated a national railroad to the Pacific ocean. William B. Ogden, S. Lisle Smith and George W. Dole were the Chicago committee on arrangements. The committee on resolutions at the convention consisted of thirty-three of the most prominent men assembled. It was found that many who favored ocean harbor improvements were opposed to lake harbor improvements, even though the latter needed improvement worse than the former. It thus came to pass in the end that all came to favor lake harbor improvements. Efforts by several to give the convention a political caste were promptly defeated. President Polk had vetoed the River and Harbor bill on August 3, 1846, and had said: "It would seem the dictate of wisdom under such circumstances to husband our means and not waste them on comparatively unimportant objects. . . . Some of the objects of the appropriation contained in this bill are local in their character and within the limits of a single state; and though in the language of the bill they are called harbors, they are not connected with foreign commerce nor are they places of refuge or of shelter for our navy or commercial marine on the ocean or lake shores."

"Thus discourses James K. Polk in his veto message on the harbor bill, and the sentiment is an insult to the country. Husband our means, forsooth! Are not millions being squandered by this same James K. Polk for the invasion of Mexico and the extension of slavery? Are not steamboats being bought and chartered daily at enormous prices to enrich his favorite prodigals? Are not the treasury doors unbarred whenever the 'open sesame' is whispered by the slave driver? And yet Mr. Polk outrages the intelligence of the people, his masters, by claiming, when a pittance is asked for a great Northern interest, that we must 'husband our means'—that the object for which we ask them is comparatively unimportant."—(Democrat, August 12, 1846.)

"His real hostility to the bill cannot be concealed by such a shallow subterfuge. The objects of improvement lie north of Mason and Dixon's line and would benefit the North and West, whose growing prosperity is hateful to the slave owners of the South. . . . The lives of an hundred or two of hardy mariners and a few millions of property are of no consequence in the eye of James K. Polk, when weighed against a Virginia abstraction or that idol of the South—negro slavery. Three times already has the whole policy of the Government been changed at the command of the South, and its business broken up and deranged, because the slave owner was jealous of the prosperity of the free states. They were rising in prosperity—growing rich in commerce, agriculture, manufactures and great in intelligence, while the South, with the curse of slavery upon her, was standing still or going backwards. . . . All other pretenses of objections to the harbor bill are idle and vain. The North can and will be hoodwinked no longer. If no measures for protection and improvement of anything North and West are to be suffered by our Southern masters, if we are to be downtrodden and all our cherished interests be crushed by them, a signal revolution will inevitably ensue. The same spirit and energy that forced emancipation for the whole country from Great Britain will throw off the Southern yoke. The North and West will look to and take care of their own interests henceforth.”—(Democrat, August, 1846.)

Wm Holabird.

The morning of the opening day of the convention was joyous and brilliant; the streets were thronged with citizens and visitors. Flags were seen everywhere—on buildings and vessels. Blasts of martial music, the deep voice of artillery, the roll of drums and the cheers of delegations enlivened the auspicious opening. The procession assembled on Michigan avenue, thence marched on Monroe to Wells, thence to Lake, thence to Michigan avenue. Foreign delegations marched west on Madison to State, thence to Lake, thence to Clark, thence to the public square. Cleveland Light Artillery was present. The ship “Convention,” drawn by eight horses, fully manned and under full sail, passed through the crowded streets. The Journal said there were 5,000 men in the procession. Militia and fire companies in uniform paraded, the latter beautifully decorated and graced with the presence of young ladies and commanded by Stephen H. Gale, chief. Dr. Philip Maxwell was marshal of the day. On Monday, July 5, 1847, the Journal said: “Delegate Meetings.—At 8 o’clock this morning the Illinois delegations meet at the tent on the public square; the New York delegations at the court house; the Missouri delegations at 100 Lake street, in Peck & McDougall’s office, upstairs; the Ohio delegations at the Sherman house. . . . A great, a glorious day—a day which children’s children will remember when the actors that took part and the hands that indited are cold and motionless; as a day when party predilections were obliterated; when sectional interests were forgotten; when from eighteen free and independent sovereignties men came up to the achievement of a noble work, united their voices in one grand harmony for the promotion of an object demanded alike by the most enlightened self-interest, the most liberal view and indeed by common humanity.”—(Evening Journal, July 6, 1847.)

last ten or fifteen days, but it was not until Saturday that the pressure became burdensome. When we arrived on the 'Oregon' at sunrise yesterday morning, there was scarcely a spare inch of room in any public house save in a few bedrooms long since bespoken. But the citizens had already thrown open their dwellings, welcoming strangers in thousands to their cordial and bounteous hospitality; the steamboats as they came in proffered their spacious accommodations and generous fare to their passengers during their stay. . . . The grand parade took place this morning, and though the route traversed was short, in deference to the heat of the weather, the spectacle was truly magnificent. The citizens of Chicago, of course, furnished the most imposing part of it—the music, the military, the ships on wheels, ornamented fire engines, etc. I never witnessed anything so superb as the appearance of some of the fire companies with their engines drawn by horses tastefully caparisoned. Our New York firemen must try again; they have certainly been outdone. I think New York had some 300 delegates on the ground—among them John C. Spencer, J. DePeyster Ogden, Thurlow Weed, James L. Barton, Seth C. Hawley, George W. Patterson, Alvin Bronson, John E. Hinman, etc. From New England the number present is smaller, but still considerable. I notice among them John A. Rockwall, of Connecticut; Elisha H. Allen, now of Boston, etc. From New Jersey there are six or eight. From Pennsylvania I think fifty to 100, among them Andrew Stewart, Senator Johnson, of Erie, etc. From Ohio the number may not be much greater, but among them are Tom Corwin, Governor Bebb, ex-Governor Morrow, R. C. Schenck, John C. Wright, etc. From Georgia there are at least two here, and one is Thos. Butler King. There is one even from South Carolina. Indiana, Missouri and Iowa are well represented. Michigan and Wisconsin have a large regiment each; while Northern Illinois is here, of course, en masse. A judicious estimate makes the number present to-day 20,000 men, of whom 10,000 are here as members of the convention. . . . The citizens had provided a spacious and beautiful tent, about 100 feet square, pitched in an open square near the center of the city, radiating from a tall pole in the center and well provided with seats. It holds about 4,000 persons comfortably. The rest of the gathering were constrained to look in over the heads of those seated. . . . A general call was made for Thomas Corwin, of Ohio, which could not be stilled. He was conducted to the stand by John Wentworth. Although coming to the stand reluctantly, Mr. Corwin addressed the convention for nearly an hour in his own inimitable manner on the relations and relative character of the Puritans—on the wants and just demands of the West—the absurd folly of considering harbor improvements on salt water constitutional and on fresh water not so, and the mighty strides of the West to greatness and dominion. The vast assemblage was electrified by his admirable effort. . . . In his letter General Cass was content to say he could not (i. e., would not) come, and gave not the least expression of sympathy with the objects and desires of the convention. The letter excited much astonishment and was read twice at the urgent call of many delegates. The general expression was not flattering to General Cass. Andrew Stewart, of Pennsylvania, made a vigorous and animated speech in favor of internal improvements on comprehensive grounds. It was perhaps a little too plain and thorough-going for the weak stomachs of some present, who had but recently begun to profess friendship for internal improvement. It pleased right well a majority of the convention, but brought up in opposition David Dudley Field, of our city (New York), who favored us with an able and courteous speech in favor of 'strict construction' and of such river and harbor improvements only as are consistent therewith. He was sharply interrogated by different members and in reply to their questions denied the right of the Federal Government to improve the navigation of the Illinois river, since that river runs through a single state only, or of the Hudson river above a port of entry. A portion of the members manifested considerable impatience during the latter portion of this speech, which is to be regretted, for Mr. Field was perfectly courteous, not at all tedious, and fairly called out by the speech of Mr. Stewart. For my part I rejoiced that the wrong side of the question was so clearly set forth. In the afternoon, Abraham Lincoln, a tall specimen of an Illinoisan, just elected to Congress from the only Whig district in the state, was called out and spoke briefly and happily in reply to Mr. Field. . . . The resolutions having been read and accepted, Mr. Field very fairly objected to the last clause of the fifth resolution, affirming substantially that the 'common understanding' of the constitution, through a long series of years, 'has become as much a part of that instrument as any one of its most explicit provisions.' This ought to have prevailed, but it did not. . . . Thomas Butler King, of Georgia, made a most admirable speech in favor of river and harbor improvements and internal improvements generally. It was really a great speech, thoroughly National in its spirit and looking to the good of each section through the good of all. . . . On the last day, the convention came together thoroughly resolved that no topic should be entertained which might mar the harmony and hearty unanimity with which the resolutions of the grand committee had been received and adopted yesterday; so that successive efforts to get before it the project of a railroad to the Pacific, the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, etc., were promptly and decidedly thwarted by the undebatable motion to lay on the table. . . . Previous to putting the motion of final adjournment, the president of the convention, Edward Bates, of Missouri, returned thanks for the honor done him, in a speech which took the convention completely by surprise—so able, so forcible and replete with the soul of eloquence. I will not attempt to give an account of this wonderful speech—no account that can now be given will do it justice. In the course of it he said that when he emigrated in 1812 to the French village of huts called St. Louis, which has now 50,000 inhabitants, he was obliged to hire a guard against hostile savages to accompany him across the unbroken wilderness which is now the state of Illinois, with a civilized population of 600,000 freemen. His speech was greeted at its close by the whole convention rising and cheering long and fervently. . . . The convention upon its adjournment was instantly reorganized as a committee of the whole (with Horace Greeley as chairman), and Gov. William Bebb of Ohio took the stand. He dwelt upon the diffusion of intelligence, purification and morals, and the melioration of the social condition of man. He brought sharply and eloquently out that ‘Vain will be all your canals and railroads, your river and harbor improvements, if the condition of the toiling millions be not thereby or therewith sensibly meliorated—if they shall still be constrained to delve twelve to fourteen hours per day for the bare necessities of physical life. I hold,’ said he, ‘that this need not and ought not to continue—that society may be so revised that ten or eight hours’ faithful labor daily will secure to every industrious man or family a full supply of the necessities and comforts of life, so that each may have ample leisure to devote to the cultivation and perfection of his moral, social and intellectual powers.’ A. W. Loomis, of Pittsburg; Gen. Levi Hubbell, of Milwaukee; S. Lisle Smith, of Chicago; Anson Burlingame, of Massachusetts, late of Michigan; E. H. Allen, of Boston, and Horace Greeley, of New York, were called out in succession and each responded briefly. The speech of Mr. Smith, of Chicago, regarded as an oratorical effort, was the best of the many good speeches made here within these three days. It was beautiful, thrilling, brightly poetic—enchanting and enrapturing the audience. I will not attempt to sketch it. Mr. Allen’s remarks were very happy in a very different vein—these two affording striking illustrations of Western and Eastern popular speaking respectively. William M. Hall, of Buffalo, advocated a series of resolutions offered by him concerning the proposed railroad to the Pacific. His resolutions were adopted as the proceedings of the mass-meeting and not of the River and Harbor convention. Thus has met, deliberated, harmonized, acted and separated one of the most important and interesting conventions ever held in this or any country. It was truly characterized as a congress of freemen, destitute of pay and mileage, but in all else inferior to no deliberative body which has assembled within twenty years. Can we doubt that its results will be most beneficent and enduring?” . . . —(From a series of letters written on the ground by Horace Greeley and published in the New York Tribune in July, 1847.)

Mr. Greeley showed that the Democrats generally were non-committal on the object of the convention, while the Whigs were interested. President Polk had just vetoed the River and Harbor bill, so the Democrats had to be cautious. Writing of the letter of General Cass, Mr. Greeley said: "Did mortal man ever before see such a letter from one who is by position and was by profession friendly to the objects of the convention? It was listened to with hardly less astonishment than indignation." William M. Hall said: "The meeting of that convention raised the value of Chicago property at once, and was the starting point of its unheard of prosperity until overtaken by the disastrous fire of 1871." "A New Wonder in the World.—The greatest wonder in the world is that the late convention should have terminated harmoniously. Old Babel never witnessed more discordant tongues than there were sentiments (upon everything else than the great one which called them together) among the crowd. We not only had Whig, Abolitionist and Democratic orators and editors, but we had every variety of each kind. We had the Boston differences, the New York differences, the Missouri differences, and the sectional differences everywhere. Then we had our differences here at home. But no person on the ground would have mistrusted that we were not all members of the same great party actuated by one impulse and with the same great end in view."—(Democrat, July 9, 1847.)

The convention was a splendid advertisement for the city. It furnished the second great impulse to growth; capital poured in and all public enterprises—railways in particular—were established and stimulated. The convention adopted a series of fifteen resolutions to the effect that the Constitution favored the promotion of commerce by the proper use of Government revenues; that Congress had derived this power, ample in extent, from the states themselves; that this power had been recognized from the foundation of the Government by the erection of harbors, lighthouses, piers, breakwaters, sea walls, etc.; that the principle had been "acknowledged to embrace the Western lakes and rivers by appropriations for numerous lighthouses upon them, which appropriations had never been questioned as wanting in Constitutional authority;" that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states clearly included the power to build harbors; that the Government by extending its jurisdiction over lakes and rivers precluded itself from denying that jurisdiction or the legitimate regulation of their commerce; that the appropriations thus far for Western lakes and rivers had not been proportionate; that the proper protection of the lake harbors in case of war, presumably with Great Britain, demanded that the principal harbors be made secure at once; that the argument most commonly urged against such appropriations, that they invited sectional combinations to insure success to many unworthy objections, was unsound and unrepublican; "that we are utterly incapable of perceiving the difference between a harbor for shelter and a harbor for commerce, and suppose that a mole or pier which will afford safe anchorage and protection to a vessel against a storm must necessarily improve such harbor and adapt it to commercial purposes; that we disavow all and every attempt to connect the cause of international trade and commerce among the states with the fortunes of any political party, but that we mean to place that cause upon such immutable principles of truth, justice and constitutional duty as shall command the respect of all parties and the deference of all candidates for public favor."

In July, 1847, it was declared by the Democrat that the fire companies of 1837 were able to make a better public display than those of 1847. In 1847 the schooner "John Lillie," eighty-three feet long, was built at Gross Point. The bridge at Randolph street was in such bad condition in the fall of 1847, owing to the enormous travel across it, that a new bridge was necessary and was built. In July work on the Galena & Chicago railway was in rapid progress. In July the street commissioner was busy turnpiking the streets, repairing side and cross streets, etc. Enormous quantities of lumber were taken by team into the country from Chicago at this time—the roads and weather being very fine. Wheat was 55 to 65 cents.

"Fuel for Lake Steamers.—The immense quantities of wood used by our steamboats is truly surprising. The Empire on some trips burns 700 cords. It is stated that on an average she uses 600. Calculating that she performs thirteen trips during the season, she will consume 234 acres of timber and employ forty wood choppers at an expense of over $10,000. This is a small item in the expense of this mammoth steamer; yet she clears from $20,000 to $30,000 a season. By this some idea may be gained of the immense profits of vessels engaged in the lake trade. At the present time there are sixteen first-class steamboats engaged in this trade."—(Democrat, July 14, 1847.) "Canal Boats.—We notice five splendid new canal packets on the South branch, made expressly for the navigation of the Illinois and Michigan canal. They are beautifully finished both inside and out and are to be furnished in excellent style when they start."—(Democrat, July 22, 1847.)

"The exhibition of the magnetic telegraph will be continued this evening with novel experiments in magnetism. A dead frog will be made to jump about the room as if alive, by its influence. . . . This is the last evening that Mr. Swift will continue his experiments in electricity and magnetism. All those wishing to witness the operation of the magnetic telegraph, the greatest wonder of the age, should embrace this last opportunity. Wires are connected with the Sherman house, with which he will experiment." . . . "The Telegraph.—The steamer Empire, which arrived yesterday, brought workmen with the implements for setting the posts.”—(Democrat, August 3, 1847.)

The Erie and Michigan Telegraph Company petitioned the Council for a right of way through the city in July, 1847. In 1847 Chicago built many new vessels—mostly schooners. The steamer “Sultan” gave an excursion August 4, for the benefit of the Universalist church. Phrenologists gave public examinations. H. L. Stewart in 1847 succeeded William Stewart as postmaster at Chicago. The revised city charter of 1847 gave Chicago the following additions: “All that part of Township 39 north, Range 14 east, which lies north of the north line of Sections 27, 28, 29 and 30 of said Township; and the east half of Section 33, Township 40 north, Range 14 east, and fractional section 34 and in said Township 40, shall hereafter be included in, constitute and be known by the name of the City of Chicago.” Nine wards, instead of six, as before, were defined as follows:

First ward—all south of the river and east of State street projected; Second ward—all south of the river and between State and Clark streets; Third ward—all south of river and between Clark and Wells streets; Fourth ward—all south of Chicago river, west of Wells street and east of the South branch; Fifth ward—all west of the South branch and south of Randolph street; Sixth ward—all west of the South branch and North branch and north of Randolph street; Seventh ward—all east of the North branch, north of the Chicago river proper and west of La Salle street; Eighth ward—all north of Chicago river and between LaSalle and Wolcott streets; Ninth ward—all north of Chicago river and east of Wolcott street. It was provided that each ward should be entitled to two aldermen, of whom each should hold office for two years, a successor to be elected annually after the first year for each ward. The mayor was given the powers of a justice of the peace. At each annual election there were to be chosen a city attorney, treasurer, collector and surveyor, besides assessors and street commissioners for each ward or for united wards. The city marshal was given all the powers of a constable under the state laws. Each male over twenty-one years and under sixty years was required to work three days upon the streets and alleys of the city or to pay its equivalent. The Common Council was empowered to lay out, make and assess streets, alleys, lanes and highways and make wharves and slips; could condemn land and order it converted to public use; could make, maintain and repair drains and sewers, had exclusive power over the erection or construction of float or drawbridges, could order built sidewalks, breakwaters, tunnels, etc., and the harbor protected, had power to lease for not over ten years Lot 5, Block 4; Lot 9, Block 50; Lot 6, Block 55; all in the Original Town of Chicago and donated for the use of schools under the act to provide for the dedication of lots in towns situate on canal lands—passed in 1839; had power to levy and collect taxes and assessments, could regulate sporting and animals running at large, etc. It was provided that convicts could be required to work on the streets. This they did with ball and chain attached.

In August, 1847, the Common Council named the square upon which the courthouse stood Jefferson square; also the ground east of the fence east of Michigan avenue from the north side of Randolph street to the south side of Lot 8, Block 21, in Fractional Section 15, addition to Chicago, Lake Park. The public ground in Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago between Randolph and Washington streets and west of Michigan avenue (now 1847 enclosed) was named Dearborn square. Also the land west of the west side of Dearborn square and east of Block 12, Fort Dearborn addition, was constituted a street. It was decided to number the streets from the river and its branches and from Michigan avenue west. In August, 1847, Chicago claimed 16,000 population. The City Council standing committees were Finance, Claims, Streets and Bridges, Fire and Water, Police, Schools, Judiciary, Printing, Wharves and Public Grounds, Commissioner of Schools, Board of School Inspectors. Fire department was organized as follows:

"Mr. Speed's Telegraph.—The posts of this telegraph company were being put up through Clark street on Wednesday and Thursday. They cross Captain O'Reilly's line on Randolph."—(Democrat, November 13, 1847.) A plank road from Chicago to Des Plaines was talked of in November, 1847. The New census of Chicago, November, 1847, showed the following result: Males under 10 years, 2,593; males between 10 and 21, 1,203; males of other ages, 5,188; females under 10, 2,430; females between 10 and 21, 1,604; females of other ages, 3,814; total, 16,832.

In November, 1847, the propeller "Phoenix" was burned between Cheboygan and Manitowoc and 250 lives, mostly of Holland emigrants, were lost. The November market showed large numbers of deer and bear. On November 26 a diploma was granted P. S. Updike for having served ten years on the fire department as a member of Engine company No. 1. Rush Medical College had in November 140 students—double the number it had a year before. Many wood stoves were exchanged for coal stoves at this time. "Our city has never been backward in any of the benevolent enterprises of the day. It has given liberally to the poor Scotch and Irish, besides donating large sums yearly to missionary, tract and other enterprises. Tea, donation and dancing parties are also prominent among the many ways and means for raising funds to provide for their several objects. But we have often remarked that in the winter, when such things are generally in full blast, the poor are the last to get a turn at the public crib. They must be satisfied with the skimmed milk, while the more favored are rioting on the delicious cream. Suppose we change this order of proceeding."—(Democrat, December 10, 1847.)

The Galena & Chicago Railway company found considerable difficulty in getting the right of way from Chicago to Fox river in the fall of 1847. The new hose cart cost $450, which was raised by subscription; it was bought second-hand in Philadelphia and originally cost $1,700. The cheap postage system inaugurated late in 1847 was a great boon and advantage to business men. It was Jackson Hall against the field. The Democrat scooped the Journal and all others and published the President's message first in December, 1847. It ran a private express by Gray & Butler's fast nags, and brought the message from Mattville, Michigan (130 miles), in nine hours—thirty-six hours ahead of the mail. This was considered great enterprise. The Democrat had done the same act in 1846. The Democrat of December 21, 1847, said of the Peace Convention held here at the Tabernacle Baptist church: "It has been called by a few foreigners (not citizens) and Abolitionists who under the pretext of being the friends of peace have taken this course to give vent to their hostility to the Government. . . . Chicago has done nobly in raising troops for the war, and it is really too bad that she should be disgraced with such a meeting."—(Democrat, December, 1847.) There were many poor people in town and they were given much help. Numerous applications for work and other relief were made to the county board and the county commissioners. Very severe cold prevailed. On the street wood sold at $6 or a trifle less per cord; coal at $6 per ton. It was decided that coal was cheaper than wood. Many thought that when the canal opened coal would drive out wood and were using coal in open-hearth fire-places.

A new market in State street, not to cost over $10,000, was projected in December, 1847; A. Peck's bid to build it was accepted. "Resolved, That the City of Chicago will undertake to erect buildings sufficient for the accommodation of the city and county upon the public square, provided the county will convey to the city its title to said square."—(Resolution introduced by Alderman Granger, December 22, 1847.) "Telegraph.—We understand the telegraph between this city and Milwaukee is up and in working order so far as the wires are concerned. All that is waiting are the batteries and registers."—(Democrat, January 4, 1848.)

It was noted in January, 1848, that large numbers of Norwegians were settling in this city and county. About a block on Lake and Water streets was burned at this time; two hotels were destroyed—New York and Columbian houses. On Saturday, January 15, 1848, the first telegraph message between Milwaukee and Chicago was sent. "The telegraph worked well and appears to be perfectly under control of the operator. This is Messrs. Speed and Cornell's line," said the Democrat of January 17. The contract for a plank road from Chicago to Des Plaines was let to A. J. Douglass, of Chicago, in January. The first telegraph charges to Milwaukee were 25 cents for ten words; 2 cents for each additional word, and 2 cents for delivery. The first telegraph message between Chicago and Michigan City was sent on January 28. In January, 1848, the Council granted the citizens permission to build a bridge at State street without cost to the city—private subscription. The plank road was described to extend from the Milwaukee road between Dickinson's and Robert's on the Sand Ridge to Smith's tavern on Union Ridge, and thence to the Des Plaines river near Brook's tavern, and thence to the house of F. W. Page at Elk Grove. "A gentleman coming into town yesterday morning on the road from Wheeling to this city (the route of the proposed plank road) met within seven miles of the city 120 teams. And this number does not give a correct idea of the amount of travel on that road, as it was too early in the morning to meet the largest number; and the roads not being first rate, other days would show a great increase. Indeed we have seen ten times as many teams in the streets as there were yesterday. There can be no question that stock in the Northwest Plank road will pay large dividends."—(Democrat, February 10, 1848.) "Plank the Streets.—That little bit of planking on Lake street is a standing monument to the want of public spirit in the property holders of Chicago. It proves the entire sufficiency of planking to obviate the mud, which renders our streets, without exception, worse than those of any other city. A great deal has thus been done to drive trade from this city. The effort may yet be successful."—(Democrat, February 22, 1848.)

The pumps of the canal water works were started on February 10, 1848, to fill the summit level of the canal—one engine of 170 horsepower. A percussion match factory was established here by N. Woolsey & Co. Theodotus Doty, on the Naperville road, was postmaster in Lyons township in 1848. In the spring Randolph street from the South branch to State street was planked and a special assessment of $6,500 was levied to cover costs. At this time Chicago and Cincinnati were connected by telegraph—O'Reilly's line. It was argued in 1848 that St. Louis, in order to countercheck Chicago, must build a railway from Cincinnati to St. Louis. An assessment of $3,273 on the property benefited was levied for the construction of the aqueduct on Madison street from the South branch to the east side of State street.

About April 1, 1848, water was ready to be let in on the summit level and the Ottawa level of the canal. In 1846-47 Beardstown, Illinois, packed 35,000 hogs, while Chicago packed but 20,000. Pekin packed 15,000; Naples, 15,000; Peoria, 10,000, and Merodosa 15,000. Early in April, 1848, Lockport launched the first boat on the canal—named "General Fry," for a former trustee. It ran from Lockport to Joliet, at both of which places meetings were held and speeches delivered to celebrate the event. The completion of the canal and the early completion of the Galena & Chicago Railway immensely stimulated building and business here. "Yesterday afternoon the city was completely deserted." Everybody had gone to Lockport to see the "General Fry" locked through the canal. The boat was decorated and crowded with ladies and gentlemen. The propeller "A. Rossiter" took her in tow and at 7:30, April 10, 1848, she was afloat on Lake Michigan. The boat was cheered all along the river as it passed down. The event was observed here with a public meeting and with speeches by John Wentworth and Charles Walker. The completion of the canal was succeeded by great activity in building on the South branch. The first loaded boat through from Peru to Chicago arrived April 24, 1848, with 100 barrels of molasses and 49 hogsheads of sugar; the name of the boat was "General Thornton." Twenty-three teams (sixty-nine horses) were put on the canal on April 22, 1848. About May 1, stone from Joliet began to arrive by canal and a little later coal made its appearance via the same route. The passenger fare by canalboat from Chicago to Peru was $4; on one trip a boat carried 100 persons, receiving therefor $400; the fare was deemed too high.

The city had water carts long before 1848, the exact date is unknown. The cabin fare from Buffalo to Chicago in 1847 was $10; in 1848 it was raised to $14; there was a combination to put up prices. Capt. R. Hugunin, in April, 1848, was superintendent of construction of the plank road from Chicago to Des Plaines. In 1848 for the first time grocers began to deliver goods to the houses of customers. In May several hundred men were at work grading the Galena railway a short distance west of Chicago. The Staats Zeitung (State Gazette) made its first appearance about April 30, with Doctor Helmuth as editor. Col. John C. Fremont and lady were at the Sherman house in April. It came to be the practice here in 1848 to charge emigrants for landing their effects upon the wharves; a body of them formally protested against this exaction. The Democrat had had an Adams press, but in May, 1848, received a Taylor cylinder power press, which could run off in one hour the entire edition of any paper in the city. "The Canal Trade.—The trade on the canal increases beyond all precedent. We notice the first shipment of lumber to St. Louis—125,000 feet, by Horace Norton & Co.; also a ton of salaratus by the same firm. Several contracts embracing 25,000 and 30,000 bushels of corn, oats, etc., have been made to come forward next month. The want of boats is sensibly felt, as the trade has already exceeded the capacity of those running."—(Democrat, May 13, 1848.) The telegraph did not a little to facilitate business operations; the O'Reilly lines connected Chicago with St. Louis via Milwaukee and Galena. A big grant of land by Congress to the Illinois Central railway caused Chicago to rejoice in May, 1848; Senators Breese and Douglas were given due credit for their exertions. "Nuisances.—The slaughter houses on the South branch and the distillery and pig sty and slaughter houses on the lake shore are complained of, and justly, as nuisances. They are at times almost intolerable, and the stench from them must tend to breed disease, especially in a crowded city."—(Democrat, May 22, 1848.)

broken and the price was forced to 85 cents. O'Reilly's telegraph was extended to Springfield in May or June, 1848; at this time Chicago was connected by wire with New York on the east, Galena on the west, Milwaukee on the north and with St. Louis and New Orleans on the south. "Canal.—Notwithstanding the increase of boats on the canal, there is said to be freight enough at Peru at this moment to keep the whole fleet engaged for a month if not another ton should accumulate. The Peru Beacon says there is no probability of the produce there being cleared out as boat after boat from below crowd the landing with produce for Chicago, and a hundred wagons at a time crowd the streets loaded with wheat to be shipped on the canal."—(Democrat, July 7, 1848.)

The first brick warehouse on Market street was built in 1848 by R. C. Bristol; it was 70 by 75 and four stories. Canal boats were built in the city away from the river and afterward moved to the water as houses were moved. In June the city borrowed of George Smith, E. D. Taylor, Augustus Garrett, Walter S. Gurnee and Charles V. Dyer $11,070 for five years at 6 per cent, with which to build the new State street market. In June the steamer "Queen City" ran from Chicago to Buffalo, including stops, in two days and twenty hours—the quickest trip on record to date; the "American" made the trip in two days and twenty-two hours. The Des Plaines (Northwestern) plank road was announced finished on September 7, 1848. At this date the rails on the Galena railway were laid from Chicago to a point a few miles westward. Immense quantities of wheat began to arrive by wagon and canal in September, 1848. Hundreds of farmers' wagons thus loaded came from long distances south and west; the price ran up to $1 per bushel on September 11.

"There is now a smart chance of a man's making his 'lasting fortune,' by trying his luck on a cargo of Illinois wheat and pocketing a cool thousand with very little trouble if he only watches the telegraph close enough to get half an hour ahead of his contemporaries in the field."—(Democrat, September 12, 1848.) "A lucky dog who happened to receive a slip by telegraph last week and who had long been watching his turn of the wheat, started for the docks, like a fresh hound from the leash, seeking among the holders of Illinois wheat whom he might make a meal of. He soon came across his man and immediately struck a bargain for a cargo at 80 cents per bushel, the seller chuckling over his trade. In less than fifteen minutes, however, the market rose to 85 cents, and the fortunate possessor of the news by the last flash pocketed the cool five hundred and like a bloated spider retired again to the citadel of his fortress to weave fresh meshes with which to entangle another unwary fly. And thus are fortunes made in the Garden City of the West."—(Democrat, September 12, 1848.)

The Niles Register, August 6, 1814, said: "By the Illinois river it is probable that Buffalo, in New York, may be united with New Orleans by inland navigation through Lakes Erie, Huron and Michigan, and down that river to the Mississippi. What a route! How stupendous the idea! How dwindles the importance of the artificial canals of Europe compared to this water communication. If it should ever take place (and it is said the opening may be easily made) the territory (of Illinois) will become the seat of an immense commerce and a market for the commodities of all regions."

"How strange to us appear some of the expressions of this paragraph. Then all west of Ohio was an unbroken wilderness, inhabited only by savages with here and there a fort or trading post and a few small French settlements along the Mississippi. Little did the writer think that in only thirty-four years 'his stupendous idea' would become a commonplace reality, and that in less than forty years a city of more than sixty thousand people would be reposing in quiet dignity at the northern terminus of that canal. What an 'immense commerce' that city has engaged the past year."—(Democrat, 1848.)

In 1848 a railroad had reached New Buffalo in Michigan, sixty miles from Chicago; for six years Chicago was not interested in it; but was interested in all the western roads, because the western roads would bring the produce and the boats would take it East. This was the old view held by Chicagoans. Many merchants really opposed the western roads, thinking they would distribute the trade along the route instead of concentrating it at Chicago as a deposit. They soon learned differently. No attempt to canvass for money was made for roads eastward. Chicago let others build the roads and rested on her position. But the East fought for a monopoly of the way to Chicago—wanted the trade—Buffalo, New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia. The Michigan Central and the Michigan Southern were rivals, each trying for Chicago trade and connection. The Northern Indiana route reached Chicago February 20, 1852, and the Michigan Central a few weeks later. The effect was immediate and prodigious. First, in 1847, strap iron was used on the Galena road, and by 1850 forty-two miles to Elgin had been completed. This was the only road that Chicago started partly at her own expense—but it was taken up by the Northwestern railway 1864. From 1848 to 1852 the canal stood alone for Chicago of all the proposed western transits. The city had a population of 20,023 in 1848 and 13½ square miles of territory. An immense business in coal, stone, wheat, pork, corn, lumber, etc., was done. But the railways at once greatly surpassed the canal and swept the growth and commerce of the city on with unprecedented and wonderful strides.

In September, 1848, it was noticed that canal boats carried large cargoes both ways for almost the first time generally. The Chicago Horticultural society gave a creditable exhibition in the courthouse in September. In 1848 about sixty-five acres north of the cemetery were purchased by the city for $2,425; this is now a part of Lincoln park. The unsold canal lands and lots in Cook county were estimated to be worth at this time about $1,041,295. The sale of forfeited canal lots at this time brought high prices. At this time the city relied on the country adjacent for its beef; droves of cattle were driven here from two hundred miles distant; one man in McLean county sold one thousand head in one drove to Wadsworth, Dyer & Co., packers, in September. At this date Marsh & Sherry and Slocum & Clapp were also packers.

In 1846 there were used nineteen steamboats, thirty-six brigs, seventeen propellers, one hundred and twenty schooners—tonnage 44,450. Arrivals and departures, 3,779; corn exported, 1846, 11,947 bushels; corn exported, 1847, 67,315 bushels.

By September 30, 1848, the rails had been laid on the Galena railway westward two and a half miles, starting from Kinzie street. In 1848 for the first time on an extensive scale there were many hold-ups and numerous cases of stealing on a large scale. Cattle were stolen from the prairie adjacent and driven to the yards and hurriedly slaughtered before the owners could recover them. In October, Abraham Lincoln, Congressman, and family passed through Chicago on their way from Washington to Springfield. The Northwestern plank road extended from Milwaukee avenue at the city line to Sand Ridge at Dickinson's, thence to Shrigley's at Dutchman's Point, thence through Wheeling to the county line. A plank road was planned at this time to extend from the city limits at the end of State street (Twenty-second street) a distance of twelve miles to Rexford's at Blue Island; the estimated cost was $1,800 per mile. In October every packing firm in the city was working overtime to take care of the cattle arriving in droves of several hundred each. About four hundred were being killed daily. On October 8, the brig "Bufalo" arrived with the first locomotive for the Galena railway and one hundred tons of railway iron; between four and five miles of track were graded at this time and about 1,500 feet of track were being laid daily. "The forwarding merchants in this city have had more merchandise pass through their hands this past week than they have ever had in the same space of time since the settlement of the place.”—(Democrat, October 10, 1848.)

Two new fire engines arrived from Boston in October, they cost about $750 and were bought by Mr. Gale. On October 9, teams and canal brought in 19,500 bushels of wheat. The work of widening the river was begun on North Water street on October 11. The dirt was dumped in hollows, vacant lots, streets, roads, etc. Wheat fell to 50 cents per bushel on that date—a great disappointment to the farmers. During 1848 the West Side improved faster than any portion of the city. The great lumber yards began to arise there. The canal, the Galena railway and the plank road in addition made that division attractive. This was the year when many iron mills were established, because the canal brought coal—flour-mill and saw-mill machinery, founderies, threshing machines, boilers, plows, elevators, freight cars, engines, stoves, castings, wagons, agricultural implements, ship ironwork and paper mills. The iron came largely from Scotland through the St. Lawrence river. The new market on State street had the largest hall in the city—on the second floor; it could be made smaller by double doors. Every road leading to Chicago for a hundred miles was lined with long trains of prairie schooners loaded with produce of every kind. The new fire engine company No. 5, was organized in October, 1848. The canal tolls at Chicago from May 9, 1848, to October 14, 1848, were $40,527.27. On October 24 the locomotive and two cars were put on the track of the Galena railway—they were the first. The next day they ran out as far as the track had been laid—five miles; this was the first trip of a locomotive and train from Chicago. On October 24, the annual firemen's parade took place; they were escorted by the Hussars, Flying Artillery, Montgomery Guards and Jaegers. At the close the five engines had a trial of skill. In 1848 the canal did not fully meet expectations, because St. Louis proved as good a market as Chicago for the products of the Illinois valley. Grain could go down to St. Louis cheaper than come here, and in St. Louis the cash was at once realized, while by the Chicago route the cash was obtained mainly at Buffalo. Later the winters tied up commerce at Chicago, while at St. Louis the river was open most of the time.

“Owing to the energy and enterprise of Thomas Dyer, Esq., and his partners in the beef packing business, Chicago has become famous for its fine beef, even in the metropolis of the beef-eating English nation. If any one is anxious to know how this desirable celebrity has been acquired he has only to visit the extensive slaughtering, carving and packing establishment on the South branch, where eighty or more stalwart men are employed.”—(Democrat, October 31, 1848.) “On a Strike.—The Jack Tars are all on a strike. They do not admire the weather at this season and have demanded higher wages to remunerate them for the hardships and dangers they are compelled to endure. Whole crews of the poor fellows have been confined in the jail this summer for refusing to return to Buffalo on the same vessel on which they had started from that port, thus putting themselves in the power of the law, which gives the captain right of legal process to compel them to fulfill their engagements."—(Democrat, November 2, 1848.) "It is wonderful to see with what rapidity the city is extending itself south and west. Factory after factory, dwelling after dwelling, attest the growth of the Garden City in those quarters, while in the city and in other directions the increase is also great."—(Democrat, November 4, 1848.)

The new State street market was ready for use on October 30, and had numerous stalls. It was said: "Now housekeepers will not have to chase around town to get what they want." On September 1 the census showed a population of 20,023 for the city. The Second ward—Monroe to Harrison and Lake to the river—was the largest, having 2,904, and the Fifth (Bridgeport) the smallest, with 299. There were 228 colored residents. The old market on State street was removed to Market street, the center of the canal trade, where there was a dense population. The arrival here in November, 1848, of the steamer "Empire State" was considered an important event. It was much the largest vessel on the lakes—310 feet long, 60 feet wide, 37 feet beam, 15 feet hold and registered 1,800 tons. The engine cylinder was 76 inches in diameter and the piston had a stroke of 12 feet. Captain Hazard was commander. The passenger capacity was 2,000. Crowds inspected the vessel. Whenever a vessel was wrecked the papers would say: "Another result of Polk's veto of the harbor bill." Early in November 800 sheep in one flock were driven here for slaughter. "Chicago beats the world for house moving," said the Democrat. On November 13, the City Council met for the first time in their hall in the new State street market. The Mechanics' Fair was held in November. "A week today the election took place, and the rush for office is beyond all precedent. There is scarcely a grocery in town where the barkeeper has not got a petition for some man to have some of the offices in the city. There is one place where a barkeeper has already told that he got a sixpence a name for every name that signed a petition that he had for a certain man to be postmaster. Men have already come to this city from fifty miles distance to make arrangements to get a petty post-office."—(Democrat, November 14, 1848.)

Large numbers of vessels wintered here in 1848-49, 90 sail vessels, 4 steamboats, 5 propellers and 57 canalboats. State street around the new market was planked in November, 1848. Many deer were in market—twenty to thirty in one shop. By November

20, 1848, the Galena railway was completed to the Des Plaines river, a distance of ten miles. The locomotive ran out daily conveying men and materials. "Riding on a rail" soon became a trite expression. On November 20, a number of editors and several stockholders of the railway took a ride out to the Des Plaines river and brought back a farmer's load of wheat—the first to reach Chicago by rail. At the same time Millican Hunt and John Worthington shipped in by rail the first cargo of hogs. At this time the Council decided to plank Canal and Randolph streets. On December 3, the funeral of ex-Mayor Garrett was the largest ever held here up to that date. On December 7, the new State street market was first opened. When the roads were bad the trade here fell almost to nothing; then was the time all favored plank roads. The following were talked of—Chicago to Blue Island; Chicago to Des Plaines, near Spencer's; Chicago, north toward Gross Point. "The periodical depression in trade, one of which is now upon us, would by these roads be entirely avoided, and the city would not for four to six months out of the twelve, be completely cut off from the source of all its prosperity and all its wealth."—(Democrat, December 9, 1848.)

In 1848, prior to November 10, the canal yielded about $126,000. Three hundred boats were put on, but the start was slow owing to a lack of water. The first year was considered experimental, but the following results were accomplished—bringing coal from the center of Illinois to the lake cities; transporting lumber and salt from Chicago to St. Louis; transporting the produce of the Illinois river country to Chicago and thence to Eastern markets. In the winter of 1848-49 it was concluded to put on many more boats and to open the Calumet feeder whereby about 5,000 cubic feet of water per minute in addition would be secured. Land sales were rapidly reducing the canal debt. The exportation of ice began in 1848 on an extensive scale. On December 23, snow fell here to the depth of from twelve to eighteen inches—deeper than any fall since 1842, when it was about the same. The fine sleighing brought farmers to market. Think of it—poultry was 3 to 4 cents a pound, venison 3 cents, prairie chickens 15 cents per pair, and quails 12 cents per dozen. "The multiplication of drinking shops in the city is alarming the more temperate portion of the community. There are now, we are informed, nearly one hundred and ninety persons selling on license at $50 per annum. How many are selling without we cannot say. This is a heavy business for a city of 20,000 inhabitants."—(Democrat, December 27, 1848.)

About this time—December, 1848—the California gold excitement began to stir Chicago; soon the "forty-niners" began to get ready to leave in the spring. Even during the winter Chicagoans went to New York and there took vessel for the Eldorado. Ice was cut from Chicago river below the Clark street bridge and used in 1848-49. California gold began to arrive here in December, 1848. A new plank road from Chicago to Elgin was projected at a large meeting held at the house of L. H. Appleby in Bloomingdale, Du Page county, on January 20, 1849. McCormick's reapers were beginning to make Chicago famous. The weather was intensely cold for several weeks in January, 1849. "Office Seekers."—The office seekers among the Whigs have come out of their hiding places in crowds and are now like a swarm of locusts lighting upon the citizens with petitions, recommendations, etc. The post-office is the great bone over which the quarrel is loudest and for which the most desperate exertions are making. There are as many as from ten to twenty applicants for some offices, and for others their name is legion."—(Democrat.)

The prospect of the early completion of the Michigan Central railroad to Lake Michigan and afterward its early continuation to Chicago greatly stimulated business and improvement here in the spring of 1849. A paper was circulated in January, 1849, requesting signers "to support no man for election to the City Council, and no present member holding over for re-election, who will not unequivocally pledge himself to a systematic and thorough improvement of our streets. "On February 1, 1849, there were here in store 435,000 bushels of wheat. There were but nine feet of water on the bar at the entrance to the harbor on March 30. "The completion of the Central railroad to New Buffalo, with the fast boats on the lake and the new arrangements of the railroad companies in New York will enable a person, as the New York Commercial remarks, to sup one day in New York, the second in Buffalo, the third in Detroit, and breakfast in Chicago the next morning. That's going it with a rush."—(Democrat, April 10, 1849.)

By act of February 12, 1849, the Firemen's Benevolent association of Chicago was incorporated under S. F. Gale, C. E. Peck, C. E. Griswold, A. Gilbert, Cyrus Bradley, A. Rossiter and others. It was 14 degrees below zero on February 15, 1849. There were numerous cases of "knockdowns" and "hold-ups" at this time. The old postoffice was established on Clark street opposite the courthouse in 1836, and was still there in 1849. Steam to elevate grain in the warehouses of R. C. Bristol and Mr. Haddock was used at this time. For the fiscal year 1848-49, a satisfactory report was made by the authorities. Many liabilities of former years were discharged. Interest in city bonds to the amount of $1,439.11 was paid to Strachan & Scott and George Smith & Co. Nearly $3,000 was paid to S. F. Gale and W. S. Gurnee on account of hose and hose carriage. On roads leading into the city $454 was spent. Randolph street bridge bonds of $1,000 were redeemed. There was received from the delinquent resources of former years $2,291.40. The total receipts of 1848-49 were $47,711.77, of which

$6,398.28 came from the wharfing lots, $5,761.83 from the school tax and $13,887.88 from the city tax. The total expenses of the city in 1848-49 were $45,050.54. The fire department cost $4,205.-62; dredging to widen the river, $3,509.63; city hospital, $459.94. The total liabilities of the city were $36,333.20, and the total resources, $43,637.17. Among the liabilities were bonds of $3,000 for the Clark street bridge; bonds of $10,870 for the State street market; lots for the fire department, $2,413.10; due for cemetery land, $1,818.75.

It should be noted that even as late as 1848-49, Beardstown, a small place well down on the Illinois river, packed more hogs than Chicago; that town packed 48,150 hogs in 1848-49. Various building associations were established in 1849. J. R. Bull & Co. began to issue the Chicago Dollar Newspaper in March, 1849. A party of Chicagoans left for California on March 17, taking their boat by rail to the Des Plaines and then floating to St. Louis. Many wagon-trains bound for California passed through here in the spring of 1849. It was stated at this time that from December 1, 1848, to March 1, 1849, 162 vessels had left the Atlantic cities for California; they carried many Chicagoans. A large train of Germans and Americans left here on March 29 to cross the plains to the Pacific slope.

The "great flood of '49" occurred on Monday, March 12, 1849. The usual spring thaw, accompanied by several days of heavy rain was sufficient to raise the river suddenly high above its banks. Bridges, lumber and vessels above began to give way, were swept down, carrying others with them until in the main river near State street all were at last jammed into a huge dam. Vessels were thrown in every position on the banks, some stranded wholly and wrecked, others partly so, and still others were crushed where they rested. Every bridge was swept away, so that the Council was forced at once to establish four ferries—two across the main river and two across the South branch. The whole city turned out to rescue the vessels from their perilous positions. The greatest losses were to canal boats—between thirty and forty were destroyed.

Major Woodworth in his inaugural message said that the cholera must be overcome; that proper attention must be given to drainage, sewerage, planking the streets, widening the river, etc.; that the police force should be strengthened to offset the unusual outbreak of crime; that a bridewell should be established; that schools should be sustained; that there should be a hospital physician for the city; that public officials should be paid in accordance with their proficiency; that the city and county should come to some equitable agreement concerning the public square; that the encroachment of the lake on Dearborn park should be checked; that the city treasury should be properly guarded; and that something should be done at once by way of relief in the flood emergency.

In the spring of 1849 the Michigan Central Railway company endeavored to monopolize the traffic of the Great Lakes. It bought sixteen of the best steamboats and propellers for traffic from Buffalo to Detroit and between New Buffalo (its western terminus on Lake Michigan) and all notable points on that lake. Among the vessels bought were the "Atlantic," "Mayflower," "Empire State," "Empire" and "Canada." The "Lady of the Lake" propeller was chartered for the season for $7,000 to ply principally between New Buffalo and Chicago. Many men were leaving weekly for the gold fields of California. Hundreds passed through here in caravans for that Eldorado. So great was the rush to the Randolph street ferry on April 7 that the boat sank when loaded with people; no lives were lost. At this time the Council ordered a loan with which to rebuild the bridges washed away by the "great flood of 1849." By April, 1849, the Galena railroad had reached the Des Plaines river. Widening the river between Clark and Dearborn streets was in progress in April, 1849. "We have just commenced running one of our steam presses upon stereotype plates for the enterprising firm of Griss Bros. & Company of this city. This is the first printing from stereotype plate that has ever been done in our city."—(Democrat, April 17, 1849.) Before this date printing from such plates had been done East. Steam printing at Jackson Hall building, the Democrat office at 45 La Salle street was advertised in April, 1849.

About the middle of April lake captains declared it to be hard to bring a vessel drawing seven feet over the bar at the entrance to the harbor in case of a heavy swell. As most vessels then drew from eight to eleven feet there was great danger; in fact, the larger ones remained outside. Dredging was demanded. The extension of the north pier in the form of a semi-circle to the south had made matters worse. The channel at best was very crooked and erratic. It was decided this spring to plank South Water street. The canal traffic in the spring of 1849 was immense; the boats were crowded with freight and passengers. In April the Michigan Central railway was finished to New Buffalo and boats from that point ran regularly. The oak planks for Chicago streets were sawed at Stowell's steam sawmill on the South branch; oak logs were brought by canal to the mill, which ran two saws regularly. There arrived here by steamer from Cleveland 546 tons of coal on April 27, showing that the canal did not yet supply the demand from the mines down the Illinois river. Temporary bridges on scows spanned the river and its branches in April. A market house for the West Side was staked out in May, 1849; the canal trustees appropriated land therefor at Des Plaines street. The North Side from Dearborn street to the lake was growing rapidly with residences and trees. Hard and rapid work was done on the bridges during April. The one at Clark street had a draw eighty feet clear and cost $2,800, of which $1,500 was paid by the city and the balance by subscription. The temporary bridges were insufficient; in one case over one hundred teams waited while one vessel passed.

"Clark Street Ferry.—There appears to be no order or regularity about it. The boat is more than half the time so filled with water as to render it both unpleasant and dangerous. Yesterday the confusion and disorder at the ferry was disgraceful. The ferry boats for teams at Dearborn street not being running, the rush at Clark street was immense and it was really surprising that some accident did not result. Ladies have but very little chance in the melee that ensues every time the boat lands; it is as much as a full grown man wants to do to elbow his way through the crowds. The boat is not large enough, to say nothing of its being a crazy, leaky concern."—(Democrat, May 4, 1849.)

In May, 1849, the Northwestern plank road was pushed rapidly, starting from the bridge on the North branch and extending up Milwaukee avenue for twelve miles. The first idea of the Council was to raise the lots and lower the streets, so that the gutters of the latter would complete the drainage, but this plan in the end was impracticable owing at all times to the crowded condition of the streets, including even the gutters. "Washington street is known only by the number of churches upon it. Ask where it is and people will show you nearly all the churches in town on a single street. It might as well be called Church street at once."—(Democrat, May 4, 1849.) "City Scavengers.—There is not a city in the United States of the size of Chicago without its scavengers. Here all the slops of the houses and the filth of every kind whatsoever incident to cities are emptied in the gutters and offend the nostrils of every traveler either on the sidewalks or on the streets."—(Democrat, May 7, 1849.)

About May 7, the new bridge at Madison street was commenced. Large numbers of vessels were in port. There were shipped to Buffalo on May 5, 800 barrels of flour in one cargo—freight 25 cents per barrel. "The Harbor.—Yesterday the harbor and offing presented a fine appearance. A fleet of sixty or eighty vessels of all classes—steamers, propellers and sail craft were in motion."—(Democrat, May 8, 1849.) "Will not the corporation do something to make the Clark street ferry passable? A lady fell from the boat into the water yesterday. There is danger of such accidents constantly. Such miserable management was never seen as there is at this ferry."—(Democrat, May 8, 1849.) "Water Spouts.—Several very large water spouts were seen to form and burst on the lake yesterday. They attracted a great deal of notice and made, as they passed over the water, a magnificent appearance."—(Democrat, May 8, 1849.)

On May 9, 1849, it was agreed between the City Council and the County Commissioners that the county should own the public square; but should build on the north end of the same a building fronting on Randolph and extending from Clark to La Salle, to be used as a court room and to have office for sheriff, clerk and recorder. The city further agreed to build in the suburbs a jail to cost about $15,000. This was the basis of the famous bride-well. The balance of the public square was to be kept open until needed.

In May, white oak planking from Black river was laid on Randolph street from State westward to the river. Prior to May, 1849, all mail for the Northwest came to Chicago and thence was sent to Milwaukee, Galena, Ottawa, etc.; but at that date it was sent from the East directly to those cities. R. L. Wilson of the Journal became postmaster here, vice Stewart. Pervious to this the storage of wheat cost the owner 2 to 3 cents a bushel, but now the price fell to 1 cent. The power press of the Democrat printed half a dozen other papers; in fact, it was kept going day and night.

Fearing the cholera, the Board of Health in May began the systematic labor of thoroughly cleaning the city. Every house owner was ordered to clear his premises of filth at once. The slaughter houses were particularly cleansed and purified. Late in April, despite all precautions, that dreaded disease made its appearance here; four died with it on the 12th and four more on the 13th of May. Then it spread rapidly. From a few to ten deaths daily were at first reported, but as many as twenty-one died on August 1. By June 6, 1849, about two thousand persons had been carried on the Galena railway to the Des Plaines river and return. Immense quantities of lumber came here, much of which went west over the canal. In May alone there arrived 2,690,000 feet of lumber, 3,015,000 shingles and 938,000 lath. It was in 1849 that the first planking was laid in the downtown alleys. By June 11 the Galena railway was completed across the "big slough," fourteen or fifteen miles from Chicago; on June 7, the railway brought in 700 bushels of grain and on the 8th 794 bushels more. McCormick, Ogden & Co. sold in 1849 about 1,500 reapers—regarded as a great industry. Lake street was being planked in June. To the joy and relief of the inhabitants, the new Madison street bridge was thrown open on June 17 for the first time. Real turtle soup appeared at the St. Charles hotel on June 24. It was intensely hot from June 21 to June 25; the hydraulic cisterns gave out and no water indoors could be had for three days; peddlers hurried to the rescue. The dust was stifling and the streets were sprinkled. In June, 1849, Lieutenant Webster was ordered to commence work on the light-house at Calumet, at the end of the Chicago harbor pier, and on the Marine hospital. "Wheat by Railroad.—Persons have no idea of the great quantity of wheat that comes in by railroad at the present time. From 1,700 to 2,000 bushels come in daily. The wheat buyers now divide their attention between Market street and the railroad depot."—(Democrat, June 15, 1849.)

"The great mass of the deaths and cholera cases in our own city are clearly attributable to butchering within the city limits. How much longer is this nuisance to be tolerated? There are now two slaughter houses in one of the most public blocks of our city, in the block of the postoffice, the Sherman house and several of the heaviest stores on Lake street. We are for prohibiting butchering within the city limits entirely. What say our citizens? Let them talk with their aldermen."—(Democrat, June 28, 1849.)

The Marine hospital was planned to be built on Michigan avenue near the river and facing west, and was to be 90x128 feet. In June, William Gamble, superintendent of public works, completed a survey of Chicago harbor 1,000 feet in all directions from the end of the north pier and sounded every twenty feet. It was found that a bar had formed at the end of the north pier southward to a distance of 300 feet and that only six feet of water could be depended upon over this bar. Vessels were obliged to pursue a tortuous course to reach the harbor. Dredging on an extensive scale was ordered by the Council. By July 1, 1849, the Galena railway was completed to Cottage Hill, sixteen miles from the city—fare to Des Plaines, 25 cents; to Cottage Hill, 37½ cents. From June 1 to July 1, 1849, there were ninety-four deaths from cholera in the city. At this time a canal boat loaded with oats arrived from the Calumet feeder—the first from that source. The new Chicago hospital was first opened June 8, and there the cholera patients were taken and cared for. The city was infested with gamblers, blacklegs, burglars and other desperate criminals.

"The Western Citizen as a distinct paper seems to have been discontinued, its heading being put over the Weekly Tribune, which again is but a modified edition of the Weekly Gem. Several papers in this city have wanted to get out matter to put their head over, but we have looked upon it as a fraud, as it is. If a person should happen to subscribe to the Gem, the Tribune and the Citizen, he pays for all three, when the man who pays but for one gets the same matter."—(Democrat, July 11, 1849.)

On July 14 there were twelve deaths from cholera and on the 15th sixteen. Hundreds if not thousands of citizens deserted the city—fled from the cholera. On July 23 nine died; on the 24th, fourteen; on the 27th, twenty; on the 29th, eighteen. The panic almost completely shut off all business. Prior to July 30, 434 deaths from cholera were registered. W. H. Brown, Thomas Church and Samuel Hoard were health commissioners. "The diffusion of gambling shops, the parent of so many other vices, has increased within the last six months beyond the belief of any person who has not investigated the matter."—(Democrat, August 7, 1849.)

An asylum, mainly for the care of children made orphans by the cholera, was projected in July. The name selected was "Orphan Benevolent Association." At the head of the movement were William H. Brown, Orrington Lunt, Samuel Hoard and R. K. Swift. The Northwestern plank road was completed to Oak Ridge, eight miles distant, by August 15. At this date the Galena railway had been completed to Babcock's Grove, twenty-one miles from Chicago. The planking of Water street west from State was begun in August. Canal street south from the Galena depot, on the North branch, was being planked at this time. Late in August the cholera began to decline, deserters began to return and business began to resume its former healthy tone. Printers were paid 25 cents per thousand ems for composition in September. An eastern combination, assisted by several business men of Chicago, was formed to control prices in August. "The immense power of an organized association like the present combination can be partly realized when for a little paltry patronage presses may be hired to sound its praises or cover the evil it entails upon the public. The newspapers of the city, with the exception of the Democrat, have come out in favor of the combination." . . . "We learn that, on account of a disagreement between some of the contracting parties after they had given their adhesion to the association, the combination has been postponed until spring, so that during the fall months the lakes will be as free as ever." "As soon as it became known that the combination would not be formed this fall, the Tribune had a long article condemning combinations in general and the lake combinations in particular, at the same time giving some very good reasons why it should not be formed. What a pity that this combination, to which the Tribune looked to destroy a 'ruinous competition,' has gone to its grave without having fulfilled its mission." . . . "We learn that the combination has failed in consequence of a disappointment as to the division of the contemplated spoils."—(Democrat, September 1849.)

"The completion of the Michigan Central railroad already makes a change in the character of the business of this city; and should it be extended round the lake, we have no doubt an immense amount of produce could be shipped by railroad to the East. It now costs 60 cents per barrel for flour by way of the Central road to Buffalo and 20 cents by steam round the lakes. We learn that shipments have been made direct to Detroit and Buffalo by this route, shippers calculating the saving of time, etc., will pay the additional expense."—(Democrat, September 8, 1849.)

The La Salle street sewer was built in September, 1849. It was planned that by November the branch railroad to St. Charles would be ready. Winter wheat sold at 70 to 80 cents; spring wheat, 50 to 60 cents; oats, 22 to 23 cents; potatoes, 25 to 31 cents; whisky, 20 to 25 cents a gallon; beef, per cwt., $2.50 to $3.25; pork the same; butter, 8 to 10 cents, and eggs 8 to 9 cents. On September 21 thirty buildings at Randolph, Lake and Franklin streets were burned. Immediately thereafter the cry arose, "No more frame buildings—no more wooden buildings." At this time Chicago had four new flour mills and another in the process of completion. On October 24 there arrived by rail 7,925 bushels of wheat, besides other products. "Widen the River.—Scarce a steamer or propeller arrives or departs but is detained in the river on account of the number of vessels obstructing the channel. The only way to remedy this is to carry out the plan of widening the river immediately. The work now progresses, but very slowly."—(Democrat, October 25, 1849.)

"The croakers who were always anticipating but never realizing a change in the general prosperity have heretofore been signally disappointed. With them the canal was to destroy the retail trade, turn the few large stores into wholesale depots and annihilate the many small ones. The reverse occurred. The railroad was to destroy the forwarding business. On the contrary, it is now increasing daily. . . . In 1836 the value of the imports of Chicago amounted to but $325,203 and the exports to the small sum of $1,000.64. From 1836 to 1840 both imports and exports steadily increased. The last named year they amounted to $562,106.20 as the value of imports, and $228,635.74 as the value of exports. From 1840 to 1848 the increase was rapid. The last named year the imports amounted to $8,338,639.66 and the exports to $10,706,333.40. The year 1848 was the first in which the value of exports exceeded that of imports. The population increased during this time from 4,853, the number of inhabitants in 1840, to 19,724, the number in 1848. The population this year (November 15, 1849) is 23,047, being an increase of 18¼ per cent in eleven months. This increase, it will be recollected, too, is in the year in which the cholera has taken off between 600 and 700 citizens, driven a large number from the city, depressed trade and paralyzed its energies. But probably in no year of its existence has Chicago increased so materially and substantially as in the present."—(Democrat, March 15, 1849.) "The Tremont House.—This mammoth hotel has attained its fifth story, and towers above the surrounding buildings at a height never before attained by any building in this city."—(Democrat, November 15, 1849.)

Said the Democrat of October 25: "The receipts of wheat are now large. Yesterday about 30,000 bushels came forward. On Tuesday there was about the same quantity." By November 1 the new Wells street bridge was completed. Mr. N. Martin was the contractor for most of the planking being done on the streets. This year Canal street received more improvement than any other. At this time Chicago had many livery stables and horses were in great demand. It was this year that plate glass windows first made their appearance in the establishments of J. & T. Speer and Charles Follansbee. "Slaughter Houses.—The real estate in the south part of the city cannot be greatly enhanced in value by slaughter houses on the South branch. A drive out on State street will make this evident. From the time one passes Jackson or Van Buren street a stream of effluvia is encountered which might be cut with a knife, it is so thick and so powerful."—(Democrat, November 15, 1849.)

The ordinance of 1849 created the office of harbor master. The survey of the Michigan Central railway from New Buffalo to Michigan City in December, 1849, indicated its early continuation to Chicago. In 1848 there were 4,665,139 pounds of merchandise, principally dry goods, shipped for the Southwest by canal; in 1849 the quantity shipped was 8,322,677 pounds. In 1848, 32,099 barrels of salt were shipped; in 1849, 56,388 barrels. In 1849, 955,491 pounds of iron and steel were shipped; also 949,319 pounds of agricultural implements. During 1849 nearly 6,000 cords of wood came here from points between Chicago and Ottawa.

From March 1, 1849, to January 1, 1850, the total receipts from freight and passengers on the Galena railway amounted to $28,554.56. By January 1, 1850, the railway had in operation three double passenger cars, sixty-two freight cars and three locomotives. In January many men were engaged in widening the river. Scores were leaving for California every week or two. The gold excitement spread in all directions.

COOK COUNTY AND CHICAGO

AN important question settled early in 1850 was the comparative right of the city and county in the public square. The act of January 15, 1831, creating Cook county located the public buildings of the county on the public square as laid off by the canal commissioners. James Thompson, acting for the commissioners, laid out the town and platted it under date of August 4, 1830. This map was accepted by the commissioners and used as a basis of all their transactions. On this plat Blocks 39 and 46 are marked "reserved." When the town was thus laid out the commissioners acted under authority of the act of January 4, 1825, and reserved the above two blocks for public purposes, and by general understanding and usage thereafter Block 39 became the public square. It was a donation by the canal commissioners for that purpose. Thus prior to the creation of Cook county, the two blocks "reserved" belonged to the canal commissioners and not to either city or county. If the county had any interest therein it came through the act creating the county and locating the county buildings on the public square. But the canal commissioners had conceded the right of the city to occupy at least a portion of such reservation; therefore both city and county seemed to have a valid right to build on Block 39, known as the public square. The special committee of the city to report on the question was James Curtis, Peter Page, John C. Dodge and A. S. Sherman. The following action by the Council and by the County Board was taken after this committee had reported:

"Resolved, That the mayor, with the concurrence of the special committee heretofore appointed in the premises, be, and he hereby is, authorized to enter into an agreement on behalf of the city with the county authorities, for a union between the city and the county in the erection of a jail and a bridewell."—(Resolution passed, April 8, 1850, after adopting the report of the special committee.)

"Ordered, That a committee of seven be appointed by the chair to confer with the Common Council of the City of Chicago and take other measure to secure the erection of such public buildings as the necessities of the county require."—(Ordered by the Board of Supervisors; see Democrat, May 1, 1850.)

"It is estimated that about 25,000 head of cattle have been slaughtered in this city since the first of September last. Of this number between 16,000 and 18,000 have been put up for European and Eastern markets. The number of barrels packed is 50,000, against 30,000 last year. It is estimated that about 15,000 or 16,000 hogs have been packed in this city this winter to date. Last season 26,000 hogs were put up. The falling off has been caused by the country having been drained of corn, the high prices forcing it East.”—(Democrat, January 30, 1850.)

On February 1, many citizens of Chicago ran out to Elgin to participate in celebrating the advent of the Galena railway into that city. On that date eighty teams waited in line at St. Charles to ship their wheat by rail to this city. A half dozen railways were talked of at this date—among them the Rock Island-La Salle railroad. A plank road to extend from State street at the city limits to Momence, on the Kankakee, was projected at this time; it became known as the Southern plank road. “City Improvements.—Standing at the corner of State and Jackson streets a few days since, we could count over a dozen buildings in process of erection in that quarter. We doubt not that the number of buildings at present being erected in this city is over one hundred.”—(Democrat, February 15, 1850.)

“We have but just now entered upon our life as a city. We have but just reached out our arms to the country around us—in the canal, the railroad, and the plank roads extending from us. Formerly it was a serious undertaking to attempt a journey to Chicago from a distance so near as Fox river. Now it is but a pleasant drive of an hour or so. Formerly the roads leading to the city scarcely deserved the name. Now the people are beginning to appreciate the necessity of good roads.”—(Democrat, February 19, 1850.) Water from the hydrants could not always be depended upon; often the reservoirs were empty or nearly so; there was much complaint in 1849-50. The Chicago Marine and Fire Insurance company had a savings department, of which J. Y. Scammon was president.

The Democrat of April 12, 1850, said: “One of our merchants left this city for New York on the 2d inst. to purchase goods. The goods were received on the 10th! They are to be found at Francis Clark’s. This is the quickest yet.” The pipes to convey hydrant water to the West Side were cast at Morse’s foundry and were laid across the South branch at Madison street in the spring of 1850. The officers of the Board of Trade in April, 1850, were Charles Walker, president; John P. Chapin, vice-president; Thomas Hale, treasurer; John C. Dodge, secretary. At a public meeting held in April, 1850, a committee was appointed to take steps to secure a “supply of pure, fresh water.” This committee was R. H. Foss, T. M. Moody, A. S. Sherman, Luther Marsh, R. J. Hamilton and William E. Jones. At this date, 1850, the West was experiencing the greatest growth impulses it had ever known. Railroads were projected in every direction, and the money of the East flowed in a golden stream over the fertile prairies. Emigrants by the thousands poured into every quarter of the Upper Mississippi valley. Farmers and factories were multiplied by ten. Chicago and Cook county received their share of settlers and money.

On April 30, 1850, there were thirty-three prisoners in "the hole which bears the name of jail in this city." Rapid work on the mains and buildings of the gas works was in progress in April and May. Work on the Calumet lighthouse was commenced in May, 1850. By the 20th of this month one tier of oak plank had been laid on the Southern plank road from the Southern hotel on State street to the distance of one mile. Said the Democrat of June 3: "Fat Cattle.—Within the last few days 109 fat cattle have been shipped from this port for Buffalo by the steamers 'Empire State' and 'Empire.' This is the first large exportation of live cattle from this state that we recollect of." The Odd Fellows celebrated on June 5, 1850.

"Firemen's Review.—The firemen turned out in force yesterday and looked fine. A number of the companies had entirely new uniforms, which were gotten up with much taste. The mayor and Common Council inspected the engines and apparatus on State street north of the city hall, after which the companies formed in procession and passed through a few of the principal streets, preceded by a band of music. First came the hose company with their splendid carriage. The dress of this company was white jackets with black pants, with the usual fireman's cap. Next came No. 1; uniform, green frocks with white pants, hats edged with green, gilt lettered. The hose company's dress was the same. No. 2 was dressed in fine taste—red jackets with black pants; head dress, a beautiful velvet cap with gold tassel. Hose company's dress was the same. No. 3's uniform was neat—red coats and white belts, white pants, hats with gilt lettering. The hose company had red jackets and black pants. No. 4 mustered strong. The dress was red jackets, white pants, hats edged with red, and gilt lettered. The hose cart was attached to the engine. No. 5 looked remarkably fine. The dress was red coats trimmed with blue velvet, white pants, hats edged with blue, and gilt letters. No. 6—this new company's uniform is not yet completed. It is red jacket and black pants, hats gilt lettered. The whole company was not in uniform. Bucket company—red jackets, black pants. The cart and buckets were ready for duty, as they always are. The hook and ladder company did not turn out."—(Democrat, May 30, 1850.)

On June 6, 1850, the Industrial convention which assembled here was represented by delegates from Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, New York, Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Iowa, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Mississippi, Louisiana, Indiana, Michigan. Warren Chase, of Wisconsin, was president of the convention.

The tonnage of vessels built here in 1847 was 3,952; in 1848,

10,489; in 1849, 17,332. "The city hall, although a small portion of the north end has been taken off to enlarge the room for the accommodation of the Council, is still 102 feet long. It is forty wide."—(Democrat, July 4, 1850.) "The Harbor.—Mr. Durfee, the harbor master, states that within ten days a channel about 300 feet in width and ten feet deep will be dredged between the piers where the bars have been obstructing the passage of vessels."—(Democrat, July 17, 1850.)

On July 9 it was 96 degrees in the shade. A large buoy painted red was placed at the entrance of the harbor to mark the location of the sand bar. Upon the death of President Taylor in July, 1850, Abraham Lincoln, who was then in the city arguing an important patent case, was induced to deliver the eulogy. His speech was delivered in the city hall; other commemorative services were held in the churches. The Democrat of July, 1850, said: "Hon. A. Lincoln delivered a very able eulogy on General Taylor yesterday afternoon in the city hall. A large number of our citizens were present to hear it."

The newspapers of 1850 were loud in their praise of the luxuries to be had at the new Tremont house under Mr. Couch, manager. Prior to 1850 the West Side was dependent for its water upon the reservoirs and pipes of the South Side, but after that date the mains for the West Side were extended directly from the hydraulic works on Michigan avenue westward across the river at Madison street. In spite of the efforts of the health board (William H. Brown, Flavel Moseley and Samuel Hoad) the cholera again made its appearance here in June, 1850. By July 17 thirty-three had died.

The first canal steamboat arrived here on July 19, 1850, having come down the Ohio from Pittsburg and up the Mississippi and Illinois rivers. It looked like an ordinary canal boat except that it had an upper cabin thirty-two feet long and ten feet wide; the boat itself was 102 feet long and seventeen and a half feet wide and was propelled by two locomotive engines. On July 27 the Galena railway put on for the first time a daily freight train between Chicago and the Junction in Du Page county. A fire on July 30 burned over twenty houses, including the Chicago theatre. It started on Dearborn between Randolph and Washington and swept through to State. The theatre building quickly caught fire, but Mr. Rice succeeded in getting his company and his audience out without accident. The extent of the fire was due to a lack of water in the Dearborn aqueduct. The first post for street gas was set up at Lake and Clark streets on July 30. On July 27 there were eleven deaths from cholera; on the 28th seven, and on the 29th sixteen.

For the year ending July 1, 1850, the following postoffice statistics were reported: Expense for clerk hire, $11,341.61; contingent expense, $1,408.93; incidental expense, $644.46; rent, $650; receipts from box rent, $1,469; postmaster's compensation, $2,000; total expenses, $17,541. The total receipts were $20,970.18, leaving the office owing the Government $3,429.18.

"Land Suit.—Since the building of the piers on the north side of the river, some five or six acres of land (sand) have been made. This is claimed by different individuals whose lots come down to the lake shore. Two of the contestants, William Jones of this city and S. Johnson of Cincinnati, have a case in the United States District court (now in session in this city) with regard to their right, which is to be tried today. We also learn that the United States sets up a title to the land. The land is valuable and is growing both in extent and worth."—(Democrat, July 27, 1850.)

Again this year, as in 1849, business was largely suspended, hundreds leaving to escape danger from the cholera. However, many remained and continued their affairs as usual. The made land cases at the north pier were argued before Judge Drummond on July 31. The late big fire induced the Council to extend the fire limits late in July from the South branch east to State street and from the main river south to the alley between Randolph and Washington streets. The insurance companies having expressed doubts that the fire engines could throw water to the roof of the Tremont house, an exhibition was given them on August 5, and the five engines all threw a stream from twenty to thirty feet above the parapet of that building; this feat satisfied the insurance officials. George W. Wentworth, one of the city aldermen in 1850, and a brother of Hon. John Wentworth, died of cholera on August 4. A public meeting to devise means to protect the lake front shore was held on September 3. The deaths from cholera from June 23 to September 1 were 441; all but 148 were in August.

Sewers and planking on La Salle and Clark streets were being placed in August; also planking on State street. On September 4, 1850, the city generally for the first time was lighted by gas; George F. Lee had brought this result about. "Gas in the City Hall.—Six handsome chandeliers, each with six burners, were on Wednesday suspended in the city hall, by which it was brilliantly lighted last evening. Their numerous pendants seemed all aglow with the clear, steady flame which, in its unvarying splendor, raised a little above the burner, suggests to one a gorgeous oriental flower just opened to full bloom. The Common Council room and other offices in the building are also lighted with gas. . . . Handsome glass lamps or lanterns were yesterday morning placed upon the lamp-posts, and the city was lighted up in finished style last evening."—(Democrat, September 6, 1850.)

In September the rails on the Michigan Central were being laid between New Buffalo and Michigan City; this meant the early completion of that road to Chicago. Deaths from cholera in 1849 were as follows: May, fifty-four; June, eighty-nine; July, 320;

W H Bayford

August, 200; September, eighteen; total, 681. In 1850 the deaths from cholera were: June and July, 168; August, 283; September, seven; total, 458. O'Reilly was called the "Napoleon of the Telegraph in the West." The Chicago & Mobile railway received a big grant of land from Congress at this time; it became the Illinois Central. The Tremont house opened with everything new on September 30; it faced on Dearborn street and was declared to be the finest hotel in the West. On October 1, 1850, the steamer "Empire State" arrived with the first wheat from the Calumet; that vessel passed through the Calumet feeder and thence up the Calumet river to Hobart, Indiana, where the cargo was obtained; it brought oats, flour and potatoes also.

The New Hope Hose company, with their cart "Philadelphia," was ready for operations in October. George W. Dole became postmaster at this date. The Chicago Collection district was divided by the Wisconsin line. Sheboygan, Racine, Kenosha and Waukegan were made ports of delivery. The bounty bill for the "Black Hawk Boys" and others became a law in 1850. At this time the third telegraph line (Snow's) was being finished from La Porte to Chicago; this meant the connection of Chicago with Detroit, Toledo and all of Canada by wire. Of Engine Company No. 3, with new quarters at the Kinzie house, the Democrat said: "We were equally taken by surprise at the sight of Brussels carpets, beautiful tables with marble tops, unique chairs, richly chased lamps, elegant hangings, etc." "Firemen's Festival.—Yesterday, the morning being more pleasant and favorable, the review came off at the appointed hour and was one of the most brilliant spectacles ever exhibited in this city. As early as half past seven the different fire companies, attired in their full dress uniforms and preceded by bands of music, might be seen escorting their guests to the different engine houses and thence to the place of rendezvous. At nine o'clock the line was formed on State street north of the Market house, under the direction of C. P. Bradley, chief engineer, U. P. Harris and James J. Langdon, assistant engineers, and moved through the principal streets. The line of procession reached nearly the entire length of Lake street and was composed of 800 men, 400 of whom were firemen from abroad. The procession was led by the City Council, the city marshal and the chief and assistant engineers, preceded by a brass band, and the entire line was headed by a stalwart 'Son of York,' axe in hand. His name is David Langley, and he was selected by the Chicago department to head the procession. Following the City Council was a beautiful brass band from Buffalo."—(Democrat, October 12, 1850.) The procession was as follows:

1. Buffalo brass band.
2. Company No. 9 of Buffalo.
3. Brass band.
4. Company No. 4 of Detroit.

5. Brass Band.
6. Members of five or six companies from Milwaukee, at the head of whom was Mayor D. A. Upham of that city.
7. Racine firemen—several companies.
8. Brass band.
9. Kenosha firemen—several companies.
10. Putnam's brass band, Chicago; Hose Company No. 1, Johnson, foreman; Hose Company No. 2, R. Thomas, foreman; Hook and Ladder Company, D. Knight, foreman; Engine Company No. 1, J. M. Donnelly, foreman; Engine Company No. 2, J. T. Edwards, foreman; Engine Company No. 3, A. H. Burley, foreman; Engine Company No. 4, J. L. Marsh, foreman; Engine Company No. 5, S. McBride, foreman; Engine Company No. 6, Chas. Norton, foreman; Engine Company No. 7, Mathew Conley, foreman. The Chicago firemen were preceded by ex-chief engineers S. F. Gale, C. E. Peck and Ashley Gilbert. The day ended with a big dinner at the Tremont house. Samuel O. Eames became foreman of Hope Hose Company.

"The 'Calumet Trader,' blown up two or three weeks since, has been entirely repaired and started yesterday morning on her regular trip to the Calumet and Deep rivers, where large quantities of freight await her arrival. She will run regularly hereafter until checked by winter. Quite a trade has been opened between the Calumet and this city, of which the 'Trader' is the medium. She carries passengers as well as freight. Alderman Granger is now her owner, having purchased her hull, raised and refitted it for service."—(Democrat, October 11, 1850.)

Postoffice boxes under Wilson were at first $1 per year; but he soon increased the charge to $2; in October, 1850, Dole reduced the price to $1. The use of stoves instead of fireplaces immensely increased the output of stoves in this city at this date. Very rapid work was being done on the Rock Island railroad in October. In this month the "Calumet Trader" brought from the Calumet river oak planks to be laid on State, Clark and La Salle streets. At this time a second freight train was found necessary on the Galena railway. The journeymen shoemakers formed a protective union on October 28. William Stuart, who had previously edited the Chicago American, resided in Binghamton, New York, in October, 1850.

"Slaughter Houses.—The Council adopted an order at their last meeting empowering the judiciary committee, if they thought necessary, to prohibit slaughter houses, tallow and lard making establishment, etc., in the city. At present the nuisance caused by these establishments is intolerable. One situated on the West Side has been prosecuted three or four times within the past week or ten days."—(Democrat, October 30, 1850.) "The Calumet.—Were it not for the opening of the Calumet river to the city by the canal, we would this season have been badly off for our usual supply of winter fuel. A large portion of that supply has been heretofore received by the way of the lakes; but the late Government seizure of vessels freighted with wood from the public lands has cut off a large portion of the receipts from that quarter, and we are now made dependent upon the canal and the Calumet. From the latter river we are receiving large supplies of fine hickory and oak wood of the best descriptions.”—(Democrat, October 29, 1850.) “Lake Shore Protection.—We are glad to see that this work is being carried forward with energy and dispatch. The main piles have been driven from Washington to Jackson streets and the intermediate for the length of a block. By some the proposed wall of stone at the landside is considered unnecessary.”—(Democrat, November 1, 1850.)

The sewer main was laid on Wells street in October, after which that street was planked. By the 31st Snow’s telegraph line to this city had its poles and wires all set and in place. A small blackmailing sheet called the Mosquito was issued here in 1850. A lady who did not relish its reference to her gave one of its editors a public horsewhipping. The Galena railway declared an 8 per cent dividend for the six months ending October 31. The Chicago firemen held a torchlight procession on November 4. Dr. William B. Herrick was government physician in the Marine hospital in November. A market for the North Side was projected late in 1850. The lot at the southwest corner of Randolph and State streets—ninety feet on Randolph and eighty-two on State—was sold by W. S. Gurnee to John Gurley for $10,000; an adjoining lot on State street was sold for $3,000.

“Our thanks are due to the operators of Speed’s line of telegraph and to the superintendent, Mr. Clarke, who staid up until after midnight on Tuesday in order to forward all the dispatches they might receive from the East and North. We are also under obligations to Messrs. Gamble and Rainy of the Southern and Western O’Reilly lines for similar favors.” . . . “Great Thoroughfare.—On Thursday last the following persons and teams passed over Wells street bridge in this city: Men and women, 3,605; boys and girls, 565; total, 4,170; teams, 565.” . . . “The city attorney and city marshal have been ordered to commence suit against the slaughter houses in the city forthwith. The river is in a most offensive condition, caused by the blood and filth from these houses all escaping into it and then putrefying.”—(Democrat, November 1850.)

In November, 1850, the city borrowed $30,000, payable in ten years; of this amount $8,329 was paid to George Smith & Co. and old outstanding bonds of that amount were retired. This act placed city orders at par; there was a three-fourths of 1 per cent premium on the new loan. On December 5 the Democrat effected a “scoop” on all the other papers by securing and publishing the President’s message in advance. Here is what the Democrat said:

"By this means we are enabled to give the message to our readers in advance of all other sources, not, however, without going to an expense which no other office in this city was willing to shoulder. This is, however, the age of steam and lightning, and to keep up with the times a paper must be deterred by no obstacle or frightened by no expense so that its readers may have the latest information at the earliest possible moment. From our copy of the message reports have been sent to Detroit and Milwaukee, so that the papers at those two points are indebted to the enterprise of the Chicago Democrat for an early report of the message. The message was expressed by the Government to Louisville, Kentucky, and thence was telegraphed by O'Reilly's line to St. Louis. It occupied from two o'clock yesterday afternoon till five o'clock this morning in its delivery at this point. The delay was occasioned by the Dubuque and Galena offices not being able to receive it as fast as it was delivered."—(Democrat, December 5, 1850.)

The value of real estate in Chicago in 1850 was $6,114,600; personal property, $1,993,300. Taxes were as follows: For state purposes, $47,026; county, $32,451; town, $3,526; school, $7,000; road, $3,500. Newspapers were as follows: Political twelve, with 14,704 circulation; literary and educational three, circulation 6,400; medical two, circulation 1,700; agricultural one, circulation 5,000; religious three, circulation 6,472. There were the following libraries: German Literary association, 1,200 volumes; Burley's circulating, 2,000 volumes; Young Men's association, 2,000 volumes; Mechanics' Institute, 2,000 volumes. There were five district schools with 2,500 pupils enrolled; there were about thirty other English common schools, with seventy-nine teachers and 3,877 pupils. There were twenty-nine religious societies, with a membership of 17,200. The average daily wages of a carpenter without board was $1.37. A day laborer received $1 and board per day. The weekly wages of a female domestic was $1.25 and board. The price of board per week for a laboring man was $1.25. Monthly wages of farm hands, $12. Mark Skinner was president of the Illinois General hospital. At this time Chicago was devising means to capture more of the trade of the Great West—through advertisements, personal solicitation, railways, the canal and arguments.

"Public Meeting.—The undersigned supervisors of the three towns of Chicago have been requested to call a public meeting of the citizens of said towns to take into consideration the expediency of applying to the Legislature to be set off from the county of Cook and erected into a new county; or of taking some measure to give them a more just and legal representation on the Board of Supervisors; accordingly the citizens of said towns are hereby requested to assemble in the city hall for that purpose." N. H. Bolles, George W. Dole and Henry Smith, supervisors. In accordance with the above call the meeting was held with Charles Walker as chairman.

"After a discussion of the township organization, division of the county, and sale of the public square, the following committee was appointed to present a plan to secure the city an equality of representation in the Board of Supervisors. T. A. Stewart, F. C. Sherman, E. B. Williams, Alexander Lloyd, John C. Dodge, William Jones, Alexander Fullerton, Elihu Granger, B. S. Morris, N. H. Bolles and Charles Walker." . . . "The meeting last evening adopted a bill with a petition to be sent to the Legislature, making the mayor and aldermen ex-officio members of the Board of Supervisors. Also some amendments to the township law which we will publish tomorrow. A proposition to make a new division of the county into townships of larger size was discussed and the meeting adjourned until Saturday next for its further consideration."—(Democrat, January 22, 1851.)

The adjourned meeting met on Saturday and there were introduced resolutions to the above effect. J. Y. Scammon moved their adoption. P. Ballingall moved to amend by declaring it "inexpedient at the present time to amend the city charter." The amendment failed to pass. L. C. Kercheval moved to adjourn; lost. Scammon's motion was then put to vote and carried. The following resolution was also passed: "Resolved, That the charter recently revised and amended under the direction of the Common Council of the city of Chicago, as the same has been amended by the committee appointed to examine and report upon the same, meets the cordial approval of the citizens of this city."—(Democrat, February 4, 1851.)

On January 1, 1851, the Southwestern plank road, which had been commenced in May, 1848, was finished to Brush Hill, a distance of sixteen miles, with a branch of six miles toward Naperville. The Northwestern plank road, begun in 1849, was finished eighteen miles to Dutchman's Point, and a branch six miles long reached the Des Plaines river. The Western Plank Road company, organized in the winter of 1849-50, connected with the Northwestern branch at Robinson's and was to be extended seventeen miles westward. The Elgin and Geneva plank road was to connect with the Western in Du Page county. The Southern plank road, organized February 12, 1850, reached Kyle's tavern, ten miles south of the city, on January 1, 1851. Thus in all about fifty miles of plank road radiated from Chicago.

On January 1, 1851, the city contained the following enterprises: Six exchange dealers and bankers; thirty-two forwarding and commission merchants and produce dealers; fourteen wholesale grocers; fifty lumber dealers; also a large number of retailers in all branches of business. The Government during 1850 built the Marine hospital, the iron lighthouse, and surveyed the harbor. Important works done by the city were: Planking 6.69 miles of street; 3,967 feet of sewers laid; important lake shore protection with piling; widened the river Wells to La Salle and Wolcott to Clark; North Water street was vacated and a new street opened to the northward so as to provide wharfing lots; also large accessories to sidewalks and grading. Chartered companies in 1850 supplied: 1. Parts of the South and West Sides with hydraulic water from the lake—nine and a half miles of pipe, with 1,000 hydrants, supplying 800 families and 200 business establishments. 2. The Chicago Gas Light & Coke company, located on Monroe near Market, had down six miles of pipe, and on September 4, 1850, the city was lighted with gas for the first time; number of consumers, 197; number of street and bridge lamps, 112; number of burners, 1,417; the city paid $2.50 per thousand cubic feet, others $3.50. The Democrat of January 1, 1851, said: "The buildings erected by private enterprise during the year 1850 have been on a scale of greater magnificence and attended by a larger aggregate cost than those of any preceding year." Among the most important of these improvements were the Tremont house, 120x180 feet, five and a half stories, costing $75,000, J. M. Van Osdel, architect; a brick theatre building eighty feet on Dearborn between Randolph and Washington, cost $11,000; docks to the extent of 1,830 feet on the North branch, about 2,000 feet on the South branch, and about 2,000 feet on the main river were erected.

On the night of February 7, 1851, upon receipt of the news that the resolution to prevent the Board of Supervisors from selling any part of the public square had passed both houses of the Legislature, a salute was fired, public rejoicing occurred and the salutes and the speaking were continued the next day. Thus this vexed question was so far settled. The city wanted to keep the square, but the county wanted to sell at least a part of it. The county, having by far the majority on the County Board, seemed certain to have its way, until the Legislature was appealed to with the above result. It now remained to divide the public square between county and city. The new law, passed February 4, read as follows: "That Block No. 39 in the original town of Chicago, be and the same is hereby dedicated to public uses as a public common and square. The Board of Supervisors and all other county authorities of the County of Cook, and the Common Council of the City of Chicago are hereby forbidden to sell, mortgage, encumber or convey said Block 39 or any part thereof. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent the location of county buildings on said Block 39. This act to be in force and take effect from and after its passage."

In December the city paid $250 to have the river cleansed with water pumped from the canal. A society for the relief of the poor did excellent work during the winter of 1850-1. By January 1, 1851, the Southern plank road was completed to Kyle's tavern, nine miles from Chicago. During 1850 the Galena railway bought for depot purposes Block 1 on the North Side, south of Kinzie and between Dearborn and State, paying therefor $60,000. The lake front was fully protected during 1850. The North Side market was located on Block 8, Wolcott's addition to the North Side. By January 1, 1851, there were 9.59 miles of city streets planked, 2.9 miles in 1849 and the balance in 1850. That of 1850 was as follows: Market street, 4,951 feet; State, 12,667 feet; South Clark, 758 feet; North, 4,329 feet; La Salle, 760 feet; Wells, 762 feet; East Madison, 272 feet; West Madison, 7,481 feet; West Randolph, 3,672 feet. During 1850, 1,830 feet of docks near the Galena depot were built on the North branch. S. C. Higginson was president of the Western Plank Road company. When the gas works were first started but 10,000 cubic feet were made, but by January, 1851, the quantity was increased to 24,000 cubic feet to be used in twenty-four hours. In January, 1851, surveyors were at work for the Michigan Central Railway company between Michigan City and Chicago. The Chicago & Milwaukee railway was projected in 1850.

There was sharp rivalry between the Michigan Southern and the Michigan Central railways as to which one should reach Chicago first. The Southern endeavored to prevent the Central from securing the right of way through Indiana and endeavored to obtain for herself authority from the Illinois Legislature to go to Chicago without conditions. It was merely an attempt, made in advance, to monopolize the railway traffic eastward from Chicago. In the spring of 1851 there were but four flouring mills here, as follows: Marine mills, four run of stone, capacity 300 barrels per day; City mills, three run of stone, capacity 225 barrels; Hydraulic mills, three run of stone, capacity 225 barrels; North Branch mill, two run of stone, capacity 150 barrels. But a fire early in 1851 destroyed the latter, leaving a city of about 25,000 inhabitants with only three flouring mills. The alleged spirit manifestations of the Fox sisters of Rochester, New York, attracted the notice of Chicago about this time.

"The lake shore protection seems to answer the purpose finely so far, and we should think would prove a complete barrier for the further progress of Neptune's dominions. What a pity it had not been built years ago. Apropos, would not the lake shore look better if the bank was leveled off in shape?"—(Democrat, March 14, 1851.)

On January 30, 1851, the thermometer stood fifteen degrees below zero; the Democrat said that it had been as low here as twenty-eight below. It began to be realized now that beyond a doubt Chicago was soon to be the center of railway development in the West. Two roads were soon to be here from the East—Michigan Central and Michigan Southern. Starting from Chicago were the Galena, Rock Island, Milwaukee, Illinois Central and others, with a dozen more in prospect. All this rendered it certain that the canal, built by the state, was now soon to be paralleled and largely ruined by the railways built by private corporations. The canal had so long been looked to as the greatest commercial medium that Chicago could secure, that the transit of hope and thought within three or four years to an entirely different expectation was to a considerable degree frightening. The industrial revolution was welcomed.

In February, 1851, the liquor license clause was stricken out of the new city charter bill; there had been received revenue to the amount of nearly $10,000 from this source. The proposed new charter provided that assessors should be appointed by the Council; that in order to vote a citizen must have resided in the state one year, in the county six months, and in the ward ten days; that the city clerk and not the inspectors should give election notices; that citizens qualified to vote could be elected to any city office; that judges of election must make return within three days. Immense preparations were made for building in the spring of 1851. In 1857 "Grandfather" Dutch was called the Nestor of the Chicago press. In February, 1851, the slaughter house bill passed the Senate but was defeated in the House; this was an attempt to drive slaughter houses from the city limits. John Wentworth was at this time regarded by many as the father and preserver of the river and harbor improvement system. An important law of 1851 provided for the drainage of the wet lands around Chicago and embraced Townships 38, 39 and 40, Ranges 12, 13 and 14—in all about 150,000 acres. On March 5 the Sauganash hotel was burned down. Chicago received from Congress $27,176 for the harbor in March, 1851. On March 6 O'Reilly's telegraph line to Milwaukee was completed and in operation. About the middle of March, 1857, there were in the warehouses waiting for the opening of navigation 386,487 bushels of wheat, 589,246 bushels of corn and 279,549 bushels of oats. At this time the city indebtedness was about $101,304.19, on a part of which 12 per cent interest was being paid; steps to refund at a lower rate were taken. The Legislature provided for a board of water commissioners in 1851, the object being to enable Chicago in the end to provide its own water. A permanent system of sewerage was recommended and provided for, and finally was carried into effect. The new charter gave the city power to control slaughter-house nuisances. This was a period of great advancement. Schools were multiplied and improved; the river was widened and the harbor deepened; the police force was reorganized and the court laws were amended and simplified.

The new postage law of 1851 made a great difference to business houses—3 cents per half ounce of prepaid, otherwise 5 cents. The Marine hospital was nearly completed in March, 1851. Chicago milk was complained of—was said to be from distillery still. During the winter of 1850-1 a new and dangerous sand bar formed across the harbor entrance; it extended over one thousand feet southward from the end of the north pier; vessels had to come in over a crooked course and pass over nine and one-half feet of water, reduced to less than seven feet during heavy swells. Lieutenant Webster recommended the discontinuance of the present system of pier extension and the construction of an outside jetty so located as to concentrate the shore current upon the bar and thus carry it away to the southward. The Board of Trade was particularly active at this time to improve the harbor. United States Circuit and District courts were located here about this date. The first Board of Water Commissioners were John B. Turner, Horatio G. Loomis and Alson S. Sherman.

It was noted in April, 1851, that business houses to an unusual extent were crowding out private residences in the down-town districts. The Common Council now met in rooms fitted up in the north end of the city hall. In May city scrip was 5 per cent discount; county orders the same; Illinois and Michigan canal indebtedness 75 per cent discount; Galena railway stock par; exchange on New York three-quarters of 1 per cent discount. At this date the following preëmption claims against the canal trustees were still unsettled: Scott's claim on the West Side; Sanger's on the south of the North branch; Lynch's in Bridgeport at the hydraulic works. Orders regulating the slaughter houses were passed in May. It was at this time that the planking on the streets began to give way, get out of repair and place, and cause serious vexation and trouble. Iron columns, pillars, sills, capitals, beams, etc., began to make their appearance in buildings. Schuyler Colfax was for a time connected with the old Tribune of the forties. In June, 1851, nine acres on the North Side between Clybourn and Sheffield avenues sold for $300 an acre. At the same time forty-two acres on the South Side near the city limits (Twenty-second street), between Ulrich's and the river, sold for $150 an acre.

The first Lake street bridge was proposed in June, 1851. On June 13 the Northwest plank road was completed two and a half miles beyond Colonel Anderson's at Niles, which village was fourteen miles from Chicago. The first annual meeting of the trustees of Northwestern University was held in June. A question which had come up often before was discussed at this date, namely, the right of the Galena railway to bridge the North branch to reach their new depot on the North Side. As the river and its branches were navigable streams, a right to bridge at all was denied; but despite this contention bridges from the start had been constructed here and were continued. The railway was enjoined, but later was permitted to resume work on the bridge. It was noted in June that West Chicago had grown faster than either of the other two divisions—North and South. The lighthouse at the mouth of the Calumet was ordered commenced in June, 1851. On June 16, 1851, for the first time so far as known, a tunnel under the Chicago river was considered by the Common Council. This city had become the best horse market in the West; prices from $40 to $1,000 were paid.

It was at this date that the "cut-off" question came up to disturb the dreams of Chicago. It was seen that the railway lines bound from the East to the West would have to pass south of the southern extremity of Lake Michigan. Why then should such lines be run up a considerable distance north to Chicago, when time and track would be saved by continuing them directly westward from the southern point of the lake? The Michigan Central, Michigan Southern and Illinois Central were particularly concerned in this question. Had Chicago remained a small town, such an eventuality would have occurred; but the enormous growth of the city compelled the railways to center here. The Illinois Central thought to bring pressure to bear on Chicago in the "cut-off" emergency; they acted as if they wished to mulct this city of a large bonus for coming here at all. The Rock Island took this cue and offered to come to Chicago instead of passing eastward south of the southern point of Lake Michigan, if the citizens would raise $100,000. By July 14 $30,000 was subscribed. Finally the Council, on June 30, authorized the mayor to subscribe for $100,000 worth of stock in this road, "subject to the express condition that the connection between said Chicago and Rock Island and any other railroad from the East shall be made at some point within five miles of the present southern boundary of the city of Chicago." The first Tuesday in August was set as the day to vote upon this issue of bonds. In forty-eight hours, about June 24, over 2,000,000 feet of lumber were received here—thus breaking the record. The new postal law of 1851 reduced to one dollar the postage necessary to convey the Democrat one year to subscribers; it had required $3.12 before this year. In August, 1851, it was noted that there was no sickness here and that doctors had little or no practice. During some weeks there was not a single burial. A union of printers in August fixed composition at 16 to 25 cents per thousand ems. Halsted street was the west line of old Chicago and for a long time remained unoccupied, but by 1851 buildings far beyond it had been erected. Carpenter's addition was bounded north by Kinzie street, along which ran the Galena railway; north of Carpenter's addition was Ogden's addition and south was Madison street and Duncan's addition. On the east of Carpenter's addition was Halsted street and the Old Town of Chicago. Off to the westward of Carpenter's addition was old Bull Head tavern, built by Mathew Laflin and used largely by drovers and cattle dealers; it stood near where Madison street and the Southwest plank road met. In that vicinity the well water was declared to be excellent.

"Fourteen large droves of cattle stopped over night at Darrow's hotel on the Southern plank road just out of the city limits last week. Few persons can conjecture the number of cattle that come into our city in a year. Until S. L. Darrow fenced in his large enclosure, there was no such thing as yarding large droves of cattle near the city," said the Democrat of July, 10.

At one time the North Side was the most important part of Chicago; the best and largest stores and warehouses were there. Property was high; steamboats landed at the north docks; this was about 1835 to 1841. The construction of the Great Western road and the bridge over the South branch at Randolph street completely changed all this, and threw the trade to the South Side, where it remained. It remained for the Galena & Northwestern railroads to revive business there. The Archer road leading from State street to Bridgeport was now an important thoroughfare. The building of the canal caused the desertion of the old town of Bridgeport and the erection of a new village on a cut of the canal near the old site; in July, 1851, there was hardly a shanty in the old village. One of the early plans proposed to tunnel the river at Washington street with a boiler iron bore twelve feet in diameter. In July, 1851, Wabash avenue was being opened and graded its entire length—to Darrow's hotel on the plank road. Mayor Gurnee's plan of sewerage was to flush and cleanse the sewers with water pumped from the new city water works. The contract for the new courthouse was let on July 16, 1851, as follows: The mason work to Peter Page at $58,785; the carpenter work and painting to John Sallett at $29,000. The city was to pay five-eighteenths of the whole cost and the county thirteen-eighteenths. Thus of the above amount the city was to pay $24,385 and the county $63,400. Messrs. Burling, Van Osdell and Butler were the arbiters to determine what each (county and city) should pay. The county agents who let the contract were C. V. Dyer, W. H. Davis, F. C. Sherman, Joseph Filkins, S. Anderson and R. W. Everett. The main building was designed to be 100 feet square and in Grecian Ionic style. During one week in July, 1851, 8,000 buffalo robes, the property of the American Fur company, were forwarded by Neely, Lawrence & Co. to New York. In July there were five daily papers issued.

In July, 1851, there were a total of 1,506 buildings on the West Side, 2,742 on the South and 1,550 on the North; total, 5,798. From March 1 to July 23, of that year, 127 buildings were erected on the West Side, 110 on the South and 83 on the North. West of Carpenter's addition to the city limits there were but forty-two buildings; west of Duncan's addition, but fifteen. On July 23 order was given to clear the public square of liberty poles preparatory to commencing work on the county buildings. A large raft of cedar logs was brought here from the Calumet, worth $6 per 100. In August Dearborn park for the first time was lighted by gas.

It had been thought that the improvements to the lake front shore line would be permanent, but by August, 1851, the waves were again rapidly encroaching on the shore. A second barrier was built. In August, 1851, cholera again made its dreaded appearance here. In this year for the first time a chapel stood in the cemetery. On August 25 Hadduck's big warehouse burned down, also that of H. Norton & Co. The lighthouse at Calumet was nearly completed by September 1. In August 120 died of cholera. McCormick's reapers met with great success in Europe this year. The corner stone of the new courthouse was laid in September. A new building for Engine company No. 1 was erected. Special permission to widen the river at the old garrison grounds was obtained from Congress. A big storm on the 26th and 27th of September washed away a part of Michigan avenue opposite Mayor Gurnee's residence. At night he rallied a gang of men and repaired the break and checked the damage. In 1831 there were no railways of consequence in the United States; twenty years later there were 11,000 miles of track laid and 10,000 more being laid. The Clybourn & Ellis slaughterhouse burned September 30. Germain's warehouse on the North Side was burned.

In October a map representing the Illinois Central railway running to the southern point of Lake Michigan instead of to Chicago was shown here. This so angered Chicagoans that pursuant to the request of a public meeting, the Council appropriated $10,000 to be used to defeat the attempt of the Illinois Central to get a large loan from England. Isaac N. Arnold drew the resolutions adopted by the Council. They were promptly sent to England and Holland in order to cripple the Illinois Central by cutting off its money supply. It was declared to be a plan of certain persons to secure a big haul from the city treasury. Robert J. Walker and Mr. Neal, of the Illinois Central, were at this time abroad endeavoring to negotiate the loan. The general view here was that as Congress, in making the immense land grant to the Illinois Central, expected Chicago would be the northern terminus of that road, the city should do nothing unless such expectation was likely to be defeated; accordingly, on September 30, the Council rescinded the $10,000 appropriation which had been made in response to a numerously signed petition of the citizens. What the people demanded was that the Illinois Central should come to Chicago before joining any of the trunk lines from the East. The resolutions were as follows:

"WHEREAS, A memorial has been presented to the Common Council of the city of Chicago, signed by a large number of citizens of this city, expressing fears that the Illinois Central Railroad company, in violation of the terms and spirit of the grant of land by Congress to this state to aid in construction of said road and in violation of the act of the Illinois Legislature incorporating said company, intend to divert the Chicago branch of said road from a direct line to this city to the East, so as to connect with Eastern roads before coming to Chicago.

"WHEREAS, The city of Chicago (and it is believed the state of Illinois) will resist by every means in their power such perversion of the grant and such violation of the contract on the part of said company; therefore, for the purpose of making such resistance effectual, it is "Ordered, That the sum of $10,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated and placed subject to the order of the mayor for the purpose of defraying the expenses of making such resistance. And the mayor is hereby authorized and empowered to retain counsel and take all such steps as he may deem necessary to secure the rights of the city and state in the premises."

"The great objection to the former resolutions was that they were being used to defeat the Central railroad in procuring a loan; we are satisfied no member of the Council so intended, its design being merely to carry out the wishes of all our citizens in compelling the company to run its road directly to Chicago. . . . There is a mystery about the earlier resolution that requires explanation. They were drawn at a very early day and subsequently petitions were presented and circulated to call out just such resolutions. Not an alderman on the board knows the origin of the resolutions nor of the petitions sent out upon which to base them. No sooner were they passed than copies were sent to Holland, England, etc., to operate against a loan. Where things are done so private, there is always a suspicion. . . . If Chicago ever received a fatal blow from any quarter it has been from railroad quarrels."—(Democrat, July, 1851.)

It came to pass that about January, 1851, it was feared that the Michigan Southern railway would run directly west from the most southerly point of Lake Michigan to Joliet, thus cutting off Chicago to the north. At this date the Michigan Southern was trying to prevent the Michigan Central from coming west at all. During this quarrel between these two roads the Illinois Legislature adopted the "cut-off policy," much to the injury of Chicago. "The whole cut-off policy originated in the useless quarrels of last winter, when our citizens pared off between the two Michigan companies, and by defeating both, compelled them to resort to indirect means to get here. It is greatly to be regretted that both of those companies could not have found an equal right to come here under the plain legislation of our country. Our foolish fights prevented it and we now have to suffer the consequences. Who is to blame for compelling these companies to resort to these calamitous 'cut-offs' is not for us to say, but we esteem it our duty to say that the evils of those quarrels should keep us out of precipitate action for the future. Our idea has always been that instead of warring upon any railroad company and endeavoring to prevent it from coming here, we should labor to get as many here as possible and to have all come without any 'cut-offs.'"—(Democrat, October 17, 1851.) "False Alarm.—It seems that the cut-off humbug has exploded, and what the great mass of our citizens hoped and predicted will prove true. Upon what subject the agitators and busybodies in our city will go off half-cocked next remains to be seen. Hereafter let our people be careful what petitions they sign, and let our aldermen look at the origin and design of any resolution upon which their hasty action is invoked. Will Peck now pay back the fifty dollars."—(Democrat, October 20, 1851.)

This article was written in view of a dispatch from Washington that the Illinois Central had abandoned the plan of a cut-off and had concluded to run to Chicago west of Calumet lake and not approach the Indiana line nearer than four and a half miles. The Democrat laid all the trouble over the Illinois Central cut-off to Ebenezer Peck and declared that he had already been paid $50 from the $10,000 appropriation. "All the legislation at Springfield, and all the action here last winter respecting the railroads was just such as the worst enemies of Chicago could have desired. The Michigan Central railroad wanted to come directly here. We would not let it. The Michigan Southern railroad wanted to come directly here. We would not let it. We, the citizens and legislators of Chicago, drove both these roads to adopt the cut-off policy. In this matter who were our enemies? The Illinois Central company sent on a charter to bring a branch direct to Chicago. The words 'direct route' were struck out and 'most eligible route' inserted at the instigation of a citizen of Chicago. . . . The company proposes to establish the depot upon the lake. Our private interest is to have it upon the river and we so avow it. The company, after suitable examinations, have declared that the capacity of the river is not sufficient for their business. Under no circumstances then can we have it upon the river."—(Democrat, December 10, 1851.) "The policy of Chicago.—Make a fuss all summer because the Illinois Central railroad will not run as our own citizens want it. Finally the company agrees to a line located by the mayor for the city. Then a quarrel arises where the depot shall be, and in the quarrel the railroad is kept out of the city entirely. Some of our citizens are determined to have a complete cut-off this time."—(Democrat, December 10, 1851.)

In October, 1851, the debt of Chicago was announced as $101,000, with a weekly city expense of about $3,100. In 1851 the city valuation was $8,562,717, and the tax $63,385.87. The journeymen house painters demanded an increase of wages to 12 shillings per day. William Wayman built the first iron building in the city; it was made of sheet iron and stood on the North Side. In 1851 the Galena railway depot was removed from the West Side to the North Side.

"We have heretofore spoken of the additions made to our wholesaling firms within the past year or two. We still notice that the increase of wholesale houses continues, and this year in a more marked degree than for any year previous. In fact, Water street is being built up along its entire length, both on the river and on the south side, with large buildings, fitted up in the best manner for wholesale warehouses. The completion of the canal and, still more, the extension of the railroad, have operated rather to the injury of our retail establishments, which in many instances were transferred to the country villages; those that remained were compelled in a great measure to confine their business to a merely city demand, which in the meantime has been springing up in a most unprecedented manner, and which has now more than made up for the loss caused by the transfer of the country trade. The completion of the canal, the railroad, etc., has, however, created another trade—a wholesale one. Our wholesale establishments are now the pride of our city and are fully able to meet all the demands of the trade scattered in the flourishing towns and villages around us."—(Democrat, October 7, 1851.)

The Kankakee country was filled with deer, and Chicago sportsmen in large numbers went there to hunt. By November 11 cars on the Michigan Southern ran twenty-five miles west of Michigan City and cars on the Michigan Central ran twenty-one miles west of the same city. Edward Silver slaughtered fifty-three head of cattle here in eight hours and forty minutes—averaging 600 pounds per head. He had previously slaughtered an ox and made it ready for packing in about five minutes. At this time the city tax "outside of the lamp district" was 75 cents on the $100; and "inside of the lamp district" was 55 cents on the $100; the latter included the "lake shore protective tax." The beautiful steamer "Lady Elgin" arrived here first on November 15, 1851. Under the law of 1850-51 the new hydraulic works were planned in November. "Our city has grown faster than ever before within the last year and our suburbs ten times as fast," said the Democrat of November 25. At this time the doctors said that the city was so healthy that were it not for the "baby business" they would have no practice. "The year 1852 will be the greatest Chicago ever knew. The wildest dreams of our citizens will be surpassed. The expenditures of the Illinois Central railroad alone within our city will exceed $500,000. We are going all the time right straight ahead for Chicago—for Chicago against 'all the world and the rest of mankind'—Chicago forever."—(Democrat, December 6, 1851.)

There was much feeling and excitement manifested in December, 1851, over the location of the Illinois Central depot; private interests were warring for advantages. "The depot question is the fashionable topic of conversation now. It is vulgar to talk of anything else. The fashion requires also that in your discussions you should blockade the sidewalk," said the Democrat of December 6. By December 8 the public building on the square had reached a height of about twelve feet. In November and December, 1851, the Rock Island railroad was being rapidly constructed. The quarrel over the location of the Illinois Central depot continued; finally late in December it was established on the lake front. The Democrat of December 13 said: "The suicidal course is still predominant and there is no probability, if there is a design, of agreeing to anything that the company can accept. And, strange to say, the quarrel is all about the number of feet the company shall go out into the lake. Now, who cares, when the track is 350 feet out, whether it goes any farther or not? Is the depot to be lost to our city on this trivial issue?"

By December 17 the Merchants' Telegraph line was completed to this city. During the cold weather in January, 1852, the water works were put out of service by Jack Frost, causing much inconvenience and suffering. About this time Illinois state bonds threatened to rise to par. All Chicago was proud of the showing made with McCormick reapers in Europe. In December, 1851, the city ordinances provided for the right of way of the Illinois Central railroad to Chicago. The entrance of that road into the city along the lake front meant the cessation of the tax levy for lake shore protection. The canal tolls for 1851 were as follows: At Chicago, $109,862.29; at Lockport, $7,849.51; at Ottawa, $8,298.69; at La Salle, $47,379.85. The sixth annual ball of the Firemen's Benevolent association was held on December 31. The Rock Island Railroad company pursued a wiser course than the Illinois Central in this respect: It first bought its depot grounds and then easily secured permission to run to them; while the Illinois Central first obtained permission to enter the city along the lake front and then encountered a combine, or rather combines, that demanded exorbitant rates for a site. This was a vital period to Chicago's future prosperity. A failure to secure the railroads in contemplation meant that this city would be cut off as Milwaukee was—meant the establishment of a distributing point at the mouth of the Calumet or in Indiana on the lake shore. Yet to secure the prize, Chicago was not forced to subscribe for the railway stock, or make large contributions, or exert itself beyond good management and persistent effort. The Illinois Central depot ordinance was finally passed in January, 1852. The Democrat of January 3 said: "The following is the ordinance which has gone into force without the signature of the mayor, and which rival companies are using the most powerful exertions to repeal. Their object is to keep the Central Railroad company out of our city entirely."

In 1851 among the leading improvements were the following: The basement and the walls of the first story of the new county building on the public square were erected; two brick schoolhouses, one on the North Side and one on the West, were built; a market was erected on the North Side at a cost of $12,000; a brick house for Engine company No. 1 was built on the South Side at a cost of $2,500; the Marine hospital on Michigan avenue near the site of the old fort was completed at a cost of about $50,000—the plans were drawn by Lieutenant Webster and the construction was superintended by E. Burling, architect. In January, 1852, the city bride-well was nearly ready for occupancy. "Scheme.—With the Illinois Central depot on the lake shore and the Rock Island depot on the river to the west, why not unite them by a canal?" This canal would have passed from lake to river about along the line of Twelfth street.

"The improvements completed in the city the past year (1851) have been more extensive than those of any one year since the first settlement of the city; and this notwithstanding the epidemics and other causes partially retarded the progress of development. We feel certain that 1852 will see a much greater degree of activity in the projection and completion of practical improvements than was witnessed in 1851. The question now is, not as to the fact of anticipated improvements, but as to the best point for their commencement and completion. The property owners are, many of them, awaiting the location of the various railroad depots, anxious to know where to begin, and very much chagrined at any delay which will prevent the maturing of their plans. . . . We notice another great aid to improvement, and that is the planking of the streets of the city. There the greatest appreciation in the value of property, other things being equal, is visible. We may instance in illustration of this—Lake, Randolph, Water, State, Market, La Salle, Wells and Dearborn streets in the South division; Canal, Madison and Randolph streets in the west division; and Clark and Kinzie in the north division. . . . It is to be remarked that the improvements made the past year eclipse in cost and quality of material those of any former season. A large proportion of the buildings are of brick. In finish and design, especially of stores, a greater degree of attention has been paid to taste and style. Iron has become an article almost indispensable to the builder. A larger quantity of stone has been used in building during the past than former seasons. The architects are: J. W. Van Osdel, E. Burling, Ashur Carter, John F. Rague, William S. Denton and D. Harper. The improvements upon South Water street have been more extensive than those upon any other in the city."—(Democrat, January 5, 6, 1852.)

In January, 1852, when it was proposed still further to increase the city debt on account of the water works, the Democrat of the 7th said: "Now we go for improvements of all kinds to be assessed upon the property benefited. But we are for no increase of our debt. It is large enough for a city of 100,000 inhabitants. While the real estate benefited pays for all planking, grading, sewers and sidewalks, why should not our annual taxes pay all our annual expenses and our interest and create a sinking fund for our principal? This inquiry is being made upon all sides." The total liabilities (real debt) of Chicago on November 10, 1851, were $132,268.71; and the total resources and assets were $279,525.14; excess of assets, $147,256.43. The liabilities were mainly in the form of bonds drawing from 6 to 12 per cent interest and falling due from 1851 to 1866. Among the assets were the following items: 1. The three markets on Market and State streets and in the north division. 2. Wharfing privilege mortgages, $137,025.20. 3. Wharfing privilege lots not under mortgage, $13,317.80. 4. City taxes for 1851, $63,385.87. 5. Fire apparatus, including engines, $12,548.75. On No. 2 above, the city received annually interest to the amount of $8,221.51. Late in 1850 the city liabilities were $101,304.19. The city tax in 1850 was: General tax, 30 cents; school tax, 5 cents; total, 35 cents on each $100.

On January 12 it was 16 degrees below zero. The Chicago old settlers held a subscription ball and supper on January 21. Of the eighty-four steam and sail craft plying here in 1851, thirty-five were owned by Chicagoans. The sub-treasury at this time had on hand $23,763.04. On January 22 at sunrise the mercury stood at 22 degrees below zero, 18 below at 8 A. M., and 15 below at 8 P. M.

Under the old revenue law people could let their taxes go unpaid until after the return of the books and the advertisement of their real estate. Under the Township Organization law it was different. The collector's warrant required him to levy upon and sell personal property as under an execution by the sheriff. In 1851-52 Mr. Joy owned nine ice houses and put up approximately 10,000 tons of ice—the greatest quantity stored here thus far. Coal sold at from $5.50 to $7.50 per ton, and wood at $4.00 to $5.50 per cord in January. There was much complaint about the irregularity of the mails. In 1852 travelers going East from Chicago took the following route: Left Chicago at 10 o'clock A. M. by stage, passing around Lake Michigan over dreadful roads for twenty-five miles until the railroad was reached; thence by rail to Michigan City, fifty-five miles from Chicago; thence eastward over the Michigan Central or Michigan Southern. The work of widening the river was continued nearly all winter 1851-52, though sometimes it was necessary to use powder to blow up the frozen earth.

In February, 1852, the city widened Madison street for several blocks next to the river. Allan Pinkerton began to figure here as a thief taker; he shot one of them who was trying to escape. It was stated that about February 9 a Mr. Wait, clerk in the post-office, mailed one evening the following letters: Unpaid, 3,642; paid and distributed, 6,283; paid by stamps, 280; paid in money, 209; free, 471; total, 10,885. On February 9 mail from Michigan City was only four hours distant; the railway brought it to the Calumet and Butler & Lewis' stage line the balance of the way. On February 11, 1852, the Democrat said: "The cars upon the Southern Michigan are to be here on Saturday next." The Michigan Central, Illinois Central, Rock Island, Milwaukee and other roads were soon to be in operation. The outlook at this date was never brighter and better. It led to the greatest growth in 1852 that Chicago, with all its marvelous development, had ever known. Dr. Mead's insane asylum, three miles north of the city, burned down in February. On February 18, 1852, the Michigan Southern's trains had reached "Ainsworth's," twelve and a half miles from Chicago. On that date Butler & Lewis' team brought the mail to the city from "Ainsworth's" in forty minutes. Money was bet that the team could not do it in that time; nearly 3,000 people turned out to witness the arrival. The Democrat of February 20 said: "This was the nags' last run; the iron horse now succeeds them," and also "Clear the Track.—The train on the Northern Indiana and Southern Michigan railroad will reach this city today at 10:30 o'clock A. M." The Democrat fought persistently the proposition to borrow $350,000 for the new city water works; argued that it was too great a debt. In the early history of Chicago convicts to whom was attached ball and chain could be seen working on the streets, but not after 1852. Ebenezer Peck led the forces that fought against the entrance of the Illinois Central into the city; his course was declared to be an attempt to hold up that company. His opponents insisted that the laboring element as well as all other interests would be benefited by the presence of the railroad, because of the many men to be employed. Down with the "ball and chain" and "up with the cause of the laboring man," was the purport of their cry. In the spring of 1852 there were 394 liquor shops in the city—249 in the south division, 94 in the north, and 51 in the west. The new engine for Engine company No. 1 was built in this city and tried out in March—Nugent & Owens, builders. Fifteen hundred feet of C. E. Peck's hose was used—a Chicago product.

In the early spring of 1852 city bonds drawing 7 per cent interest were worth only 80 to 85 cents on the dollar, but those drawing 10 per cent were at par. The greatest public improvements in 1851-52 were two large schoolhouses; North Side market, containing the city hall; the bridewell, several fire engine houses; the courthouse; Chicago river widened; a big bridge at private expense on Lake street; development of the sewerage system. It was declared in March, 1852, that the harbor must be enlarged and that a greater revenue must be obtained from the wharfing privilege which had been neglected. The police department needed more men. The city was proud of its fire department, three new engines having been bought in 1851, of which two were built in this city. At all times as the city bounded forward in population new departments were differentiated and new standing committees appointed. Even as late as 1852 many here continued to give undue importance to Chicago of the navigation of the St. Lawrence river.

In 1852 the planking on the streets was so bad that several horses were crippled and one or more killed. Chicago at this time again tried to secure the iron trade of the Lake Superior country, but failed as it continued to go to Pittsburg. Lake Superior trade was generally struggled for. It was now concluded that steam fire engines should be exclusively used. The four leading newspapers here were Democrat, Tribune, Journal and Advertiser. It had been predicted that the railroads would injure the retail business of Chicago, but the reverse was early found to be the result. The country trade cut off was more than balanced by the increase in city population. At this time the press admonished the city authorities not to surrender too freely the city streets to the railroad companies. The real objection of the city to the Township Organization law was that of unequal representation; the city in proportion to population was not fairly represented on the county board. It was also argued that the municipal government was sufficient for the city and that not more than three men were needed on the county board. At this time the piers of the harbor were rapidly going to pieces—the wood would not last, it was found, more than ten years.

One of the objections of Chicago to township organizations was due to the fact that the road officers of South Chicago Town assessed and collected in the fall of 1851 a road tax of $440 and disposed of it as follows: Expense assessing and collecting, $190; services of road officers, $60; total paid to officers, $250; expended on roads and bridges, $190; total tax, $440. "This new engine company—Eagle No. 7—have made their appearance in uniform and number sixty men. Their machine is that formerly worked by No. 1," said the Democrat of April 6. Cook County Medical society was organized on April 5, 1852, with E. McArthur president, and H. A. Johnson, secretary. The late opening of the Strait of Mackinaw in the spring of 1852 was regarded as a worse "cut-off" than that proposed by the Illinois Central. In April, 1852, the Galena and Michigan Southern railways were the only two here, but several others were nearly ready.

"The Michigan Central Railroad company has been kept out of our city entirely by the worst management on the part of men here professing to be its friends. Upon reviewing the whole ground we see nothing that the Michigan Central Railroad company has to thank anyone for here. Had they been saved from their friends here, they would have been in Chicago long since. . . The Southern Michigan Railroad company are astounding even their most sanguine friends by the way they are pushing their road along in these times considered unusually hard. They will do in about four weeks what we never believed until recently that they would have done in two years."—(Democrat, February 9, 1852.)

"The first ordinance relating to that road (Illinois Central) did not meet my approval, as I was advised by eminent counsel it might be construed to give the unconditional right to run the road to Lake Park in front of Canal Section 15, leaving its continuation at the option of the company; because it seemed to make the city, for a valuable consideration, guarantee to the company the perpetual right to occupy a strip of land of immense value which did not belong to the city, when the intention of the people was that they should only have the right of way there; and because the proposition intended to require the construction of branch tracks was very loose and imperfect."—(Mayor Gurnee in Democrat, March 2, 1852.)

A public sale of canal lands took place in May, 1852; the prices paid surprised even old Chicagoans. "Today comes off the sale of the most valuable part of the city property, which has been reserved from sale only until this day by a long and tedious lawsuit. It extends as far down as the toll gate and from the plank road (State street) to the river. But the best property offered will be those five fancy lots below the city line and east of the plank road in Section 21," said the Democrat of May 18. The little steamer "Calumet Trader" was running in May, 1852; it ran up the Calumet river. A cabinetmakers' and joiners' strike occurred here in May, 1852; they were mostly Germans and demanded $2 instead of $1.25 and $1.50. The master mechanics held out against any advance. In May it was proposed to plank Archer road from State street to the city limits, and macadamize it the rest of the distance to Bridgeport. Swamp lands was an important question in 1852-53. In order to have the position of Chicago clearly defined a mass meeting of the citizens was held about the middle of March and resolutions were adopted, to the effect that this city was not hostile to any railway, but did resent and intended to fight the junction of the Michigan Central and the Illinois Central at a point south of Chicago. It was declared that a scheme of these roads was on foot, to unite Detroit and Cairo and leave Chicago far to the north.

In May, 1852, sealed proposals for the construction of the city water works were called for. On May 24 the Democrat announced that the Michigan Central was now complete to Chicago. Short-lived papers here before 1852 were the Porcupine, Random Shot and Mosquito. There were burglaries almost every day in May. The Democrat waged a relentless, persistent and savage war upon the character and performances of Ebenezer Peck. A large concern, the Chicago Dry Dock company, was organized in the summer of 1852—their dock to be built on Block 67, South branch. The Democrat of May 26 noted that the St. Louis Republican, which left that city on Sunday evening, arrived in Chicago the following Tuesday morning—the quickest yet. It was carried by the steamer "Hibernia" from St. Louis to La Salle in twenty-two hours and forty-five minutes; thence by packet boat "Louisiana" to Chicago in seventeen hours and thirty-five minutes—a total of forty hours and twenty minutes. This was almost the last of the old order of things here; the railroads changed all. Forty acres in Section 28, South Chicago Town, sold in May, 1852, for $8,000 cash—this was regarded as a high price. The tract lay between Twenty-second and Thirty-first streets near State.

"All the hotels in our city are now crowded to overflowing. The like was never seen before. The "cut-off" has completely ruined the ease of landlords and their employes, to say nothing of the great demand for beef, vegetables, etc. Where are the "cut-off" croakers now? Where are the manufacturers of indignation meetings? The "cut-off" is made and nobody but landlords is groaning, and they under the weight of coppers. Our private houses will have to entertain while more hotels can be built. Chicago is now more than realizing the predictions of its most sanguine friends. We are going to set Chicago down at 100,000 population at the close of 1855. Its growth both in population and wealth for the last two months has exceeded anything that the maddest enthusiast ever dreamed of. The rush of money here for investment from foreign capitalists is truly astonishing." . . . "Thus one after another the railroads are centering in our thriving city, contributing to make it the focus of the commerce and business of the great Northwest." . . . "The present prosperity in our city can be checked but in one way and that is by its unhealthiness in August. We must all turn our attention to doing away with the prejudice to our city in consequence of rumored unhealthiness in this month. We should with all possible dispatch open and grade all our streets." "Time to Sell.—There is now a large amount of money in this city seeking real estate investments in blocks or large tracts of real estate. Foreign capitalists prefer to invest in large and contiguous blocks or tracts. Small lots are getting as unfashionable as uncomfortable. Nobody seems to want them." "The Town of Chicago will eventually be in the city of Chicago and many persons are now doing business in the city and are, to all intents and purposes, its citizens, who reside outside of the city limits. It is safe to say that the town outside has doubled its population within the past year and will add materially to swelling the population of the city."—(Democrat, May and June 17, 1852.)

The canal land sales, by May 27, 1852, amounted to $220,000; much was waste land that had been reclaimed by the general drainage law. In May, 1852, the sewerage system of Mr. Garrett attracted the attention of local officials. On May 31 the Michigan Southern put on an express train. Although as early as 1848 the people wanted Wabash and Michigan avenues opened to the city limits, it had not been done by June 1, 1852. Steps to open Prairie and Indiana avenues were taken at this time; they were thronged with teams on their way to the railroad depots on the lake front. The widening of Madison street was continued to Wells. At this time the water commissioners bought of P. F. W. Peck for a reservoir site a tract at Adams and Quincy streets, 217½ feet on the former, for $8,750; this is now the north part of the postoffice site. The city hall in the new market house on the North Side was the finest in the city. In June a new fire engine for company No. 4 was brought from Utica, New York. In June, 1852, the new post-office was opened by George W. Dole, postmaster. Mail from New York to Chicago came in forty-six hours, but was delayed in transit for four and one-half hours. The Rock Island and the Michigan Southern companies in June began to lay out their depot grounds on Van Buren street. The Common Council appropriated $500 with which to celebrate the Fourth of July. This city continued better and better to be a horse market; $250 was paid by buyers for a good team. The United States steamer "Michigan" was here in June, 1852. On June 30 the hod carriers struck for a raise from 7 shillings to $1. On July 5 the mercury reached 100 degrees. A lot 27 by 80 feet at the corner of Madison and Dearborn streets, opposite New Grace church and west of the public school building sold for $1,400. Twenty feet frontage on Randolph street and eighty feet deep next west of the Sherman house sold in July for $3,030. Beginning, the mail between New York and Chicago was sent over the New York Central lines and the Michigan Central. It was noted at this time that the railways drove away the wolves; the animals would not cross the iron tracks; the farmers at twenty-mile prairie had been much troubled by them. On July 14 the Lake street bridge was put in operation. A market house to cost $11,173 and to be built on the West Side was contracted for in July. Large numbers of Swedes were arriving here weekly. A memorial meeting in honor of Henry Clay was held by the bar and others. The city hospital, 18 by 40 feet, stood on the North Side two or three blocks from the river. Very fine illuminated daguerreotypes were taken by C. C. Kelsey at 96 Lake street. A. B. Dolton was first light keeper of the Calumet lighthouse in August. Perry's expedition to Japan was noticed here. In 1852 Chicago obtained $20,000 for harbor improvements.

The Lake street bridge cost $7,200; it was 414 feet long, including approaches, each approach being 115½ feet. The swing was 183 feet; width, 30 feet; weight, 90 tons; it required one minute and forty-five seconds to open. The eleven-acre estate of Giles Spring, from State street to the lake shore, was settled at this time. The O'Reilly & Bain telegraph line between Buffalo and New York was sold at auction May 17 for $39,500; it was said to have cost $300,000. The firemen's parade of June, 1852, with seven fire engines and their hose carts, three hose companies and one hook and ladder company, was the finest ever seen here up to that date. The census of June 1, 1852, gave Chicago a population of 38,733, of whom 345 were colored, 19,314 American born, 19,419 foreign born; owning the dwellings in which they reside, 3,156. The Calumet lighthouse was finally lighted for the first time August 14. By this time the system of running omnibuses had become very successful. Block 97, Section 27, South Chicago Town, sold at the rate of $500 per acre. The lot at the corner of Jackson and State, 40 by 180 feet, sold for $3,500 cash. The canal was supplied with lake water as far as Lockport; the pumps at Bridgeport took from the river every five minutes a body of water 40 by 120 by 5 feet. Speed's telegraph line absorbed Snow's line in Illinois in 1852. Section 3, Township 38, Range 14, sold for $130 to $150 per acre. A twenty-acre tract on the West Side, Section 3, Township 39, Range 13, sold for $40 per acre. The United States Marine hospital was opened April 1, 1852. On September 29 there were over seventy vessels in Chicago harbor. The roof on the new courthouse was now being finished. The West Side market was nearly done. Ferrell & Ballou were constructing the hydraulic works for the city. The Democrat of September 29 said:

"The foundation of the edifice is laid twenty-five feet below the surface and is supported below this by 200 piles and a solid body of masonry two feet thick. The walls of the foundation which are now in progress are laid in water lime and are eight feet thick."

By October 1 the Chicago dry dock, 235 feet long, was nearly completed. At this time the artesian well being sunk by the Galena Railway company near their depot on the West Side, between Halsted and Union streets, had reached a depth of 185 feet; clay and hardpan extended down 104 feet and marble and other rock the balance of the depth. Engine company No. 6 was on Lake street between Clinton and Jefferson. This year for the first time several of the stores here began to employ female clerks—as in New York, Philadelphia and Boston. About this time the Tribune passed to William Duane Wilson and Henry Fowler. The North-western Christian Advocate said in October, "Chicago is and must necessarily be the centering point of the most extensive system of railroads the world has ever seen." Already the following roads were in progress: 1, Chicago & Milwaukee; 2, Chicago & Fond du Lac; 3, Chicago & Galena; 4, Chicago & Quincy; 5, Chicago & Rock Island; 6, Chicago & Alton; 7, Illinois Central; 8, New Albany & Salem; 9, Cincinnati & Chicago; 10, Fort Wayne & Chicago; 11, Southern Michigan; 12, Central Michigan.

The Prairie Farmer began to be a power all over the West. It was simply impossible for Chicago to house all the people who came here to live in 1852; temporary houses were erected in all quarters. A lot 40 by 180 feet at Lake and Clark streets sold for $16,000 in October, 1852. At first a single plank in depth was laid upon the streets, but later the planks were doubled. "Bull's Head.—The enterprising proprietor of this extensive stock depot has planked twelve yards of convenient size and furnished them with bunks to feed and tie up cattle. He has also two sets of scales and has every accommodation necessary for a large amount of stock."—(Democrat, November 25, 1852.)

Ten acres (outlot 26), Section 5, Township 39, Range 14, near the toll gate on the Northwest Plank Road, sold for $10,000 in December, 1852; it had been bought at canal sale on May 10, 1849, for $950. The great influx of California gold greatly stimulated all business enterprises here in 1852. On September 16 appeared the first number of the Democrat Press by J. L. Scripps and William Bross, with office in Swift's bank building. Mr. Dutch, editor of the Commercial Advertiser, said of Mr. Scripps, "He has been the great luminary in expounding all the absurd, wild and ridiculous theories on morals, religion, science and politics; the champion of Fourierism, socialism, communism, free-soilism, free trade and anti-bankism." An important omnibus line ran regularly between State street market and Bull's head tavern, Mathew Laffin, proprietor. Peck & Co. ran a line from Lake street bridge to State street, thence to Twelfth street. J. Frink & Co.'s line ran from Lake house on the North side to Clark street and along the latter to the Rock Island depot. These three lines ran regularly for customers who later patronized the street car lines. Then omnibus lines were the only satisfactory way to get around the city.

In the fall of 1852 Mayor Gurnee, who lived on the lake front at the foot of Adams street, was again compelled to build shore protection at his own expense to prevent the waves from cutting through Michigan avenue. "Look at the history of Chicago for the last two years. How rapid has been her progress—how she has grown in wealth and population, and how changed the character of her business. What has done it? The canal, the Galena railroad and the certain knowledge that other great channels of travel and commerce would shortly be opened," said Democratic Press of October 9, 1852. On October 18 the Rock Island Co. ran regular trains to Joliet. A public meeting deploring the death of Daniel Webster was held in November. Irving hall was opened by its owner, Mr. Stearns, on November 20. At this time the steam pile driver of the Illinois Central was at work on the lake front track of that road. The American Car company began to build cars, axles, wheels, etc. Abraham Lincoln was here in December taking testimony for canal claimants. The packing of beef and pork at this time was immense. Coach and wagon making was large here—capital employed $127,000; aggregate value of annual products $210,445; number of vehicles 2,625; men employed 323. About the middle of December there were eighty-six vessels in port here. "We know one gentleman who purchased one hundred and twenty feet on Michigan avenue south of Van Buren street about a year ago. He has recently sold sixty-four feet for what the whole purchase cost him. The balance is worth at least $100 per foot, making a clear advance of at least $5,600," said the Democratic Press of December 20. Fire Engine No. 3 was called "Niagara." The growth of the city at this time was the wonder and delight of the inhabitants; even during the winter of 1852-3 new residents continued to pour in. The Democratic Press of January 1, 1853, said, "Within the last two years our hotel accommodations have been doubled and we are worse off now than then. The different public houses frequently have to turn away strangers for want of room. A few nights ago the Sherman House had to turn away over sixty on that account." On January 4, 1853, cars ran as far out as Morris, and ran regularly on the Rock Island to Joliet.

The old buildings on the public square were removed in January, 1853; the old watch-house being the first to go. About the middle of January it was proposed to extend the city limits, as the city population proper began to overflow the boundaries. At this time all of the Tremont house above the first story was rented to G. W. and D. A. Gage for $12,000. The planking of the streets was not carried forward in 1852 as the wants of the city required; this was due to the dissatisfaction with the system. Ogden's bridge on the South branch was useful at this time. The new bridewell was located at the corner of Wells and Polk streets in January, 1853. Local writers yet could not dismiss the fixed notion that Chicago was bound to receive great benefit from trade through the St. Lawrence river. "The postage on letters handled at the Chicago postoffice during the quarter ending December 31, 1852, amounts to $46,201.86. About seventy-five per cent. of this amount is for letters distributed. The above figures show an increase in the business of the office of thirty and a quarter per cent. over the corresponding quarter of the previous year," said the Democratic Press of February 3. By February 3 the walls of the old courthouse had been torn down. At this time the city clerk's office was removed from over the South side market to the new city hall in the courthouse. "Some of the good people of Milwaukee are greatly horrified at the idea of having a railroad built to their city by Chicago contractors. They call Mayor Crocker's recommendation of the proposition of Messrs. Wadsworth & Steele 'an attempt to sell Milwaukee to Chicago,'" said the Democratic Press of February 7. At this time the Board of Trade met in their rooms at the corner of Clark and South Water streets. Again the project of tunneling the river was considered by Council and people in February, 1853. By February 14 the Rock Island railroad was open to Ottawa. At this time the famous Bull's Head tavern on West Madison street—barns, sheds, fences and about two acres—was sold for about $15,000. Said the Democratic Press February 21, "Never before at this season of the year have we met so many strange faces in Chicago. We have heard this remark again and again within a few weeks. The thing is very easily accounted for. Charge it to our railroads." The Western Plank Road company was organized in February to build westward on Lake street six and a half miles from the river; stock at the start sold for $100 per share—par.

CITY MORTALITY.

The Oakwoods Cemetery association of Cook county was incorporated by Act of February 12, 1853, the incorporators being Joseph B. Wells, W. B. Herrick, John Evans, Norman B. Judd, W. B. Egan, Ebenezer Peck, J. Young Scammon, R. K. Swift and C. N. McKubbin; it was authorized to conduct a cemetery "near the City of Chicago in the County of Cook."

The Mayor-elect, Charles M. Gray, said in his inaugural that the financial affairs of the city were in a flattering and healthy condition; that little scrip had been issued for several years and provision for its redemption had been made; that money to meet all city obligations must be provided; that the debt of $13,000 owed by the city to the county for the public buildings must be met; that the new Recorder's Court—a city affair—must be provided for; that the police department should be expanded at once to meet the growing city; that the important office of surveyor, about which there was some complaint, should be rendered effective and satisfactory; that the school fund should be rigidly maintained and secured; and that better rules concerning the payment of court expenses should be adopted.

The act of February 12, 1853, extended the limits of the city of Chicago to embrace the following tracts: North Division: All those parts of Sections 31 and 32, Township 40 north, Range 14 east, lying east of the center of the North branch of Chicago river and west half of Section 33, same township and range. South Division: All of fractional Section 27, Township 39 north, Range 14 east, and so much of the shore and bed of the lake as lie within one mile east of said section; and all that part of Section 28, same township and range, lying south and east of the South branch of the Chicago river. West Division: All those parts of Sections 28, 29 and 30, Township 39 north, Range 14 east, lying north of the South branch of the Chicago river and the branch thereof running west through said Section 30.

This act was an amendment to the act of February 14, 1851, to reduce the law incorporating Chicago and its several amendments into one act. The land above mentioned added to the North division was made a part of the Seventh ward; that of the West division was added to the Fifth ward; and that of the South division was added to the First, Second, Third and Fourth wards on their southern extremities, the east and west lines of each ward being extended south to embrace the new tracts. The city clerk was authorized to couple together two or more taxes levied by the Common Council and general over the whole city, or over one of the three divisions, provided he should designate each tax rate under proper names and columns. This act also repealed so much of the act of February 23, 1847, as created South Chicago school district and included therein any of the lands above provided for by this act.

On April 4, 1853, a beautiful mirage of the eastern shore of Lake Michigan opposite Chicago was seen here; the shore line, forests, streams and buildings could be seen. In 1852-53, for the first time, merchants in the West learned that they could buy goods in Chicago as cheap as in New York, thus saving freight, delay, etc. In April, 1853, under the advices of the Board of Trade, the wharfage and storage charges were regulated and improved. The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser at this time predicted that the lines of travel and commerce would run south of Lake Michigan, thus leaving Chicago, like Milwaukee, a town of local importance only. Many others in the East made the same prediction. While their predictions were not fulfilled, it cannot be denied that there was such a possibility in view of the cut-off policy of the railroads. The facts that Chicago fought against the cut-off policy and that no important town movement was made at the mouth of the Calumet river or in Indiana at the southern extremity of the lake, were sufficient to force all the railways to center in this city. In July, when the news was received here that the railways had united to form east and west connections south of the city, there was much excitement. The Democratic Press, on June 22, thus explained matters and the excitement subsided: "We have known for a long while that both of the rival roads from the East had, or believed they had, ample authority for forming a connection with a Southwestern road and designed doing so whenever it best answered their purpose. The Michigan Southern intends connecting with the Rock Island road; the Michigan Central with the Illinois Central, the Chicago & Alton, and probably the Central Military Tract roads. We have never been frightened in view of these connections. Chicago will for all time to come command the trade of the country traversed by these roads. But the "cut-off" still has terrors for some of our people."

A terrible railroad accident occurred April 26 about ten miles south of Chicago at the junction of the Michigan Southern and Michigan Central railways, through which about sixteen were killed and nearly fifty wounded. At that date trains were not required to slow up or stop at crossings. But the coroner's jury found the train crews of both roads guilty of gross carelessness and neglect. The journeymen shoemakers struck in April. In May Warren Parker bought all the city omnibuses and thereafter operated them; before this date they had been run by the hotels—Sherman, Tremont, Matteson, City, American, New York, Doty, Commercial and others. "We counted over one hundred persons at Clark street bridge the other day; who stood in the rain fully thirty minutes waiting for the bridge to close. The $20,000 now annually lost by the bridge nuisance would go a long way toward building a tunnel," said the Democratic Press of May 5. At this date the piles for the Illinois Central track along the lake front were being rapidly driven. Canal sales of about $1,000,000 again took place in May. The tunnel question was again agitated in June. It was announced that the total cost of the new courthouse, including fence and furniture, was $114,055.55. Despite the great number of arrivals here, there was actually a dearth of laborers for buildings, railways, etc. "The city of Chicago has built herself up, doubled her trade, doubled her manufactures, trebled the value of her real estate and rendered it saleable by a single act of policy—that of making herself a railroad center."

—(Detroit Advertiser, June, 1853.) During a fire on the West Side in June, 1853, the private wells and cisterns there were soon exhausted, whereupon a line of men half a mile long to the river was formed and an abundance of water was thus secured. In June, 1853, the city clerk was authorized to advertize for plans for a tunnel under the river; this is believed to have been the first official action in the matter.

"The pipe of the new waterworks has all been laid in the North division of the city; in about a week more it will all be down on the West Side and by the first of August all down on the South division—thirty miles in all. The crib work to be put down in the lake is all prepared. . . . The engineer hopes to be able to have the entire work completed by the middle of October. That will be the proudest day Chicago has ever seen."—(Democratic Press, July 2, 1853.)

Although the arrival of lumber was very great, yet in June, 1853, so enormous was the shipment of the same westward and its use here, that building lumber was actually scarce in this city. The Blue Island Plank Road company called for subscriptions in July; the line was to be a continuation of Hoosier (Blue Island) avenue through Canalport to Blue Island. The Democratic Press of July 12 said: "It is inside of the mark to say that the commerce of Chicago has been more than quadrupled since the opening of the canal and the first section of the Galena railway." It was proposed that the following parking should be built:

"On the South Side, in addition to Dearborn Park, Lake Park and the Courthouse Square, two parks of ten acres each between State street and the river, north of Twelfth street, and one of ten and one of fifty acres between Twelfth street and a line drawn west of Myrick's. On the West Side, two of ten and two of fifty acres at proper distances from the river and from each other. On the North Side, two of ten and one of fifty acres, properly located. This, perhaps, to the minds of some seems to be a large amount of precious land to devote—perhaps waste is the word they would use—for such a purpose. The necessity for them does not appear, as it will be fifty years hence when Chicago shall contain half a million people. Five years ago $3,000 would have purchased more land suitable for such purposes than $500,000 will now. For the time being the wide streets and open spaces answer all the purposes of parks, but the latter will soon be covered with dwellings and stores."—(Democratic Press, July 11, 1853.)

"We well remember the fears which were expressed by many of our citizens upon the completion of the canal lest that important work should merely prove an elongation of the lake on the one hand and of the Illinois river on the other, bearing northward or southward the trade of a region of country which had hitherto come to Chicago. The same class of persons foreboded results equally as disastrous to our city by the completion of the various lines of railroad which are to center in Chicago, and for the same reason. But how different the result!" . . . "Tuesday afternoon (July 12, 1853) we passed down the ninth division of the Illinois Central railroad to Kankakee, returning on yesterday. It was opened on Monday (the 11th), as our readers are aware."—(Democratic Press, July 14, 1853.)

At the mass meeting to consider the tunnel question on July 22, 1853, Mayor Gray presided. The following citizens were appointed a committee on resolutions: B. S. Morris, E. C. Larned, G. S. Hubbard, G. F. Foster, Alderman Dwyer, Peter Page, W. H. Stickney and D. S. Cameron. It was "Resolved, That this meeting do hereby call upon the Common Council of this city to take measures to have a tunnel built as soon as practicable."

"There is hardly a branch of mechanical business that is not prospering in our city. One cannot turn a corner or walk the length of a block without observing some class of mechanics busily employed at their avocation. Especially is this true in regard to all those connected with house building." . . . "The present force of the night police is twenty men. Owen McCarthy is captain, James Donahue lieutenant, which leaves eighteen men to be employed on the watch. They start out on their beats at eight o'clock in the evening and come in at four o'clock in the morning. There are two men on each beat and they always go in company. There are five beats in the South Division, two in the North, and two in the West."—(Democratic Press, March, 1853.)

"Last Saturday afternoon the officers of the Rock Island Railroad company treated a portion of our citizens to a most delightful ride. The company assembled at the depot at four o'clock and then, all things being ready and all aboard, the hosts gave the signal and the train was off for Blue Island." . . . —(Democratic Press, April 11, 1853.) "The amount of travel now pouring over the great thoroughfares which lead into this city is truly astounding. Every train that comes in or goes out is full to overflowing. As an indication of the amount of travel daily passing through our city, we publish the following statement of the number of meals served during the last five days at the Sherman house: Monday, 569; Tuesday, 628; Wednesday, 674; Thursday, 684; Friday, 731. This, be it remembered, is but one of the ten or twelve hotels of the city—all of which are taxed to their utmost capacity."—(Press, April 23, 1853.)

"During the rains of the last fortnight the streets have been silently teaching the existence of a great want in our young city—prompt and vigorous measures for a thorough and effective system of sewerage. Situated as our city is upon a substratum of clay totally impervious to water and with but slight natural grades, it follows that most of the water which falls remains either upon the surface or passes off by the slow process of evaporation. . . . No city upon the continent requires a thorough drainage more than Chicago. None would be more benefited by it—none can be drained so cheaply and effectually. . . . The system of sewerage heretofore adopted in this city has served its day. . . . Although it is but two or three years since sewers were sunk in our principal streets, we nevertheless believe that, could a section of them be casually disclosed to public view, it would be regarded as one of the most remarkable curiosities of the day, and the minds of the public would be filled with wonder at the short-sighted policy which dictated such inefficient and ephemeral structures for so important a purpose. We want no more wooden sewers in Chicago. . . . We are arriving at a point in the history of our city when we must enter upon some general plan of sewerage. Let not another dollar be expended in works of this character until a definite and judicious system has been determined upon. Enough money has been wasted upon public improvements in Chicago.”—(Democratic Press, May 5, 1853.) The following plans of city drainage were proposed at this date: 1. On the principle of declination; 2. Drainage vats and pumps to clear them; 3. Main and branch drains in each division; 4. Deep canals at definite intervals.

Early in July the Rock Island railroad began to take shipments for points westward of the western terminus of the canal. The tunnel committee was making elaborate and searching investigations. The Palmer omnibus line soon had rivals—S. B. & M. O. Walker established one in July, 1853. New wheat in August brought 98 cents to $1.03 per bushel. There was a united movement of the owners of buildings against the carpenters about this date. Eastern “drummers” for the first time in considerable numbers began to drum for trade not only here but farther westward; this was a step by Eastern wholesalers to retain the trade that was fast going to Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, etc. When the Illinois Central tracks were first laid along the lake front, they were out a considerable distance from the shore line, leaving a body of water between. It was proposed in July to fill in the space between the tracks and the shore line and convert the same into a park. In March, 1853, a Chicago-built locomotive was turned out from the shops of the Galena & Chicago railway and was named “J. B. Turner,” for the president of the company. A large octagonal reservoir was built about this time at Clark and Adams streets; it was made of boiler iron, was supplied with a twelve-inch pipe, contained 500,000 gallons, and was twenty feet in diameter, twenty-eight feet deep and elevated sixty feet. Yellow fever in New Orleans caused much consternation here in August; the previous visits of the cholera were not forgotten. By September 6, $3,294 was raised for the sufferers at New Orleans; by September 12 it was $4,394. Large numbers of foreigners not able to speak

Alfred Brown

English passed through here daily for the West. In June, 1852, the Legislature incorporated the "Cook County Drainage Commissioners" and empowered them to drain the lands around Chicago. This they did in 1852-53—built many drains through the city, at a cost of about $30,000, by July, 1853, and in the main advanced this sum from their own pockets or borrowed it on their own responsibility. They put assessments on the lands benefited, but did not get what was due them and so asked judgment against the delinquents. Before Judge Rucker there were filed two objections that the law was unconstitutional and void and that Jefferson was exempted by the last Legislature from the operation of the law. The court overruled the constitutional objection, but sustained the Jefferson objection. I. N. Arnold, George Manierre and G. W. Thompson were the attorneys for the commissioners, and Grant Goodrich, C. B. Hosmer, E. Martin and A. N. Fullerton were the attorneys for the objectors. This judgment resulted as follows: All land outside of Jefferson, delinquent, was to be sold, and in the end Jefferson would have to pay for the ditches already built there.

"Drainage by the commissioners met with pretty severe opposition in some quarters in the outset; but the evident benefit resulting from the work has changed the minds of all, save the citizens of the only territory in Cook county in which the valuation list shows a decrease in the valuation of real estate during the past year. Jefferson township stands alone in that unenviable position. It was she who protested against the assessment; it was she alone who desired to be relieved (?) from the tax; and she alone now has her sloughs and her mire. . . . Several individuals of Jefferson township are now forming a board of their own for the purpose of draining their own lands. These gentlemen protested against the petition of certain citizens of Jefferson township presented last winter to the Legislature, for the exemption of this township from the operations of the drainage law. They knew that the general weal would be sacrificed to the pecuniary saving of vast profits of the few. The law passed, however, but applied so far only as to free her from tax after the date of the passage of the act. W. B. Ogden said: 'If you want high lands, dig deep ditches.'"—("Jefferson" in the Democratic Press, September 15, 1853.)

The city directory of December, 1853, gave Chicago a population of 55,500. There were 156 lawyers, 106 doctors, forty-two churches, six public schools with thirty-one teachers, ten colleges and high schools, four military companies (one mounted), twenty-four periodicals, of which seven were dailies, sixteen weeklies, four monthlies and eight religious. The fire department consisted of twelve companies with a total of about 600 men, eight good engines and three hose carriages. In November, 1853, the Council changed the name of Hoosier avenue to Blue Island avenue. It crossed the canal and the South branch, formed a junction with Archer road, and then passed south to Brighton, where the Union Stock Yards now are. On December 6 there was an excursion over the Illinois & Wisconsin railway to Elk Grove. There was great dearth of water in November and December; the hydrants were inadequate and peddlers' carts again made their appearance. The newspapers of 1853 are filled with railway extension notices and with predictions of Chicago's railway growth and supremacy. Fierce attacks upon the water commissioners for failure to have the works ready in October as agreed were made late in 1853. At this time the drainage committee was busy laying its assessments. In October the hotels were so crowded that the newspapers called for the construction of others. Vessels grounded on the sand bar at the harbor entrance at this time. The tax of Chicago in 1853 was as follows: City tax, $58,946.40; school, $25,262.74; state, $8,420.91; building, $16,841.83; water, $16,841.83; market, $7,243.92; lamp, $2,105.02; whole tax, $135,662.65. The valuation of real estate was $13,130,677; personal property, $3,711,154; total valuation, $16,841,831. About this time New York, Philadelphia, Boston and other Eastern cities, which had begun an elaborate system of selling goods by sample throughout the West, were seen to be aiming at the life of Western wholesalers; a great outcry against them was therefore raised. In the end Western wholesalers were compelled to adopt the same custom—to sell by sample and drummers.

On December 31 the city had eight railroads in operation, with thirty-seven trains arriving and leaving daily; 7,627 dwellings; 9,435 families; population, 60,652—native white 29,134, foreign white 29,404, colored 583; stores and other business places, 1,184; schools of all kinds, 54; churches, 61; manufactories, 196. In 1847 Chicago had imports valued at $2,641,852 and exports at $2,296,299. In 1852 there were, imports $8,338,639, exports $10,709,333. The total value of real and personal property of Chicago in 1840 was $1,829,420; in 1847 it was $6,071,402; in 1853 it was $16,841,831.

The daily papers were the Democratic Press, Journal, Tribune, Democrat, Courant, Commercial Advertiser and Staats Zeitung; tri-weeklies, Northwestern Christian Advocate, Budget, Democratic Press, Democrat, Evangelist, Free West, Garden City, Herald, Journal, New Courant, Olive Branch of the West, Staats Zeitung, Tribune, Times and Tablet; semi-monthly, Sheldon's Bank Note Reporter; monthlies, Prairie Farmer, Northwestern Medical and Surgical Journal, Youths' Temperance Banner; bi-monthly, Homeopath.

The market houses were leased for the following sums: State street market, 1852 $1,808, 1853 $1,900; Market street market, 1852 $320, 1853 $320; Randolph street market, 1852 $911, 1853 $720; North Side market, 1852 $905, 1853 $845. In January, 1854, wheat was worth $1.15. On the 23d the mercury stood at 17 degrees below zero. On January 26, 1854, hydrant water was forced to all parts of the city where pipes had been laid. It flowed from the North to the West Side through a pipe at Kinzie street bridge; thence it came to the South Side from the West Side through a pipe laid across the river at South Adams street; but later a pipe across the main river at Dearborn street brought water directly from the North to the South Side.

By act of the Legislature Cook county came into possession of 18,000 to 20,000 acres of swamp land—mostly on the Calumet and easy of drainage. In January, 1854, the county authorities requested the further right to sell these lands to a company that would drain the same and construct a harbor at the mouth of the Calumet. At this time there were nearly 600 places in the city where liquor was sold, and it was estimated that two-fifths of such places conducted gambling games of some sort and many of them were bad resorts. In 1853 the number of arrests was 2,449, of which 2,237 were caused by liquor. There were 220 licensed groceries (saloons) and nearly 400 without license. Capital invested in the liquor business amounted to about $1,000,000.—(From statistics collected by Rev. Mr. Archibald Kenyon under the direction of the Cook County Maine Law League.)

A quantity of Wisconsin wheat to be delivered in Buffalo in the spring of 1854 sold here in January, 1854, at $1.35 per bushel; good winter wheat was worth here in January $1.28. Corn deliverable in Buffalo was worth 60 cents per bushel and oats 30 cents; choice hogs, $4.95. Prices were thus sent soaring by the European demand. The whole Legislature visited Chicago in February, 1858, upon invitation of the Common Council. It began to be noted at this time that Chicago, with its numerous railways, was the central point from which to go everywhere—"it was in everybody's way." On February 20, 1854, the Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway company offered to plank Canal or Clinton street, providing they were permitted to run their proposed "horse railway" (street railway) into the city. This was the first public project to run street cars in Chicago. Land on the West Side for a park to be called "Union" was bought of S. S. Hayes, W. S. Johnson, Jr., and an adjoining tract of W. S. Davidson, Isaac Shelly, Jr., and S. L. Baker. The first tract comprised 10,948 acres and the addition Lot 5. The sum of $57,024.66 was paid for all. The tract was bounded by Lake, Reuben, Warren and two diagonal streets on the east. In February, 1854, William B. Ogden, while in Europe, obtained a valuable collection of books which he designed as a nucleus for a public library for the city. He managed to secure the books as a contribution on the proposition of an interchange by the state of Illinois with the governments of France, Belgium, Holland and Switzerland. There were books, pamphlets, maps, drawings, engravings, etc., selected by him. He proposed the establishment of a public library and agreed to give $1,000 if $50,000 were raised, or $3,000 if $100,000 were raised. This was the real start of Chicago's present splendid public library.

In nearly all reform movements of the forties and fifties Grant Goodrich, Dr. N. S. Davis and Thomas B. Bryan were active and enthusiastic participants and leaders. On February 28, 1854, wheat was $1.08. A survey of Chicago harbor in March showed but eight feet of water over the sandbar; a subscription of $600 was promptly raised to clear it; by March 10 the amount had grown to $1,000 to be expended under the direction of the Board of Trade. "Our harbor, after all, is the life of Chicago. Shut it up and Chicago would be a railroad center, it is true; but her lake commerce is, after all, the mainspring of her prosperity. This fact is well understood by our business men, and hence their prompt attention to everything that affects so vitally the best interests of the city."—(Democratic Press, March 9, 1854.)

Again in the spring of 1854, as for several seasons past, there were too few buildings to accommodate the people; rents were very high and business men declared "We must have more room." All old residents noted the enormous proportion of foreigners here. The new city charter forbade the use of more than $100,000 credit by the city authorities in one year. In 1853-54 Union Park was bought on the credit of the city, of which one-third was assessed to the property benefited. A new city hospital was projected. The new water works were not wholly satisfactory, had taken too long and had cost too much. The Legislature accordingly granted the city the right to raise an additional sum to complete the works. The bridewell was used principally for petty offenders from the Recorder's court. Congress granted the request of the city to widen the river at old Fort Dearborn. New bridges were built and the tunnel was considered. A uniform grade of sidewalks was very important in the estimation of all persons and began to take form late in 1853. All things considered the most notable circumstance of 1853 was the large number of wholesale houses established. The Board of Trade duly considered the pending question of opening a channel across the St. Clair flats. The plan embraced the opening of a ship canal from Lake Erie to Lake Michigan. Mr. Ogden in the spring of 1854 wrote urgently from Paris about it. The artesian well at the Galena station on the West Side encountered 104 feet of blue clay; 30 feet of marble; 9 feet of soapstone, and 342 feet of solid limestone. At 180 feet good water was found, but it would not rise to the surface. E. Sherman, E. I. Tinkham and L. W. Clark were the original proprietors of Holstein, the suburb on the West Side along the North branch. In 1854 goods began to be imported directly from Europe. "Why pay New York jobbers?" it was asked.

Ten or fifteen years ago, or until the completion of the Wabash and Erie canal, the principal trade of Chicago was from Lafayette, Terre Haute and other Wabash towns. The streets of Chicago were thronged continually with wagons and prairie schooners from the Wabash valley. One of the principal streets of that city was named Wabash avenue in commemoration of the vast amount of trade and the immense number of teams that daily poured into the Garden City from the Wabash."—(Lafayette (Ind.) Courier, March 30, 1854.)

The writer of the Annual Reviews of Chicago in January, 1854, stated that the postoffice was receiving fourteen daily mails and several weekly and semi-weekly mails; that the receipts for the quarter ending January 1, 1854, were over $130,000; that an average of 30,000 letters and seventy-five bags containing 45,000 newspapers, passed through daily. About 5,000 letters were received and sent out daily by Chicagoans.

The act of February 28, 1854, amendatory to the act to reduce the law incorporating the city of Chicago, provided that the corporate limits and jurisdiction of the city of Chicago should be extended to Lake Michigan and should include so much of the waters and bed of said Lake as lie within one mile of the shore thereof and east of the present boundaries of the city. It was provided in this act that in case of more than one vacancy in the office of alderman in any ward, the candidate receiving the highest number of votes should have the longest term, etc.; that the vacancy in 1854 in the Chicago water commissioners should be filled from the West division, that of 1855 from the North division and that of 1856 from the South division; that the city marshal should be elected for two years; that the Common Council should have power to borrow $100,000 for the use of the water works, provided two-thirds of the Council should concur; that the Recorder's court should sentence criminals to the bridewell; that when expedient the Council could elect a superintendent of special assessments; that they could purchase and improve suitable grounds for a house of refuge and correction and to erect buildings thereon; that they could authorize the construction of tunnels under the Chicago river and its branches; that private persons should have the protection of their property; that the Council could regulate the keeping of lumber yards within the fire limits of the city; that they could annually thereafter levy not to exceed a mill on the dollar to meet the interest accruing on the funded debt of the city; that if the expenses of either of the three divisions should exceed its proportion of the revenue, the Common Council could collect such excess by special pro rata assessment on that division.

In 1852-53 (winter) only one railway entered Chicago—the Galena & Chicago—and was finished only a few miles out. Now (January, 1854) there were 1,621 finished miles and 7,779 projected miles radiating from Chicago. By May, 1854, there were forty-six trains daily, making ninety-two arrivals and departures daily. The population had doubled; the same of real estate and of all property. Already it was "a great railroad center." And Chicago in her corporate capacity had not invested a dollar in them. All were projected and built by private enterprise. The railroad bonds of other cities were hawked about Wall street, but Chicago's were not. Galena railway stock was high above par—so far as to surprise eastern capitalists.

Lots on Michigan avenue between Adams and Jackson were held at $200 a front foot; this was regarded as an extraordinary figure, but the land was worth it. During the spring of 1854 there was wonderful activity in real estate of all kinds. In March coal sold at $9 per ton, due to the large increase in population for which suitable calculation had not been made. Without asking permission from the government—wholly disregarding all red tape—the city authorities took possession of the government dredging boat and began using it to clear out the bar at the harbor entrance. The subject of sewerage was thoroughly discussed at this time. All government buildings here were much too small and inadequate to meet the wants of the public. The appropriations for the Chicago lighthouse were as follows: In 1849, $15,000; in 1851, $4,498.39; in 1852, $6,300; total, $25,798.39, of which amount only $13,500 had been spent by April, 1854. Another sale of canal lands occurred in May; there were about 200 lots in Chicago remaining unsold and about 90,000 acres between this city and La Salle. Measures to secure a lifeboat for the city were taken at this time. The stone cutters struck for higher wages in June; at Athens the non-union and union men clashed in a serious riot.

On June 7, 1854, choice winter wheat was $1.50 per bushel; good winter wheat, $1.40; spring wheat, $1.30; corn, 43 to 49 cents; oats, 30 to 35 cents. The big bell for the new courthouse, six feet in diameter, six feet high and weighing about 10,000 pounds, was cast in the foundry of H. W. Rincker, of this city; it was ready in June. Notices similar to the following appeared in almost every local newspaper at this date:

"What Crowds!—Twelve hundred passengers arrived in the four trains of the Michigan Southern railroad and 800 emigrants—making 2,000 passengers by a single line. The same number of emigrants arrived by the same road last Saturday evening. Is it any wonder that the West grows?" . . . "A change is coming over South Clark street. It is being transformed from a street of private residences to a business thoroughfare."—(Democratic Press, June 29, 1854.)

The firemen held a splendid review in June, 1854. Great efforts to secure an appropriation from the city treasury with which to celebrate the Fourth of July were made at this time, but resulted in failure, although such an appropriation had been made in 1853. It was regarded as a dangerous precedent which should be broken. Public meetings were held and much bitterness was manifested. Many country people came to town to see the eclipse in June. It is related that a citizen of Chicago planted a quantity of beans, but when they grew up, noticing that the beans were on top of the stalks and thinking that he had made a mistake and planted them wrong side up, he pulled them up and reversed them; his neighbors said he did not know beans.

The tunnel question continued to be investigated and discussed at intervals during 1854. The new Lake View hotel was opened July 4. In spite of every precaution cholera again made its appearance here in June and was deadlier than ever before. The deaths in June, 1851, were 36; in 1852, 91; in 1853, 82; and in 1854, 331. Those who could possibly get away scattered in every direction and the hush of death fell upon all ranks and ages. The Board of Health made heroic efforts without avail. A cholera hospital was opened one and three-fourths miles south of Madison street, nearly midway between Clark street and the river. It was one and a half stories high, enclosed by a tall fence and completely isolated. Many emigrants were overtaken here by the cholera and required care. S. Lisle Smith, Chicago's most brilliant orator, died at this time, but not of cholera it was said. The ire of Chicago was again kindled in August upon receipt of the news that President Pierce had vetoed the river and harbor bill on the ground of unconstitutionality.

The summer of 1854 was probably the hottest and driest ever known in this section of the country. The hot weather began on July 3, and by August 5 there had been twenty days when the mercury registered over 80 degrees; fourteen days over 85 degrees, and ten days 90 degrees and over. Then there was a long period with the mercury over 70 and 80 degrees, with a short stretch of over 90 from August 21 to August 24, inclusive, but on September 1 the mercury shot up to 94 degrees and was 92 on the 2d, 92 on the 3d, 94 on the 4th, 94 on the 5th and 82 on the 6th.

Heating houses by steam began to be considered in 1854. Stockmen complained that there was in vogue here no system to bring all sellers and buyers of cattle, hogs, etc., together. There were two principal centers for stockmen—one at Bull's Head, on West Madison street, and one at Myrick's yards, south on the lake shore. Sometimes prices varied at these two centers, so that both buyers and sellers were obliged to visit each yard several times a day to learn what market changes had taken place. The new water works were no sooner ready than they were put in operation to their utmost capacity. By September 18 the following buildings were supplied: 1,164 on the South Side, 465 on the North Side and 459 on the West Side. By June 30 there had been spent for the water works $351,788, on construction account; $46,050, on interest, and $29,761 on miscellaneous items; total, $427,599.

"Thirteen thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine passengers arrived and departed from the depot of the Michigan Southern Railroad last week. Our ten railroads are pouring their crowds into our city and through it and our hotels are overflowing." . . . "Never in the history of Chicago have the streets of our city given so clear evidence of intense activity as for the past few weeks. Carriages, drays and vehicles of all descriptions fill the streets, and the sidewalks are literally crowded with people in a hurry, rushing in all directions. The hotels are crowded to overflowing and those who arrive by the evening trains are fortunate if they find a place to lie down on the parlor floor till morning." . . . Yesterday at 12 o'clock we counted twenty-eight sails outside beating up to get near the harbor so as to come in with a change of the wind, which was then blowing a gale off shore. It died away before night and by the assistance of tugs nearly everything had got inside the harbor by dark. As yet we have no tug here which can bring in a large vessel in a gale or hardly in a stiff breeze." . . . "Yesterday we examined the first building we have seen heated by steam in Chicago—Lake View house."—(Democratic Press, October and November, 1854.)

In September, 1854, the new Metropolitan hall was ready for occupancy; it was owned by Messrs. Gurley, was 61 by 99 feet and seated from 1,800 to 2,000 persons. It was noted by the newspapers about October 1 that grocery and provision stores began to be opened much farther south on Clark and State streets than ever before, and that residences on the downtown streets were being rapidly supplanted by business establishments. On October 4 winter wheat was $1.30 to $1.40; spring wheat, $1; corn, 54 cents; oats, 35 cents. 'Change began to be a power here by this time; they did a large business at the Board of Trade rooms. The travel over the Clark street bridge was enormous; a close estimate early in October fixed the number of persons crossing at 24,000 and the number of teams at 6,000, from 6 A. M. to 7 P. M. During this time the bridge was open about three hours to permit the passage of nearly one hundred boats, causing great annoyance and inconvenience. The citizens "demanded" the construction of a tunnel under the main river. It was observed that more out of town merchants were here to buy goods than were ever seen before; in fact, the wholesalers began to run short by November 1. Competition forced the merchants to adopt the credit system; sales on from three to six months' time began to be made.

The semi-annual parade of the fire department took place on October 25. At this date J. A. Donnelly was chief engineer, and Delos Chapell first assistant engineer. The parade was as follows: John Miel's band, mayor and Common Council, hook and ladder No. 1, Philadelphia hose No. 1, Hope hose No. 2, Illinois hose No. 3, Fire King hose No. 1, Fire King engine No. 1, band, Kenosha hose No. 1, Kenosha engine No. 1, Metamora hose No. 2, Metamora engine No. 2, Third Assistant Engineer Silas McBride, Niagara hose No. 3, theater band, Niagara engine No. 3, Excelsior engine No. 5, Excelsior hose No. 5, Adrian band, Adrian Protection engine No. 2, Adrian hose No. 2, Light Guard band, Garden City engine No. 6, Garden City hose No. 6, Naperville band, Eagle engine No. 7, Eagle hose No. 7, Wabansia hose No. 8, Wabansia engine No. 8. The ceremonies closed with an excellent exhibit of water throwing on the lake front with water drawn from the lake and from hydrants.

It was now heralded abroad that Chicago was the greatest primary grain market in the world; Buffalo and Odessa handled more grain, but not from primary sources. A mass meeting to consider the question of sewerage was held on December 20, 1854; Mayor Milliken presided. Resolutions to the following effect were passed: 1. The condition of the city demanded at once a complete and comprehensive system of sewerage. 2. Great danger to property and injury to health would otherwise result. 3. The site of the city, if properly drained, would render the location healthful. 4. There was nothing impracticable in such a system. 5. The City Council did not have sufficient continuity and fixity to accomplish such a task. 6. The work demanded a separate and distinct board of sewerage commissioners to carry the system to a finality.

About thirty feet of the river bank where old Fort Dearborn had stood was removed to widen the harbor and the dirt thus taken away was deposited on South Water street between Dearborn and Wabash. The financial crisis of October and November caused business men much annoyance and loss. On November 18 the newspapers boasted that Chicago had direct railway connection with the Mississippi river at Rock Island and Galena. A lot 25 by 80 feet on the east side of Clark street near Washington, which had been bought in 1852 for $2,300, was sold in 1854 for $8,000. In October trees were planted in the courthouse square. The Council ordered Dearborn street extended southward from Monroe to Jackson and there to be connected with Edina place. At this time Dearborn street between Madison and Monroe was only thirty-three feet wide. It was at this time that Doctor Dyer, for $26,000, sold a lot at the corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets to the government to be used as a site for a postoffice and customhouse. Bids had been called for and it was claimed that his tract was too far south and away from the business center and that he had been shown special favors in the award. There were recriminations and considerable ill feeling over the matter. It was claimed that Doctor Dyer's lot was sold for $15,000 more than it was worth. The propositions submitted were as follows, the last being that of Doctor Dyer:

Corner Adams and Clark, 120x140 feet.....	$ 47,000
Corner La Salle and Randolph, 140x140 feet.....	121,500
Corner La Salle and Randolph, 130x140 feet.....	102,800
Corner Randolph and Wells, 120x140 feet.....	74,000
Washington, between Presbyterian and Baptist churches, 133x180 feet.....	80,000
Corner La Salle and Washington, 120x140 feet.....	60,000
Corner Lake and Market (old Sauganash), 120x140 feet....	85,000
Corner Dearborn and Washington, 120x140 feet.....	59,000
Corner Dearborn and Monroe, 120x140 feet.....	26,000

The dissatisfaction continued to grow until at last a public meeting to voice the view of the people was held, with Mayor Milliken as chairman, and W. L. Newberry, head of the committee on resolutions. The resolutions embraced the following points: 1. That the lot selected was unsuitable and unsatisfactory. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury would probably be willing to sell the Dyer lot and buy another better suited for the purpose. 3. That a committee of three be appointed to wait upon the Secretary of the Treasury to learn what could be done. 4. That the State Legislature be asked not to grant the government a site until the same should be satisfactory to the citizens.

There were large sales of lots in Holstein in December, 1854—particularly in Pierce's addition—on the West Side near the North branch. Winter wheat was $1.35 to $1.40 in November, but by December 1 had dropped to $1.12 to $1.25. On December 11 it was $1.35 to $1.40. The committee of nine appointed by the citizens to prepare a bill to be presented to the Legislature in favor of a board of sewerage commissioners reported in January, 1845, and the proposed law was duly considered by all Chicago in mass meeting. The bill as first prepared provided for three commissioners from each of the three city divisions and for a sewerage fund of $500,000. The people voted acceptance of the bill and it was forwarded to the Legislature, and, with some changes, became a law. The immediate necessity for a sufficient sewerage system was conceded by all residents, but the Common Council feared to take action in so important a measure and the citizens dreaded the expense. An appeal to the Legislature was the final resort. The Democrat, edited by John Wentworth, had opposed the new waterworks and now disfavored the proposed sewerage system on the ground of the enormous expense.

In 1854 over 1,400 died of cholera.

Choice winter wheat sold here on January 17 at $1.50 per bushel. The years 1853 and 1854 were noted for the number of industrial unions organized. Almost every trade effected such action. Lots on Clark street between Washington and Madison sold in January, 1855, for $300 per front foot; the same lots two years before sold for $60 per front foot. Again in January another mass meeting to protest against the location of the new postoffice at Dearborn and Monroe streets was held. One of the severest snow storms that ever visited Chicago swept this locality in 1855. For a week all business was suspended. The railways were completely tied up. It was observed that this was an entirely new experience for the railroads and the city. On February 23 Isaac Cook, postmaster, opened the postoffice on the west side of Dearborn street, in the first brick block south of Randolph.

The city's receipts for 1854 were as follows: General fund, $298,413.08; local tax, South division, $60,969.82; local tax, West division, $30,868.54; local tax, North division, $33,087.27; total receipts, $423,338.71. The expenses were as follows: General fund, $247,591.57; local expense, South division, $82,146.87; local expense, West division, $39,309.19; local expense, North division, $39,854.76; total expenses, $408,902.39. There was on hand in the city treasury on February 1, 1855, $14,436.32.

"And yet, for all these railroads, Chicago in her corporate capacity has never expended a single dollar. Eastern and foreign capital, proverbially cautious, and even skeptical though it be, has done the mighty work. There has been no spasmodic effort to accomplish it. . . . Compared with other cities, Chicago owes but a mere nominal sum. Her principal debt is for her waterworks, and her revenue derived from water rents will ere long pay the interest and in the end liquidate the debt. She has now adopted a general and it is believed efficient plan of sewerage for which an additional loan has been made. Most of the streets yet remain to be paved, from the necessities of the case plank having been heretofore used." It was argued that if Chicago had thus grown in twenty-five years while only 50,000 square miles of country between Lake Michigan and the Rocky Mountains had become settled, what would she become when the whole 700,000 square miles of that territory had become settled. It was not to the credit of Chicago that she had done nothing to aid the railways; but there was no occasion for her to do so.

In an act of February 14, 1855, supplemental to the act to incorporate the Chicago City Hydraulic company, it was provided that the persons to be elected Water Commissioners of the city should be chosen successively from the North, West and South Sides, one to be thus chosen annually and to hold the office for three years; that the first one to be elected under this act should be chosen in May, 1855, from the South division; that the board should assess such water rents upon owners or occupants of buildings as should seem equitable; that such assessments should be a lien upon such property; that the board should have power to borrow as the Common Council should deem expedient not to exceed $300,000 and should issue bonds therefor bearing not over 7 per cent interest; that such bonds should be sold for not less than the equivalent of 7 per cent at par; that such bonds should not be issued until approved by a majority of all aldermen; that the board should print and issue rules and restrictions of the water service; that a sinking fund should be provided; that said board members could be removed for cause; that the chief engineer should reside in the city; and that proper accounts of all acts and proceedings should be kept.

The act of February 15, 1855, incorporated the Chicago Tunnel company with W. B. Ogden, George Steel, Henry Farnam, John H. Kinzie, Peter Page, Edward Benling, Edward H. Haddock, Walter L. Newberry, John S. Reed, Isaac N. Arnold, Henry Smith, George F. Ramsey, Sylvester Lind, Ezra B. McCagg, A. C. Stuart, William Lill, Philo Carpenter, George W. Snow and James H. Rees as the incorporators, and with $1,000,000 capital. The Common Council was authorized to contract with the company for the construction and maintenance of one or more tunnels through or across Chicago river or either of its branches. The company was authorized to borrow money at not over 12 per cent and to mortgage its property to secure the debt, and issue bonds if desired, and to use the streets and alleys with the consent of the mayor and Common Council. Chicago was empowered to buy such tunnels if deemed desirable.

During the fiscal year ending February 1, 1855, Union Park was bought at an outlay of nearly $60,000 in short time bonds, which were promptly met as they matured. Business men at this date considered city lands a good investment. The apparent debt of the city increased by $87,000, but when the $60,000 was deducted and $16,000 more that had been paid for the Clark street bridge, real estate and fire apparatus, the actual debt was inconsiderable. Owing to the cholera, the health department had spent about $5,000 more than in 1853. There was an increase of $3,000 in school expenses, due to an increase in the salaries of teachers and of the city superintendent, and office which did not exist before 1854. The police and judiciary departments had cost about $49,000, which amount was reduced to about $18,000 by fines and licenses. About one-half of the latter sum was for the recorder's court and legal expenses. On February 1, 1855, the city funded debt amounted to $328,000, and the total liabilities to $374,316.44. The general resources were valued at $498,025.59. The net available assets were estimated to be worth $32,707.63. This report was made by L. D. Boone, Eli B. Williams and M. L. Keith, finance committee of the Common Council.

In February, 1855, it was proposed that the Young Men's association, Board of Trade and Mechanics' institute should raise capital and erect a large suitable hall for lectures, public concerts, etc. At the municipal election in March, 1855, twenty-four German saloonkeepers voluntarily closed their places of business on election day, announcing beforehand that they would do so. This act was almost the first of its kind and was warmly commended by the press, clergy, etc. Choice winter wheat was worth $1.55 on March 6. Levi D. Boone became mayor in March, 1854. The City Council decided in March to increase the extent of paved streets. A lot on Lake street, near Clark, 20 by 100 feet, sold for $18,000. The spring of 1855 was very cold, late and backward, but the wholesale trade here was simply gigantic. Western merchants poured in to buy goods. In April white winter wheat sold as high as $1.60. A determined and desperate fight of the combined liquor dealers against prohibition and all stringent liquor laws was made here in April, 1855. J. N. Brundage began to issue the Chicago Wide Awake at this time. The emigration westward through this city was even larger than in 1854; trains of a dozen coaches, loaded to their utmost capacity, were a common sight at the depots. On April 6 twenty-five cars in one train, drawn by two locomotives, arrived near midnight with about 1,300 passengers. A lot 20 by 90 feet on Market street, near Madison, sold for $3,300 in April. The Democratic Press of April 11 said: "Cutting off the docks on the south side of the river between Clark and Wells street bridges is a great improvement to the harbor, and it now seems a wonder that the encroachment was so long permitted." On April 10 white winter wheat sold at $1.70. The Michigan Central brought 3,000 emigrants here on April 13. Lots on State street, at Eldridge court, were quoted at $100 per front foot, and on Michigan avenue, near Taylor, at $170. Pinkerton & Company, of the Northwestern Police Agency, were active in catching criminals of all sorts at this time. In April, 1855, Washington Square, on the North Side, began to figure as a point of recreation. It had been donated to the city by the owners of Bushnell's addition upon condition that it should be fenced and forever used as a park. At this period the Council fixed all liquor licenses at $300 and made all terminate on July 1, when prohibition should go into effect if sanctioned by the vote of the people. Seventy or eighty took out licenses, a number quit the business, and many refused either to quit or take out a license. About a score were fined by Judge Rucker and serious riots occurred in several places. The militia was called out and cannons were planted around the court house square at Clark and Randolph. The city marshal, sheriff and several policemen were badly bruised. Nine rioters, cut, bruised and bleeding, were arrested. An immense crowd gathered and rioting continued nearly all day. One rioter, Peter Martin, died from the result of a pistol shot. A big law and order mass meeting finally ended the violence, but not the contention. Upon the question of liquor license the county polled 6,075 votes for and 4,603 against license. Upon the question of prohibition the following vote was cast (see Press, June 8, 1855):

By act of February 12, 1855, the People's Gas Light and Coke company was incorporated with capital not over $500,000 and with location in Chicago. The object was to manufacture gas and coke and sell the same after February 12, 1859, and to lay pipes in the streets with the consent of the Council. It was an express provision of this act that gas should be furnished the inhabitants at not to exceed $2.50 per thousand feet, and furnished the city of Chicago for public uses, at the election of the proper authorities, at not to exceed $2 per thousand feet. The incorporators were Matthew Laflin, L. C. Paine Freer, A. G. Throop, D. A. Gage, John S. Wallace, George W. Snow, H. B. Bay and R. H. Foss.

The plan for the improvement of Union park, which comprised about eighteen acres, was prepared by Carter & Bauer; the first sum assessed for improvement of the same was $6,333.33. In May, 1855, the Board of Sewerage Commissioners offered $1,000 for the best plan of a systematic drainage system for Chicago and vicinity. Another sale of canal lands occurred in May. For the summer of 1855 a special health officer was appointed from each of the nine wards. Quarantine was established in May, and all arrivals by vessel, canal and railways were rigidly scrutinized for cases of cholera, smallpox, ship fever, etc. The Council appropriated $25,000 for quarantine purposes, of which amount the mayor and Board of Health were authorized to expend on buildings and grounds, for quarantine service, not to exceed $8,000. W. H. Stickney was chairman of the committee on quarantine.

The cities of Chicago and Milwaukee were united by railway on May 19, 1855. Already the bridewell was found to be too small. The space along the lake front between the Illinois Central tracks and the shore was a stagnant pond at this time; the newspapers demanded that it be filled. In the spring of 1855 the police department was reorganized, the ordinance allowing eighty men under C. P. Bradley, chief. At first under the new system seventy-three men were set at work.

As stated before, the first proposition for a street railway (called horse railway then) was made in 1854, and thereafter until May 26, 1855, the subject was duly considered by both people and Council. All proceedings culminated on the latter date upon the passage of the first street car ordinance by a vote of nine for and four against. Permission to cover the following streets was given: State street south to the city limits; Ridgely place to Colbourn avenue; Ringgold place and Cottage Grove avenue; Washington from State to Market; on the North Side, Dearborn to North, Division, Clybourn, Racine and Sedgwick. These streets pierced the most densely populated parts of the city at that date.

On May 26, 1855, at the Clark Street Methodist church 1,800 children participated in a memorable temperance celebration. The owner of the Sauganash hotel site raised a petition to the Council in May, praying that such tract be used for the proposed new post-office and customhouse. At the vote on prohibition throughout the county in May, vigilance committees of the prohibitionists and liquor interests stood guard at the polls in Chicago and other saloon localities. In June the Council appropriated $500 to be used in opening an entrance through the bar into the harbor; the same amount was raised by subscription from the citizens. Light iron fronts began to supplant massive stone fronts on many stores and other buildings. In June, 1855, the Council approved the Sauganash site for the location of the proposed postoffice and customhouse. On July 14 the mercury reached eighty-one degrees above zero; the 15th, ninety-two; the 16th, ninety-four; the 17th, ninety-six; the 18th, ninety-two; and the 19th, ninety-one. On the 17th it dropped suddenly from ninety-six to sixty degrees, but rose again during the night. The newspapers noted that at 3 o'clock P. M. on the 17th the heat at ninety-six degrees was almost suffocating, but by 6 o'clock P. M., with the mercury at sixty degrees, a fire was comfortable. In July vessels of large draft could not cross the bar into the harbor. On July 13 red winter wheat sold at $1.80, and white winter wheat at $2 per bushel. July 21 new winter wheat was worth $1.60 to $1.70.

"It is hardly possible to pass through a street in the city without coming upon buildings in process of erection." . . . "The planks on our streets have been placed on the even surface of the ground—not elevated in the center or turnpiked. The result is a constant splashing or squirting as you ride on them." . . . "Our railroads are the work of capitalists all over the country, who had the sagacity to see that the resources of the Northwest were boundless, and that Chicago was the natural seat of empire of this vast region. . . . Our citizens deserve credit chiefly for making the best use of the facilities for trade and commerce which they find created, as it were, over night, to their hands. We have grown in population and wealth because we could not help it."—(Press, July and August, 1855.)

Electric fire alarms and signals for the city were first considered in July, 1855. New winter wheat was worth $1.75 on July 24, but soon fell to $1.40. It was so cold on July 30 that woolen clothing was comfortable, and on July 20 the mercury fell from ninety-six degrees to fifty-eight degrees. Observers declared that tide variations in Chicago reached a height of about two feet. A contest of the firemen to see which company had the best engine and the most efficient force was held on August 10. Two of the greatest improvements in 1855 were the new depots for the Illinois Central and the Michigan Central railways. Both of these railways laid double tracks in and near the city in 1855. In August, De Golyer's pavement was laid on the section of Lake street down town—probably the first used in the city. The deaths from cholera in 1855 prior to August 1 were 448; all efforts and precautions failed to prevent its ravages; many fled, but busy Chicago as a whole was about as strenuous as ever. In September the city leased of the county the old poorhouse property on the lake, about five miles south of the city, and converted it into a reform school. It embraced ten acres and was leased for five years without rent. About $500 in repairs was spent upon the property by the city.

The first wheat ever to come from Iowa to Chicago wholly by rail arrived on September 20. It was grown twelve miles west of Davenport, was shipped from that city, and comprised 600 bushels, which brought $1.20 per bushel. The State Fair was held here in 1855 on the South Side, just beyond the city limits, on the bank of the South branch. Much difficulty in reaching the grounds was experienced. Tugs, omnibuses and private conveyances were brought into requisition. White winter wheat was worth $1.60 to $1.70 in October. The famous tract called "Egan's Garden," at Jefferson and Lake streets, on the West Side, sold in October, 1855, for $59 to $75 per front foot. Big sales of lots in Elston's and Sheffield's divisions on the North branch were recorded at this date. The De Golyer pavement was referred to as the "wooden streets of Chicago." The fire engine companies held a trial of efficiency on October 21. A vigorous but abortive attempt to organize a stock company to build a tunnel under the main river was made at this time. Rev. D. B. Nichols became first superintendent of the Reform School, with a salary of $1,000; he had previously been a city missionary.

The Times of October 24, 1855, declared that Chicago, "the great metropolis of the Northwest—the city of Abolitionists and Know-nothings—the greatest grain emporium in the world—is without a dollar to pay its honest debts! Its bank funds are gone—its orders are refused by the banks and depreciated with individuals—its credit is comparatively worthless." The Press replied as follows: "It is sufficient to say that the paragraph is utterly and basely false. Last Monday evening the city treasurer reported $7,798.34 cash on hand, and there has not been a time within our recollection for the past seven years when 'its credit was comparatively worthless.' The credit and resources of Chicago are undoubted."

On November 5, 1855, red winter wheat was worth $1.60 to $1.65 and white winter wheat $1.75 to $1.80 per bushel. Lots in Archer's addition to the South Side were offered for sale in November. The fierce struggle in Kansas began to attract attention and to kindle the wrath of Chicagoans. The large Stables of Frank Parmelee & Company at State and Randolph streets were completed in December. The building operations in 1855 were enormous—were declared at the time to be greater than for any year. At the session of Congress 1854-55 the harbor bill was supported by General Cass, but Douglas worked against it and Pierce vetoed it. This moved the Press of December 22 to observe: "The piers of Chicago harbor are going to wreck and ruin; the bar at the mouth of the harbor has seriously obstructed navigation and sundry vessels have been wrecked, and yet Mr. Douglas and Mr. Pierce can grant us no appropriations. True, the receipts of our custom-house for the past year will probably reach three-quarters of a million dollars, but Chicago cannot have appropriations for the improvement of her harbors."

About the close of 1855 an elaborate sewerage system for Chicago was decided upon. The district to be covered was bounded as follows: Division street on the north, Reuben on the west, North on the south, and Lake Michigan on the east. The important question was, Into what should the sewerage be drained? The following routes of drainage were proposed: 1. Into the river and its branches; 2. Directly into the lake; 3. Into artificial reservoirs, thence to be pumped up and used as fertilizing material; 4. Into the Chicago river, thence by the proposed steamboat canal into the Illinois river. After mature deliberation plan 1 above was adopted. Approximately State and Washington streets were the high lines or the ridges of the South Side, from which the drainage should radiate. On the North Side three main lines of drainage were necessary—into the Chicago river, into its North branch and into the lake. On the West Side all drainage was toward the North and South branches. The river was to be flushed from the canal and the lake. It was decided that the mains should be from five to six feet in diameter. The estimated cost of the existing (1855) sewer lines was as follows: South Side, $157,893; North Side, $156,522; West Side, $188,831. The drainage of the above described tract under the new system proposed in 1855 was estimated to cost $2,300,000.

In October, 1855, at a meeting of the old settlers of Chicago called to review early times, it was concluded to organize an old settlers' society, to be composed of all persons who settled in the country prior to January 1, 1835. At a subsequent meeting the following was one of the articles of the constitution adopted: "Article 3. None shall be eligible to membership in this society but the persons who resided in Chicago prior to January 1, 1837; and the male children of those who are now eligible to membership and who were born prior to that date, who shall become so eligible at the age of 21 years, and who desire to become members, must first sign the constitution and by-laws." Among those eligible to membership were the following:

In September, 1855, Chicago had 216 lawyers, 125 doctors, twenty-six banking and exchange offices, ninety-one lumber yards, fifty-seven hotels, sixty-four commission houses, sixty-six clothing houses, seventy-one boot and shoe stores, forty-six wagon and carriage makers, twenty-one wholesale and 173 retail grocers, forty-five dry goods stores, twenty-six furniture stores, thirty-two hardware dealers, nineteen watch and jewelry stores, fifty-five drug stores, fifteen tinware and stove dealers, and ten breweries. Bull's Head was owned by E. Stevens before the summer of 1855, but at that time Belden & Sherman became its owners—hotel, yards, stables, pens, scales, etc.

"Not the least important wonder of the age is the city of Chicago. Its rapid growth and immense trade are subjects of remark in every section of the Union and are beginning to excite the jealousy of older but less enterprising competitors in the strife for supremacy in the West."—(Charleston, Illinois, Courier, December, 1855.)

"In nine years we have paid the penalty of imperfect harbors to the tune of about $13,000,000, and increasing every year, not to speak of the loss of some thousands of lives. A glance at the record we have made will show that nine-tenths of the disasters of the present year have occurred from the want of harbors on the lakes, or from imperfect harbors, obstructed rivers and sand bars. In vain has the commercial public appealed to the Federal government for aid to improve our rivers and harbors. . . . Take our own harbor for an example. Not a storm occurs but thousands of dollars are sunk at our bars or dashed to pieces against our piers and breakwaters. The loss this year (1856) alone exceeds sixfold what was wrung from Congress at the last session over the President's veto. The Federal government has been too keenly following the scent of Southern popularity to attend to the legitimate interests of the young and vigorous West. Our richly freighted vessels have been dashed to pieces and our seamen hurried into watery graves before the very eyes of statesmen who have been criminally indifferent to the fate of both." It was noted that in 1848 the loss on the lakes has been $404,830, while in 1855 the loss was $2,797,839. "Here is a tax upon the commercial interests of the West with a vengeance."—(Press, 1856.)

Nearly one hundred trains arrived and departed daily at the end of 1854. On February 16, 1852, there were forty miles of road completed with Chicago as a center; in January, 1856, there were 2,933 miles completed. In January, 1856, there were actually in operation in Illinois 2,410 miles of railway. Europe and the East had awakened to the importance of investing in the West. For the year 1855 the railway earnings, passenger and freight, of the roads centering in Chicago was $13,292,201.09; total earnings of all railways (forty miles) centering in Chicago January, 1852, was (estimated) $40,000. In January, 1856, fifty-eight passenger and thirty-eight freight trains arrived and departed at Chicago daily.

At the end of 1854 the railroads were completed as follows:

On January 8, 1856, at daybreak the mercury stood at twenty-five degrees below zero, and at the same time the next morning, January 9, it stood at thirty below. So thick was the ice on the river that teams with heavy loads crossed and pleasure sleighs raced up and down on the main river and both branches.—(Democratic Press, January 15 and 17, 1856.) On February 3 the mercury stood at twenty-six below zero. Wide Awake Fire Company, No. 12, was organized in January. For the fiscal year ending February 1, 1856, the receipts of Chicago were $583,046.92 and the expenses $550,766.11. During the winter and spring of 1856 the grades of the three divisions were accurately laid off by the surveyors preparatory to the construction of sewers.

A merchants' exchange building was proposed in April, 1856. Soundings were made and a full description of how to enter the harbor over the bar was published in the newspapers. Again in April, 1856, as for several years past, railway trains from the East were crowded with emigrants for the West. In 1833 H. C. West owned eighty feet on Lake street at the northwest corner of Lake and Clark; he paid $300 for it on a debt and felt cheated. In the fall of 1833 he sold it for $1,000 and felt he had made a big bargain, as he really had. In 1856 the same lot was worth $100,000. At the port of Chicago in 1855 the imports were $191,524,165.13 and the exports $214,118,318.25, according to Colonel Graham in the Democratic Press of May 6, 1856. On May 8 the Council authorized the issue of $100,000 worth of city bonds, bearing 6 per cent interest and due in twenty years, to be used for general municipal purposes. They were sold to B. F. Carver of Chicago for 90½ cents on the dollar. The Democratic Press of May 21 said: "It is the first time bonds to so large an amount have been negotiated among our own capitalists and shows that we long ago predicted that we are rapidly becoming independent of Wall street." The dredge was busy removing the bar at the harbor entrance May, 1856.

In May, 1856, an organization, the Chicago South Branch Canal company, composed of William Green, Charles Stetson and W. S. Sampson of Cincinnati, Colonel Mason, Colonel Fish, A. G. Throop and W. L. Sampson of Chicago, bought a tract of 151 acres on the South branch, including the site of the State Fair in 1855, paying therefor $4,000 per acre, or $604,000 for the whole tract. They proceeded immediately to dredge the South branch and to dig canals 100 feet wide at right angles to the river and 250 feet deep. This was the foundation of the first great dock system at Chicago. Sleeping cars on the railroads made their first appearance here in 1856. They would not be looked at now (1909) except with surprise and incredulity, but then (1856) were regarded as the acme of comfort and luxuriance. On June 25 there were in store here 542,472 bushels of corn. It was about this time that Chicago hackmen became the worst robbers, thieves, bandits, rapers of women, and villains and criminals generally that ever infested any community; severe measures were necessary to suppress their outrages and crimes. During a heavy rain in July nearly all cellars and basements of the city were flooded. On July 7 it was ninety-seven degrees in the shade. The new Randolph street bridge was opened in July; its bottom was eighteen feet above the river, thus permitting tugs to pass under by lowering their smokestacks.

The city hospital was built under the direction of the Board of Health and the corner stone was laid in June, 1856. Among the founders were George P. Hanson, George W. Dole, Doctor McVicker and Isaac Speer. It was located on La Salle street between Old and New, two miles south of the river, and cost about $75,000. Chicago by position, canal, railways, etc., was the natural depot for the West. She did not grow any faster than the country. Her growth was not to be compared to that of other cities, because she was vastly, differently situated. She grew as the Western country grew. Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota—all were building her up. Other cities did not grow thus because they had but a limited tributary country. The citizens did nothing; but wonder—were open-mouthed at their own growth and grandeur. To say that the enterprise of the citizens or the efforts of individuals made Chicago is idle and incorrect. God Almighty first made the divide; Joliet, second, called attention to it; the canal builders, third, utilized it, and the railways, fourth, supplemented it. Lake Michigan made Chicago largely. This was the end of water as it was the beginning of railways to the West. In 1856 enough people to form two states found their way west of Lake Michigan. In 1856 the Dean Richmond loaded with wheat at the wharves of Chicago and unloaded at the wharves of Liverpool. Steamers ran to the head of Lake Superior. Its situation at the terminus of the great lakes; water communication with the Mississippi; access to the great Illinois coal belt; contact by rail with the lead, iron and copper mines of the Mississippi and Lake Superior regions; in the heart of an agriculture empire and in a genial climate—were the substantial advantages possessed by Chicago.

The Lake street bridge was nearly ready. The Wells street bridge was ready August 4. On August 21 white winter wheat was worth $1.28 to $1.30. This was the time of the "bridge and tug war." The latter demanded the prompt opening of the river whenever they had occasion to pass, but the latter insisted on recognizing the rights of the public as well; violence was resorted to, but in the end an ordinance requiring the boats to lower their chimneys settled the dispute. The new Richmond house was opened in October. On the 13th of that month the Chicago Reform school on the lake shore south of the city was destroyed by fire; it consisted of four buildings connected together and had been the old county poorhouse. The loss was about $800; the Council promptly appropriated $3,500 for a new building. The Board of Trade and business men generally still clung to the idea of the great importance to Chicago of the trade with Canada and Liverpool through the St. Lawrence valley. In October, 1856, the Board of Trade assembled at their new rooms in Steele's building at the corner of South Water and La Salle streets. It was particularly noted that on October 19, 1856, one Chicago merchant bought on 'Change corn for immediate delivery to the amount of 145,000 bushels. It was regarded as a remarkably large transaction.

In October, 1856, 112 policemen were employed, which number was thirty-two more than the ordinance allowed. On November 10 red winter wheat was worth 94 to 95 cents, and white winter $1. The wrecks on the lake in 1856 were unprecedented in number and value, and from all sides came the cry for better harbors. Prior to December, 1856, the extent of sewerage laid under the new law was as follows: Of six-foot bore, 1,596 feet; five-foot bore, 6,084 feet; four-foot bore, 1,024 feet; three-foot bore, 280 feet; two and one-half foot bore, 1,352 feet; two-foot bore, 12,062 feet; one-foot bore, 3,304 feet; total, 31,662 feet, or almost exactly six miles. During 1856 the following expense was incurred: Wells street bridge, cost $19,182; Chicago avenue bridge, $4,013; Randolph street bridge, $20,811; Rush street bridge, $15,825; repairing South Water street bridge, $13,299; paving Lake, State and Market streets, $29,510. The following work was in progress: New float bridge at Indiana street, $5,000; same at Erie street, $5,000; same at Polk street, $5,000; new iron draw bridge at Madison street, $30,000; improvement of the harbor at Dearborn Point, $40,000; improvement of the harbor around Blocks 6, 7 and 14, Old Town, $43,000. The Democratic Press of December 15 said: "Chicago has already passed that point in her commercial history from which must date the ability and disposition of her citizens to engage in stock and other speculative financial transactions incident to the accumulating of capital."

The direct Chicago and Liverpool grain trade was established by C. Y. Richmond, the sailing vessel "Dean Richmond" making the first trip from one port to the other. The box receipts of the Chicago postoffice for the year ending June 30, 1856, were $5,717. This was greater than those of Washington, Buffalo, Detroit, Cincinnati and Baltimore, but less than those of Boston ($9,674), Philadelphia ($5,863), St. Louis ($6,000) and New York ($25,572). A new policeman arrested a drunken man on the Illinois Central tracks and charged him with obstructing the railway.

A big fire on August 13, 1856, destroyed the Michigan Southern and Rock Island freight depots, the Rock Island and Walker hotels and other property to the amount of $100,000. In the fall of 1856 the Massasoit hotel was opened on South Water Street. On January 2, 1857, the lake was frozen out farther than ever was known before and many skaters went out in safety several miles. The Democratic Press of January 3 said: "At 4 o'clock at least a thousand boys and men were skimming the glassy surface, many quite as far out as they could be seen from the shore." At this date red winter wheat was worth $1.06, and white winter $1.15. Chicago forwarders were sharply criticised for putting on extra charges for handling goods here shipped from Eastern points to places west of this city. The "back charges," as they were called, were declared to be unfair, because the consignee had no voice as to how much he should pay the Chicago forwarder. Western merchants claimed they not only took the profits but the goods also. William B. Ogden still continued to press the project of a steamboat channel from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river.

The Illinois game law went into effect on January 15, 1857—on deer, quail, prairie chicken, wild turkey, pheasant, woodcock, etc. Prior to this a city ordinance had in a small measure protected such game. On January 22 it was sixteen degrees below zero, and on the 23d twenty below. Early in 1857 work was commenced on Dearborn hall, a building 62 by 100 feet on Dearborn, between Lake and Randolph. The city in January and February made a determined fight against watered milk. The report of the water commissioners in February, 1857, showed that a total of fifty-two and one-half miles of pipes had been laid. The Democratic Press, speaking in February of the large business houses of the city, said: "One of these firms handled during the business season of 1856 the aggregate of $15,000,000 in their transactions in grain and other descriptions of produce. There has passed through their hands 5,256,000 bushels of grain, mostly wheat. Their check account at a single one of our banking institutions foots up nearly eight millions of dollars."

The old cemetery (now a part of Lincoln park) was declared in February, 1857, to be too small and too near the city, and a new one was demanded. It was proposed to trade the old one, consisting of over sixty acres, for a tract of 640 acres owned by C. V. Dyer ten miles south of the city, and $30,000 to be paid in ten years.

The tract was at Riley's tavern and the little village of Comorn. A new city charter was discussed in January and February, 1857. By act of February 16, 1857; the Chicago Hydraulic company was authorized to borrow, in addition to sums previously specified, the sum of $500,000, but not for more than 7 per cent interest.

The city balance sheet for 1856 gave the following statistics: Cost of fire department, $81,264; health, $32,136; interest, $40,797; loans, $103,543; salaries, $43,761; schools, $70,990; police, $99,972. The total expense of the general fund was $678,137.77; total funded or bonded debt, $535,000; total liabilities, $639,661. An additional ward—the Tenth—was added to the city early in 1857. On March 7 red winter wheat was worth $1.05 to $1.10 and white winter $1.15 to $1.20. It was noted often during the early years of the city's history that at no time did accommodation keep pace with population and improvement. The city government in every department struggled far in the rear to keep up with development and growth. Although the city government was restricted to borrow but $100,000 in any one year, it had gone to the limit for several years and thus was deeply in debt for improvement to its water, sewerage and other systems. Mayor Wentworth in his inaugural of March, 1857, said:

"While our city government is amply sufficient for us, we are paying largely for a county government which would be entirely unnecessary save for our relations to certain territory outside our city limits which cannot be conveniently attached to any other county. This territory is so scattered around our city that it cannot be erected into a single county. From their location the inhabitants of the country towns affiliate more with our citizens than they do with each other. Thus naturally they throw the responsibility of county government upon us, while we are almost entirely indifferent to it, as will be seen by the small number of votes cast at the election of ward supervisors. We have a city assessor and county assessor, a city treasurer and county treasurer, a city physician and county physician, a city attorney and county attorney, and so on, duplicating almost every city officer. In many cases, no doubt, there is an understanding between these duplicates to divide work with each other and thus make our tax payers pay twice for work that need be done but once. Our county taxes have increased without good cause. Our supervisors meet too often and pay themselves too much for their services. No alderman can be interested in any city contract, nor hold any office the salary for which comes out of the city treasury. The reverse is the case with the supervisors, and they are not at all modest in appointing one another to office. Indeed, it is very seldom that they go out of their own board in their selections. . . . These supervisors appoint themselves disbursing officers for their own towns. They generally take the money as soon as it is appropriated and then account to each other for its expenditure. There is no responsibility beyond themselves, while each has a personal interest in not questioning the account of his fellow supervisor. And I know of no particular instance of wrong done among our supervisors, but such practices have never failed in the end to lead to the greatest abuse and corruption. I suggest the appointment of a committee on county relations. There is now in our county treasury nearly one hundred thousand dollars of surplus money. The taxes of this year will greatly increase this amount. And yet our county has bonds outstanding upon which we are paying 10 per cent interest. Thus in our county, as often in our city, money has been borrowed at high rates of interest to lie idle in the hands of officials, or to be loaned out at their pleasure at from 2 to 5 per cent a month."

The new office of city comptroller gave satisfaction in 1857 by placing before the people a more detailed and better knowledge of municipal affairs. C. G. Hammond occupied this office in 1857, with a salary of $4,000, the highest ever paid to a city official. At this date, owing to the want of suitable ordinances or the lack of their rigid execution, crime and outrage were rampant. The hackmen continued to be robbers, highwaymen and swindlers and were guilty of more than one attack on women. In one case even several members of a fire department seized a respectable woman, compelled her to enter their building and there abused her. The police were involved in these outrages. They were in civilian's dress, with nothing but a star to distinguish them. Often they pocketed their stars and engaged in outrages without being discovered. The bar at the harbor entrance continued to cause annoyance and loss. Under President Jackson five bills appropriating money to the amount of $162,000 for Chicago harbor had been passed. One was passed under Van Buren, two under Tyler, one under Fillmore, but Polk and Pierce vetoed all river and harbor bills that came before them. The press of the city contested sharply for the appointment as corporation newspaper and paid a bonus to get it; before 1856 $100 had been paid by one newspaper and $350 by another. In 1856 $3,000 was paid for the appointment. In the following extract from Mayor Wentworth's inaugural in 1857 he probably referred to Allan Pinkerton and associates when he speaks of "a highly respectable police":

"Our police system has been gradually falling into disrepute, and it is a lamentable fact that while our citizens are heavily taxed to support a large police force, a highly respectable private police is doing a lucrative business. Our citizens have ceased to look to the public police for protection, for the detection of culprits, or the recovery of stolen property."

The act of February 13, 1857, incorporated the Lake Michigan and Chicago Canal company and authorized it to construct a canal from the South branch of Chicago river to Lake Michigan, the canal "to be located on the most eligible route between the south line of the city and the south line of Sections 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11, Township 38 north, Range 14 east in Cook county, or with the consent of the Common Council of the city of Chicago and the owners of property adjacent thereto, between the south line of said city and the south line of South street in said city," also to construct piers and breakwaters on Lake Michigan at the mouth of the canal. The company was authorized to take for its use a strip of land not over 300 feet wide. The capital was fixed at $500,000, but could be increased. The corporate powers were vested in a board of directors which could make its own rules and regulations and could fix its own rate of toll. They were authorized to borrow money for construction purposes. Nothing was done.

Under Mayor Wentworth, for the first time in the annals of the city, policemen were required to wear certain caps on which were their stars and numbers, and hackmen were required to wear brass plates or badges. County supervisors were elected from the towns of the county and also from the wards of the city. William Price became postmaster in April, 1857. A terrible gale in April destroyed much property. In April, 1857, new and vigorous demands for a higher grade for the streets were made. It was proposed to raise the streets thirteen feet above low water mark, which would necessitate raising them an average of about three feet above their grade in 1857. A mass meeting demanded the thirteen-foot grade. The Burlington (Iowa) Board of Trade complained of the back charges of Chicago forwarders. The wholesale trade of the city was enormous in the spring of 1857, as was also the emigration westward.

For many years the sand dispoits on the north side of the river adjoining the lake had continued to grow until in 1857 they numbered many acres of solid ground. From the start squatters had located thereon, laid out rude streets, built shanties and fenced in small patches for gardens and yards and otherwise made themselves at home. They paid no rent and soon they paid little or no attention to law. Occasional raids of the police served only to unite them for mutual protection against their deadly enemies—policemen and landlords. By 1857 the whole tract called "The Sands" was covered with shanties and was the resort and retreat of the rabble, tramps, thieves, criminals, etc., of every description. It was not safe for a policeman to venture there alone even in the daytime. Should he do so, like lightning the wireless message flew to all parts of the tract. There would be a hurrying and skurrying; hostilities to his intrusion would be manifested; no information whatever would be given him; and if he attempted any liberties, missiles of every description would assail him from a score of clapboard ramparts, until he took pleasure in retreat and delight in escape, regardless of official dignity. Processes of law demanding their evacuation were met by threats and open and vigorous battle. Previous to 1857 raids had been made upon the dwellers there and they had thus been kept from openly attempting to ransack and destroy the city—at least in daylight. In the spring of 1857 it was determined to break up this haunt of crime. Accordingly a sheriff's posse numbering about a score visited the tract, tore down about sixty shanties which had previously been marked, and generally renovated that section and placed it under the eye of the police. Those who submitted and paid their rent were usually permitted to remain—about twenty shanties in all. This raid cleared "The Sands," but the criminals moved a few blocks to the westward and soon were even more formidable, wicked and defiant than ever. It was even necessary later to again raid "The Sands."

Alderman Coughlin was convicted of misdemeanor on election day and sentenced to pay a fine of $250 and to an imprisonment of two months. On May 1 inmates of the bridewell numbered 104; ninety-three were committed in April. Small hotels and merchants, hackmen and salesmen—many of them—were guilty of extortion at this date. Offenses of every description poured like a flood over the inefficient legal restraints until the Council controlled them with ordinance after ordinance. In May, 1857, it was ordered that Twelfth street from the river westward to the city limits should be planked six feet wide with three-inch oak, at a cost of $19,534, to be assessed upon the property benefited. The same was ordered for Van Buren street from the canal to the Southwest plank road, at a cost of $11,927; the same for Canal street from Van Buren to Old, at a cost of $20,814; and the same for Van Buren from the South branch to Clark, at a cost of $5,420. This was the first movement to plank the streets outside of the down-town district. The "runner" nuisance had become unendurable; they infested the boat landings and railroad depots and kidnapped passengers if they could not secure them any other way; they were regulated by ordinance. In May, 1857, in an excavation on South Water street between State and Wabash, numbers of skeletons of white men were uncovered by the workmen; they were supposed to be those of General Scott's soldiers who had died of cholera in 1832 and been buried in unmarked graves; the bones were removed to the city cemetery. In a raid on gambling dens in May $2,500 worth of property was confiscated.

On May 28 spring wheat was worth $1.23 to $1.30 and winter wheat $1.60; hogs, $5 to $5.50; cattle, $5.50. A squad of town and city officials in May were indicted, tried and found guilty of being in league with disreputable houses and criminals. Thomas G. Prendergast, police magistrate and justice of the peace, and Charles O. Malley, acting justice of the peace, were thus convicted. Messrs. Ford, Quinn and Nolan were convicted of blackmail and extortion. There was an enormous increase in "police cases" during the spring and summer of 1857. It was now the regular custom for tugs to take vessels out beyond the harbor. Long John Wentworth made a model mayor; he tore precedent and obstruction to tatters; uprooted crime, cleaned the streets, enforced order and economy, regulated the municipal departments and made the city a city in fact instead of a dirty, disorganized village, with hogs on the streets and crime in the doggeries. A line of propellers ran regularly to Collingwood, Canada. The Rush street bridge was opened in June; it was a double draw with a center pier, and worked on a pivot; it was 210 feet long, had a clearance of eighteen feet and cost nearly $50,000.

"Urbs in Horto—A City in a Garden.—It was once true of our city. It is still on our municipal seal, but the din of business and the rise of block after block of iron, marble and brick stores, warehouses, mills and manufactories are fast destroying the truth of our motto and driving our garden afar from the dusty streets. The time is fast approaching, nay, is even now upon us, when our merchants and our solid men, our clerks, our lawyers, will seek their homes without the din and bustle of business in quiet suburban retreats. And of these none is probably more delightful than Hyde Park, five miles south of the river, on the lake shore."—(Press, June 20, 1857.) "Boston has its Malden, its Auburndale and its Melrose; New York has its Staten Island and its Brooklyn Heights; and Chicago will have its Hyde Park, its Highland Park, and its Evanston. Our citizens are now looking about for residences out of town."—(Press, June 22, 1857.)

The act of February 14, 1857, incorporated the Brighton Hotel and Stock Yards company with capital of $50,000, located at or near Brighton, in Cook county. The object was to establish a cattle, sheep, hog and horse market, with all necessary buildings to care for the animals. The company was authorized to build a hotel and to borrow money on the pledge of its property. The act of February 22, 1861, changed the name of the "Brighton Hotel and Stock Yards company" to "Brighton company." On February 5, 1857, the Chicago Merchants' Exchange company was incorporated by George Steele, John P. Chapin, Samuel B. Pomeroy, James Peck, Julian S. Rumsey, Edward K. Rogers, Thomas Richmond, Thomas Hall, Walter L. Newberry, Edmund D. Taylor, Hiram Wheeler, George Armour, Elisha Wadsworth and Walter S. Gurnee. The objects were declared to be to promote the commercial interests of Chicago and to formulate rules to facilitate the transaction of business among merchants and traders in the city.

So great were the number of burglaries and other crimes in June, 1857, that the Democratic Press published daily lists of them, duly numbered; from two to eight occurred each night. By June 27 there were forty-eight burglaries for that month alone. Many hackmen were convicted and punished for passing counterfeit money on travelers; they had made a business of it. The ordinance for the new thirteen-foot grade was being carried into effect at this time. In July it was decided to add another story to the courthouse. The Fourth of July was duly celebrated by the militia and fire companies. On that day the corner stone of Chicago University was laid at Cottage Grove, Stephen A. Douglas and Isaac N. Arnold delivering appropriate addresses. On July 14, 1857, the "Madeira Pet," a British schooner direct from Liverpool with a cargo of earthen and china ware, hardware, cutlery, Britannia ware, paint, iron, etc., entered the Chicago river; its displacement was 123 tons. One hundred guns were fired to celebrate the event. The Chicago Press of July 15 said: "This event is regarded as one of the most important and significant in the commercial history of our city." The Board of Trade passed the following resolution: "That we hail the arrival at this port of the 'Madeira Pet' direct from Liverpool as the pioneer of an immense foreign trade soon to be opened between Chicago and Europe." The "Dean Richmond" had gone from Chicago to Liverpool in 1856.

In the autumn of 1855 the Illinois Central began to use coal-burning locomotives—the first here. City rents were ruinously high. Proprietors of daily newspapers were forced by the Associated Press of New York to pay exorbitant sums for telegraphic service and complained bitterly and repeatedly. At this time 'Change recognized seven grades of wheat; in July it was proposed to cut them down to four. The Cook County Agricultural and Horticultural society, with Edgar Sanders president, was organized in July at the office of the Prairie Farmer. In August, 1857, the "Madeira Pet" cleared for Liverpool with a cargo of 4,000 cured hides. It was escorted out of the harbor with much ceremony. An omnibus line ran four times daily between Chicago and Holstein; lots there sold for $125 to $300. That suburb was high, rolling and drained to the North branch. It was about half a mile west of Ward's rolling mill on the north branch and about three miles from the Lake street bridge; John Donlin sold lots there. Steps to have branch postoffices in different parts of the city were taken in August, 1857. A ferry on the river at Polk street was upset and thirty persons were thrown into the river; no lives were lost. Union park was being greatly improved and beautified in August.

The panic of 1857 was heralded here by the refusal of the banks to grant discounts on any terms and by the failure of the business house of Loomis, Abbott & Chapman. A little later Thomas George & Company failed. Brokers were waiting like hawks to swoop down upon the banks at the least excuse. Frost & Bradley (lumber) and Higginbotham & White (dry goods) went down about the middle of September. Fraser & Carr (dry goods), B. F. Farnsworth, G. F. Hamilton and John S. Wright also failed before September 22. Soon banks and bankers began to go down. Benson & Kingsbury, Baker & Davidson, F. B. Gardner & Company, Seymour & Woodruff and others were forced to close. The consternation and dismay were complete. The Press of October 15 said: "It is with pride that we record the fact that Chicago yet stands." One of the worst fires in the history of the city occurred here October 19; twenty-two lives were lost, eighteen bodies were recovered, and property worth $676,200 was destroyed.

A fire brigade was at once planned and to be composed of "a picked corps of men, duly qualified for their functions by the city, to be in attendance at fires, to preserve order, remove and guard property exposed, and by their trained skill lessen the confusion, check pilfering, and generally add to the efficiency of the fire department."—(Press, October 29, 1857.) The plan was proposed by E. E. Ellsworth and approved by the underwriters. The Citizens' Fire Brigade was accordingly organized.

On November 5 red winter wheat was worth 68 to 78 cents and white winter 80 to 90 cents. One of the results of the panic of 1857 was the united demand of tenants in November for a reduction of rents. Thousands were thrown out of employment, and their care was a serious question for the city fathers and others. Martin Quinlan, city sexton, and several medical students were indicted in November on the charge of robbing graves in the cemetery for the purpose of dissection. The Press of December 3 said: "Uncle Sam's new customhouse and postoffice on Dearborn street is at last beginning to make its appearance above ground." It fronted eighty-two feet on Monroe and 163 feet on Dearborn; Colonel James was the contractor. It was built under the appropriation of August 4, 1854, and cost a total of $434,894. The total spent for city improvements in 1857 was over $604,000. Six new bridges and repairs cost $112,000; grading the streets to the new datum, $275,023; Dearborn park, $16,000; two new schoolhouses, a city hospital, three new fire engine houses and a city armory, $111,150; dredging and improving the river, $90,000. The dailies at this time were the Press, Times, Democrat, Staats Zeitung, Journal, Tribune and Union; all were Republican except the Times (Democratic) and the Union (Independent).

For six weeks prior to January 9, 1858, the weather was as fine, fair and mild as April. Hundreds were out of employment in January—were willing to work for 50 cents per day. The new city directory of January, 1858, gave the following statistics: Hotels, eighty; real estate agents, ninety-three; lumber dealers, ninety-three; wholesale grocers, thirty; retail grocers, 380; wholesale dry goods, fifteen; retail dry goods, forty-two; retail clothiers, seventy-three; boarding houses, 240; saloons, 370.

Mayor Wentworth, upon vetoing an ordinance increasing the salaries of certain city officials, made the following observations: "The chief inducements that I had, for only a single year, to accept the office of mayor, which demanded more of my time than I ought to spare from private avocations, were to liquidate the increasing floating debt of our city and thereby save its greatly endangered credit, to prepare the way for a great reduction in taxes, and effectually prevent the further issue of city bonds. Few of our citizens are aware that the right to borrow money has been considered a legitimate source of revenue. The charter limits this right to $100,000 per year; and after taxing the people to the extreme limit of the charter it has been considered proper to add this annual issue of $100,000 of bonds. Nor has this profligate expenditure of money stopped here. A floating debt has been accumulated and handed down from one administration to another, until I found upon my hands, in coming into office, liabilities to be extinguished during my year of quite a quarter of a million dollars. The funded debt of the city is $535,000 exclusive of what is due by the Board of Sewerage and Water Commissioners. During my year not only the interest on this sum had to be paid, but $25,000 of the principal. So that $300,000 had to be collected from this year's taxes, for which this administration is in no way responsible. The Water Commissioners have borrowed $846,000 at 6 per cent. The Sewerage Commissioners have borrowed $220,000 at 6 and 7 per cent. . . . To meet all this we received money in the treasury March 10, 1857, $64,464.88; tax warrants of 1856, $24,003.96; total, $88,468.84. Deduct this from the liabilities that were handed down to us, and this administration may be said to have been inaugurated with no money in the treasury and a debt of over $200,000 to be provided for, besides paying its own expenses. . . . It has been my aim to make the proceeds of the licenses and police court fines pay all the expenses of the police department and also of the bridewell. We have received from licenses $74,248.81, and from fines $26,829.77; total, $101,077.58 in ten months. The whole expense of our police and bridewell department service amounts of only $80,132.62."

Late in January, 1858, Maj. J. D. Graham of the Government engineer corps reported the city hall to be in longitude 87 degrees, 38 minutes and 1.2 seconds west of Greenwich, and in latitude 41 degrees, 53 minutes and 10 seconds. The South market building was ordered sold in February, 1858.

The boundaries of the city wards at this date were as follows: South division: First ward, lake shore to State street; Second, State to Clark; Third, Clark to Wells; Fourth, Wells to South branch. West division: Fifth ward, between Hamilton avenue and Randolph street, east and west from South branch to city limits; Sixth, between Madison and North and Tenth west from Hamilton avenue south to city limits. North division: Seventh, from North branch to La Salle; Eighth, from La Salle to Wolcott; Ninth, from Wolcott to the lake shore. At this time there were two fire districts on the South Side, one on the West and two on the North.

Paul P. Rhode

In February, 1858, Isaac Cook succeeded Mr. Price as the Chicago postmaster. December, 1857, and January, 1858, were very mild, but February was very cold. For the fiscal year ending January 30 the comptroller's report showed that the city expenses amounted to the very large amount of $1,190,146.85, less the balance in the treasury of $30,426.81. The total receipts were $1,190,106.85. The treasurer's report showed the expenses to be $927,859.96, with a balance of $64,464.88 from the previous year, 1856-57. There were clashes and serious trouble among the fire companies at this date. The underwriters in March reported in favor of steam fire engines. An important railway convention to adjust freight rates between the seaboard and the West was held here in March. The winter of 1857-58 was such a hardship on the poor that one or more public soup houses were opened. Chicago was entitled to a county supervisor from each ward in addition to the supervisor from each of the South, North and West towns. Thus each voter in the city was obliged to vote twice in April—once for a supervisor for his ward and once for a supervisor for his town. The ease with which immense buildings were raised to the new grade was the marvel of the times. A vast improvement near the mouth of the Chicago river was made in 1857-58. A section of the old Fort Dearborn land had been cut away and the river widened to facilitate the passage of vessels. A fine bridge at Rush street had been built at a cost of about $50,000, several hundred yards of dock had been constructed, and the Illinois Central had made important improvements. Enormous numbers of buildings, particularly frame dwellings, were erected in the spring of 1858. The abuses of the hackmen were so great, and had been for several years, that drivers were forced to form an organization to take corrective measures to redeem themselves in the spring of 1858.

"Horse Railroads.—We are glad to see some definite steps taken looking toward the establishment of horse railroads in the South division. We care not by whom or through what streets these roads be built so that the public are best suited, but the roads we must have. We shall publish the proposed ordinance tomorrow."—(Press, April 28, 1858.)

In April the United States court rooms were removed to Larmon's block on Washington street. A new vagrant ordinance struck a severe blow at all tramps during the summer of 1858. Two new water reservoirs—one at Chicago avenue and Sedgwick and one at Morgan and Monroe—were ordered built in 1858. The National Typographical Union held its seventh annual session on May 3. In this month a union depot on the sands north of the river mouth, for all the railroads that did not come into the city on the tracks of the Illinois Central, was proposed. The roads to be thus united were the Galena, Michigan Southern, Chicago & Alton, Rock Island, Chicago, St. Paul and Fond du Lac, and Chicago, Pittsburg & Fort Wayne. The cry arose in May from property owners that city tax for 1858 must not exceed 10 mills. In April the vote for sewerage commissioner and water commissioner was as follows: Water commissioner, Lunt 2,397, Price 545, Bay 942. Sewerage commissioner, Webster 3,312, Gage 551. The city ordinance of 1858 prohibiting saloons from selling liquor on Sunday caused bitterness and riot during that year. In May, 1858, about $200,000 of Chicago sewerage bonds, running twenty-five years and bearing 7 per cent, were sold by Commissioner Sylvester Lind for an average of 97½ cents on the dollar. All Western towns, envious of Chicago's growth and prosperity, took advantage of every opportunity to make fun of this city. The following from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of May, 1858, is a sample of these attacks: "Chicago is a bustling city. It was formerly in Illinois, but now Illinois is in it. Lake Michigan is situated on Chicago. The principal productions of Chicago are corner lots, statistics, wind, the Democratic Press and Long John Wentworth. The population of Chicago is about sixteen millions and is 'rapidly increasing.'"

The additions to the courthouse were being built in May, 1858, and all buildings were being raised to grade. Rejected spring wheat was returned to this city by New York in May; an investigation by the Board of Trade showed that the complaint was just. A new system of grain inspection was demanded, devised and instituted. There had thus far been no uniformity of inspection, each inspector using his own judgment or bias. After June 15, 1858, the following grades were to prevail: 1. Chicago club wheat; 2. No. 1 spring wheat; 3. No. 2 spring wheat; 4. Rejected spring wheat. The months of April and May, 1858, were extremely wet, the rains being almost continuous. The Board of Trade continued to waste valuable time and energy on shipments, via the St. Lawrence river, between Liverpool and Chicago. "Fluid lamps" (kerosene) began to be used; their frequent explosion was noticed. On June 23 the thermometer registered ninety-eight degrees.

In July, 1858, the city police force numbered 160 men—forty-seven in the South division, forty-two in the West division and forty-one in the North division, the others being specials. It was in July, 1858, that many of the citizens took positive ground against granting to any company a franchise to occupy the streets with "horse cars" without adequate compensation. The Council had granted to Henry Fuller & Company the right to build a "horse railroad" on State street, and in the opinion of many had failed to obtain suitable consideration therefor. A mass meeting was held and protests were filed. These vigorous protests caused Mayor

Haines to veto the ordinance as it was passed. It was then amended to meet more nearly the wishes of the people—to be built within a definite period; not to approach nearer than twelve feet to any sidewalk; cars to be run by animal power; not to connect with any other street railway; no cars from other roads to be run over its tracks; the city to have the right to buy the road after twenty-five years; the purchase price to be fixed by a commission of five persons; fare, rate of speed and time of running to be controlled by the city. On July 28 the Clark street bridge, the most important one in the city, and but four years in use, broke in two and fell into the river; after the breakage and until the ferry there was started people were forced to go to the Wells and Rush street bridges to get across.

The Atlantic telegraph, laid in July and August, 1858, was watched with great interest here. Upon receipt of the message of Queen Victoria to President Buchanan on August 16 and his reply thereto, an enormous impromptu celebration of the important event was held. The fire and militia companies came out, bells were rung, bonfires were lighted in all quarters and the British and American flags, blended, were flung to the breeze. It was estimated that from 15,000 to 20,000 people were on the streets. The Council appropriated $1,000 with which to suitably celebrate an event of such importance to the world, to America and to Chicago. The Press and Tribune of August 17 said: "It is impossible to do full justice to the events of last evening in this city. Any description would fall short of adequateness save that which with those who had not the evidence of their own eyes would pass to the least pardonable extreme of exaggeration. The affair was spontaneous and the hearty outburst of our entire community in their rejoicings at the successful termination of suspense and the glorious completion of an enterprise literally world-wide in its scope."

On August 17 an imposing formal celebration was held to emphasize and dignify the event and spend the money that had been appropriated by the Council. The streets were illuminated, as were also the courthouse, postoffice and many business blocks. At a meeting of the Board of Trade an appropriate letter was addressed to Cyrus W. Field, who had conducted the project to success.

In August, 1858, spring wheat was worth 81 to 82 cents, red winter $1 to $1.11, white winter $1.15 to $1.20. The ejectment suit against the Illinois Central Railroad company by George C. Bates, to recover possession of the depot grounds of that company on the lake front, was tried in September, 1858. The suit was based upon the preëmption claims of the Kinzie family to the tract. After a long and important trial the claimant was defeated. By August, 1858, the union depot had been located definitely on the West Side. The small park (then called Washington) on the North Side, next to Clark street, had not been improved as agreed upon and suit to recover it from the city was threatened in October, 1858. Also Jefferson park, on the West Side, acquired from Judge Thomas, administrator, in 1850, was claimed by his widow in 1858 upon the same and other grounds. The People's Gas Light & Coke company was organized in October. On October 9 occurred the great fire on Lake street, by which twenty-three lives were lost and $500,000 worth of property was destroyed. The Citizens' Fire Brigade had their first annual review on October 28, 1858. On November 1, 1858, the first ground for a "horse railroad" (street railway) was broken on State street. The first rail on this road was laid on December 2. The Adams house was opened this fall. Bridgeport was called South Chicago in 1858. By November 4 the big reservoir on the West Side at Monroe street was nearly finished. "During the last week 32,900 hogs, alive and dressed, were received in this city over the various routes of supply," said the Press and Tribune of November 22. There was a big exodus to Pike's Peak late in 1858 and early in 1859. The act of February 19, 1859, repealed the act of February 16, 1857, providing for the laying out of a park in the South division of Chicago; such law was declared immature and not demanded by the interest of the people of the South division.

The act of February 11, 1859, incorporated the Rosehill Cemetery company, the incorporators being William B. Ogden, Charles G. Hammond, John H. Kinzie, Hiram A. Tucker, Levi D. Boone, Benjamin W. Raymond, Charles V. Dyer, James H. Rees, John Evans, Jonathan Burr, Levi B. Taft, E. K. Rogers, Robert H. Morford, Andrew T. Sherman, William Turner, George Schneider, C. H. Deihl, Andrew Nelson, James V. Z. Blaney, Henry Smith, Philo Judson, E. L. Jansen, Francis H. Benson, all of whom were constituted a board of consultation. The five persons last named were the first board of managers. The company was authorized to purchase not to exceed 500 acres in the township of Lake View, Cook county, and to devote the same to cemetery purposes.

In the spring of 1859 U. P. Harris was elected chief of the fire department. In March the Council granted the North Chicago Railway company the right to construct and operate a horse railroad on the North Side; William B. Ogden was one of the incorporators. On March 30 the water commissioners reported that during the fiscal year 1858-59, 74,433 feet of water pipes had been laid; that the total length of pipes in the city were 382,282 feet; that 122 fire hydrants had been set; that the total number of gallons of water pumped had been 1,091,865,000, which was about 3,000,000 gallons daily, and that 8,231 buildings had been supplied with water. It was noted in March, 1859, that vessels had just left here bound for Liverpool, Pike's Peak and New Orleans, that to Pike's Peak going via the canal and Illinois, Mississippi, Missouri and Kaw rivers as far as possible. A single track street railway was being laid on State street in March. Prior to April, 1859, city contractors were required to wait for their pay until assessments had been collected, but at that date the Council ordered the issue of construction bonds. So great was the demand for houses now that the Press and Tribune issued a call, headed "1,000 Houses Wanted." The McCormick reaper works were regarded as one of the greatest local industries. The following machines had been turned out by that concern: In 1854, 1,600; 1855, 2,500; 1856, 4,000; 1857, 4,000; 1858, 4,500. The improvement of the courthouse in 1858-59 greatly enhanced the appearance of that structure. In April, 1859, five trains daily reached Hyde Park. Commutation tickets sold at 7½ cents a ride. The following bridges were in existence in April, 1859: Rush, Clark, Wells, Lake, Randolph Madison, Van Buren, Polk, Twelfth, old Kinzie, Erie, Indiana, Chicago avenue and North. Wentworth of the Democrat opposed the location of the union depot on the West Side; the Tribune said he wanted it on the South Side where his property was located. On April 19 North Market hall was destroyed by fire. On April 25 four street cars were kept in operation all day on State street—this was the first general run. The plan was to extend the State street car line to Ulick's hotel, two miles south, at the earliest possible moment. By April 30 the postoffice and customhouse at Monroe and Dearborn was ready for the roof. The war news in Europe caused all prices to advance in the spring of 1859. The Press and Tribune said: "Later—A Panic.—Late last evening the dispatches of the steamer 'Vigo' were received, indicating a heavy decline in breadstuffs. The news caused a frightful panic among the holders of wheat, and large quantities were immediately thrown on the market, which declined rapidly 8 to 10 cents on the closing price on 'Change—No. 1 red selling as low as $1.55 and standard and spring at $1.15—a decline of 15 to 18 cents per bushel since yesterday noon."

In May, 1859, the "horse railway" was being built on West Madison street. The new Rosehill cemetery, six miles north of the city, was now ready for interments. A gentleman asked an Irish gravedigger. "Is this the place where the new cemetery is going to be?" The Irishman replied, "Yis, yer Honor, and not a healthier place for a cemetery is there on top of this' earth." In June a resolution before the Council in favor of building a fire-proof recorder's office on the public square, fronting on Washington street, and not to cost more than $4,000, was lost by a vote of 20 to 17. On June 16 the second horse railroad in the city was opened on Madison to Sangamon streets. At this date the State street line had been extended to Cottage Grove. On the occasion of the visit to this city of the Council of Cincinnati in June, 1859, the old fire engine "Neptune" was brought out and its power exhibited. It threw a stream 253 feet in a horizontal direction. At this date (1859) the "Long John" steam fire engine was the pride of the department. On May 16 red winter wheat sold at $1.73, but on July 8 it sold at $1.12. On July 14 corn was 1 cent higher than standard spring wheat; the next day they were quoted at the same price and were exchanged on even terms in the Chicago market—about 68 cents. On Sunday, July 17, the mercury stood at ninety-six degrees. In July the horse railway tracks on Randolph from Clark west to Reuben were being laid. On July 28, 1859, Rosehill cemetery was dedicated with much ceremony by the laying of the corner stone of the chapel there and the reading of a poem by Professor Goodwin. J. V. Z. Blaney, president of the company, addressed the assemblage. The cemetery then embraced a little more than twenty acres. A strong demand for a girls' reform school was made at this time; there was no place except the jail in which to confine female offenders. In August the Council passed an ordinance providing for such an institution, and the board of Guardians decided to spend not to exceed $3,000 the first year thereon. The guardians of the boys' reform school, owing to a shortness of funds, objected to the movement. Owing, it was claimed, to a war between the allopaths and homeopaths, the city hospital had remained for some time silent and unfinished; it was on the South Side, near Archer road.

On August 25, 1859, the Chicago City Railway company had in operation three lines, with seven miles of tracks and forty-eight cars. A double track was opened to Cottage Grove on August 28. A vigorous attempt to change the name of Clark street to Broadway was made at this time. The West Side lumber district had a $500,000 fire in September. The National Fair held here in September at Cottage Grove was an important event. The exhibits, racing, shooting, military drills, band contests, balloon ascension surpassed naything ever seen in the West. The Press and Tribune of September 18 said: "The fair brought together the largest number of people, mainly out of the six states of the Northwest, that ever gathered at any point in either of those states for any purpose whatever. On Tuesday, the culminating day, there were not less than 60,000 persons on the grounds." The park was owned by Henry Graves, was surrounded with a tight board fence nine feet high, contained thirty-one acres, seated over one thousand persons and had one of the best trotting tracks in the country.

"Kilgubbin" was on the North Side, first along Kinzie street and later at the angle where the North branch joined the South branch. It held at one time over two thousand population and became in 1858 as famous or infamous as "The Sands" had been two or three years before. One hundred families or more (if such they can appropriately be called), of which the members were nearly all law-breakers, had gathered there in all sorts of habitations except respectable, with pigs, geese, goats, rats, etc., and the locality had become the resort and hiding place of numerous criminals; but in 1859 the place was raided and uprooted, the river there was widened, and a valuable basin was built. The name Kilgubbin was afterward (1864-65) applied to a tract of forty or fifty acres, covered with shanties, located on the West Side where Carpenter street touched the river. Another similar section of about twenty acres was on the West Side between Des Plaines and Halsted, near Harrison avenue. A few other smaller sections were similarly built up and occupied—one at Milwaukee avenue and Union; another near North Rucker and Kinzie; another small one between Clark and State, near Twelfth. In those localities it was usual for the inhabitants to have a patois or jargon of their own.

Late in September a double track was laid on Madison from State to the South branch. At this time cars began to run from Clark street along Division to Clybourn. The Kingsbury tract (on the east side of the North branch above Kinzie), which previous to this date had lain mostly covered with water and unimproved, was now being rapidly formed into streets and lots and built upon; it had been part of the estate of Major Kingsbury. The extraordinary activity in the grain market here made it necessary at this date to start a clearing house for grain. On October 17 a total of six street cars were run on Randolph street, thus allowing a car every ten minutes, instead of every twenty minutes as before; this improvement was regarded with great satisfaction by the citizens. About this date George Horsley secured a judgment of $1,000 against the city, and, as the comptroller refused to honor the same, he levied on fire horses and engines. Ten skeletons in rude coffins were exhumed at Doyle's building on South Water street on October 27; they were supposed to be members of General Scott's army who had died of cholera in 1832. Stealing cattle and hurriedly slaughtering them was a common offense at this time. At one of the big slaughter houses there was employed a good-natured Scotchman as foreman. On one occasion when his force was busily engaged in knocking down hogs with a sledge hammer and then sticking them, a visitor who was an interested witness of the proceedings was asked by the accommodating Scotchman, "Wouldn't ye like to knock down a hog or two yerself?"

In November, 1859, when it was proposed to unite the North and South Side street railway systems by a track over the Clark street bridge, a great outcry against such a step arose. The North pier was in very bad condition and liable to be washed away by any severe gale; the Board of Trade asked for an appropriation of $600 to be used in repairing it. Not receiving the appropriation, the board with characteristic liberality and promptness raised $650 for the purpose. The Secretary of the Treasury was petitioned to expend the balance (about $60,000) of the last winter's appropriation for the lighthouse (about $87,000) in rebuilding the north pier. On December 31 it was twenty-two degrees below zero.

The year 1859 was characterized by a severe depression in financial and business circles, and at times by spurts of extraordinary prosperity. A fine school building was erected on Aberdeen street. The postoffice was finished externally. Building improvements cost about $2,044,000. South Clark street was paved with Nicholson blocks and Michigan avenue with gravel. Improvements on the Kingsbury tract cost $125,000. City improvements cost a total of $275,800, as follows: Macadamizing, $45,332; graveling, $82,819; paving, $57,561; Washington park, North Side, $1,187; Lake street bridge, $14,571; Kinzie bridge, $8,860; Halsted bridge, $8,000; dredging, $40,000; sidewalks by city, estimated, $8,000; culverts, crossings, etc., estimated, $5,000; planking streets and alleys, $5,500.

The fire department about this time adopted a decoration of honor consisting of a maltese star with silver rays and shield. The old cemetery (now a part of Lincoln park) embraced about one hundred and twenty acres, of which about sixty acres had been surveyed into lots and mostly sold; not over half of the lots were occupied by burials. It was now proposed to donate the north sixty acres to the city for a public park and to fence in and hold the sixty acres of cemetery.

At this time (1859) the growth and prosperity of Chicago were formally considered by the citizens, who in mass meetings appointed committees on manufactures, commerce, agriculture, drainage, emigration, printing, publishing, currency, finance, etc. Receipts of the city for the fiscal year February 1, 1859, to January 31, 1860, were $1,386,295.19, less $39,145.33 balance on hand at the beginning. The expenditures for the year amounted to $1,286,295.19, less $65,752.21 on hand at the close. The funded debt on January 31, 1859, was $514,000. Attempts to lay double tracks on State street and across Clark street bridge were checked by injunctions. The Board of Trade was now located in the Newhouse block on South Water street. By March, 1860, there were eleven trunk railway lines and twenty branches and extensions, with a total mileage of 4,736, centering in Chicago. The total earnings of all these railroads for 1859 were $14,978,300.29. The total receipts of grain, with flour expressed in wheat, were 20,008,223 bushels; cattle packed, 51,809; hogs packed, 185,000; receipts of lumber, feet, 305,688,233.

In the spring of 1860 the receipts of corn were enormous. George W. Dole died in April, 1860. The following public halls were here at this time: Metropolitan, Bryan, Light Guard, Kingsbury, Wilkowsky, and three in the market buildings. The proposition to build a railroad to the Pacific met the unqualified approval of all Chicago. The ship canal was not lost sight of, but continued to be discussed periodically. In May, 1860, the union station was at last definitely located on the West Side. In May, 1860, the Citizens' Fire Brigade, after two and a half years of existence, resolved that as they had up to date paid their own expenses so far as the city was concerned, and had rendered good services, they would disband on June 1 unless the city should assist them. During the week of the National Republican convention the Press and Tribune claimed a daily circulation of 21,000 copies; the presses were not fast enough, as more copies were demanded. In the spring of 1860 a resolution by Peter Page to build a "hall of records" was again defeated in the Council. He wanted a portion of the land (twenty-eight acres) at the Reform school to be traded for the Armory, where a jail could be built, which change would permit the jail in the courthouse to be transformed into the "hall of records." Wilkowsky hall, 45 by 90 feet, at the corner of Clark and Monroe, was sold in June, 1860, for $30,000. Late in June the crop of hay on the courthouse square was harvested. In June, 1860, Graceland Cemetery company was organized. It was now seen that corporate cemeteries would supplant those of the city. Chicago raised $1,500 for the tornado sufferers in Northern Illinois, Rev. Robert Collyer being the disbursing agent; Lee Center, Amboy, Albany, Comanche, and other towns had been leveled. Late in July, 1860, the Times passed to C. H. McCormick, proprietor of the Herald. On August 6 it was ninety-seven degrees. Upon invitation of the corporate authorities of Montreal, John Wentworth was sent there to represent Chicago at the reception given to Prince Edward. In the Calumet region were the best hunting and fishing grounds near Chicago.

By August 27, 1860, the city had nearly forty-seven miles of sewers, six miles being laid in 1860. The system had cost up to July 1 a total of $748,181.43. It was recognized at the time that the system was only in its infancy and that perhaps the most important step thus far had been raising the grade. It was also admitted that the next most important step was to dig a channel and force the water of Chicago river into Illinois river. The various plans talked of at this time were as follows: 1. To cut down the summit of the Illinois and Michigan canal; 2. To dig a new channel through Mud Lake to the Des Plaines; 3. To dig a steamboat canal 200 feet wide and six feet deep; 4. The same twelve and a half feet deep.

Prince Napoleon, second son of Jerome Bonaparte, was at the Tremont house September 2. Said the Tribune of September 5: "A New Public Park.—A public park of eighty acres in extent is being rapidly formed in the North division. The park will embrace the extreme northern section of the cemetery grounds and is already underbrushed and laid out with roadways." The Mechanics' Institute fair at the Wigwam was a success in September. There were in Chicago at this time fourteen public schools, three universities, six libraries, four asylums, five hospitals, nineteen Masonic lodges, eleven Odd Fellow lodges, two Good Templar lodges, three benevolent societies, two medical colleges, two musical societies, two theological seminaries, four cemeteries, two theaters, one law institute, and fourteen public halls. Graceland cemetery, with seventy acres, two miles north of the city limits, was dedicated on August 30; Thomas B. Bryan was president. Wheat rose 20 cents a bushel in August. An attempt to burn the Rock Island bridge, presumably at the instigation of St. Louis persons, kindled the wrath of Chicago this year; it was supposed to be an attempt to divert the trade beyond the Mississippi from Chicago to St. Louis. On September 1 there were received here 190,396 bushels of wheat, the largest amount ever received up to date in one day; on September 5, 192,394 bushels were received. The loss of the steamer "Lady Elgin" on Friday night, September 7, sixteen miles north of Chicago and twelve miles off Winnetka, caused intense grief and horror here and throughout the country; Spencer and Combs, students of the Garrett Biblical Institute, heroically saved many lives by swimming out and rescuing them in the surf. The steamer was owned by Gurdon S. Hubbard and collided with the schooner "Augusta," laden with lumber. For weeks after the event the shore was patrolled by watches to recover the bodies washed up. Nearly four hundred persons were lost; bodies were found as late as the last of October. Several unidentified bodies were buried at Rosehill.

The Prince of Wales, traveling as Lord Renfrew, arrived here on September 21 and stopped at the Richmond house. He came from Detroit over the Michigan Central and was received by a large crowd at the station. A committee consisting of William B. Ogden, John Wentworth, William Bross and W. McComas, was authorized to welcome him and suite to Chicago and Illinois. He declined a public reception—wanted rest, but showed himself to the public from the balcony of the hotel and rode around the city. A newspaper called the Tribune was started here by Mr. Ryan as early as 1838. Later it was discontinued and in 1847 another Tribune made its appearance. It was united with the Press in the fifties under the name of Press and Tribune and on October 25, 1860, the name Press was dropped and since that date the paper has been issued as the Tribune. Dr. William B. Egan died on October 27, 1860; he had come here in the fall of 1833 and had located on the North Side. He owned the Tremont house corner—paid $500 and $200 in medical attendance for it. He delivered the oration when the ground was broken for the canal. The propeller "Globe" blew up in the river at Wells street in November, killing about fifteen persons.

The new Postoffice and Custom House at Dearborn and Monroe was first occupied on November 20, 1860. During the fall of 1860 the following among other ceremonies were held in the Wigwam: Mechanics' fair, Zouave receptions, a concert, three days festival of the Catholics, tornado relief concert, obsequies of Capt. Jack Wilson of the "Lady Elgin;" Sabbath school concerts, and religious services every Sunday evening. It was noted in 1860 that the street cars were robbing the omnibus lines of their passengers. An excellent skating pond was on Wabash, north of Twelfth. Col. Richard J. Hamilton died here on December 26, at the house of his son-in-law, Murray F. Tuley.

Emigration to the West reached high water mark in 1856, after which it declined until 1860, when it nearly doubled that of 1859, but later fell off, owing to the war. By March, 1861, the total number of miles of railroad centering in Chicago was 4,915; total receipts of grain in 1860, with flour expressed in wheat were 36,504,772, with total shipments expressed in same, 31,256,697 bushels, the largest ever known up to that date; the total receipts of corn were 15,487,966 bushels; hogs packed, 101,816; live hogs shipped, 133,612; hogs received, 275,095; cattle packed, 25,209; live cattle shipped, 104,122. The slaughter houses at Bridgeport were considered a great nuisance in March, 1861; their removal was talked of. Nathan H. Bolles, an old and prominent settler, died at this time. In the warehouses here in March were stored 4,300,000 bushels of grain. In 1861 four suits aggregating $280,000 were begun against the sewerage commissioners—Sylvester Lind, Philip Conley and S. D. Webster, who were that amount short in their accounts.

The act of February 18, 1861, provided that no encroachment should be made upon the land or water west of a line mentioned in the second section of an ordinance concerning the Illinois Central railroad (which line was not less than four hundred feet east from the west line of Michigan avenue and parallel thereto), by any railroad company; that no cars should be permitted to occupy the same; that the City Council should never allow any encroachment west of said line; that any person owning a lot on Michigan avenue should have the right to enjoin any company or persons from violating the above provision; that "neither the Common Council nor any other authority should ever have the power to permit encroachments on said tract without the assent of all persons owning lots or land on said street or avenue, 'because of the fact that the State of Illinois by its canal commissioners had declared that the public ground east of said lots should forever remain open and vacant.'"

The act of February 21, 1861, provided for the organization in Chicago of an executive department of the municipal government to be known as "The Board of Police of the City of Chicago" to consist of three commissioners to be chosen from the three principal divisions of the city and to have control of the police force of the city. It was made their duty to preserve the public peace, to prevent crime, to arrest offenders, to protect the rights of persons and property, to guard the public health, to preserve order, to remove nuisances, to provide a proper police force at every fire, to protect strangers and travelers at stations and landings, and to obey and enforce all ordinances of the Common Council. It was provided that the acts of the police department should be under the control of the board and that there should be a general superintendent of police, three captains, one deputy superintendent, six sergeants and sixty police patrol and as many more of the latter as should be ordered by the Council on the application of the board of police. It was also provided that the city could be divided into police precincts or districts without regard to ward boundaries and could be governed the same as the board should deem best. The board could appoint captains and sergeants to certain precincts and provide precinct stations. The supervisors of Cook County were empowered to raise by tax money sufficient to carry this act into effect. The Board of Police was given all the powers theretofore conferred by law upon the Mayor of Chicago. In March, 1861, Mayor Wentworth, acting under this law, discharged the entire police force and appointed three police commissioners—Tuttle, Wayman and Coventry—under whose reorganization the force was as follows: General superintendent of police salary, $1,500; his deputy, $1,200; three captains, each, $700; six sergeants, each, $650; sixty patrolmen, each, $600.

In 1861 the Legislature passed a joint resolution providing that the board of trustees of the Illinois and Michigan canal should cause a prompt and thorough survey, examination and estimates to be made of the Illinois river, the Illinois and Michigan canal and portions of the Des Plaines and the Chicago rivers, and of the portage between said rivers "for the purpose of accurately ascertaining the comparative value, cost, efficiency, benefits and advantages, direct, prospective and incidental, of the different methods proposed or desirable for improving the navigation of the Illinois river." The Chicago Board of Underwriters was incorporated February 22, 1861, by T. L. Miller, Julius White, H. B. Wilmarth, C. N. Holden, S. T. Atwater, B. W. Phillips, S. C. Higginson and Alfred James. Isaac Cook, postmaster, resigned in March, 1861. The Skating Park company, formerly the South Side Skating Pond company, offered their park at Michigan avenue and Twelfth street to the volunteers for a parade ground in April, 1861. Under the ordinance of April 26, all the indebtedness of Chicago contracted prior to April 1, was liquidated by the issuance of new bonds to the amount of $343,114.74. The total city debt at this time was $588,303.61. The city owed the cemetery fund $6,477.01; the school tax fund $3,472.05; and the Reform School fund, $15,654.05. On April 27, 1861, there were run off on the Tribune double cylinder press 27,000 copies of that paper, the largest edition printed here up to that date. The New Sherman House was opened in the spring of 1861.

On May 26, 1861, the large main pipe, three hundred and thirty feet long, of the Gas Light & Coke company, was laid across the river at Franklin street. About June 1 the Times was sold in part by C. H. McCormick to Wilbur F. Storey of Detroit. Owing to the war, business here in the spring of 1861 was unsettled, erratic and more or less hazardous.

In June, 1861, the city had eight steam fire engines as follows: South Side—"Long John," with eleven men and four horses at La Salle, near Washington; "Enterprise," ten men and five horses, State, near Congress; "Little Giant," nine men and two horses, Dearborn, near Washington; "Economy," eight men and two horses on Old street. North Side—"Atlantic," ten men and four horses, Michigan, near Wolcott; "Liberty," nine men and two horses, Illinois, near Franklin. West Side—"Island Queen," ten men and four horses, Lake, near Jefferson; "U. P. Harris," ten men and four horses, Jackson, corner Clinton. Attached to each engine was a hose cart, drawn by a single horse. In addition there were five independent hose carts and four hand engines. U. P. Harris was Chief of the Fire Department.

It was at this time (June, 1861), that the city lost heavily during the financial crisis and crash of the banks—a total of $295,733 in the Marine, Carver's and Tinkham's; also Sylvester Lind, the sewerage treasurer, was short a large amount. Thus the city at this date faced such loss, with a large debt already on its hands, and with the war expenses looming up in the foreground like a pirate ship. A period of intense heat characterized the summer of 1861. The mercury stood as follows: July 30, at ninety-three degrees; 31st., ninety-four; August 1, ninety-four; 2d., ninety-six; 3d., eighty; 4th, ninety-nine; 5th, eighty; 6th, eighty-nine; 7th, ninety-seven; 8th, ninety-five. The State fair at Brighton (stock-yards), was an important event in September, 1861. During 1860 and 1861 Chicago and Cook county made a strong effort to secure the proposed agricultural college. It was proposed to locate it at Cottage hill on the Galena railroad, fifteen miles from the city. By October 1, 1861, about $17,000 had been subscribed here on the fund with which to buy the land. Prof. J. H. McChesney and Thomas B. Bryan worked for the location there.

"The city apparently was never more busy than at the present time. The streets are crowded with an endless caravan of buses, wagons and drays laden with merchandise of every description. The constant arrival and departure of trains heavily freighted, the cartage of such vast quantities of goods, the hotels swarming with guests, the rapid and daily increasing influx of strangers, the arrival and departure of regiments for the war, and the walks crowded with hurrying pedestrians, impart a genuine metropolitan and business air to the city, which it has not worn since the palmy days of 1856."—(Tribune, October 15, 1861.)

rapid progress. The Board of Trade corrected grievous wrongs in the inspection of grain. The State Horticultural Convention met at Bryan hall December 3. In December, 1861, the Tribune began to issue three editions daily. In 1860 building operations amounted to $1,188,300; in 1861 they amounted to $797,800. On January 7, 1862, the city paid the following interest: On water bonds, $34,855; on sewerage bonds, $29,700; on municipal bonds, $29,142.88. It also paid off bonds issued in 1852 to the amount of $25,000. The capital invested in manufactories in 1861 was $6,537,000 and the output of products that year was worth $16,948,381. In a terrible railroad accident at Hyde Park Judge W. A. Barron of this city was decapitated. A Board of Trade committee divided on the subject of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain in February, 1862. The first golden wedding in Chicago was that of D. B. Heartt and wife on February 13, 1862, at 122 Buffalo street; they came to Chicago in 1836. In February, 1862, an examination of city water disclosed that it was very impure. In March, 1862, the paid firemen numbered ninety-three and the volunteer firemen two hundred and ten. The Mercantile Association in March, 1862, passed a resolution endorsing the Illinois and Michigan ship canal bill then before Congress and recommended its passage. There was great complaint about the stench of the river in the spring of 1862. The contractors who in 1860 had put new cells in the courthouse jail were not paid until March, 1862; they complained at the injustice of the delay. The Tribune for some years had made fun of "Wentworth and his Wines." In December, 1861, small fish choked the screen at the pumping well, whereupon the screen was removed, letting the fish be drawn into the water mains, where they died, polluting all the water of the city. An actual experiment in March, 1861, had shown that the pumps at Bridgeport could cleanse the river of sewage, but not of slaughter-house refuse and the stench. The first annual report of the Board of Public Works was made in May, 1862. The following departments had been in operation one year: Water, Sewerage, Parks, Streets, River and Harbor, Public Buildings, Bridges, Lamps and Lights, and Public Improvements. The muddy streets in March, 1862, were in places almost impassable. The following wheat grades were established in March: Extra club, Northwest club, No. 1 Spring, No. 2 Spring, Rejected Spring.

In March, 1862, the impurity in the hydrant water was largely ascribed to the slaughter houses on the two branches, therefore the special committee of the Council reported that the following steps should be taken: 1. In order to obtain pure water the intake should be farther from the mouth of the river and the wash of the shore—built out at least one mile, at a cost of from $60,000 to $125,000; 2. A brick tunnel six feet in diameter, costing about $125,000 should be dug; 3. The pumping works should be removed to Winnetka, sixteen miles northward, and would cost $1,689,600; 4. Filter beds, costing $107,500 should be used; 5. There should be built a subsiding reservoir, costing $107,775. The water of the lake for several miles out was thoroughly examined at this time.

In April, 1862, George Schneider retired from the Staats Zeitung, with which he had been associated as editor and proprietor since 1851. The vote for mayor in 1861 was 8,274 for Rumsey (Rep.) and 6,601 for Bryan (Dem.). In 1862 the vote for the same office stood 7,434 for Sherman (Dem.) and 6,246 for Holden (Rep.). In 1861 only the Fourth and Tenth wards went democratic, but in 1862 the First, Third, Fourth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth and Tenth polled majorities for that party. In May, 1862, the city was so short of buildings of all kinds that the newspapers called for five hundred more. In May many druggists were fined for selling liquor without a license. The river was such a nuisance at this time that the pumps at Bridgeport were set going to empty the foul water into the canal.

*"Glorious News from Bridgeport.—The River Filth Going to the Rebels.—We learn that the pumping works at Bridgeport were started yesterday to pump out the river. All those who are desirous of taking a parting sniff of the Chicago river perfume, would do well to visit Bridgeport today, as at the present rate of progress, all the filth in the river will in a few days be on its way to the rebels. If the latter can stand it, it will be of no use to bombard them any longer."—(Tribune, May 30, 1862.)* The pumps there could raise 56,000 cubic feet of water per minute eight feet high.

In the spring of 1862 the grain warehousemen roused the wrath of the grain merchants by inserting in the warehouse receipts a clause branding sound grain as a mixture; a war settled the controversy. Teamsters hauling stone with which to macadamize North Wells street struck and demanded twenty shillings instead of seventeen shillings per day. City officials of Baltimore and Pittsburgh were formally received by the Council and Board of Trade in June, 1862. Despite the war great improvement in the city was made in 1862. The Chicago river continued to be the receptacle of every variety of filth and a "Smelling Committee" was sent up both branches in August, 1862, to trace the rotten sources to their owners. As soon as their report was received the Council ordered the nuisances abated. In August J. Y. Scammon, of the old Marine bank, in which the city had had a large deposit, agreed to pay by installments $56,387.24 to settle the account. On September 2, the Pacific railroad convention convened here with seventy-three commissioners appointed by act of Congress in attendance. William B. Ogden presided. The resolutions adopted described how the project should be carried into effect. Also in September the World's Horse fair held here, near Camp Douglas, attracted great attention.

Also the State Horticultural fair assembled in September. Already the city was famous for its conventions. In September, so great had become the rush for the street cars during the evenings, that arrangements to run them every eight minutes were made. In October a coal famine forced the price of that article up from $5 to $7 per ton.

"Few cities probably in the North have been affected by the war to so little extent as Chicago. Except the continual appearance of soldiers in our streets and the war bulletins there are no indications that a fierce strife is being waged upon our borders. The tide of business flows on unabated. Our streets are fairly choked up with the transportation of merchandise; our stores are thronged from morning till night with customers in the face of panic prices. Amusements are patronized to an unprecedented extent and the present season will be as brilliant and successful as any of its predecessors. The fashions are as dominant as ever and the promenades are already blooming with the fall habit. Parties, balls, and routs are opening with a rush."—(Tribune, October 7, 1862.)

In October, 1862, a branch postoffice was established on the northwest corner of Randolph and Halsted streets, with A. C. Stewart in charge. James W. Sheahan edited the Post at this time. By November 1 the special committee appointed for the purpose had almost wholly abated the distillery and slaughter-house nuisances on the North Branch and were hard at work accomplishing the same good on the South branch. The South Chicago of this date was Bridgeport. For a long time there had been an urgent demand for a bridge at State street. In November private subscriptions raised $10,000 for such a bridge. The new courthouse bell, weighing 11,476 pounds arrived in December. The newspapers urged that it be put up as quickly as practicable, as it was needed by the fire watchmen and to keep time for all. On December 10, 1862, Comptroller Hayes sold to C. C. Parks, banker, at Dearborn and Lake streets, to be paid for in gold, $75,000 par value of the city bonds bearing 7 per cent interest for 9 per cent premium and interest. As gold at this date was at 30 per cent premium, the sale was not as good as seemed at first glance.

The city indebtedness on December 12, 1862, was as follows: Municipal, 10 per cent bonds, $2,000; 7 per cent bonds, $973,500; 6 per cent bonds, $300,000; 7 per cent school bonds, $28,000; sewerage, 6 per cent bonds, $87,500; 7 per cent bonds, $875,000; water, 6 per cent bonds, $1,030,000; 7 per cent bonds, $113,000; grand total, $2,409,000. The assessed valuation of property at this time was—realty, $31,587,545; personalty, $5,552,300. The total city tax for general purposes was $564,038. The levy was as follows: City, 3½ mills; school, 2 mills; interest, 2¼ mills; sewerage, 2½ mills; war, 1½ mills; reform school, 1 mill; police, 1½ mills; total, 14¼ mills. In the lamp district there was an additional lamp levy of 2 mills.

In December, 1862, an astronomical observatory was definitely located here. For some unaccountable reason there was a great deal of sickness in December, 1862—whether justly or not, the inhabitants ascribed it to the city water. A special committee was appointed to ascertain if Calumet river water could be used to flush the South branch. The big bell on the courthouse was rung for the first time at noon on December 31. When the proposition to run "horse cars" through the streets was first proposed in 1858 it encountered emphatic and determined opposition not only from the Council but from the inhabitants. Messrs. Gage, Parmelee, Fuller, Bigelow and Carver were compelled to make a protracted and strenuous fight to obtain permission to use the streets at all, much more to use them without restriction. The Tribune in January, 1863, said, "Three years have now elapsed since that venture was made and the result arrived at has been more than satisfactory not only to the stockholders but to the citizens. When the question is asked, What should we do with the street cars? the universal reply is, What indeed?" At this date the Chicago City Railway company employed about two hundred men, of whom about one hundred were conductors and drivers and the rest helpers. Thirty cars were run—as follows: Eight on Randolph, seven on Madison and fifteen on State. There were six extra cars for emergencies. The pay roll was about $5,000 per month, and the street expense about $1,000 per month. The total receipts from the three lines run had been as follows: In 1860, $124,625; 1861, 136,079; 1862, $141,783. William H. Waite was president of the company. This was the street car system of January, 1863.

The Board of Trade and the Mercantile Association, in February, 1863, reported on the practicability and importance of a ship canal to unite Lake Michigan and the Illinois river. The spring of 1863 saw the macadamizing of Milwaukee avenue from Ellston road to the old city limits. The old Richmond House on South Water street, at which the Prince of Wales had stopped in 1860, had so run down that it was sold under a mortgage in March, 1863. The big refractor telescope for the observatory connected with Chicago University at Cottage Grove, was being made at Cambridge, Massachusetts, by Alvan Clark & Sons. In March, 1863, the Council was deadlocked between Democrats and Republicans—no quorum could be obtained. In March the City Railway company was ordered to keep its tracks on the South Side cleaner and in better repair. In April, 1863, seventy vessels were counted at one time outside of the harbor.

The second annual report of the Board of Public Works made on May 1, 1863, gave the following statistics: Length of distributing water main, 98 miles and 2,643 feet; all pipes, 10+ miles and 4,890 feet; cost of the Water works, \$1,118,494.09, of which all except \$67,700 had been paid with 6 and 7 per cent bonds. There were received in water rents from January 1, 1862, to March 31, 1863, \$188,448 and in profit tapping pipes, \$847. The total expense for repairs during the same period was \$122,615. It was estimated that a tunnel two miles out in the lake would cost \$307,552. Three miles of sewers were built in 1862; in May, 1863, the total length of sewers was $57\frac{3}{4}$ miles. Two pivot bridges were built in 1862—one at Wells street, costing \$6,000, and one at Clybourn avenue, costing \$2,000, one-half of which was borne by the city. The Board recommended that the park (Lincoln) at the north of the cemetery, about fifty acres, should be improved. From November 30, 1855, to March 31, 1863, the Reform school had received 711 inmates. At the latter date it contained 250 inmates and was in good condition. Fifty-six men who had been inmates were in the Union army. The school was divided into three divisions, depending on educational and other attainments. J. F. Curtis was instructor.

In 1863 the citizens complained that the city did not have one good driveway where speeding could be indulged in. The Rosehill and Evanston Plank road was the best, but it was too far from the city. North Clark street was very bad; Wells fair, Michigan avenue good as far as Twelfth, South State and South Clark were poor. On the West Side was not one good street of considerable length. "Never before have our merchants, our manufacturers and our produce dealers done so large and profitable a business as they have during the past year. We are not only the largest grain market, but by far the largest primary market on this continent. We have the satisfaction of knowing that we have done much to furnish men and means to crush out the rebellion. The noble and patriotic move of the Board of Trade to raise and equip men for the service and means to support the families of those who went to fight the battles of their country, has given our city a notoriety and a name of which we all may feel proud."—(Tribune, April 7, 1863).

The act of February 13, 1863, reduced the various acts relative to the City of Chicago to one act. The corporate limits were declared to "embrace and include within the same all of Township 39 north, Range 14 east, and all of Sections 31, 32, 33 and fractional Section 34, Township 40 north, Range 14 east, together with so much of the waters and bed of Lake Michigan as lies within one mile of the shore thereof and east of the territory aforesaid." It was declared that the North division consisted of all north of the center of Chicago river, and east of the center of the North branch of Chicago river; that the South division consisted of all south of the center of the main Chicago river, and south and east of the center of the South branch and of the Illinois and Michigan Canal; and that the West division should consist of all lying east of the center of the North and South branches and of the Illinois and Michigan canal. It was further provided that the city should be divided into sixteen wards as follows:

First Ward.—All that part of the South division which lies south of the center of the main Chicago river and north of the center of Monroe street.

Second Ward.—All that part of the South division which lies south of the center of Monroe and north of the center of Harrison street.

Third Ward.—All that part of the South division which lies south of the center of Harrison street and north of the center of Sixteenth street.

Fourth Ward.—All that part of the South division which lies south of the center of Sixteenth street and east of the center of Clark street and a line corresponding with the center of the last named street, projected southerly to the city limits.

Fifth Ward.—All that part south of the center of Sixteenth street and west of the center of Clark street and a line corresponding to the center of the last named street projected southerly to the city limits.

Sixth Ward.—All that part of the west division which lies south of the center of Van Buren street and east of the center of Jefferson street continued to the south Branch of the Chicago river.

Seventh Ward.—All that part of the West division which lies south of the center of Van Buren street, west of the center of Jefferson street continued to the South branch and east of the center of Morgan street continued to the South Branch.

Eighth Ward.—All that part of the West division which lies south of the center of Van Buren street and west of the center of Morgan street continued to the South branch.

Ninth Ward.—All that part of the West division which lies south of the center of Fourth street and north of the center of Van Buren street.

Tenth Ward.—All that part of the West division which lies south of the center of Randolph street, east of the center of Curtis street and Aberdeen street and north of the center of Van Buren street.

Eleventh Ward.—All that part of the West division which lies south of the center of Fourth street, east of the center of Curtis street and north of the center of Randolph street.

Twelfth Ward.—All that part of the West division which lies north of the center of Fourth street continued to the North branch.

Thirteenth Ward.—All that part of the North division which lies north of the center of North avenue.

Fourteenth Ward.—All that part of the North division which lies south of the center of Division street.

Fifteenth Ward.—All that part of North division which lies south of the center of Division street and north of the center of Huron street continued to Lake Michigan to the North branch of the Chicago river.

Sixteenth Ward.—All that part of the North division which lies south of the center of Huron street continued to Lake Michigan and to the North branch of the Chicago river and north of the center of the main Chicago river.

It was provided that the municipal government should consist of a Common Council composed of the mayor and two aldermen from each ward and that the other officers should be a clerk, comptroller, board of public works, city engineer, board of police, superintendent of police, school agent, board of education, superintendent of schools, board of guardians of the reform school, commissioner of the reform school, counsel to the corporation, city attorney, treasurer, collector, city physician, board of assessors, two or more police justices, clerk of police court, one chief engineer and two assistants of the fire department, one or more harbor masters, one inspector of fish, three inspectors of elections for each ward or election precinct, and others to be decided on and appointed by the Common Council.

It was further provided that municipal elections should be held on the third Tuesday of April in each year; that the Common Council should divide the wards into election districts; that the mayor, city attorney, treasurer, collector, clerk of the police court and chief engineer and first and second assistants of the fire department should be elected by the people; that these officers should hold their offices for two years; that the boards of police and public works should each consist of three commissioners, one from each of the three divisions; that the board of education should consist of fifteen school inspectors, to be elected by the Common Council. Very full powers to manage the affairs of the city were given the Common Council.

Probably the most important event of 1863 was the canal convention in June. The object was to plan, herald and support the construction of a ship canal from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan, with the still further object of continuing the canal eastward to the Atlantic. For weeks Chicago prepared for this convention. There was an immense attendance, one of the largest ever gathered in the city. A large tent seating six thousand was erected on the lake front, between Harmon and Eldridge courts. Here prominent men from nearly all the States met to deliberate. Mayor Chauncey Fillely of St. Louis was temporary chairman, and Hannibal Hamlin, Vice President of the United States, permanent chairman. The address of welcome was delivered by Dr. Daniel Brainard. The convention passed resolutions that such a canal large enough to admit the passage of gunboats should be built as a war measure if for no other purpose. The importance of this convention to Chicago and the West has ever since been compared to that of the River and Harbor convention of 1848. There was collected from all sources to pay the expenses of the convention $8,671, but only $6,171 was expended on the convention itself. Out of the amount there was paid to the Soldiers' Home $420, leaving on hand $2,080.

The canal convention had scarcely dispersed before the manufacturers convention assembled to consider subjects of interest to that branch of industry. The national Christian Convention also met here in June. The surreptitious and corrupt passage through the Legislature in June, 1863, of a bill to construct a "horse railway" on Wabash avenue and other streets, whereby the rights of the city and the citizens were not adequately considered and protected, kindled the indignation of all Chicago. The Council promptly passed resolutions denouncing the bill as a swindle and requesting the Governor to kill the same with his veto. The Legislature was asked to reconsider the bill and to pass no act unless consented to by the Chicago Council and the property owners along the right of way. The Tribune of June 10 said: "No bill ever passed an Illinois Legislature more corruptly, and none contains so open and defiant a contempt of the city government and of the people of Chicago. It was stolen through the Senate and bribed through the House."

The whole current of talk in the city yesterday turned on the enormous gridiron swindle attempted by the hungry Chicago lawyers who are engineering the Wabash Horse Railroad project. All classes of citizens execrate the scheme as monstrous."

In June, 1863, the first steps to build a water tunnel under the lake were taken by the Board of Public Works. The tunnel was to be five feet in diameter. The bed of the lake out two miles had been fully examined before these steps were taken. Dull & Gowan of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, secured the contract to dig the tunnel at $315,139. In July, 1863, Dearborn street, between Madison and Monroe, was again ordered opened and widened. The directory of July, 1863, gave the following statistics:

INDUSTRIES.	1857.	1863.
Agricultural implement manufacturers.....	2	7
Breweries	19	29
Distilleries	7	16
Grain elevators	7	18
Packing houses	13	52
Iron foundries.....	8	15
Machine shops	17	31
Tanneries	4	16
Carriage builders	19	26
Wagon makers.....	24	43
Hotels	77	94

The eighteen grain elevators of 1863 had a storage capacity of 8,615,000 bushels; the shipping capacity per day was 2,555,000 bushels. There were 47 miles and 4,520 feet of gas pipe; 1,310 public lamp posts; 4,467 private consumers; amount of water pumped in 1862, 2,217,279,739 gallons. There were sixty miles of sewers with 1,264 catchbasins.

In July twenty-four squatters were dispossessed on the south ninety feet of Lot 4, Block 6, Old Town, by the verdict of a jury; Ebenezer Andrews, Joseph E. Otis and Hiram Wheeler owned the land, which was on the North Side, near the mouth of the North branch. This settlement was a revival of old Kilgubbin. Notwithstanding the order of court, a dozen or so of Irish families would not vacate and accordingly a squad of police pulled their shanties down over their heads. Early in the spring of 1863 negotiations for the sale of the West Side street railway were begun and the sale was finally effected late in July. The property sold for $300,000 and consisted of the tracks on Madison and Randolph streets—about ten miles, including switches, 170 horses and mules with harness, 20 cars, snow plows, wagons, etc., and the privilege to run on State street, over to Lake street. The transfer was to take effect on August 1 and $200,000 of the amount was paid in cash. Among the purchasers were J. Russell Jones, John C. Haines, E. B. Washburn, N. Corwith, Benjamin Campbell and W. H. Covington. In September, 1863, Comptroller Hayes sold $100,000 sewerage bonds to C. C. Parks & Company, bankers, for $1.11 on the dollar par value.

Previous to 1863 Chicago had no public adornment—no parks, drives, statuary, etc. The open places called parks were really cow pastures and the best drives were rotten plank roads. Even Dearborn Park on the city front was characterized by tin cans, dead animals, cast off shoes and clothing, a few shriveled trees and not a flower. Union Park, on the West Side, was the pasture ground for horses and cattle, the broken-down fences, dead and stunted trees and rubbish, rendering it anything but inviting. Washington Park in North Clark street was the dumping ground for almost everything. The courthouse square was "a standing disgrace to the city." Refuse, ashes, old hats, dead cats and filth could be seen there. Cows and horses were allowed to crop the grass growing among the small trees trying to make a living there. There was plenty of land for parks—why not? asked the Tribune of September 25. An equestrian fair was held here in October on the grounds of the Washington Skating Park. Notwithstanding the war, the building operations of 1863 were enormous. The West Division Railway company announced that after October 17 cars would run on Randolph street, between Wood and State, every six minutes, from 6:58 to 7:58 A. M.; 11:30 to 2 P. M. and 4:18 to 7:54 P. M. daily.

Late in October no vessel drawing eleven feet could get out of the harbor. On October 23 street car tracks began to be laid on Halsted, between Madison and Blue Island avenue, leading to Bridgeport. Omnibus lines still ran where the street cars did not. At this time it was planned soon to extend the tracks to Milwaukee avenue. On November 3, 1863, Rush street bridge broke in the middle and went down with a herd of cattle and a few persons; this was regarded as a singular occurrence. An injunction was granted, to stop the laying of tracks on Halsted street, but the street car company by working all Sunday completed the line from Madison to Twelfth. Street laborers were Irish and German, instead of Italian as now. Late in 1863, with Rush street bridge ruined and Clark street bridge often blockaded, there arose a great cry for a bridge at State street. By December 5 the citizens had subscribed $14,000 toward such a bridge. The city added as much more, and the bridge was commenced.

The Douglas tract at Cottage Grove embraced about six blocks, besides the three divisions of Oakenwald adjacent. Cottage Grove avenue ran through the middle of the tract. On the east of the tract was the lake, on the west Douglas avenue, on the north Cook street and on the south Douglas place. Near the center were five acres dedicated to Chicago University. In 1863 the tract sold for less than the mortgage on it—bringing $1,386 per acre.

At the close of navigation in 1863 the canal was emptied into Chicago river, the filth was swept into the lake, the wind carried it to the city water intake, and the hydrants told the story of contamination and impurity. However, it was noted that two miles out where the crib was to be the water was good. In December the West Division Railway company began to lay tracks on Milwaukee avenue, designing to extend the line to the city limits as soon as practicable. On December 24 cars were running on Halsted street and Blue Island avenue, and three-fourths of a mile of track had been laid on Milwaukee avenue. The street car companies tried mules, but finding them unsatisfactory returned to the use of horses. In 1863 the area of Chicago was twenty-four square miles—Bridgeport and Holstein had been added. The amount of business done by the street car companies in 1863 was $340,500. Originally two companies controlled the street car lines—one on the North side and one on the South and West sides; but during 1863 a new company, as before stated herein, bought the West Division lines; so that at the close of 1863 three separate companies owned the lines of the three divisions. The State street line was considered the most important and ran as far as Camp Douglas. The Randolph line was next most important, with its Milwaukee avenue branch. The Halsted line was a branch of the Madison line and the Blue Island line was a branch of the Halsted line. These branches had reached the Burlington and Quincy tracks. The North Side line was doing a big business and was to be extended at once to Lakeview and Grace-land cemetery.

A blizzard of unusual severity swept over Cook county from December 30, 1863, to January 2, 1864. On January 1 the mercury reached eighteen degrees below zero in the morning and twenty-five degrees below at night. The snow was so deep that all street cars stopped running. Sixteen thousand tons of hay were handled here in 1863. In January, 1864, the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad company bought a tract of eighty acres just south of the city limits and began to fit the same up for cattle yards. In January, 1864, the Board of Trade had a membership of about 1,500 and demanded larger quarters. It was proposed to lease Metropolitan hall of Mr. Munger and enlarge it. In February West Market hall was sold to Henry Fuller for $2,500. The Chicago and Evanston Street Railway was definitely projected in February, 1864—to run past Calvary and Graceland cemeteries; fare five cents. In February the Council granted the street railway company the right to lay its tracks across State street bridge when ready. Late in the fall of 1863 the street car line was graded along the Lake View road from Doctor Dyer's to Graceland Cemetery—a distance of about two and a half miles and the track was laid in the spring of 1864. It was planned to pull the cars in trains with dummy steam engines, brought from Philadelphia. A new and better Randolph street bridge was built in 1864.

In March, 1864, the railway employes struck for higher wages and better conditions, but failed to secure all they sought. On March 17, 1864, ground was formally broken by the Mayor for the lake tunnel. For the fiscal year ending April 1, 1863, there were on hand, strange to record, the following unexpended balances: Water fund, $23,237; sewerage fund, $109,904; school fund, $11,002; reform school, $12,430; interest, $38,566; war fund, $68,276; police fund, $23,532; general fund, $50,791. All of these balances disappeared during the next year—1863-64. The levy had been a little too high. The journeymen tailors, trunkmakers, bakers, tinsmiths, confectioners, gas fitters, harnessmakers, bricklayers, shoemakers, printers, masons, carpenters, coopers, hatters, iron moulders and nearly every other trade organization struck for higher wages in March and April, 1864. The war had caused everything but their wages to advance in price; they now demanded their rights, which employers failed to see. The Tribune of April 4 said, "Strikes among workmen are of daily, almost hourly occurrence." A new workingmen's hall on Blue Island avenue cost $16,000. A general mass meeting of all the trades of the city assembled at Bryan hall on April 26, with George K. Hazlitt as chairman. Ex-Gov. E. W. McComas, the principal speaker, dwelt upon the dignity of labor and the necessity of organization. Steps for permanent organization of the city unions were taken. It was shown that employers were combining against employes. In April, 1864, the name of the Board of Trade was changed to Chamber of Commerce. The second Board of Trade met in the Tremont House, also in the Sherman House.

In April, 1864, the "detective corps" was broken up and reorganized by the Board of Police Commissioners. The great and rapid advance in all prices alarmed everybody. In May, 1864, there was hardly a good bridge on the river—the Clark street bridge was out of repair, the Randolph bridge broke down May 10, the Polk bridge also broke in two about this time and the Rush bridge was often unmanageable. "Rush Street Bridge on the Rampage.—During the severe gale on Sunday evening Rush street bridge became for some moments perfectly unmanageable and propelled by the wind it spun round on its axis with great velocity. Many ladies were on board at the time and were considerably alarmed at the violent action of the machine. Even the bridge tenders showed for the nonce an unusual desire to get their charge landed on terra firma."—(Tribune, September 17, 1864).

For several years the Firemen's Benevolent association had been in existence and had done good work. Street cars reached Lake View about the middle of May, 1864. The cars ran a little over an hour apart. Lake Geneva began to be a summer resort for wealthy Chicagoans. In May, 1864, right to lay a street car track temporarily on Clinton street, between Madison and Randolph, was granted, but was made permanent upon petition of the property owners there. According to the Tribune of July 16 no improvement worthy of the name had ever been made to the twenty acres of Union Park. "Its neglected condition, useless walks, yawning holes, dead trees and toppling fence are disgraceful." The truth was that excellent resorts in the country near by were so numerous and so easily reached that the need of parks had not yet been felt beyond the bearable point. About this time No. 14 State street sold for $24,000 and No. 136 Clark street for $26,000. Nos. 155-159 West Madison street sold for $7,000. The new State street bridge was planned to cost about $35,000; it was to be ready in October, 1864. The Crosby Opera House, a famous structure in its time, was being erected in 1864; also a new music hall at Clark and Washington by Smith & Nixon.

A tunnel under the river, which subject was fully considered in 1855-7, was again brought to the attention of the inhabitants in July, 1864. The Board of Public Works, whose chairman was Mr. Gindele, reported on a La Salle street tunnel to be fourteen feet high and twenty-eight feet wide. In 1864 as in 1863 the distilleries and packing-houses on the river branches were forced to abate their nuisances. In the fall of 1864 the Government advertised to sell the Marine hospital at auction; it should never have been built, but the great cry raised at the time by Chicago caused the Congress to yield. On September 5 it was sold to James F. Joy for $132,000. For two successive days—July 29 and 30—the mercury reached one hundred degrees. On July 30 nearly all men here interested in the packing industry met at the Board of Trade rooms "to take into consideration matters pertaining to their mutual interests and particularly the matter of a Union Stock Yards." There were speeches and communications showing the necessity of such a step. The condition of Chicago harbor was so bad that a plan to extend the existing piers four hundred feet farther into the lake was considered in August. By August 13 the lake tunnel had advanced about three hundred and ten feet from the shore shaft. In August the Tribune put in use an eight-cylinder Hoe press. An effort of the South Side Railway company to lay its tracks on Indiana avenue and on Clark, between Polk and Twelfth, encountered strong opposition from property owners there.

By September 8 the lake tunnel had advanced four hundred and sixty-four feet from the shore shaft. In 1852 New York put in a fire alarm and police telegraph; Philadelphia did the same in 1856. Now, in 1864, Chicago was doing the same. By September 8 about thirty miles of this wire had been laid here—all on the South side, in three circuits and fifty-two signal boxes. Wires were to be laid at once on the North and West divisions.

The mortality of Chicago for a series of years was as follows, which table should be compared with that giving the population:

Years.	Deaths.	Years.	Deaths.
1853.....	1,206	1859.....	1,826
1854.....	3,829	1860.....	2,056
1855.....	1,970	1861.....	2,069
1856.....	1,895	1862.....	2,575
1857.....	2,170	1863.....	3,475
1858.....	2,043	1864.....	4,032

By January, 1865, about 125 miles of wires had been laid—45 miles in the South division, fifty in the west, and thirty in the north. "The crowds now drawn to the scene of a fire by the sound of the courthouse bell will be wanting; the alarm will be silent to all save those who are wanted to assist. It will also be invaluable as a police telegraph, by which information of losses, robberies, disturbances, etc., can be instantly transmitted to and from the central station. The laying of the corner stone of the New Chamber of Commerce building at La Salle and Washington streets on September 11 was attended with due ceremony. The employment of women compositors in the Times office encountered the indignant remonstrance of the men compositors; in fact indignation meetings were held but to no purpose. A firemen's monument designed by Volk and costing $10,000 was erected in Rosehill cemetery in September by the Firemen's Benevolent Association. By October 3, the State street car line ran as far as Raber's block on Archer road. A double track on Clinton from Randolph to Van Buren was being laid; from it one branch ran to Jefferson and thence up Jefferson to Twelfth; also one from Clinton on Twelfth to the junction with the other branch. A horse barn for the street railway company was built at Clinton and Van Buren. Fox & Howard, on their contract for dredging the harbor, secured a judgment against the city for a balance of $15,000 and costs. Early in October a mile of street car track was opened on Larrabee street. Center street was soon to have a double track. At this date there were in operation on the North Side twelve miles of track.

By October 13 the crib of the water works was nearly completed. A new pest house 24 by 48 feet, two stories, twenty-four rooms, and costing about $12,000, was ordered in October. Late in September a dummy engine began to run between Camp Fry and Graceland cemetery. On October 21 the City Council in a train of three cars drawn by a dummy engine rode to Camp Fry, thence to Graceland, where all were dined at the residence of S. H. Kerfoot. Though the dummy was reported to be a success, its use was soon discontinued. On October 30 the Council formally named the lake front "Lake park." By November 17 over 1,000 feet of lake tunnel had been excavated. Ambrose & Jackson's famous restaurant stood on Clark opposite the courthouse; it was probably the best here at this time. A big jail delivery was thwarted in November. In November negotiations to transfer to the Fort Wayne Railroad company that part of West Adams street between the river and Canal street were under way. In November a London fog of thirty hours' duration settled down upon Chicago.

During the winter of 1864-65 Randolph street cars left the Garrett block on the stroke of each hour and every ten minutes thereafter for the city limits, each car consuming thirty-two minutes on the trip. Intermediate cars ran half as far as the others. This arrangement provided a car every five minutes.

Before the Civil war a small cemetery on Eighteenth street was used for a few years, but later the bodies were removed. A small graveyard on Chicago avenue was used for about ten years and was then vacated before the advance of residences. It was supposed that all bodies were removed to the city cemetery, but such was not the case, because on December 3, 1864, while workmen were excavating a sewer on Chicago avenue near Wolcott ten additional coffins were exhumed; they were reburied in the city cemetery. Washington, Central and Ogden skating parks were open in December. At this time the artesian well on the West Side was sunk; water was struck at a depth of a little over seven hundred feet. The water rose a few feet above the surface, contained a little sulphur, was about sixty-five degrees temperature, and flowed several hundred gallons per minute. It was sunk by the Chicago Oil company, the hope being that oil would be struck. It is yet flowing at Chicago and Western avenues. This was the period of greatest oil excitement.

The year 1864, despite the drain of the war, was one of almost unexampled prosperity to this city. Among the important buildings erected were Chamber of Commerce, Crosby's opera house, Chicago University, the observatory tower, Smith & Nixon's Music hall at Clark and Washington, Lombard block in Monroe, Custom-house block, and the blocks of Cobb, Magie, Gellatry & Dimmick, Wicker, Miller, Hempstead & Armour, Fullerton, Justice at Clark and Randolph, Andrews, Otis & Engle's Adair Allen & Parker, Honore & Waites, Tyler's bank, Reed's bank, etc. Metropolitan hall had been raised to grade and improved at a cost of $40,000. Four of the buildings of 1864 were worth over $100,000 each. In the spring of 1864 property owners waked up one morning (this is almost literally true) and found that their lots had doubled in value over night. Inside improved rental property had about doubled in value since the preceding summer. Among the other improvements of 1864 were the following: Four and a half miles of sewers were laid; Lake street from the river to Halsted was paved with Nicholson blocks; the old West Side brick two-story market was removed; nearly thirteen miles of water pipe were laid; the lake tunnel was completed a quarter of a mile; the crib two miles out was ready to be sunk; the 400 additional feet to the North pier were well advanced; there was dredged from the Chicago river mouth 53,413 cubic yards of sand; the State street bridge was finished and was continued over the railway tracks on the North Side; the new bridge at Randolph street was well advanced, and so was the fire alarm telegraph system. The contract for the latter was let to John F. Kennard & Company of Boston. There were established thirty-five districts of postal distribution, all city mail being delivered by carriers.

A stock exchange was established in January, 1865, with J. C. Hilton as president, and a membership fee of $1. A proposed new city charter was discussed at this time. The following were the largest private incomes here December 31, 1863: Potter Palmer, $333,485; J. V. Farwell, $197,152; P. Schuttler, $103,731; William B. Ogden, $87,509; C. H. McCormick, $67,449; W. Munger, $59,473; A. E. Kent, $47,050; W. L. Newberry, $34,558, etc. The Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago company agreed to pay $100,000 for Adams street from the river to Canal street, but the city reserved the right to tunnel the river there and to build a bridge there under certain conditions. In January, 1865, the Potter Palmer estate, the largest in the Northwest, united with other interests and became the Field, Palmer & Leiter company. Field & Leiter had begun business here in 1856, but not as a firm. After several changes they united with Palmer as above. The opening of the Clinton bridge over the Mississippi in January, 1865, was an event of importance to Chicago commercial circles. The inauguration of the Railway Postal System in 1864 was also of great importance to this city.

The charters of the three street railway companies permitted them to use the streets for twenty-five years, of which, by January, 1865, about six had expired. These roads now asked to have the time limit extended to ninety-nine years. It was a plan to make a good thing better. Almost everybody except those interested in the railways opposed the time extension; but the railways pressed the subject until finally a mass meeting of the citizens to disapprove the bill that had corruptly passed the Legislature was held on January 24 at Metropolitan hall. The following resolutions were passed: "Resolved, by the citizens of Chicago in mass meeting assembled, That it is the firm and deliberate conviction of this meeting that ninety-nine out of ever one hundred of the residents and property holders of said city are earnestly and unalterably opposed to any extension of the franchises of said corporations and to any further legislation on the subject; Resolved, That we hereby most firmly and decidedly censure and reprobate the conduct of such of our representatives as voted for this most obnoxious monopoly." Of the Cook county delegation in the Legislature, William Jackson, representative, was the only one to oppose the measure to the last. He was publicly thanked by this meeting.

The act of February 13, 1865, incorporated the Union Stock Yards and Transit company with the following men named as incorporators: John L. Hancock, Virginius A. Turpin, Roselle M. Hough, Sidney A. Kent, Charles M. Culberton, Lyman Blair, David Kreigh, Joseph Sherwin, Martin L. Sykes, Jr., Joseph Sherwin, George W. Cass, James F. Jay, John F. Tracy, Timothy B. Blackstone, Joseph H. Moore, John S. Barry, Homer E. Sargent, Burton C. Cook, John B. Drake and William D. Judson. They were authorized to locate, construct and maintain in convenient proximity to the southerly limits of Chicago and west of Wallace street a union stock yards, together with the necessary enclosures, buildings, barns, pens, sheds, planking, fences, tanks, wells, pumps, streets, cottages for employes, railway switches, etc., for the care and safe keeping of live stock, etc.; capital stock, $1,000,000. The yards were begun in June, 1865, in a marsh and embraced 345 acres; the buildings alone cost $350,000, the Hough house there costing $125,000. The total cost was over $1,000,000.

Early in 1865 a committee of thirty was appointed to report on the best method of discharging the filth of the river and how to obtain pure drinking water. One plan proposed was to dig a canal 100 feet wide and ten feet deep from the head of navigation on the South branch to the mouth of the Calumet river. In January, 1865, the City Limits Dispatch company began to deliver parcels, etc., to every part of the city. In January, 1865, there were four principal stock yards—Pittsburg & Fort Wayne, Michigan Southern, Cottage Grove and Sherman's. There was no connection between the yards, and it was the rule that quotations on the same article varied considerably. It was customary for dealers to get together each night and compare notes. Early in 1865 Isaac N. Arnold, congressman, succeeded in getting through the House a bill for a $5,000,000 ship canal; but the bill died of inanition thereafter. Buying and selling stocks on commission and otherwise had grown to enormous proportions. Early in 1865 the old fire offices of chief engineer and assistant engineers were abolished and marshal and assistant marshals substituted therefor. A city ordinance passed in the fall of 1864 provided that all the streets should be numbered; this was done during the winter of 1864-65.

By January 27, 1865, the street car tracks on the South Side extended south on State to Twenty-second, thence to Cottage Grove and thence to the city limits, and a branch extended from State on Archer road as far as Raber's residence. The West Side lines extended on Randolph from State to Union park, thence to Lake and thence to the city limits; on Madison from State to the city limits; on Halsted from Madison to Blue Island avenue, thence to Sixteenth street; on Halsted from Randolph to Milwaukee avenue and thence to Chicago avenue; on Market from Randolph to Madison; on Clinton from Randolph to Van Buren, thence on Van Buren to Jefferson, thence on Jefferson to Twelfth. The North Side lines were as follows: On Clark from Kinzie to North, thence on Green Bay road to the city limits; on Chicago avenue from Clark to the river; on Division street from Clark to Clybourn and on Clybourn to North; on Sedgwick street from Division to North.

A law of 1864-65 provided for deepening the summit of the canal so that the water thereof could be used to cleanse Chicago river. Col. R. B. Mason and William Gooding were added to the Board of Public Works and Chicago was authorized to issue $2,000,000 in bonds as a second lien upon the canal, to be used to lower the summit so that lake water could be forced through to the Illinois river. In this bill was a fee clause—put in at the last moment and forced through—a $25,000 steal, it was claimed.

The street car companies took advantage of the hard times to raise their fare to 6 cents. Two new bridges were proposed for 1865—at North avenue for $3,700 and at Fuller street for $6,300. The city hospital building erected later in the fifties; in 1865 it was used as an eye and ear infirmary. The receipts of Chicago for the year ending April 1, 1865, were $2,034,610, the expenses $2,008,789, balance on hand $461,266.39. The Chicago Stock Exchange had rooms at 57 Dearborn street. It was said of Wabash avenue that "in wet seasons it was a sea of mud and in dry seasons a desert of dust." It was now proposed to pave it with Nicholson blocks. Bids for building the Washington street tunnel were called for in June; they varied from $200,000 to $314,000. On July 2 the water works crib was ready for sinking. It was determined to build a new bridewell in 1865. In August the 400-foot extension to the north pier was completed; the new channel was 150 feet wide, 600 feet long and fourteen feet deep. Dredging the channel cost $60,000 and building the new pier cost $75,000. During the year ending April 1, 1865, the fire department cost $119,028.72, the health department $6,678.57, the police department $97,734.90, the fire alarm telegraph about $75,000, and the pesthouse $15,000. The Tribune of September 13, 1865, said: "Never was a city so lavishly parked as ourselves with so little benefit. We have had our parks laid out for years, and almost numberless complimentary allusions made to them in the shape of Council resolutions, municipal ordinances, newspaper notices, ward meetings, individual surveys, etc. Then, too, we have had Park Row and Park avenue and Park street and parks of artillery. We have talked and written park for years, yet we have not a park in our city." During the summer of 1865 the park on the north was named Lincoln; in September plans for its improvement were advertised for; the same of Union park. A real wheat corner was engineered here in September by a few men and the price was forced up about 20 cents a bushel. A large meeting of laboring men at Witlowsky hall in September demanded the eight-hour system. By October 1 five different railway lines running west from Chicago hauled railway postal cars. Prior to this date the West and South Side street railway lines formed a junction at State and Randolph streets, but the North Side line did not. Now it was decided to permit the North Side cars to cross the State street bridge and form a junction with the other two systems.

In June, 1865, the following parks were in existence: Dearborn, Jefferson, Union, Lincoln, Washington and Lake Shore, and yet, according to the newspapers, the city did not have a park worthy of the name. At this time $5,000 was appropriated for the improvement of Union park, $10,000 for Lincoln park and $5,000 for the Lake Shore park. In 1865 the following salaries were paid: Mayor, $3,500; city treasurer, $2,500; comptroller, $3,500; corporation counsel, $3,000; city attorney, $3,000; city recorder, $3,000. The old postoffice building had been at 84-88 Dearborn street, and the new one was located at Monroe and Dearborn. Postal money orders were first issued here in October, 1864. It was customary for the cattle dealers to meet on Sundays at Douglas grove and compare and square accounts. The State Fair of 1865 was held at Chicago Driving park, near Cottage Grove, between Indiana and State.

"Within the year now elapsed (1865) and the one preceding, two great changes have been instituted—the distribution of letters in the railroad cars while in transit, instead of delaying their journey to sort them in the office, and the delivery and collection of mail matter in the city. Chicago is divided into about fifty districts, which are regularly visited by the letter carrier from two to five times daily, obviating the loss of time heretofore experienced in visiting the postoffice for letters. The full benefit of the system will only be felt when the number of the buildings on the streets is completed—a consummation far in the future as yet."—(Tribune, January, 1866.)

POLITICS OF COOK COUNTY

1823—1866

AS early as September 2, 1823, the Fulton County Commissioners' court issued an order for the election of one major and the necessary company officers at Chicago, the polls to be opened at the house of John Kinzie. One of the first official recognitions of Chicago was in 1825 when what is now Cook county was attached to Peoria county. On September 6 of that year the authorities of Peoria county constituted the following precinct: "Ordered, that the first precinct contain all that part of the county east of the mouth of the Du Page river where it empties its waters in the Aux Plaines river, and that the election be held at the agent's house or Cobweb hall." The latter was the Cobweb Castle at Chicago occupied by Dr. Alexander Wolcott, Indian agent. Soon after this, Doctor Wolcott was commissioned justice of the peace here. Connected with the above order was another appointing Archibald Clybourn constable in this precinct. As early as 1826, it is claimed, Billy Caldwell, or Sauganash, the Pottawatomie chief, was a justice of the peace for Peoria county at Chicago. As early as 1825, also, Mr. Kinzie was a justice of the peace here. On December 8, 1829, John B. Beaubien, Archibald Clybourn and Samuel Miller were appointed first trustees of the school section at Chicago. Clybourn in 1831 became one of the first justices of the peace of Cook county. His big brick house, erected in 1836 on the North branch, was long a familiar landmark. At an election for a justice of the peace held at the house of John Kinzie on July 24, 1830, fifty-six names were enrolled; at another election for a justice of the peace held on November 25, 1830, twenty-six names were enrolled. At the latter election Stephen Forbes received eighteen votes and Rev. William See eight votes. Mr. Forbes had taught school in the Dean house the previous spring. Later he opened a private school.

As early as 1825, Governor Edwards in a letter to Henry Clay said: "A favorite object and, indeed, a political hobby that supersedes all others in this state and Missouri, is a canal to connect Lake Michigan and the Illinois river. Nothing could sustain the administration or its friends in these states so effectually as to countenance this measure. Nor do I venture too far that it might be very advantageous to the President to introduce in his measure to Congress some sentiment favorable to the connection of our Great Lakes with the Atlantic and Western waters." Daniel P. Cook, for whom the county was named, in an address delivered October 28, 1825, also stated that the canal question was a political one and the most important affecting the future of Chicago. At the election of the first five trustees for the town of Chicago, held on August 10, 1833, at the hour of 11 A. M., at the house of Mark Beaubien, the following vote was polled: T. J. V. Owen, twenty-six votes; George W. Dole, twenty-six votes; Madore Beaubien, twenty-three; John Miller, twenty; E. S. Kimberly, twenty. The voters were as follows: E. S. Kimberly, J. B. Beaubien, Mark Beaubien, T. J. V. Owen, William Ninson, Hiram Pearsons, Philo Carpenter, George Chapman, John Wright, John T. Temple, Matthias Smith, David Carver, James Kinzie, Charles Taylor, John S. C. Hogan, Elia A. Rider, Dexter J. Hapgood, George W. Snow, Madore Beaubien, Gholson Kercheval, George W. Dole, R. J. Hamilton, Stephen F. Gale, Enoch Darling, W. H. Adams, C. A. Ballard, John Watkins, James Gilbert—28.

The trustees of the town of Chicago held their first meeting at the clerk's office on August 12, 1833. The limits of the corporation were fixed as follows: "Beginning at the intersection of Jackson and Jefferson streets, thence north to Cook street and through that street to its eastern extremity in Wabansia, thence on a direct line to Ohio street in Kinzie's addition; thence eastwardly to the lake shore; thence south with the line of beach to the northern United States pier, thence northwardly along said pier to its termination; thence to the channel of the Chicago river; thence along said channel until it intersects the eastern boundary line of the town of Chicago as laid out by the canal commissioners; thence southwardly with said line until it meets Jackson street; thence westwardly along Jackson street until it reaches the place of beginning."

There was great diversity of opinion as to the comparative advantages to be derived from a railroad or a canal. The people demanded one or the other and public opinion was pronounced in favor of the canal. However, a considerable number preferred the railroad at a public meeting held here in 1833, of which Colonel Owen was chairman and Doctor Kimberly secretary. Resolutions asking the governor to convene the Legislature to secure the passage of a law providing for the construction of a railroad were passed. Governor Reynolds said: "I am much pleased to know that you are ardently interested in accomplishing the greatest improvement in all the West. There is no improvement which would be of such advantage to the whole valley of the Mississippi as that connecting the lakes with the navigable water of the Missouri valley and which would at the same time cost us little." However, he did not call a special session of the Legislature for that purpose, nor did he favor the railroad. The Chicago American of December 24, 1833, asked: "What has become of the host of noisy politicians that have in by-gone days been riding as a hobby, and many of them successfully, too, the Illinois and Michigan canal or railroad? They have all gone into retiracy or they have effected their purpose and have no further use for their hobby." At an adjourned meeting held at the Eagle hotel on February 15, 1834, when Col. R. J. Hamilton presided and P. F. W. Peck served as secretary, it was "Resolved, That the delegate from Chicago to the convention to be held at Ottawa be instructed to vote for no individual to represent this district in the next General Assembly, who is not known to be in favor of the immediate construction of a communication, either by canal or railroad, between Lake Michigan and the Illinois river." This was the position taken by all citizens of Cook county at this time. The canal question was the most important and was made the hobby by the representatives of all parties. But the representatives sent to the Ottawa convention did not do in all respects as they were instructed.

At the Ottawa convention Cook county was represented by John D. Caton, Reason Zarley and Theron Parsons. Maj. James B. Campbell was chosen as candidate for senator and Dr. Edmund S. Kimberly as candidate for representative for the Northwestern Senatorial district for the General Assembly. On motion of Mr. Caton a committee of five was appointed to draft resolutions and an address to the electors of this Senatorial district. George B. Willis, John D. Caton, Thomas Hartsill, A. H. Howland and Theron Parsons were appointed such committee. David Walker was chairman of the convention. John D. Caton and Theron Parsons were leaders of this convention.

Besides the canal question, other important ones in the spring of 1834 were: Improvement of the judicial system and reconstruction of the road law. In the spring of 1834 John W. Reed was a candidate for sheriff; so also was Russell E. Heacock. Nehemiah King was a candidate for county commissioner from the Chicago precinct. George W. Snow was also a candidate for sheriff.

At the election of July 12, 1834, for a justice of the peace in Chicago, John D. Caton received 182 votes and Dr. Josiah C. Goodhue forty-seven votes. The candidates for county commissioners in 1834 were Isaac Scarrett of Fountaindale, Cook county, James Kinzie and Hiram Fowler of Naper Settlement. Ashbel Steele was a candidate for coroner. In July, 1834, Mr. Hamlin of Peoria, candidate for representative, came here on an electioneering tour. Silas W. Sherman was also a candidate for sheriff. At this date, viz., July, 1834, there were only four election precincts in Cook county, as follows: Chicago, Naper's Settlement, Walker's Grove and Hickory Creek. Naper's Settlement was the present Naperville and vicinity, Walker's Grove was near Joliet, and Hickory Creek was the present Joliet and vicinity. Nearly all of the present Cook county was in the Chicago precinct.

The Democrat of August, 1834, said concerning the August election: "The candidates for senator and representative to the General Assembly were not run with reference to their political principles, but were supported entirely with respect to their known views in favor of the Illinois and Michigan canal, although both are Jackson men. The other officers below were supported without respect to party. The following is the vote in Cook county. Those marked thus * are Jackson men:

Thus already in Cook county there were two political parties. The Democratic-Republican ticket was triumphant at the election in 1834. The opposition was called by the Chicago Democrat the Malcontent party. That paper on August 6, 1834, said: "We do not intend to exult over a fallen enemy. The rebuke which those opposed to the nomination of Doctor Kimberly received from the people is sufficiently severe." The Democrat of July 16 said: "In spite of all their secret intrigue and management, their despicable and underhanded attempt to make a stolen march upon the yeomen of the district, they have met with a signal defeat—a total rout. All the foul aspersions, the vile insinuations and the selfish and degrading tricks which the malcontents may manufacture or devise cannot prevent the people's candidate, Doctor Kimberly, from receiving the people's suffrages for their representative." "We are struck with the inconsistency displayed in the votes as given for governor and those for member of Congress. The majority of General Duncan over both the Democratic candidates is 2,939; the majority of the Democratic members of Congress over the opposition is 4,003." The opposition here referred to embraced all who opposed the Jackson administration. ". . . What political inconsistency is here displayed by the people in electing a governor whose known opposition to most of the leading measures of the present administration (Jackson's) has characterized his course during the recent session of Congress."—(Democrat, September 17, 1834.)

Duncan had supported the United States bank and had voted to omit Jackson's protest from the Congressional journals. "If we are to take the voice as expressed in their (the electors') vote for governor, we must conclude that the state is willing to be harnessed to this monied aristocracy (the United State bank and its friends). If, on the other hand, their voice is expressed through the members of Congress, we here find an emphatic expression recorded against that institution. That the election for governor was the result of personal and private consideration is admitted by all. For members of Congress their election was claimed on the broad ground of political honesty—for the President and his leading measures. As such, the democracy of Illinois have sustained them, and in an emphatic manner proclaimed their sovereign will in opposition to the monied aristocracy and the supporters of this great monied power."—(Democrat, September 17, 1834.)

At a mass meeting held in Chicago in April, 1834, a resolution adopted declared that the county had been misrepresented at the Ottawa convention. On May 16 a mass meeting of the citizens opposed to the Ottawa convention assembled at the Eagle tavern, Chicago. At this time the Circuit court was in session and residents from all parts of the county were in town. Dr. J. Temple was chairman and H. S. Handy secretary. It was concluded to adjourn the 2 o'clock meeting until 7:30 in the evening, when all gathered in the court room in Haddock's hotel. Colonel Owen demanded to know if it was in order for the citizens who favored the Ottawa convention to participate in the proceedings of the meeting. The chairman stated not, as the meeting was called in opposition to the Ottawa convention. Among those who took active part were John Blackstone of Hickory Creek, Capt. David Carver, P. F. Peck and Mr. Van Horn of Hickory Creek. There were passed resolutions declaring that the Ottawa convention did not express the voice of the electors of this district and that only a part of the counties of the district were represented at that convention. H. S. Handy, P. F. Peck, Nehemiah King, R. Davidson and Dr. W. B. Egan were appointed a committee of correspondence. Mr. Van Horn moved that a committee of nine persons be appointed to name candidates for the positions of senator and representative—three from Hickory Creek, three from Naper's Settlement and Walker's Grove, and three from Chicago. The following candidates were reported by this committee: Maj. James W. Stephenson of Jo Davies county and Maj. James B. Campbell of La Salle county for senator; Judge Nehemiah King, John Miller and Harry Boardman for representative. At the election Stephenson and Miller were duly chosen.

In October, 1834, among the leading Democratic-Republicans of Cook county were the following:

T. J. V. Owen, John Calhoun, E. B. Williams, J. K. Boyer, David Carver, G. H. Kercheval, N. Parsons, Peter Pruyn, E. E. Hunter, J. C. Goodhue, O. Morrison, H. B. Clark, E. S. Kimberly, Alexander Lloyd, William Adams, John Davis, Harlow Kimball, Samuel Resigne, Hiram Hugunin, Otis Hubbard, John Barry, Solomon Lincoln, Walter Kimball, William Worthington, Thomas Hoyt, James Harrington, Jr., Samuel Jackson, Benjamin Jones, John Bates, Jr., Francis C. Sherman, James W. Reed, Henry W. Cleveland, H. S. Handy, Clement Stone, Thomas Reed, Paul J. Carlier, J. Huelet, John Noble, John Murphy, Silas B. Cobb, Mathias Mason, Amos Bailey, A. McGregor, Frederick Pennoyer, William Hogue, John Foote, John Sewell, S. E. Downer, E. T. Rider, Charles Taylor, Samuel Ellis, C. Burkenbile, James Kinzie, William Forsyth, S. Wilcox, E. L. Thrall, James C. Spencer, D. C. Robinson, Sciota Evans, A. T. Fullerton, P. L. Updike, John Mann, Willard Jones, A. O. T. Breed, Truman G. Wright, Benjamin Briggs, G. F. Blanchard, O. Lozier, William Stevens, William Cooley, John Lloyd, Ebenezer Goodrich, S. Rand, Ford Freeman, Gilbert Loomis, Henry Paige, L. H. Everts, H. Barnes, David Stiles, S. Marsh, D. Weaver, Washington Morrow, William Bennett, Thomas Forester, J. Dean Caton, T. King.

"We hope that every citizen of Cook county who takes an interest in the improvement of the whole state, whether he be for a canal or a railroad will be present and make up his judgment from the facts and arguments that will be placed before him. For our part we have had no difficulty in making up our minds as to the superiority of a canal or railroad—the experiment of a few years has left little doubt upon the subject."—(Democrat, October 15, 1834.)

On October 30 a political meeting more strongly to advocate the construction of the canal assembled here at the Methodist chapel. The Democrat of November 5 said: "It was the largest meeting ever held in this town; the church was crowded and the lively feeling manifested by the people on this subject shows the deep interest with which they looked forward to the session of the General Assembly in this state. The time has arrived when all agree that a communication between the Illinois river and Lake Michigan should be speedily commenced and prosecuted to its final completion." This meeting was really an adjourned one from a former meeting which had been presided over by E. B. Williams, chairman, and John Calhoun, editor of the Chicago Democrat, secretary. A memorial to the Legislature declaring a preference for a canal instead of a railroad was prepared. However, it should be stated that a considerable number of prominent men in this portion of the state preferred a railroad to a canal. Late in 1834 they held a meeting to take steps to secure from the next Legislature a charter for a railroad to extend from Chicago to the Illinois river. As a matter of fact, in the light of history, it perhaps would have been far better for Chicago had such a step prevailed. As it was, the majority demanded a canal instead of a railroad and in the end secured it. The railroad scheme was declared to have emanated from Wall street, New York, but it is probable that its advocates were in earnest and really believed a railroad preferable to a canal.

The political proceedings of 1834 were somewhat crude and disorganized. On April 13, 1835, a mass meeting of the Democracy of Cook county convened in the Exchange coffee house, Chicago. Col. T. J. V. Owen called the meeting to order. Hiram Hugunin was chosen chairman and J. W. Eldridge and J. C. Goodhue were chosen secretaries. There were also present, among others, James Curtiss, E. B. Williams, John D. Caton, David Carver, S. W. Sherman, A. Lloyd, S. Lincoln, J. Woodbury, A. Bailey, John Calhoun and J. H. Woodworth. The object was to organize thoroughly the Democracy of Cook county. On June 6, 1835, the Democracy nominated a full ticket for town officers at Chicago. The Democrat of June 10 said: "The nominations were regularly and fairly made and those made should receive the hearty and cordial support of every man who claims to belong to the Democratic party. It is a struggle between the aristocracy and the Democracy." In June, 1835, Lewis Cass visited Chicago, but did not remain long enough to partake of a dinner tendered him by T. J. V. Owen, L. C. Kercheval, G. S. Hubbard, J. R. Boyer, Alanson Sweet, James Kinzie, Giles Spring, R. J. Hamilton, J. B. Beaubien, J. H. Kinzie, W. L. Newberry, E. S. Kimberly and Gholson Kercheval. The Democratic-Republican county convention held at Vail's tavern on Flag Creek, July 4, 1835, nominated Peter Pruyne of Chicago for county recorder, Addison Collins of Hickory Creek for surveyor, and James M. Strode for senator. R. J. Hamilton became an independent candidate for county recorder. Alanson Sweet moved out of the county before the election. The Chicago charter election of July 10, 1835, resulted as follows:

The Democrat said: "Last year we had an opposition board of trustees in Chicago. This year it will be Democratic eight to one. So much for the beginning of the convention system." . . . "The election of county officers and a senator takes place on Monday next. We trust that every Democrat will do his duty on that day. The question is whether the Democracy of Cook county will continue to be ruled by a 'self-constituted junto' of aristocracy, who have no fixed political principles which they dare to avow, or whether they will convince these men that they are capable of soliciting their own candidates." At this time there were four precincts in the county—Chicago, Naper's, Walker's and Hickory Creek. The following vote explains itself:

At the August election of 1835 James M. Strode was chosen almost unanimously for senator, there being polled against him only five votes out of 1,059. R. J. Hamilton was elected county recorder, receiving a total of 602 votes and a majority of 116 over his competitor. For surveyor Mr. Collins received 670 votes, or 309 majority over Nehemiah King. In November, 1835, the following Whigs opposed Mr. Van Buren and favored William Henry Harrison: George W. Dole, Henry Moore, John L. Wilson, John Holbrook, E. W. Casey, G. S. Hubbard, A. Steele, John W. Kinzie, Henry King, T. O. Davis, B. S. Morris, H. G. Loomis, C. L. Harmon, Giles Spring and Mr. Wright. The Democrat of August, 1835, said: "The election which has just closed has been warmly contested and has resulted in the success of the opposition candidate for county recorder (the principal place contested) by a majority in the whole county of 107 votes. We believe all the officers elected, with one or two exceptions, are Democrats. The defeat of the county recorder was partly the result of the most untiring efforts of hired runners who stooped to every species of misrepresentation."

The Democrat of September 16, 1835, said: "Three hundred and forty-eight canal lots in Chicago are worth one with another and will sell any day in the market for a sum equal to $1,500 each, making a total of $521,500. Add to this fractional Section 15 and Sections 5, 7, 17, 18 and 27 in this township, which are worth $360,000, and the result is a sum all told that would be sufficient to complete the whole canal." Late in 1835, Chicago murmured because the canal had not been commenced. The Democrat of September 9 said: "It is now admitted on all hands that the last winter's canal law is defective and has proven a total failure. Very soon it will be too late to do anything with effect, and it is very possible that our canal may yet be a company stock jobbing affair, or we may even yet have a railroad. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. Something should be done."

To the Democratic state convention at Vandalia late in 1835 Hiram Hugunin, Peter Pruyne, John D. Caton, James Grant and Ebenezer Peck were delegates. The delegates to this convention were instructed to do everything in their power in support of the canal. In December, 1835, the county of Cook had four election precincts as follows: Chicago, Hickory Creek, Scott's settlement and Lake. On January 20, 1836, at the Democratic convention for county commissioner, held at the tavern of Elijah Wentworth, on Flag creek, Alfred Churchill was nominated for county commissioner. The Democrat, in January, 1836, declared that Gurdon S. Hubbard was opposed to the canal and in favor of the railroad. It also stated that Mr. Kinzie favored the railroad. At this time there was talk of a canal westward from Milwaukee or Green Bay in opposition to the one proposed at Chicago. At the Democratic convention held February 20, 1836, at O. Grant's residence, Brush Hill, Stephen N. Salisbury was nominated for county commissioner and Amos Bailey for county surveyor.

In January, 1836, steps to secure an enlargement of the town charter were taken. The Democrat charged Commissioners Kinzie and Hubbard with being improperly influenced in securing certain changes which would benefit them. In April, 1836, a large meeting of Democrats and others was held at the Exchange Coffee house for the purpose of recommending a suitable person for postmaster and collector of customs. Among those present were Ebenezer Peck, Hiram Hugunin, John Calhoun, H. B. Clarke, B. F. Knapp, J. R. Livingston, C. A. Brooks, H. Porter, C. Taylor, R. M. P. Abel, A. Vincent, William Jones, S. G. Trobridge, William Hogue, L. Nichols, N. J. Brown, W. B. French, H. Pennoyer, S. F. Spaulding, A. Lloyd and C. V. Dyer. The proceedings of this meeting were denounced by another meeting which in resolutions declared that it was an underhanded attempt to oust the old postmaster when he was not present to defend himself. At the second meeting G. S. Hubbard presided and John Bates served as secretary. R. J. Hamilton and Grant Goodrich were the principal speakers. Mr. Hamilton moved that a committee of nine be appointed to draft resolutions against any change in the postmaster.

The Democrat of March 16, 1836, declared that G. S. Hubbard, R. J. Hamilton, J. H. Kinzie "and their suite," by going to Vandalia and using their efforts with the Legislature, had defeated the provision of the canal bill requiring the election of the canal commissioners by a joint ballot of the two houses and had secured the insertion of a clause giving the Governor the power to appoint such commissioners. The paper declared that the object of this change was to make sure of the appointment of Mr. Hubbard as one of the commissioners. Doctor Fithian, a member of the House, was a brother-in-law of Mr. Hubbard; he had voted against the bill giving the appointment of the commissioners to the two houses. Said a correspondent of the Democrat concerning the pressure brought to bear upon the Legislature. "It was unquestionably the same powerful influence which obtained the passage of the Chicago Hydraulic bill and other obnoxious measures."

In June, 1836, the Democrats of Cook and Will counties met at Vail's residence, on Flag creek, to nominate joint candidates for the Legislature. Peter Pruyne was nominated for the Senate; Joseph Naper, James Walker and A. G. Leary for the House. For county offices they nominated Orsemus Morrison for coroner and Edward E. Hunter, Stephen M. Salisbury and Nathan Allen, Jr., for county commissioners. The Republicans nominated Giles Spring for the Senate and Edward W. Casey and Harry Boardman for the House. The election of August, 1836, was a Democratic victory. The American said: "We have met the enemy and we are theirs." That paper declared that from 150 to 200 illegal votes were polled at Chicago. The Republican candidates for county commissioners were R. M. Sweet and G. W. Laird. Pruyne, Democratic candidate for the Senate, received 648 votes, and Spring, the Whig candidate, received 328 votes. That was about the majority throughout this county. For sheriff, S. W. Sherman, Democrat, received 912 votes, and J. W. Tuttle, Whig, received 173. At the Congressional election in 1836, Cook county polled the following vote:

In October, 1836, an immense Whig meeting was held at the Presbyterian church. Royal Stewart called the assemblage to order and John Holbrook was made chairman and J. Y. Scammon secretary. The committee on resolutions were J. N. Balestier, Gurdon S. Hubbard and William Stuart. The resolutions adopted by this meeting denounced the course pursued by Van Buren and declared in favor of a western man for the Presidency. William Henry Harrison was declared to be that man. The meeting declared in favor of Francis Granger for the Vice-Presidency. William Stuart, J. N. Balestier, Henry Moore, Ashbel Steele and Thomas R. Hubbard were appointed to prepare an address to the people. The meeting appointed the following committee of vigilants: Ashbel Steele, Charles McClure, John Holbrook, Tuthill King, George Shadding, Augustus Garrett, H. G. Loomis, John L. Wilson, George W. Merrill, Benjamin Church, Star Foote and David Foote. On November 12, the American triumphantly said, "We have met the enemy and they are ours." Prominent speakers at this meeting were Henry Moore, William Stuart, J. N. Balestier and Edward W. Casey. The Presidential election of 1836 in Cook county resulted as follows:

In the spring of 1837 John H. Kinzie was the Whig candidate for mayor. Dr. W. B. Egan refused to run for that position. In 1838 the vote in Cook county for Governor was as follows: Edwards, Whig, 832; Carlin, Democrat, 1664. Thus the county was strongly Democratic. In 1839 the following precincts were set off to Du Page county: Cass, Salt Creek, Naperville, Du Page and Brush Hill.

In 1838 the regular Democratic candidate for sheriff was beaten by Isaac R. Gavin, an Independent Democratic candidate. In 1840 the regular Democratic candidate was beaten by Ashbel Steele, the regular Whig candidate. In 1842 the regular Democratic candidate was elected, but there was a majority against him. In 1844 the regular Democratic candidate, S. J. Lowe, won. In 1846 the regular Democratic candidate, Isaac Cook, won. In 1850 the regular Democratic candidate was beaten by W. L. Church, the Independent Democratic candidate.

An important question in 1839 was whether unnaturalized citizens should be permitted to vote for state and county officers. Naturally the party in power favored that view. In August, 1839, the Democrats had three candidates for recorder. Eli B. Williams was the regular Democratic candidate. Their candidate for commissioner was John McCord; for treasurer, Isaac Cook; county clerk, George Davis; probate judge, G. O. A. Beaumont; county treasurer, Seth Wells; and county surveyor, Asa F. Bradley. The Whig county committee at this time was A. Clybourn, Theodorus Doty, Socrates Rand, William Young, Justin Butterfield, E. H. Haddock and John Gage. Concerning the election of August, 1839, the American in June, said: "Recorder of Deeds—This office is a bone of contention among the faithful—this is the rock on which they split. The secret of the matter lies in a nutshell. The office is one of emolument. It is the part of the spoils best worth preserving." On August 3 that paper also said: "American citizens! Stop! Think! Reflect! To what pass are we fast approaching? Already an Irish representative and an Irish sheriff, with entire foreign deputies; two Irish candidates for recorder and five Irish candidates for the offices of county clerk, county surveyor and constables. In the name of all we love most, our country and our liberty, shall we submit to such dictation?" The campaign of 1840 was the most exciting and the most intensely pressed of any up to that time ever in Cook county. The Whigs were determined to defeat the Democrats. They began early and it was afterwards claimed won the campaign by their songs. It was declared that they literally sung their candidate to success. At the Whig county convention at the Illinois exchange on July 26, 1840, Eben Conant of Des Plaines was chairman and J. M. Underwood secretary. This convention passed the following resolutions: "Resolved, That the Whigs of Cook county feel entire confidence in the honesty and capability of John Stuart and will give him their undivided support for the office of Representative in Congress." The following candidates were nominated: County commissioner of Chicago precinct, Socrates Rand; school commissioner, Louis B. Goodsell; sheriff, Ashbel Steele; coroner, Eri Reynolds. John M. Wilson of Will county was nominated for representative; also William B. Ogden and G. A. O. Beaumont, both of Cook county, for representatives. Gen. James Turney was nominated for senator. Buckner S. Morris of Cook county was a Harrison and Tyler elector in 1840. Members of the Democratic and Whig parties who favored that work on the canal should be at once commenced and pushed to completion called a canal convention to be held at Spencer's tavern on the Des Plaines river early in the fall of 1840. The movement was too weak to amount to much. During the campaign of 1840 John Wentworth, who had become prominent as editor of the Democrat and as a Democratic partisan, was unstintingly abused and caricatured. He was represented as a crane and was called "Daddy long legs." The American of August, 1840, said concerning the August election that the Democratic or Locofoco triumphs were confined to the neighborhood of the canal—that the party was supported not by the farming community of the state, but by the transient laborers and scalawags who congregated along the canal. The paper asked why the Whigs should feel downcast because they had not carried the Legislature and asked "Did we ever carry it? Never! Nor can we reasonably expect to do it until there is another apportionment of representation. The Whig's stronghold is lost by the present system. The new counties away from the canal line are all Whig. . . . We all know that Jackson had 6,000 majority and Van Buren between 3,000 and 4,000 majority; while Carlin had about 1,000 majority in 1838. Already has Carlin's majority been neutralized. As far as heard from there is a Whig gain of 1,200 since Carlin's election. Depend upon it, Illinois is safe for old Tippecanoe. He has strength of his own and the "Old Hero" cannot be beat in his old territory." The American of August 14, also said:

"The Hon. Ebenezer Peck, with that characteristic meanness which ever marks the character of a skulking demagogue, has come out with a brutal tirade of indecent ribaldry, attacking the character of Mr. William B. Ogden. If Peck had published this obscene effusion before the election, some apology might have been made for him, for never was a political mountebank so galled and flayed and cut to the raw, as Peck was by Mr. Ogden in his scathing letter. We do not intend to take up the cudgel in defense of Mr. Ogden; he is fully competent to fight his own battles. It is out of the power of Peck to injure the fair fame of William B. Ogden in this community, and no one is better aware of the fact than Mr. Ogden himself."

A large proportion of this community in September, 1840, were unnaturalized Irish who had in a measure controlled the election of August, 1840. Said the American of August 5, 1840: "It is well known that a large portion, perhaps a majority, of the voters in this district were unnaturalized foreigners. It is also known that this foreign influence is perverted to the election of men unfit for office, and that the foreign population of Cook and Will counties have asserted the right, as they hold the power, to elect officers for the sole reason that they are Irishmen."

In 1840, over two hundred and fifty Whigs of this vicinity signed a petition to Congress to prohibit men of foreign birth from becoming citizens.

Although the Canal ticket of 1840 was comparatively small yet it served to split up both the Whigs and the Democrats in such a way that the Whigs really triumphed throughout the county. The vote for coroner in the county later served as an illustration of this fact and was as follows: Eri Reynolds, Whig canal candidate for coroner, received 427 votes; Lyman Butterfield, Democratic candidate for coroner, 242; Edward Murphy, Irish candidate for coroner, 239; John K. Boyer, German candidate for coroner, 209. Reynolds received the Whig vote; Butterfield the native Democratic vote; Murphy the entire Irish vote, and Boyer the whole foreign vote that was not Irish. The August election of 1840 was really a test of the foreigners against the native Americans on the question of naturalization.

At a big meeting of the Whigs held at the City Saloon on August 14, 1840, a Tippecanoe club was organized. At this meeting J. N. Balestier served as chairman. Grant Goodrich spoke to the assemblage. The principal speech, however, was made by George C. Bates of Detroit. It was a splendid defense of the American credit system which had been destroyed by the Jacksonian Democracy. The American said: "Mr. Bates made one of the ablest and most eloquent addresses it has ever been our good fortune to hear." The paper ended by asking: "What has reared these live streets and these magnificent warehouses? What has peopled this beautiful city with an enlightened and enterprising population in so short a period? It was that great bugbear of the Locofocos, the Credit System." The officers of the Chicago Tippecanoe club were as follows: John Gage, president; A. N. Fullerton of the First Ward, J. O. Humphrey of the Second Ward, Charles Cleaver of the Third Ward, George Montgomery of the Fourth Ward, S. Gilbert of the Fifth Ward, and John Lang of the Sixth Ward, vice-presidents; William Larrabee, secretary; L. B. Goodsell, treasurer; L. D. Boone, J. N. Balestier and Grant Goodrich, correspondence committee.

During the fall of 1840, Whig and Democratic clubs were organized in almost every precinct of the county. The Whig clubs were usually called Tippecanoe clubs and the campaign was characterized by torchlight processions and songs. In 1840 Judge John Pearson was a candidate for the United States Senate to supersede John M. Robinson, whose term would expire in March, 1841. On September 24, an immense Harrison meeting was held in Chicago, on which occasion Hon. John T. Stuart, congressman, was the principal speaker. Salmon P. Chase, who happened to be present in the city, spoke at this meeting. The American of September 25, said: Mr. Chase, we learn, is a talented young lawyer of Cincinnati, from near the residence of the Old Hero. His happy and practical remarks, his interesting anecdotes of the Old Hero, drew forth frequent bursts of applause. We regret that we have not time to give a report of his speech. His figure, manner and voice are very commanding and mark him for an interesting and impressive stump speaker."

The American of September 8, said: "We recently visited the good Whig precincts of Salt Creek and Barrington, which did so nobly in August last—Hanover also. The western precincts of the county are enthusiastic in favor of Harrison, and they promise a large majority in November next."

During the fall of 1840 the Democrats of Chicago assembled in the City Saloon rooms at the City hotel, while the Whigs met in their club room, Tippecanoe hall on the North Side. The election of November, 1840, was one of the most exciting ever held here. Captain Hunter, Col. James M. Strode, register of the land office, and John C. Wilson, ex-alderman, were put in jail on election day for resisting the sheriff. Judge Smith of the Supreme Court, armed with a pistol headed a mob that threatened to tear down the jail if these men were not released, but Ashbel Steele, the sheriff, prevented any serious trouble. The American of November 6 said:

"Atrocious Outrage.—Attack of a Supreme Court Judge on the Jail.—On the afternoon of Monday, the election day, a few persons were imprisoned by the sheriff in the jail of this city for breaches of the peace, Judge Smith of the Supreme Court placed himself at the head of a mob, went up to the jail and demanded of the sheriff that the prisoners should be released—that he would have them out or tear down the jail. He went up within a few feet of the door of the jail and said that he be damned if he would not have the prisoners out. The sheriff and some of the citizens resisted his attempts, and after the judge had flourished his pistols and a resort to some farce was had, the judge seeing that he could not compass his peaceful and lawful object went away with his mob."

The American of November 4, said: "At Dutchman's Point, Lake precinct, all the Harrison votes sent out from the city to this precinct were smuggled the fore part of the day and toward night were thrown out of the window. Had it not been for the vigilance of George Chacksfield and W. H. Davis, of this city, the Locos by fraud and trickery would have had the precinct all their own way."

Both Chacksfield and Davis corrected the American. By mistake no tickets were sent to Dutchman's Point, Lake precinct. It was not until the arrival of S. W. Sherman, one of the judges, that the names of the electors were learned. All tickets were then written out by hand and no others were issued during the day. The presidential vote by precincts, Cook county, in 1840, was as follows:

PRECINCTS.	Harrison. (Whig.)	Van Buren. (Dem.)
Gross Point	14	54
Thornton	46	69
Monroe	49	47
Saganaskee	35	12
Bridgeport	5	27
Salt Creek	67	50
Des Plaines	54	63
Lake	33	56
Athens	57	500
Lyons	25	19
Summit	27	285
Chicago	622	807
Hanover		No vote
Barrington		No vote
	1,034	1,989

The American of November, several issues, said: "Never in the history of elections has there been such an excitement as the present for election news. . . . Whose Fault Is It? Owing to the culpable negligence of somebody there were no election notices put up in Hanover and Barrington precincts in this county and the polls were not opened. Is there no penalty for such neglect? . . . Not to Be Cheated.—The staunch and indomitable Whigs of Hanover and Barrington precincts in this county were determined not to be disfranchised because through Locofoco negligence or fraudulent design no polls were opened. They went to Dundee, Lake precinct, and the result is declared. Those two precincts would have given us a handsome Whig majority, which would have still more reduced the Locofoco majority in this county."

In the spring of 1841 the Democrats elected Francis C. Sherman, proprietor of the Sherman house, Mayor of Chicago. Henry G. Hubbard was appointed clerk of the circuit court in March, 1841, by Judge Smith, vice R. J. Hamilton. The death of President Harrison in 1841 was duly observed in Chicago. The Whigs of 1841 demanded: 1. A solvent specie paying national bank; 2. The passage of a land bill; 3. A general bankrupt law; 4. Protection to American industry; 5. Fair prices for home products; 6. Better times; 7. Higher prices for wheat, etc. From 1837 to 1848 the Democrats of this county were intensely bitter against any national banking law. In fact the teachings of the Jacksonian administration had rendered odious any banking law whatever. Particularly was John Wentworth, editor of the Democrat, the enemy of all banking institutions; a national bank in his estimation was the basest crime against commercial and material prosperity. In those days people were not so well posted as at present; thousands of farmers did not take a newspaper and what they learned of public affairs was hazy and more or less erroneous. Many of those who did take a county paper were unduly influenced in favor of their own party and against the opposition. They were taught to believe that the opposition were rascals of the deepest dye.

"The Chicago Democrat was the first paper I ever remember seeing and my first political impressions were received from it. It was customary in those days as now to berate the Whigs in the Democrat, and I verily believed they were a set of banditti seeking the country's ruin. I had no more idea a Whig could be an honest man than I had that a robber could be honest."—(Lang Syne in Democratic Press, April 17, 1854.)

Thus during the period from 1837 to 1848 the bankers had a sorry time of it.

At a Whig meeting held September 30, 1841, at Tippecanoe hall, the Republican headquarters on the North Side, John Gage served as chairman and W. M. Larrabee as secretary. J. N. Balestier, J. H. Kinzie and A. M. Fullerton were appointed a committee on resolutions. The principal speakers were Grant Goodrich and Buckner S. Morris. James H. Ralston was the Democratic candidate for Congress and John M. Stuart the Whig candidate; Ralston was elected. The latter received about 810 votes in Cook county and Stuart about 500. For school commissioner, Church, Democrat, received 823 votes and Goodsell, Whig, 456—these figures showing the majority throughout the county. At the August election of 1841 Frederick Collins, Abolition candidate for Congress, received in Cook county a total of 35 votes.

In November, 1841, Governor Carlin visited Chicago. He was met at the Summit by a delegation among whom were John Wentworth, Benjamin W. Raymond and R. J. Hamilton and escorted to the city by a cavalcade of about sixty citizens. Upon his arrival here he held a public reception at the City Hall. He was tendered a bountiful dinner at which numerous patriotic and business toasts were drunk. At this time the canal began again to interest Chicagoans. It had lain dormant for some time and was destined to lay dormant still longer. Chicago, of course, was anxious for its completion and here the canal question was probably the most important from a political standpoint.

In February, 1842, the Whigs nominated Benjamin W. Raymond for mayor and William H. Davis for city marshal. Augustus Garrett was the Democratic candidate for mayor and Henry Smith the Abolition candidate. The following was the vote polled:

PRECINCTS.	B. W. Raymond. (Whig)	A. Garrett. (Dem.)	Henry Smith. (Abol.)
First ward.....	162	96	21
Second ward.....	110	168	21
Third ward.....	26	18	1
Fourth ward.....	13	16	0

During the municipal campaign of 1842 Seth Johnson, who was nominated for alderman on the Abolition ticket, declined the honor, saying that he was not a political Abolitionist, but one from principle. The Temperance party at this time began to make a strong showing in local politics. Col. Lewis C. Kercheval was elected by the Temperance people, a justice of the peace, to fill a vacancy. Cook county in the fall of 1842 gave John Ford a majority of about 700 votes over his opponent, Mr. Duncan, for the governorship. The Abolition candidate for Governor received in Cook county a total of thirty-seven votes. In August, 1842, the American accused Dr. Murphy, Democratic representative, with having forced through the Legislature the bill which reduced the school fund of Cook county in favor of the counties which had been carved from Cook. At this time Samuel Hoard represented Cook and Lake counties in the Senate and H. L. Stewart, Lot Whitcomb and I. N. Arnold were representatives. The actual vote for Governor in 1842 in Cook county was: Ford, Democrat, 1,328; Duncan, Whig, 625. At previous elections the result for Governor and President was as follows: In 1838 Carlin, Democrat, received 1,664 votes and Edwards, Whig, 832. Thus the county still maintained its accustomed Democratic majority during those years.

In June, 1842, ex-President Martin Van Buren visited Chicago. He was formally received by the city. On July 19, the Whig county convention assembled at the City Saloon; F. T. Miner was chairman and S. F. Gale and E. K. Rogers were secretaries. John Blackstone of Blue Island and B. W. Raymond and John Gage of Chicago were nominated for representatives. James A. Smith was nominated for sheriff. At this time the tariff bill of 1842 was elaborately discussed here.

The act of March 1, 1843, authorized the county commissioners to increase the number of places for holding elections in the Chicago precinct in said county to any number not exceeding five as would be most convenient for the voters.

In June, 1843, George W. Dole was chairman of the Whig county committee and S. Lisle Smith secretary. The Whig county convention this year was held at Spencer's hall, Cazenovia, on July 8. John Wentworth was the Democratic candidate for Congress and was elected by a majority of 1,610 in the whole district. Cook county gave him a majority of 281. Giles Spring was the Whig candidate for Congress and received 891; Henderson, the Abolition candidate, received 132 votes; scattering votes were three; total 2,198.

In February, 1844, Augustus Garrett received the unanimous nomination of the Democrats to succeed himself as mayor. George W. Dole was the Whig candidate for mayor; Garrett received 805 votes; Dole 798 votes and H. Smith, Abolitionist, 193 votes; for city marshal, Henry Rhines, Democrat, received 386 votes; Orson Smith also Democrat, 779 votes; P. Dean, Abolitionist, 405 votes and M. S. Wood, Independent, 72 votes. This election showed a considerable increase in the number of Abolitionists in the city.

In January, 1844, citizens of Chicago petitioned Congress not to admit Texas into the Union. This petition was presented to the House by Mr. Wentworth. In 1844 Wentworth received 1,736 votes for Congress, and B. S. Morris, his Whig opponent, received 792 votes. Thus the district was strongly Democratic as was also Cook county. John Wentworth favored the repeal of the protective tariff law of 1842. His opponent, B. S. Morris, like all Whigs, favored the law and therefore favored a protective tariff. Morris opposed the annexation of Texas and Wentworth favored the same; in that respect the latter sided with his party, although at a later date he opposed any extension of slave territory. The Whig candidates for county offices were G. A. O. Beaumont for Senator; William Devol for county commissioner at Chicago, and A. Clybourn for sheriff.

In the spring of 1844 D. Walker, J. Kelly, R. J. Hamilton, D. L. Roberts, Ira Miltimore, J. Robinson, T. B. Bridges, S. R. Ball, V. H. Freeman, J. Row, C. Sweet and J. A. Oliver were Abolition candidates for aldermen. Ira Miltimore was elected and the Democrats accused him of having voted for Rhines for the office of marshal and declared that Rhines was "a notorious negro catcher." The Abolition ticket was called the Liberty ticket and Miltimore became the Liberty alderman. In 1843 the Abolition vote of Cook county for Henderson, congressman was 132. In 1844 the Abolition vote of Cook county was 317. The following is the vote at the presidential election of November, 1844:

	Polk (Dem.).	Clay (Whig).	Birney (Abol.).

The result of the municipal election in the spring of 1844 was the complete success of the Democratic party. Augustus Garrett was reelected by a small majority and the Democrats also elected eight of the twelve aldermen. The Democrat said: "We claim this under all the circumstances as one of the most decisive and glorious victories ever achieved in our city. We have accomplished what the Democratic party in this city when in the least divided or rent in twain was never able to do, viz.: The election of two-thirds of the aldermen, together with the mayor and a Democratic marshal." The popularity of Mr. Dole enabled him to come within seven votes of as many as were received by Augustus Garrett. Had he received eight votes more he would have been elected mayor.

Mayor Garrett in his inaugural address in March, 1844, referring to the past year, said that expenses had been swelled during 1843 by the purchase of hydrants and hose, building the cemetery fence, constructing the Clark street sewer and making crossways—all costing about $2,500. But notwithstanding this extraordinary expense there was enough balance left to pay arrearages of interest on the city debt and to pay $1,000 of the principal due Stracham & Scott. During the whole year city orders had been kept at par, thus enabling the city to do business on a cash basis. For 1844 the Fort Dearborn addition and the canal lots sold in October, 1843, would become taxable, thus insuring an increase in revenue. The enhanced value of real estate would also add to the revenue. But rigid economy should be practiced, and the debt of the city would be wiped out within two years, thus presenting "the spectacle of the city of 9,000 inhabitants free from debt, with credit restored and equal to any city in the world." The Mayor said: "The thanks of the citizens are due to the whole fire department for the untiring exertion used in cases of fire and their vigilance in guarding against it. During the past year considerable improvements have been made in this department, especially in the purchase of hydrants and hose. It however becomes imperatively necessary that the city should purchase a new engine of the most approved plan. We have not now a perfect engine in the city, and the cost is nothing in comparison with the property at stake. I regret to say that depredations have been committed from time to time by the disinterment of bodies from the cemetery, in the grossest violation of private feeling as well as public decency. I would urge the most constant vigilance to prevent such occurrences in the future, and the offering of large rewards for the detection of the offenders." During 1843 the expenses of the bridges were about $1,500. It was suggested that as soon as the canal was opened and stone could thus be easily and cheaply procured, the streets should be macadamized as an experiment. Packers who had been fined for maintaining nuisances asked to have a free tract designated where slaughtering would not be a nuisance. Trouble having arisen over the street lines of lots, it was advised that the Legislature be asked to pass an act for a new survey to define lot boundaries, etc. Complaint was also made that the poor man was required to pay as much road tax as the rich man and this was declared not fair—three days' labor were required. In regard to the public schools, the Mayor said: "Under an able board of inspectors and a skillful agent the schools have continued to flourish and the number of scholars to increase during the past year. Such has been the addition of scholars that it becomes necessary to increase the number of schools and form new districts. A plan has also been proposed to establish a high school in addition to the district schools. I recommend that an immediate examination should be made upon the subject, with a view to the improvement of their organization, the system of instruction, and the number of districts and district schools, and the school tax for the present year be raised to the former rate of one mill, for the purpose of effecting the improvements now needed, and that should it be necessary a temporary loan for a few months in anticipation of the payment of school tax should be made. . . . Within a single year, our citizens from poverty and bankruptcy have again become prosperous and are again rising in affluence.”—(Chicago Democrat, March 13, 1844.)

The Democrat of April 4 had the following spicy paragraph: “Matrimony.—The Abolitionists and Whigs have been hugging, kissing and courting long enough and we think they had now better marry. The public are anxious to see the children of the two colored parties.”

The Journal of August 14, 1844, said: “We hope that those of our Whig friends who are Abolitionists will learn wisdom from the recent election. The Loco Abolitionists talk Liberty partyism but they do not vote it. Before the election many Locofocos pretend to be in favor of political Abolitionism, but when the day of election comes, they vote for the whole Locofoco ticket—John Wentworth and all.”

The most important political questions before the people of Cook County early in 1845 were the following: 1. War on the national bank. 2. A sub-treasury system. 3. Canal ticket excitement. 4. A state bank. 5. County and state taxation. 6. The tariff of 1842.

In the spring of 1846 the Democrats nominated Mr. Follansbee for mayor, the Whigs nominated Mr. Chapin, and the Abolitionists nominated Mr. Carpenter. Mr. Follansbee received 677 votes, Mr. Chapin 1,104 and Mr. Carpenter 229. This result was caused by a split in the ranks of the Democracy. The vote for interest on the school fund was as follows: For 12 per cent interest, 443 votes; for 10 per cent, seven votes; for 8 per cent, four votes. The Cook county vote for congressmen in 1846 was as follows: For Wentworth, Democrat, 2,412; for Kerr, Whig, 776; for Lovejoy, Abolitionist, 481. It should be added here that Mr. Wentworth was the only Illinois representative in Congress who in 1846 voted for the Wilmot Proviso.

Of course the most important question before Cook county in 1847 was the River and Harbor convention held here that year. In importance to Chicago then and ever since it overshadowed every other consideration at that time. However, the question of a new constitution was also considered at this date.

It was in 1847 at the time the Wilmot Proviso was considered by Congress that many leading men connected with the Democratic party left the same, owing to the manifest determination of the South to use that party in extending slavery to new territory. Mr. Wentworth, although a Democrat, came out in April, 1847, in favor of putting the words of the Wilmot Proviso in the proposed new State Constitution. For his course he received the abuse of the slavery wing of his own party.

In July, 1847, the Liberty party nominations in Cook county were as follows: For county clerk, James Kelly; recorder, James B. Doggett; probate justice, W. P. Caton; assessor and treasurer, T. P. Hamilton; surveyor, Robert White. The convention which nominated these candidates was held at the City Saloon, Chicago. The Democrat said in regard to this ticket: "It is no use, gentlemen, there were by far too many intelligent men at the Elgin convention who clearly saw the lamentable corruption of your party and your party leaders, to allow the faintest hope of your casting a respectable vote in any future election. . . . The scheme contemplates no less than filling the recorder's office with a most unprincipled 'bolter' and also filling the county clerk's office with a most unscrupulous and reckless Whig partisan. We urge and beseech our friends to veto this nefarious design." All parties appointed vigilance committees to attend the polls, and a fund to prosecute any man who should vote twice was raised. James A. Rees was the Whig candidate for recorder and Dr. E. S. Kimberly the Democratic candidate for the same office. Kimberly received 1,852 votes; Rees 419 votes and Egan, Whig, 746. For county clerk Davis, Democrat, received 1,842 votes and Wilson, Whig, 1,068 votes; for school commissioner Manierre received 2,580 votes and Cushing his opponent four votes.

The Democrat on December 21, 1847, said of the Peace convention here, held at the Tabernacle Baptist Church: "It has been called by a few foreigners (not citizens) and Abolitionists who under the pretext of being the friends of peace, have taken this course to give vent to their hostility to the government. Chicago has done nobly in raising troops for the war, and it is really too bad that she should be disgraced with such a meeting."

On March 11, 1848, an immense assemblage of the citizens gathered at the City Saloon to celebrate the non-partisan triumph of the municipal election. One of the ten resolutions adopted was as follows:

"Resolved, That we have met together as free men and as free men we will hereafter act; and that in our municipal elections neither the chains of party caucuses nor the mandates of tyrannous demagogues shall bind us; but we will make our selections and cast our votes irrespective of party politics—owing no allegiance but to the right—no fealty but to conscience."

This meeting was an attempt to break away from the chains of the old parties. Among those who took part were Charles Walker, Thomas Church, Alexander Lloyd, William Jones, John Finnerty, James H. Rees, Henry Smith, Eldin Granger, P. J. Denker and W. E. Jones; also were present the following men, who served as committee on resolutions: J. Y. Scammon, Ebenezer Peck, B. W. Raymond, Thomas A. Stewart, Hiram Hugunin, Asabel Pierce, E. Granger, John S. Wright and William B. Ogden. Charles V. Dyer, Philip Maxwell, James H. Woodworth, L. D. Boone, Stephen F. Gale, Elisha Woodsworth and E. W. Tracy likewise took part in the proceedings. The Whigs in the spring of 1848 succeeded in electing their candidate, James H. Woodworth, for mayor. The Democratic candidate was James Curtiss. Woodworth received 1,971 votes and Curtiss 1,361. Ambrose Burham, the Whig candidate for city marshal, was elected over Richard C. Ross, Democrat, by a vote of 1,973 to 1,265. Giles Spring, Whig candidate for city attorney, was elected over Patrick Ballingall, Democrat, by 1,912 to 1,312. The winning ticket in the spring of 1848 was called Independent.

The colored article in the proposed new constitution was designed to exclude free negroes from settling in the state. In the spring of 1848 the majority for the new constitution was 324; majority against the negro clause, 886; majority for the 2-mill tax, 423.

The Democrat of April 5, 1848, edited by John Wentworth, said: "The Whigs of this city are at last exhibiting signs of sanity. At their late convention they passed a vote of thanks to Hon. John Wentworth for his opposition to the extension of slavery, the tea and coffee taxation and his advocacy of harbor and river improvements."

At an immense independent meeting held in 1848, on which occasion J. H. Woodworth, mayor, presided, the assemblage adopted resolutions declaring that the Cook county citizens were opposed to any extension of slave territory; that slavery was a disgrace and a blot upon the good name of the country; that slavery should be excluded from Oregon, New Mexico, etc.; that Congress alone had executive authority to organize new territories and prohibit slavery therein; and that the pro-slavery attitude of the South meant the separation therefrom of the Northern wing of the Democracy. At this meeting the principal speakers were Henry Brown, Isaac N. Arnold, Thomas Hoyne, Dr. Daniel Brainard and George Manierre. This meeting was held on April 1, at the City saloon. The resolutions adopted favored river and harbor improvements. As showing the importance attached to the proceedings of this meeting, it should be stated that 752 names were signed to the call for the meeting. The cry at this time, not only in Cook county but throughout the whole North, was "Free territory, Free soil, Free speech and Free men."

An important political event in April, 1848, was an extended debate between J. Y. Scammon and J. Lisle Smith, both Whigs, as to what attitude the Whig party should assume at the Baltimore convention. Scammon represented the Northern or McLean wing of the Whigs and Smith represented the Southern or Clay wing. Several speeches were made by each and much interest was elicited in the discussion.

In 1848 the Abolition vote in Cook county for congressman was 472. That number was polled in this county for Owen Lovejoy for Congress. In the whole district Lovejoy received a total of 3,430 votes. The congressional campaign of 1848 was rendered noteworthy by the sharp contest between Wentworth and Scammon. In Cook county Wentworth received 2,183 votes and Scammon 1,921. The Democrat of September 12, 1848, said: "Preaching.—We have regular preaching every Sabbath afternoon—some of an apparently organized corps taking it upon them in turn to exhort the faithful and warn the unbelieving. The speeches are temperance, land reform, abolition, free trade and sailors' rights, just as the humor of the speaker leads him."

On July 30 the Whigs held an immense meeting to ratify the nomination of General Taylor for the presidency. Just returned from the Philadelphia convention were J. W. Norris, John J. Brown and Lisle Smith. This was an important meeting, as the Whigs practically adopted the national platform. Soon after the presidential nominations in 1848 the Whigs generally deserted Van Buren for Taylor and the Democrats deserted Van Buren for Cass. The Whigs took this course notwithstanding the fact that General Taylor was a heavy slave holder. Although the Whigs favored the Wilmot Proviso, yet they supported Taylor, who owned slaves. As a matter of fact the Whigs of this county in mass meeting assembled voted to lay the Wilmot Proviso on the table. John Wentworth declared that it was not right to bring slave labor in competition with white labor. Accordingly he favored the free homestead law and advocated giving to each man a farm in usufruct so long as he continued unable to purchase. This amounted to continued or extended preëmption rights, of which he must avail himself as soon as he was able. Wentworth also favored making all the offices of the general government elective by the will of the whole people. The preëmption right then existing was for one year.

The Rockford Free Press of April, 1849, contained the following notice: "It is a simple act of justice to Mr. Wentworth to say that his services to the cause of freedom, especially on the last night of the late session of Congress, are not and cannot be overrated. To him more than to any other man are California and New Mexico indebted for the defeat of a proposition made a few hours before adjournment, which, if successful, would have burdened them with the curse of slavery. Who that loves freedom does not thank John Wentworth for this?"

The Democratic nominations in this county were as follows: Coroner, Patrick Kelly; county commissioner, Charles Santer; sheriff, Isaac Cook; representatives, Francis C. Sherman and J. B. Witt. At this time Norman B. Judd was state senator for Cook and Lake counties. In 1848 Gerrett Smith was nominated for president by the Abolitionists. At first they were called Abolitionists, but later National Reformers. Of this party the presidential electors included the following from Cook county: Nathan H. Bolles, Mr. Nugent, Chauncy T. Gaston, Francis H. Taylor and Elias Smalley. At the convention which named these electors Nathan Bolles was chairman and F. H. Taylor secretary. The vote of the county by precincts at the November election of 1848 was as follows:

Thus it will be seen that the Free Soilers' ticket represented by Van Buren had grown immensely at the expense of all other parties. It had swallowed up the Abolitionists completely and had drawn largely from the ranks of the Whigs and the Democrats.

The Whigs of this portion of the state no sooner came into power than, as might have been expected, they began to make many changes in government offices, particularly in the postoffice department. After a time the Democrat, no longer able to control its wrath, made the following outcry on June 5, 1849: "With lying promises on their lips, the Whigs have come into power to perpetrate the worst kind of outrages on the people. Look out for them on the mail routes and in the postoffices. Let our friends proclaim their abuses and keep up their fire for reform. Let every mail irregularity be published and every missing letter or paper be proclaimed to the world."

A spirited election for judge and prosecuting attorney occurred in April, 1849. For judge, George Manierre received 849 votes, J. B. Thomas 1,228, and Giles Spring 1,525. For prosecuting attorney, Daniel McElroy received 1,890, C. Bentley 543, G. W. Gardiner 192, scattering 271. This was a Whig victory. So many postmasters were turned out of office in 1848 that Wentworth and other Democrats raised the cry of proscription. Thus in Chicago George W. Dole was appointed postmaster to supersede Mr. Wilson of the Journal, but the friends of the latter for the time succeeded in having the change revoked. In 1849 the Democrat favored the nomination of Thomas H. Benton, or "Old Bullion," for the presidency in 1850. At this time the Whigs, who supported Taylor, and the Free Soilers, who supported Van Buren, were at war with each other.

"Only Man Certain.—The only man certain of election in Cook county is Mr. Township Organization. He is upon every ticket."—(Democrat, November 1, 1849.)

In 1849, upon the question of adopting a new constitution, Cook county voted as follows: For the constitution, 1,067 votes; against the constitution, 384 votes. For the negro article of the constitution, 400 votes; against the negro article, 1,084 votes. For a 2-mill state tax, 1,019 votes; against the 2-mill tax, 489 votes. Although Cook county voted overwhelmingly against the negro article in the new constitution, it was adopted by a majority of nearly 30,000 votes in the state. The 2-mill tax carried by about 10,000 majority and the new constitution carried by nearly 40,000 majority.

Four years prior to 1849 John Wentworth, alone of the Illinois delegation in Congress, stood in favor of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, in favor of the Wilmot Proviso and of the internal improvements. In 1849 he was sustained in these views by half the Illinois delegation in Congress and by a large portion of the Legislature.

The municipal election of March, 1849, was remarkable owing to its lack of political excitement—not a convention to nominate candidates was held, the candidates announcing themselves independently and the people voted for whom they pleased without being influenced by public meetings or conventions. For mayor, James H. Woodworth received 2,668 votes, Mr. Wait 399, Mr. Kercheval 245, and Mr. Childs 22. It was noted at the time that it was a singular election and the question of slavery was held to be responsible. The old parties were breaking up on that question and already were laying the foundation of the new Republican party. Under the law of 1849-50 it was provided that every voter must reside in the town where he voted and must have been one year in the state.

A large meeting of citizens opposed to slavery was held on February 21, 1850. Mayor James H. Woodworth presided. The committee on resolutions were Thomas Hoyne, J. Y. Scammon, Mark Skinner, C. DeWolf, A. G. Throop, Thomas Richmond, E. B. Williams, James Breck, Jr., and George Manierre. The secretaries of the meeting were J. L. Scripps, D. M. Bradley, H. Krieze, Joseph Pollock and W. H. Bushnell. The vice-presidents were Henry L. Rucker, Daniel Brainard, J. Y. Scammon, Owen McCarthy, F. C. Sherman, James Curtiss, Andrew Smith, Peter Cure, E. C. Larned, A. Lloyd, Mark Skinner, I. N. Arnold, W. B. Snowhook, Grant Goodrich, P. L. Updike, Sylvester Marsh, Dr. Helmuth, C. Stoce, Dr. C. V. Dyer and N. B. Judd. The resolutions adopted opposed any concessions in Congress to the slave power. They opposed the act of Senator Douglas, who advocated leaving the question of slavery to be decided by the territories themselves, and favored the suppression of slavery in the District of Columbia. Very strong speeches were delivered by J. Y. Scammon, Thomas Hoyne, Doctor Maxwell, I. N. Arnold, Thomas Richmond, C. DeWolf and Dr. C. V. Dyer. Two of the resolutions adopted were as follows:

"Resolved, That we regard this question (slavery) as the question of paramount importance—one in which we forget all minor differences of party and opinion and hereby uniting as one man express our utter abhorrence of all compromises whereby the future extension of human slavery may be allowed or secured.

"Resolved, That there can be no compromises upon this question which do not involve crime upon the part of the North; and every Northern representative who hesitates to give his vote and influence at this crisis in favor of freedom's proviso or deserts his post knowingly misrepresents his constituents and betrays his trust."

In the spring of 1850 the Whigs nominated James Curtiss for mayor. The Democrats nominated L. D. Boone, and the Abolitionists or Free Soilers nominated L. C. Kercheval. At this time there were nine wards. Curtiss received 1,697 votes, Boone 1,227, and Kercheval 805. Thus the city was strongly Whig.

The Democrat of April 6, 1850, said: "We never knew such excitement in this region upon the slavery question, and this excitement is not confined to the districts of Congressmen Baker and Wentworth, but reliable men from other parts of the state assure us that the spell by which the politicians of the center and southern parts have held the noses of the people to the grindstone of slavery propagandism is broken. One of the causes of this excitement is the deception which has been practiced upon the people of the North by Northern men of Southern sympathies and principles." The people of Cook county were intensely interested in the proceedings of Congress on the slavery question. A Peace convention was held here in April, 1850. Mr. Wentworth refused longer to be a candidate for Congress. The Journal said: "The Wentworth dynasty is at an end." Dr. Richard S. Moloney was nominated by the Democracy for Congress to take the place of Mr. Wentworth. The latter in Congress voted against the fugitive slave law, while Daniel Webster stood alone of all the New England senators against the Wilmot Proviso. This act of Mr. Webster was declared to be his bid for the presidency. Churchill C. Coffing was the Whig candidate for Congress. W. B. Ogden was first nominated but withdrew before election. The Whigs were so broken up late in 1850 that they ran no regular ticket except for congressman and sheriff. In Cook county, Moloney, Democrat, received 2,863 votes; Coffing, Whig, 1,880, and Collins, Abolitionist, 110. The reason for the withdrawal of Mr. Ogden from the contest for Congress was owing, as he stated, to the little difference between himself and his opponent. The real question at issue was the slavery question, and the Democrats and Whigs at this time were nearly united. The consequence was that Moloney, himself a Free Soiler, was supported by many Whigs as well as by the Democrats.

The object of Clay's dromedary bill was thought here to be intended to extend slavery to New Mexico, Utah, etc. It was considered that all who favored it would repudiate the Wilmot Proviso, the Nicholson letter and the long-established doctrine that all countries are free until slavery should be established by positive law. People here believed that it meant the extension of slavery to all parts of the Union. Hence it was bitterly opposed. The Legislature of Illinois in 1850 instructed its delegation in Congress to vote for the Wilmot Proviso. They did so in a test vote on Clay's dromedary bill. When it was moved to insert in that bill the following amendment Douglas and Shields voted for it: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude otherwise than as a punishment for crime shall be allowed in either of the territories of Utah and New Mexico." All the South voted against this amendment and Cass, Clay and Webster voted with the South. Had six free state senators voted for it, it would have carried by twenty-nine to twenty-seven. On the same day the Senate passed the following as a part of the dromedary bill: "But no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposition of the soil nor establishing or prohibiting African slavery." Both Douglas and Shields voted against the amendment. They also voted against slavery in California and against the peon servitude clause. It was now clear to the people of Cook county that the South was so far wedded to the institution of slavery that they were willing to enslave poor white debtors.

In the spring of 1851 the Whigs decided not to nominate a regular ticket for the municipal election. At the spring election of 1851 for the first time at Chicago many voters were refused tickets; the voters had not fully complied with the new law. At this time Mr. Judd was senator and Messrs. Maxwell and Dyer were representatives. Walter S. Gurnee was elected mayor by the popular vote of all parties. Probably as many Whigs as Democrats voted for him. It amounted to a Whig victory and was so regarded. W. S. Gurnee received 3,032, James Curtiss 1,001, E. B. Williams 1,092, and J. Rogers 226. It was stated that 150 votes were refused in the First ward alone owing to irregularity. At this time the Journal was in favor of the nomination of Seward or Scott for the presidency in 1852. The people of this county at this time also were greatly interested in the fight in Congress on the Harbor bill. It was passed by the Senate and Fillmore promised to sign it if it passed the House. The real fight occurred in the latter. In 1851 the country began to look to Senator Douglas as a probable Democratic nominee for the presidency. Douglas himself took an active interest in local politics because he realized that if he desired the nomination for the presidency he should have the backing of his own community. In June, 1851, Mr. Skinner, Whig candidate for county judge, received 1,413 votes and Mr. Wilson, Democrat, 1,224 votes. The Democrat in 1848 and 1849 favored the nomination of Senator Benton for the presidency by the Democracy, but in 1851 came out for Senator Douglas.

The Temperance party in 1851-52 was strong in this vicinity, many in the old parties temporarily deserting the same to assist the new movement. At a convention of members of all parties held to nominate a Temperance ticket the following preamble and resolutions were passed:

"WHEREAS, The city of Chicago is now suffering deeply from pauperism, misery, crime, and enormous taxation, the direct, inevitable and legitimate result of retailing intoxicating drinks, therefore,

"Resolved, That the traffic in spirituous liquors as a beverage is dishonorable and immoral and should be treated as such.

"Resolved, That the citizens of Chicago now assembled in mass convention recommend the nomination and election of such men to fill the city offices for the ensuing year as will refuse to grant a license to any man to directly or indirectly injure his neighbor by selling him intoxicating liquors."

The Democrat of February 2, 1852, said: "The latter gentleman (Dr. Davis) gave instances of poverty, starvation and death which came under his observation the past season, all of which might be traced to the practice of candidates for offices freely paying out large sums of money for liquors with which to treat independent voters."

The Temperance people nominated A. G. Throop for mayor. B. W. Raymond had first been nominated by the Temperance party, but for reasons unknown withdrew in favor of Mr. Throop. The contest was an exciting one owing to the fight made by the liquor interests. At the nominating convention of the Temperance party the principal speakers were C. J. Hull and Thomas Dyer. The latter explained how the license clause had been clandestinely inserted in the law. He denied that the charter had contained such clause at the time he voted for it. Doctor Davis, William Bross and Doctor Palmer were appointed a committee to prepare an address to the people of Chicago. The Democrats nominated for mayor Peter Page. James Curtiss was an Independent candidate for mayor. The local issues in the spring of 1852 were as follows: 1. Temperance; 2. Reduction of taxes; 3. No increase of city debt; 4. No gratuities to lawyers; 5. No connection of the city government with private corporations; 6. All elections by the people. A. Burnam was the Temperance candidate for marshal, E. C. Stowell for treasurer, Grant Goodrich for city attorney, James Fitzsimmons for collector, and J. E. Thompson for surveyor. The license clause in the new charter was declared to have been surreptitiously inserted by Ebenezer Peck, although the latter denied the charge. At this time the practice of devoting money to buy liquor for voters was roundly denounced by the Temperance people. It was said during the campaign that one candidate for mayor in 1851 had given $3,000 for the purpose of buying liquor for voters.

The Democrat of February 4, 1852, said: "Candidates are abandoning the practice of buying men to go about for signers to call them to come out for office. This practice did very well for a respectable humbug when new. It is now old and is the meanest kind of humbug. It is to get men pledged on paper so that they cannot back out if a man that would suit them better should come out." The Democrat of February 5 said: "Since the friends of Temperance have resolved to support an independent ticket for city officers all the candidates are taking the pledge and you cannot get one of them within the smell of ardent spirits." The Democrat of February 9 said: "The Temperance ratification meeting was the largest and most enthusiastic ever held in our city. The meeting was the more crowded because it was understood that the high taxation and endless debt party in our city found Mr. Raymond's nomination in the way of their future financial schemes. Mr. Raymond accepts the nomination—not that he wants the office, but for the sake of carrying out important principles. This announcement was made amid immense applause." The Democrat of February 10 said: "Everyone knows that when the new charter was obtained it was obtained in order to allow a new increase of taxation so as to get us out of debt. No one suspected that our expenses were to be increased. It is not the new charter but extravagance that is to be censured." The Democrat of February 10 also said: "Heretofore candidates have been known by their drinking—now they are known by their refusing to drink. We declined to drink with a man yesterday and it was noised all over town that we were out for mayor." The Democrat of February 11 said: "City Retrenchment.—This is the question. There can be no other. Shall the people be taxed for gratuities to broken down politicians, for money to lay idle as deposits in banking institutions, or for anything else but an economical administration of the city government?" The Democrat of February 12 said: "Got Him Off at Last.—Those who wished to speculate on our city finances, those who never opposed taxation and endless debts, have proven too strong for the Sons of Temperance. Mr. Raymond has been frightened off the track. He is no longer a candidate for mayor." The Democrat of February 26 said: "It is proposed to add to our city debt $350,000 for hydraulic purposes and quite a large sum in addition for sewerage. This infant city of ours will soon be in debt $500,000. This before we have 50,000 population, making $10 to every man, woman and child within the city. Our debt is increasing every year and we see nothing in the future but insolvency and repudiation." The Democrat of February 27 said: "The City hall was crowded last night. The speaking was alternately eloquent and sarcastic. The dancing and drinking candidates were cut all to pieces. Rich stories of how certain bankers had tried to get the Temperance candidates to withdraw were told and also of how brandy drank in the room of Alderman Dodge was charged to lake shore protection." "Never before has such a delay (to publish statement of city finances) been made, and never before were there so many reasons for promptness. But it has been kept back. A lot of bankers are struggling to get a loan of $350,000 in order to get the deposits. They dare not have the true condition of our city finances known lest it might defeat their plans. Peck & Company ordered it kept back. There is but one great game on foot and that is to blind the eyes of the capitalists and our citizens to the awful condition of our city finances until a loan of $350,000 is obtained and divided up as deposits among the bankers and their attorneys, who have already silenced most of the presses in this city and are daily at work with money and liquor to carry our elections." . . . "Our city bonds have been sold within a short time for 82 cents on the dollar. If they are 82 cents now, what will they be when $350,000 more is added to our debt?"

The vote for mayor in the spring of 1852 was as follows: Gurnee, Democrat, 1,741; Throop, Temperance, 1,153; Curtiss, Independent, 1,295; Page, Mechanics' candidate, 271. Concerning this election the Democrat of March 4 said: "It is due to Mr. Gurnee to state that he is the only man in the whole state that could have been elected under the same circumstances." At this election the citizens of Chicago were called upon to vote on the first water works bonds—520 votes were polled against such an issue and 2,769 were for it.

The Democrat of March 3, 1852, said concerning the municipal election: "None of the defeated candidates should have any unpleasant feelings. There was nothing like personalities involved in the whole contest. There was a general cross-firing and confusing of opposition measures. . . . In times like these when candidates have to expend large sums of money a defeat leaves often very great embarrassment, and we regret to say that the time seems fast approaching when no poor man need run for office, as he cannot obtain it. . . . Some people say that there should be a law against expending money at elections."

The year 1852 is noted for the relentless and bitter attacks of the Democrat upon Ebenezer Peck. The nomination of General Scott for the presidency in June, 1852, was ratified by an immense meeting of the Whigs in June. A feature of the campaign of 1852 was the activity of the Democratic Invincible club of Chicago. In after years this organization became very prominent.

In 1852 John Wentworth was again a candidate for Congress. A mass convention of Democrats held at the City hall in September was addressed by Joshua R. Giddings and Samuel Lewis. In September the Whig convention nominated John Sears, Jr., and Samuel Marrs for representatives, A. A. Dexter for sheriff, John Filkins for Circuit court clerk and A. B. Wheeler for coroner. The Democratic county convention nominated Homer Wilmarth and William B. Egan for representatives, Cyrus C. Bradley for sheriff, Louis D. Hoard for clerk of the Circuit court, Austin Hines for coroner, and Norman B. Judd for senator. At this election the Whigs were divided. There was a Dutch wing and a Wilson wing. It was declared that Richard L. Wilson of the Journal made Whig principles secondary to his private interests. In September Senator Douglas spoke in Chicago on national issues and was listened to with intense interest by an immense assemblage. The motto of the Democrats in 1852 was as follows: "Our cause is just, so win we must, and this we mean to do; the Whigs we Polked in '44 we'll Pierce in '52."

Concerning the election of November, 1852, the Democrat said: "Chicago City Election.—We have been at many elections in our own city and we never knew one characterized by such bitter and vindictive personalities as that of Tuesday last."

At the presidential election in 1852 the Democrats polled in Cook county 3,767 votes, the Whigs 2,089, the Abolitionists 793, and the Dover Whigs 1,712. In 1852 the vote in this county on the constitutional amendments was as follows. For the amendments, 710 votes; against the amendments, 213 votes. The vote for congressman in 1852 was: Aldrich, Whig, 2,493; Wentworth, Democrat, 3,423; Collins, Abolitionist, 585. It should be noted that at all elections in Chicago and, indeed, in the county as a whole the foreign element cut a very important figure. Very often they held the balance of power and thus managed to secure what spoils they desired. In 1852 the question of a sewerage commission was taken into politics and was important.

The vote for mayor in the spring of 1853 was as follows: Charles M. Gray, 3,270; Josiah L. James, 991. For judge, George Manierre received 1,224 votes, R. S. Wilson 1,867, P. Ballingall 619, Alonzo Huntington 348. For treasurer, Edward Manierre received 2,526 votes and Mr. Gilbert 1,575. The municipal election of 1853 was quiet and uneventful. At the November election in 1853, for judge, H. L. Rucker received 2,647 votes and W. H. Davis 1,863. For clerk, C. B. Farwell received 3,272 and E. S. Kimberly 1,206.

W. J. Neuman

For school commissioner, J. W. Waughop received 2,622 and T. O. Wilson 1,818. For surveyor, J. Van Horn received 2,394 votes and J. E. Thompson 2,102 votes. For treasurer, H. N. Heald received 4,549 votes. The parties had united on the latter candidate. The fall elections of 1853 were likewise uneventful.

In February, 1854, the following call, signed by nearly four hundred citizens of Chicago, was issued: "The undersigned citizens of Chicago, opposed to the abrogation and restriction and prohibition of the Missouri Compromise Act, with a view to favor the introduction of slavery into Nebraska territory, would respectfully call a meeting to consider and protest against any action of Congress for the repeal or modification of an act which time and the public both have made sacred." This meeting was held on February 8 at South Market hall. Of this meeting ex-Mayor James Curtiss was chairman and H. T. Dickey, R. S. Blackwell, C. L. Wilson, George Manierre and Thomas Lonergan served as committee on resolutions. Strong measures against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise were adopted.

Early in 1854 the great speech of Senator Douglas on the Nebraska bill in Congress kindled immediate and emphatic opposition at Chicago. The Whigs and Abolitionists unitedly and many of the Democrats denounced his course and declared that the repeal of the Missouri Compromise was an unbearable outrage. When John Wentworth was asked how he was going to vote on the Nebraska bill he humorously answered, in imitation of some other members of Congress: "I will take an open, bold and manly course. I will either vote for the bill, or against it, or dodge it." In February, 1854, the Illinois Legislature adopted a resolution in opposition to the Douglas Nebraska bill. Meetings all over the state were held for the same purpose. The united ministers of Chicago in a stirring meeting protested against the passage of the bill. Douglas answered them in his usual able, artful and adroit fashion. Later a total of 504 ministers throughout the country protested against the passage of the bill. There was intense excitement here in April during the debate in Congress on the provisions of the bill. Everywhere throughout the West, including Cook county, people began to prepare to invade Kansas with the determination to make it a free state.

In the spring of 1854 the Maine or Prohibition law came prominently before the people of Chicago. The Temperance people organized and nominated A. G. Throop for mayor. At this time there were but two important questions, viz., the Nebraska bill and the Temperance cause. Opposed to the Temperance candidate was Isaac L. Milliken. At the election Mr. Throop received 2,432 votes and Mr. Milliken 3,517 votes. Thus in Chicago the liquor element was stronger than the Temperance element.

A large meeting of the Nebraska men was held in the spring.

Among the speakers were Isaac Cook, Dr. McVicker, E. H. Had-dock, W. H. King, C. Nye, Andrew Harvey and others. The opponents of the Nebraska bill attempted to control the proceedings of this meeting and partially succeeded. Against the bill speeches were delivered by R. S. Blackwell, S. S. Hayes, Peter Page, E. C. Larned, Hugh T. Dickey and Mark Skinner. Notwithstanding their efforts, however, resolutions favoring the passage of the bill were duly passed. Those in favor of the bill argued that the people of a territory should decide for themselves whether or not they wanted slavery. They thought it right to give back to the people the privilege which the Missouri Compromise took away in 1820. It should be stated, however, that the Democratic party here generally opposed the repeal of the Missouri Compromise.

On March 16, 1854, the German citizens held a large meeting and passed resolutions, two of which were as follows: "Resolved, That we especially consider Stephen A. Douglas as an ambitious and dangerous demagogue; that we consider him a blemish upon the honor of the state of Illinois and deem it our duty to do our best in ridding ourselves of him as quickly as possible. Resolved, That we express our deepest condemnation of the servile manner in which our Legislature has hurried itself into an endorsement of the Nebraska bill." Of this meeting G. Leverenz was chairman. It was held at North Market hall and at its close Senator Douglas was burned in effigy. Among the speakers were Messrs. Hoffman, Breck and Schlaegel. The people of the city generally condemned the burning of Senator Douglas in effigy. The Democrat said: "We have yet to hear the first word of approval of the burning of Judge Douglas in effigy on Thursday evening last. Every citizen from whom we have heard an expression of opinion condemns it in unmeasurable terms. However, in no city of the Union is there a more firmly settled or stronger feeling of opposition to Judge Douglas' Nebraska bill than in Chicago." The Journal of May 23 said: "While the passage of this iniquity is deplored, it is nevertheless politically considered a source of gratification, for it aroused the Whig party from a season of depression, despondency and gloom to action and vigorous life." That paper quoted the following from Algernon Sidney: "That which is not just is not law, and that which is not law ought not to be obeyed." A correspondent of the Democratic Press of August 24, 1854, said: "I have been a resident of the city for the last seventeen years; during all that time our elections have been a disgrace to a civilized community—on account of men made furious by whisky. Most of this time it has been hazardous even to life for a quiet and peaceable citizen to go near the polls to vote, and this state of things has been growing worse and worse until our whole elections turn on whisky and brutal force." The Democratic Press replied as follows: "What our correspondent says is true in a great measure.

Few elections have passed off since we came here to reside—seven years ago—without the perpetration of brutal outrages on peaceable citizens. It is also very true that our elections have at times been controlled by unscrupulous demagogues who have pandered to the basest passions of men by first inflaming them with whisky purchased for the express purpose and then inciting them to play the bully about the polls and frighten or drive away sober-minded and virtuous citizens by acts of violence, whose vote would probably change the result of the canvass.”

In August, 1854, Dr. John Evans was an Independent candidate for Congress. He opposed the Nebraska bill so far as it repealed the Missouri Compromise, favored the river and harbor appropriations and advocated a continuation of the new postal rates. At this time Isaac Cook was postmaster. Of course, he supported the administration and also supported the measures of Senator Douglas. It was in 1854 that the Douglas Democracy, at the head of whom were Isaac Cook and Collector Snowhook, established a paper here called The Times, for the dissemination and support of the views of the administration generally and of all the policies of Senator Douglas in particular. They attempted to read out of the Democratic party such men as Norman B. Judd, Francis C. Sherman, Judge Dickey, Judge Skinner, W. S. Gurnee, Colonel Taylor, Doctor Maxwell, S. S. Hayes and Alderman Dwyer, but were unable to do so. On September 1, at North Market hall, Senator Douglas attempted to explain to the satisfaction of Chicagoans his course in regard to slavery and his attitude on the Nebraska bill. At the meeting great opposition and disrespect to him were displayed. There were many interruptions and he was unable to finish his speech. A few days later Joshua R. Giddings, then in Chicago, answered Senator Douglas at an immense meeting called for the purpose. The Times from the first demanded that opposition to the Nebraska bill in the Democratic ranks should cease. On September 9 Lieutenant Governor Willard of Indiana delivered a powerful speech in opposition to the Nebraska bill and Knownothingism to an immense crowd in Dearborn park. He was answered by Senator Douglas the same evening. The Times denounced every person as an Abolitionist who did not support the measures of Senator Douglas. James H. Woodworth was the candidate of the Democracy for Congress and R. S. Blackwell the candidate of the Whigs.

The Nebraska bill completely divided the Cook county Democracy. The Free Soilers left that party and held a convention of their own. The Douglas wing convened at the United States court rooms and the Free Soil wing in the courthouse. The Free Soil Democracy refused to make the support of the Nebraska bill the test of Democracy in Cook county. The result was almost an equal division in the Democratic ranks. The Liberal or Free wing of the Democracy nominated Edward L. Mayo for Congress and the Douglas wing nominated J. B. Turner of Chicago. Mr. Woodworth was elected to Congress. He was the fusionist or Knownothing candidate.

In October, 1854, strong speeches for and against the Nebraska bill were made throughout the state, culminating in an immense meeting at Springfield. Senator Douglas delivered one of his masterly speeches and Abraham Lincoln answered in such a manner as to attract the attention of the whole country. Mr. Douglas thought it necessary to reply to Mr. Lincoln the following day, whereupon Senator Trumbull and Judge Breese spoke in opposition to Mr. Douglas. Speeches also were delivered by Mr. Calhoun, Col. E. D. Taylor and Colonel McClernand.

In 1854 the vote of Cook county for congressman was as follows: Mayo, 210; Turner, 1,175; Woodworth, 3,448; Blackwell, 467. The vote in Cook county this year for state treasurer was as follows: Moore, Democrat, 1,636; Miller, Whig, 3,644.

In November, 1854, Thomas H. Benton and James Shields passed through Chicago on their way to Washington. The election of November, 1854, was quiet and uneventful, as shown by the following extract from the Democratic Press of November 8: "Never in the history of the city have we had so quiet an election. The noise and confusion which have too often disgraced our city on such occasions were entirely dispensed with."

The municipal election of March, 1855, is remarkable in that not a candidate for mayor announced himself until within five days of the election. The Press of March 6 said: "It was unprecedented in the history of our city and we presume without parallel in any other municipal government in the country." The paper deplored the apathy shown and declared that the public should know every individual in office and who the candidates were to be in order to investigate their fitness for office." The election resulted as follows: For mayor, Levi D. Boone 3,185, Isaac L. Milliken 2,839; city attorney, J. T. Thompson 3,141, Patrick Ballingall 2,878; treasurer, W. F. DeWolf 3,072, Harris 2,827; collector, Jacob Russell 3,146, L. M. Wilson 2,846; surveyor, Greeley 3,206, Cloghe 2,797. This was a victory of those opposed to Democracy. It turned out afterward that the interests of private persons were alone considered at this election. The Press of March 6 said: "It is the old story. Demagogism has triumphed over public interests and an excited people have become the willing instruments of corrupt and scheming men. Our election today has no direct reference whatever to the interests of the city. Fitness for office, faithfulness, integrity, and the policy to be pursued are made to give way to a single question of caste and nationality. Several years ago party nominations for city office were abandoned. We see no reason for going back to them now, especially when both parties are alike intangible and irresponsible before the public."

During the spring of 1855 the Kansas-Nebraska question was elaborately, ably and bitterly discussed here by the press, the rostrum and the pulpit. The Times vehemently favored the position of Senator Douglas when all the other newspapers opposed it. The question of popular sovereignty was discussed and rediscussed. On October 11 Senator Trumbull delivered a powerful address here in opposition to the Douglas policies. About the same time Senator Douglas also delivered a speech of great power here, to an immense meeting. On October 17, at a large anti-Nebraska meeting held at the South Market hall, S. S. Hayes, a Democrat, opposed in a speech of great strength the measures advocated by Senator Douglas. Mr. Hayes, upon invitation, had interrupted Senator Douglas during the speech of the latter, but was not allowed to proceed. Strong resolutions condemning the attitude of Senator Douglas and the encroachment of slavery were adopted at this anti-Nebraska meeting. The Times was particularly severe with all who opposed Senator Douglas. The election of November, 1855, in Cook county resulted as follows: For county treasurer, John M. Gleeson 2,548, John L. Wilson 2,140; school commissioner, W. L. Greenleaf 2,756, J. W. Waughop 1,991; surveyor, Alexander Wolcott 2,582, John Van Horn 2,151.

"The Times of yesterday crows lustily over the result of the election in Chicago for county officers, claiming it as a victory of the Nebraska party. The fact is, no such political issue entered into the canvass, nor have our county elections for several years past been of a party character."—(Press, November 8, 1855.)

In February, 1856, L. M. Keith was nominated for mayor by the Douglas Democracy and Francis C. Sherman by the Nebraska Democrats. Mr. Keith refused to accept and Thomas Dyer was nominated in his stead by acclamation at a subsequent convention. The Democrats themselves were responsible for the reopening of the entire Nebraska question in Chicago. The spring campaign was very bitter. Personalities of the most insulting character were resorted to by the partisans. C. L. Wilson, editor of the Journal, criticised very sharply Thomas Hoyne, United States district attorney. This led to a personal encounter between the two late in February. A few minutes after the event the newsboys on the street were crying "'Ere's yer evenin' Joinel—great prize fight between Charley Wilson and Tom Hoyne." Sherman was called the anti-slavery extension candidate for mayor. Many Whigs voted for him. He was supported by such men as W. B. Ogden, J. Y. Scammon, Mark Skinner, F. A. Hoffman, J. M. Davis, E. C. Larned, John Wentworth and C. S. Blackwell. These men and others at an immense meeting on March 1 adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That we, the people of the city of Chicago, are opposed to party dictation in our municipal election; but inasmuch as the issue of freedom or slavery has been forced upon us in this canvass, we are compelled to accept it, and we resist the encroachment of the slave power and show our devotion to free principles by supporting for mayor Francis C. Sherman, the free laborer and advocate of freedom for all in the territories consecrated to freemen."

The Press of February 28 also said: "Money is flowing like water, it is said, in order to prostitute the city to the Douglas slavecrats. Let every man feel it his duty to put down the gross corruption." The vote for mayor and for president in 1856 was as follows:

WARDS.	MAYOR.		PRESIDENT.
	Dyer—Sherman.		Fremont—Buchanan.
First	264	598	787	330
Second	499	738	1,040	609
Third	374	464	702	475
Fourth	375	290	419	367
Fifth	621	763	1,190	795
Sixth	553	497	300	604
Seventh	999	219	600	703
Eighth	592	358	532	571
Ninth	433	191	327	352
	4,712	4,138	6,397	4,945

This occasioned intense joy to the supporters of Mr. Douglas, who thereupon projected a celebration where money flowed like water and the city, figuratively speaking, was turned upside down. Dyer was a Democrat, so also was Sherman. All not Democrats and all free Democrats united against Dyer. Hence his victory was considered by his friends an event which should be properly celebrated. The Press of March 5, 1856, said: "Chicago is disgraced—Dyer is elected. Yesterday demonstrated that in Chicago for once at least the men with principles stood no chance with the men with money and whisky. Never was there an election where the moral sense, the virtue, the intelligence and integrity of the whole community were so generally and so cordially united; and on the other hand the blacklegs and vagabonds of every hue and stripe went en masse for Dyer. The entire liquor interest also cast their vote for Dyer. . . . Money was used without stint. The basest falsehoods were constantly circulated against Mr. Sherman, by which almost the entire foreign vote was polled for Mr. Dyer. This combined with the liquor interest secured his election."

During the spring of 1856 the anti-slavery agitation continued in this county with unabated intensity. Never had the citizens been so profoundly moved as they were by the conduct of Southern Congressmen, Senators and press. Meetings denouncing every feature of slavery were held throughout the county during the entire year of 1856. The Republican party emerged from the ruins of the old parties—called into existence by principles such as never before had kindled emotions in the human heart. Clubs and wide-awakes everywhere paraded and resolutions denouncing slavery were of almost daily occurrence. On the other hand, Senator Douglas and his supporters, in order to weather the storm, exerted themselves with a force and a brilliancy worthy of a better cause. Even in the City Council the members were literally at war. Anti-Nebraska clubs clashed at public meetings and in the public streets. At the Nebraska convention held at Springfield the acts of delegates and of Congress were sustained, but the proceedings of that convention were denounced by the united press of Chicago, except the Times. At the Cook county Anti-Nebraska convention held in May, 1856, the nine wards of Chicago were represented by the following delegates: Mark Skinner, J. W. Waughop, D. R. Holt, J. C. Outhet, J. C. Haines, R. A. Williams, G. Schneider, Enos Ayres and J. H. Kinzie. The civil war in Kansas, the destruction of Lawrence and the violent and murderous acts of pro-slavery partisans in that territory aroused the wrath of Chicagoans opposed to slavery as nothing else had ever done. At an immense impromptu meeting held in May a large subscription was raised to assist the fight of the Free Soilers in Kansas. At one of these meetings Mr. Hoffman served as chairman and B. F. Downing as secretary. Speeches of great eloquence were delivered by Mark Skinner, Isaac N. Arnold, E. C. Larned, J. C. Vaughn, John Wentworth and Mr. Blackwell. Arnold's speech was one of unusual power, a portion being as follows:

"Violence reigns in Kansas—violence reigns in Washington. There is no security for a free man either in the heart of the country or in its extreme limits. The slave power is setting its heel upon freedom to crush out its heart's blood. But a few months have passed since the country was at peace. The senator who disgraces the state of Illinois (Douglas) and represents the slave power has endeavored to force slavery upon free soil, but that territory shall be free by the help of God. Why these outrages? Why these refugees fleeing from their homes—for their lives? These outrages are perpetrated under the sanction and authority of the United States Government. Shame upon such a Government! The issue must be met. It is slavery or freedom. The invaders must be repelled; the Government must be changed."

The speech of E. C. Larned was also particularly direct, incisive and brilliant. The following is an extract therefrom: "For the first time in American history the floor of the Senate chamber has been stained with the blood of a United States Senator. Why? Simply because he sustained the principles of liberty learned in Faneuil Hall, the Cradle of Liberty. O shame! Fellow citizens, can you refrain from tearing from their places of power the men who gave encouragement to this outrage? Has it come to this, a crime to love freedom? The battle is begun. Slavery or freedom must give way; they cannot exist together."

The Cook county delegation to the anti-Nebraska extension convention at Bloomington were Grant Goodrich, F. C. Sherman, W. James, A. Dolton, James Michie, George Schneider, John Wentworth, C. H. Ray, J. L. Scripps, C. L. Wilson, Samuel Hoad, A. Aiken, H. H. Yates, I. N. Arnold, N. B. Judd, J. W. Waughop and Mark Skinner. The convention adopted powerful resolutions against the Douglas policies. The convention was held late in May, 1856. On May 28, 1856, an immense meeting was held at Metropolitan hall to endorse and ratify the nominations made at the Bloomington convention. Among the speakers were O. H. Browning, Benton C. Cook, Governor Reeder of Kansas, Owen Lovejoy, always a favorite to Chicagoans, and Abraham Lincoln. A correspondent of the Democratic Press of May 29, 1856, said concerning Mr. Lincoln's speech:

"Abraham Lincoln of Springfield was next called out and made the speech of the occasion. Never has it been our fortune to listen to a more eloquent and masterly presentation of a subject. I shall not mar any of its fine proportions or brilliant passages by attempting even a synopsis of it. Mr. Lincoln must write it out and let it go before all the people. For an hour and a half he held the assemblage spell-bound by the power of his arguments, the intense irony of his invective and the deep earnestness and fervid brilliancy of his eloquence. When he concluded the audience sprang to their feet and cheer after cheer told how deeply their hearts had been touched and their souls warmed up to a generous enthusiasm."

Another immense meeting held at Metropolitan hall on May 31, 1856, continued the extraordinary movement against slavery extension. The 3,000 seats in the hall did not hold half of those who desired to hear the proceedings and an overflow meeting was held in the courthouse yard. Over the meeting in Metropolitan hall Norman B. Judd presided. On this occasion Chicago subscribed $15,000 in one evening to aid the Free Soil movement in Kansas. The speakers at the two or three different meetings were Norman B. Judd, Francis A. Hoffman, J. C. Vaughn, Dr. Egan, I. N. Arnold, J. H. Lane of Kansas and others. At this meeting it was determined to send a colony of 500 actual settlers to Kansas to aid the Free Soil movement. Means to provision this colony for one year were provided at this meeting. Among the heaviest subscribers to this fund were the following: T. B. Bryan, $1,000; a citizen, $600; Peter Page, $500; L. C. P. Freer, $500; Charles H. Walker, $500; Philo Carpenter, $500; Tuthill King, $500; A. G. Throop, $500; R. K. Swift & Company, $500; Jonathan Brown, $500; W. B. Ogden, $500; I. N. Arnold, $200; E. C. Arnold, $200; F. A. Hoffman, $200 and many others in equal or less amounts. At the meetings the enthusiasm had scarcely ever been paralleled in Chicago. The men present were so inspired by the righteousness of the cause that they subscribed rifles and other weapons and ammunition instead of money when they could not afford the latter. Almost a hundred men volunteered to go to Kansas to fight in favor of free soil. Mr. Arnold said in his speech at this meeting that the rifles were subscribed "to protect the settlers and punish the wild animals." When the meeting broke up at midnight so enthusiastic were the participants that they adjourned singing "The Star Spangled Banner." No such enthusiasm and determination in the cause of right had ever before been witnessed in this city.

In June, 1856, a committee of the Kansas Aid society reported that fifty citizens were ready to go to that territory. There was organized here before that date a Ladies' Kansas Aid society the object being to supply clothing, money, etc., to the destitute in Kansas territory. Mrs. H. C. Hibbard was president of this society. Late in June a company of about seventy men raised here left for Kansas, of whom the names of sixty-six were published in the Democratic Press of June 18. This company was not permitted to pass through the state of Missouri where slavery was in vogue. The border ruffians therein prevented their passage, the company returning, and the indignation at Chicago found vent in numerous mass meetings where fiery resolutions exhibited the wrath of the people. They had been permitted to pass half way through the state and were forcibly turned back. At one of these indignation meetings speeches were made by J. Y. Scammon, J. W. Waughop, Peter Page, I. N. Arnold, General Bruce of New York, J. C. Vaughan and others. During the entire period of the Kansas-Nebraska trouble this act was a burning coal upon the heart of Chicago.

The nomination of Colonel Fremont for the presidency by the Republicans was pleasing to the members of that party in Chicago. The Democratic Press called the ticket the People's party or Republican-Democratic. In June Gerrett Smith sent $500 here to be used as a contribution to the Kansas cause. On June 19, the nomination of Colonel Fremont was ratified here with bonfires, fire-crackers, pole-raising and speech-making throughout the city and at Dearborn park in particular. At one of these meetings William Bross, General Lane of Kansas, John Wentworth and Francis A. Hoffman were the speakers. During the summer and fall of 1856 emigrants for Kansas continued to pour through Chicago principally from New England. The organized Kansas Aid societies in New England were remarkably active at this time.

One of the meetings which denounced in unstinted terms the act of the Missourians in turning back the Chicago company was addressed by about a dozen of the most prominent citizens of this city.

Abraham Lincoln was advertised to speak here on July 19, 1856, on the Kansas question and as he was a great favorite already an immense crowd gathered to hear him. The Democratic Press reported the speech as follows: "A large meeting was held in Dearborn park on Saturday evening to hear the speech of Mr. Lincoln, and we have never seen an audience held so long a time in the open air to listen to an argumentative speech. The speaker was calm, clear and forcible, constantly referring to indisputable facts in our political history and drawing conclusions from them in favor of supporting the Anti-Nebraska platform and nominees that were unanswerable. He showed how the South does not put up her own men for the presidency but holds up the prize that the ambition of Northern men may make bids for it. He demonstrated in the strongest manner that the only issue now before us is freedom or slavery, that the perpetuity of our Union is dependent upon maintaining the former against the latter and held up the bugbear of disunion threatened by the slavery extensionists to the scorn and contempt it deserves."

B. S. Morris was president of the Fillmore club in August, 1856. Evidently he had refused to join the Republicans. James M. Richards was president of the Young Men's Fremont club in July, 1856. The Democrat, edited by John Wentworth, a lifelong Democrat, came out in 1856 for Fremont and Dayton. It also supported the Republican state ticket. Evidently Mr. Wentworth could not stand Douglas and his Nebraska measures. It was noted in August, 1856, that the Scandinavians were almost unitedly for the Republican ticket. At the Republican county convention of September 15, R. N. Hough, Mark Skinner, George W. Dole, Andrew Aiken, George Schneider, R. F. Clough and A. H. Dolton served as committee on resolutions. About this time ex-Governor Horatio Seymour of New York delivered a powerful speech here. Early in September Senator Douglas was advertised to speak in this city. The Democratic Press of September 8, said: "Stephen A. Douglas is announced by his paper (Times) to speak at the courthouse this evening. It was thought that he would not dare to show his face before a Chicago audience this fall after such a disgraceful and shameful proceeding as attended a public dinner in honor of the scoundrel Brooks who attempted to assassinate Senator Sumner. But he has the effrontery to do anything, and having failed to gain the respect of the people of Chicago, he now insults them with his presence."

Senator Douglas sustained himself in a speech of unusual adroitness and ability. He was answered the following day by Senator Trumbull. Concerning the Douglas speech the Democratic Press of September 9, said: "It was the old affair—his standing vindication. If it differed from his other efforts on such occasions it was only that it excelled even those in its unblushing impudence—its coarse and vulgar language—and its unpardonable and willful falseness."

At this time there was an enormous sale of Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous book, "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Her book "Dred" had just began to make its appearance here. At the Cook county Buchanan convention in September, 1856, Col. W. B. Snowhook was nominated for sheriff, L. M. Keith, clerk of the circuit court; Samuel Ashton, state senate; Patrick Ballingall prosecuting attorney. Doctor Helmuth, coroner, and H. L. Neihoff, William H. Davis, Jacob Rhiel and Elliott Anthony, representatives.

At an immense political meeting held at Barrington in September, 1856, Homer Wilmarth was chairman and S. W. Kingsbury secretary. William Jones delivered the principal speech and introduced resolutions favoring Fremont's nomination and in opposition to the Kansas outrage. One of the resolutions declared that "we are misrepresented in the United States Senate by the traitor Douglas."

In October the Fillmore county convention was held. T. J. S. Flint was nominated for the state senate; A. Clybourn, B. F. James, J. E. Craine, Eliphalet Wood, representatives. S. B. Buckley, sheriff. Jacob Russell, assessor and recorder, J. W. Chickering, prosecuting attorney and Dr. S. Brownell, coroner. The Republicans also held their county convention in October. Their candidates were as follows: State senator, Norman B. Judd; representatives, J. H. Dunham, George W. Morris, I. N. Arnold, A. S. C. Mueller; George P. Hanson, coroner; William L. Church, clerk of the circuit court; Carlos Haven of Lake county, prosecuting attorney. The presidential campaign of 1856 was spirited and brilliant in the extreme. The Republicans were united, enthusiastic, vigilant and held a continuous series of meetings day and night throughout the county. City affairs were likewise thoroughly investigated and exposed. It was charged that Mayor Dyer had borrowed money when not needed, had raised taxation, had a corrupt understanding with ward politicians, had favored unfairly the license system and had placed large sums in banking institutions, while at the same time continuing to borrow. The following articles from the Democrat of October 1 and 2, 1856, show something of the bitterness existing during this campaign:

"The opinion universally prevails among our citizens that a more corrupt Council than the present never disgraced out city. If it keeps on its course of corruption it will make a great man of Mayor Dyer if he continues to have the moral courage to send in his vetoes."

. . . "One-half of the Council were relied upon in the outset to vote against every item that would increase our city expenditures. Instead of there being one-half, quite two-thirds of the Council have gone over bag and baggage to a system of corruption that equals anything that has led California to call a vigilance committee. The Mayor has become alarmed and has interposed his veto to head off these rascally proceedings. Some of these vetoes have been sustained and some have been corruptly stricken down." "At every municipal election quarrels have been gotten up between different interests of this city, but it has made no difference which of those interests have won, the same class of men have handled our funds under different administrations and have been plundering our city all the while. The same men are in power under Dyer that were in power under Dr. Boone, Millikin, etc. They manage to raise fictitious issues about license laws, politics, temperance, etc., merely to hide the true character of their proceedings. While honest men are quarreling about the rate of license, etc., the aristocracy have been plundering the city to an enormous extent through city loans, city deposits, city contracts, etc. Last year the Nebraska party out of power complained of the party in power that the expenses of the city were enormous, that the public expenses were unnecessarily large, etc. This year the Nebraska party have got into power and the expenses are swelled enormously; and salaries which had been raised too high in all conscience last year are raised still higher this."

On October 4, 1856, the largest mass meeting ever held in Chicago up to that time convened at Metropolitan hall with overflow meetings elsewhere. Cassius M. Clay was the first speaker at Metropolitan hall. The Democratic Press said: "He made a powerful, argumentative and persuasive speech. We must say that this was one of the most effective speeches that has been delivered in this city during the campaign." Martin P. Sweet of Freeport, General Robinson of Kansas and General Nye of New York also delivered eloquent and memorable addresses. Buckner S. Morris in 1856 became the Fillmore candidate for governor of Illinois. He was a Free Soiler of southern antecedents. During the Civil War he was a secessionist. In 1856 the Maine law and the native American questions were almost wholly ignored by the Republican party in their zeal to elect their national ticket. At an immense Republican meeting held in Evanston, Dr. J. W. Ludlam served as chairman, Edward Murphy as secretary, and speeches were made by Norman B. Judd, I. N. Arnold and L. F. Bingham. On October 18, the largest meeting ever held in Chicago up to date, assembled here. It was estimated that not less than 25,000 people were on the streets. Nathaniel P. Banks delivered a speech two hours in length on the West side of the Public Square. Schuyler Colfax delivered a speech at an overflow meeting. So also did Frederick Hecker. This was the most imposing day of the campaign. The meetings were spirited in the extreme; parades were constantly passing through the streets and at night bonfires and fire crackers illuminated the sky.

On October 23, another meeting was held at Blue Island and on that occasion there were present N. B. Judd, I. N. Arnold, John Wentworth, General Nye of New York, William Bross, J. F. Farnsworth, J. C. Vaughan and George C. Bates, all of whom at different meetings delivered rousing Republican speeches. Late in October Frederick Douglas lectured here on the subject of "Freedom," his address amounting to a stirring campaign speech. On October 25, a large Douglas meeting was held at Dearborn park, on which occasion speeches were made by the following men: Colonel Richardson, General Cass, Colonel Preston of Kentucky, J. L. Robinson of Indiana, C. H. Constable, a presidential elector and others. Glee clubs paraded the streets and sang campaign songs and torchlight processions were in evidence everywhere. Unfortunately Senator Douglas was too ill to take an active part. The same night a Fremont meeting was held at Metropolitan hall. The Speakers were Gen. Mitchell Sandford of New York, Rev. Theo. Parker, General Nye and George C. Bates of California. This meeting also had its glee clubs, parades and fire works. The entire county in 1856 was thoroughly canvassed by all parties. Late in October a Fremont meeting was held at Thornton station.

Several residents there delivered addresses as did also Owen Lovejoy, John Wentworth, F. A. Hoffman and others. On November 1, at night the Republicans held a mass meeting on the West side of the courthouse square on which occasion all candidates who were present were called out and given a chance to be seen and heard by the public. Senator Douglas viewed these proceedings from the window of his office adjacent. It should be noted at this point that on election day, November 4, 1856, strong barricades were erected around every city polling place. This was the first time such a step seemed necessary. All parties wound up the campaign on the night of November 3, with meetings and parades. The Democratic Press said after the election:

"Chicago has never witnessed anything like the enthusiasm and excitement which prevailed all classes of citizens last night. Soon after dark thousands began to assemble at the corner of Wabash avenue and Water street. Eight thousand torches had been provided. Before eight o'clock they were all given out and the cry was still for more."

Election day was November 4, 1856. On that day all of the saloons of Chicago were wide open. In the "Bloody Seventh" Ward fights and riots occurred throughout the day. That ward was on the West Side from Sangamon and Morgan. The Tremont house was the headquarters for news of the election. For sheriff, Wilson received 6,482 votes; Snowhook 4,656 and Buckley 306. The vote throughout the country, particularly in Cook county, was immensely gratifying to the Republicans notwithstanding the national defeat. On November 12, the supporters of Buchanan held an immense celebration on which occasion a congratulatory speech was delivered by Senator Douglas. Mr. Farnsworth, candidate for Congress, was elected by a large majority. The Republicans regarded the result as a Republican triumph. The ultimate curtailment of slavery was pointed and emphatic and certainly foreshadowed by this election. The moral effect was with the Republicans; slavery-extension was doomed. On December 10 the Republicans held a banquet at the Tremont house to celebrate their victory. On this occasion the speakers were Owen Lovejoy, Abraham Lincoln, James Curtiss, Ebenezer Peck, Dr. Egan, E. C. Larned, J. Y. Scammon and others. Mr. Lincoln spoke to the toast "The Union," and the Democratic Press of December 11 notes his speech thus:

"He (Lincoln) maintained that the liberty for which we contended could best be obtained by a firm, a steady adherence to the Union. As Webster said, 'Not Liberty without Union, nor Union without Liberty, but Union and Liberty, now and forever, one and inseparable.' The speaker referred to the anecdote of the boy who was talking to another as to whether General Jackson could ever get to heaven. Said the boy: 'He'd get there if he had a mind to.' So was it with Colonel Bissell—he'd do whatever he had a mind to. He said our Government was based upon public opinion and whenever that changes so does the Government. Equality of men has been our central idea, and although we have progressed, yet we have been patient to a wonderful degree with certain inequalities that existed. We must change these inequalities—we must reform public opinion—we must found one principle—one central idea in the hearts of the people, that slavery is sectional and that freedom is national and we will not fail to achieve the victory. We must drown the cry now raised of equality of states, by the cry, 'All men are created equal.'"

Late in 1856 the Kansas Excelsior Joint Stock company with a capital of $20,000 was organized here. The object was to locate, purchase and settle upon a whole township in Kansas. At the city Republican convention in February, 1857, John Wentworth was nominated for Mayor, C. N. Holden city treasurer and John C. Miller city attorney. At the meeting which ratified the nominations Abraham Lincoln was present and delivered an address and Mr. Wentworth also spoke, outlining what he expected to do if elected. In February the Times called for a meeting of all who were opposed to the Republicans. In April a German colony of 800 persons to form a settlement in Kansas was organized here. They first dispatched three commissioners to that territory to make preliminary arrangements; twenty families started westward on April 18. The municipal election of 1857 resulted in a triumph for the Republican party. The Press of March said:

"It will be seen that Chicago is thoroughly Republican in sentiment and that the home of Stephen A. Douglas continues to stamp with the seal of its unqualified reprobation the political course of that arch-demagogue and traitor to freedom. No stronger evidence of that fact can be given than the election of yesterday affords."

"The Dyer administration has closed in a succession of disgraceful scenes such as have never on any former occasion been known in our city. We have had disturbances more or less serious in their nature. We have had one riot. Seldom has an election passed without its share of fights and fracas, but never before has the entire weight of the municipal government been thrown so openly and so entirely in countenance, in support, and we may add in participation with open violations of law and order and the rights of our citizens as men and voters as on yesterday. . . . Altogether, the election was one of the most disgraceful that has ever taken place in Chicago. In all the wards drunkenness and violence abounded—in some of them, ruled triumphant throughout the day."

"It was the settled purpose of the opponents of the Republican candidates to make the polls in the most closely contested wards the theater of disorder and outrage, to which end the base tools of baser men were freely plied with liquor and their excitable natures thus wrought to frenzy were purposely directed to prevent the peaceful exercise of the voters' right. . . . The election has passed. We trust that it will stand without a parallel in the annals of Chicago. The apathy, the unconcern, the inattention of our business men and those who have the largest interest at stake, a year ago threw Chicago into the control of the worst municipal government in origin, progress and termination that ever cursed the city."

It was during the summer of 1857 that candidates for the presidency in 1860 began to be proposed. Douglas was beaten by Pierce in 1852 and by Buchanan in 1856. He regarded his most formidable competitor in 1860 to be Breckenridge. The famous speech of Mr. Douglas at Springfield in June before the House of Representatives was considered by the South as his bid for the presidency. "The great object of Mr. Douglas is to keep himself before the people; and as the respectable portion of his old friends in Chicago did not see fit to call him out, it was contrived (and very probably by his own suggestion) to have the United States Grand Jury at Springfield come to the rescue."—(Daily Press, June 16, 1857.) The questions discussed were Utah, Dred Scott and Kansas. He said, "root out the evil in Utah." He favored sustaining the Dred Scott case and skillfully answered attacks upon him concerning his attitude on the Kansas question. Immediately after this speech was delivered there arose from all parts of the state a general demand that Abraham Lincoln should answer him. This Mr. Lincoln proceeded to do. The following concerning that answer was published at the time:

"The reputation of its distinguished author will secure for it a careful perusal. Of all the leading men of the day none follows more closely in the footsteps of the sages of the Revolutionary period than Lincoln. The antagonism between the sentiment and moral tone of this speech of Lincoln and of that of Douglas is strongly marked and complete. They differ fundamentally and radically. They spring from opposite theories of the inherent rights of man and of the true intent and duty of government."

"We, down here in the center (Springfield), consider Lincoln's speech an eloquent answer to the one delivered in this city by Douglas. It had the necessary fire in it and the power through it to crush out Douglas' pompous and flippant effort. Occasionally Lincoln would burst forth with the very grandest swell of eloquence. Douglas when he sees Lincoln's speech will see in it an argument he cannot answer and one that will stand in his way for more years than one. Our town people were as a matter of course delighted with it."

At a large meeting held in June, 1857, Gurdon S. Hubbard presided. Gerrett Smith delivered a speech of great strength on the unconstitutionality of the fugitive slave law and against the extension of slavery into the territories. Senator Trumbull thoroughly answered Senator Douglas in a speech of nearly three hours' duration while here in the summer of 1857. At the November election of 1857 the Republicans were again triumphant. The vote for county judge will illustrate about the majority on the whole ticket. For county judge, W. T. Barron, Republican, 6,000; Arno Voss, Democrat, 4,406; B. F. James, American, 177; scattering, 67. Charles B. Farwell was elected county clerk, August B. Boyden county treasurer, W. L. Greenleaf school commissioner and Ed. Bixley surveyor; all Republicans. The average Republican majority throughout the county was about 1,730. No polls were opened in Cicero and the returns of Lemont were thrown out for defects. The Press of November said: "The victory in Cook county in the election of Republican county officers on Tuesday last was a triumph worthy to be made note of. It will be remembered, certainly, by the defeated. It should be proclaimed as widely at least, as our opponents would have trumpeted their victory had victory been theirs. Had the Gleason and McCarthy ticket been successful the Border Ruffian press from the Washington Union down to the county organ (Times) of the most petty postmaster, would have given the figures and chuckled hugely over the indorsement therein claimed for Douglas and his political gospel. We look back to the election of Tuesday with pleasure. Our Republicans turned out nobly; our honest German Republicans and our Scandinavians were out in full force."

Thomas J. Dolger

The Chicago Democrat and the Chicago Democratic Press, still flying their own names and invoking the shades of the immortal Jackson, were yet thundering for the cause of the Republican party in November, 1857. Senator Douglas was humorously called "The Dwarf Giant." On November 1, he delivered a two-hours' speech here covering the whole ground of the slavery question and dwelling particularly upon negro equality and popular sovereignty. He said that "if the black Republicans could have their way, the blacks will push us from our sidewalks, elbow us out of our car seats, stink us out of our places of worship and everywhere overrun and overwhelm us." Late in 1857 he reversed his position on the Kansas question in a speech delivered in the United States Senate. His friends in Cook county ratified his changed views.

At a large Republican meeting held January 30, 1858, at North Market hall speeches were delivered by Messrs. Hoffman, Sturtevant, Larned, Wentworth, and Bross. Frank Lombard sang several campaign songs. About the same time at a mass meeting of the Germans, Messrs. Arnold, Gale, and Schneider of the Staats Zeitung delivered addresses. At the convention of the Democrats on January 30, 1858, to nominate candidates for municipal offices E. Van Buren served as chairman and Thomas Lonergan as secretary. The meeting was held at Light Guard hall. Among those who took part were W. Y. Daniels, D. Stuart, B. Y. Semmes and Messrs. Kennedy, Anderson, McHugh, Woodman, Diversey, Smith, Allen, Sherman and Snowhook. Mr. Sherman objected to the use of his name as a member of the committee on permanent organization, but Mr. Stuart declared the name should remain there "to show that Sherman had returned from his backsliding from the Democratic party." At this convention Dr. Daniel Brainard was nominated for Mayor and H. D. Colvin for treasurer. At the Republican city convention in February, 1858, John C. Haines was nominated for mayor, Elliott Anthony city attorney, Alonzo Harvey treasurer, Alexander Wolcott surveyor. The campaign of March, 1858, was very spirited. Ward meetings and mass meetings were of almost daily occurrence. The Press of March 25 said, "The most exciting election for years takes place today. The most intense feeling prevails." It was generally concluded that the result meant either the endorsement of the Douglas policies or the reverse. As a matter of fact the eyes of the entire country were fixed upon Chicago during this election.

Senator Douglas by this time had changed his ultra attitude and was nearer what his Northern friends desired he should be—really opposed to the extension of slavery. At the election Mr. Wentworth offered $100 reward for the detection and conviction for false voting. So far as known, for the first time at this election, betters who lost wagers upon the election were required to saw wood upon the public square as a penalty. Henry Greenebaum lost thus to G. F. Leverenz. Greenebaum thereupon sawed wood on the courthouse square beginning at ten o'clock A. M. In the same way Mr. Weihe lost to Mr. Lochbeiler and his punishment was about the same. An admiring crowd viewed the interesting proceedings. It should be noted that the Buchanan supporters favored the Lecompton constitution and tried to make it a basis of Democracy, but Douglas took a stand against such a step and hence caused an important division in the Democratic ranks.

The struggle in Congress on the Lecompton constitution was viewed with concern and emotion by the people of Cook county. At the time Senator Douglas delivered his famous speech in the spring of 1858 in the Senate there was an unprecedented rush there to hear him. As a matter of fact he practically sided with the Republicans on that question and against the Buchanan administration and the South. During the speeches made in Congress at this time Mr. Farnsworth, Congressman from this district, declared defiantly in the House that his consent would never be given for another slave state. The Lecompton constitution was killed in the House. Crittenden's amendments were adopted. All of the ten wards in April, 1858, elected Republican county supervisors. The towns of South, West and North Chicago elected very generally Republicans to office. This was true also in the entire county with few exceptions.

The following were the Cook county delegates to the Democratic state convention: Daniel Brainard, S. S. Hayes, H. D. Colvin, J. B. Vaughan, E. S. Kimberly, Dennis Coughlin, Edmund Barrett, E. Van Buren, J. F. D. Elliot, Nathan Allen, B. F. Bradley, P. A. Hoyne, H. A. Clark, William Price, Hugh Maher, W. Bateham, J. W. Bell, J. W. Sheahan, W. W. Drummond, J. B. Bradwell, H. H. Honore, D. A. Gage, Harvey Danks, R. T. Merrick, J. T. O'Bannon, O. L. Hodge, J. L. Marsh, T. P. Abell, W. W. Jackson, I. H. Roberts, L. D. Boone, Charles Welch and J. C. Smith.

In the spring of 1858 the town of New Trier went Republican for the first time in its history. The Democracy in this county was hopelessly divided this year. The Douglas wing and the Buchanan wing were far apart in their views and of this fact advantage was taken by the Republicans. Isaac Cook, postmaster, headed the Buchanan wing of the Democracy. His followers assembled at the recorder's court room and the Douglas wing at the Democratic hall. The Buchanan state convention of the spring of 1858 did not nominate state candidates but was considered a bluff by Buchanan supporters to secure concessions from Senator Douglas.

The Republican state convention was held at Springfield July 16, 1858. Norman B. Judd was a member of the Republican Central committee. To this convention Cook county sent thirty-eight delegates. Over one hundred additional persons interested in the outcome also went to Springfield. This convention passed resolutions of great strength against prevailing Democratic doctrines. They reaffirmed the Republican platform and declared for Abraham Lincoln for the United States Senate to succeed Senator Douglas. They also complimented Senator Trumbull on his Legislative record. The Dred Scott decision was repudiated and the power of Congress over the territories affirmed. At this convention Cook county politicians bore the banner—"Cook County for Abraham Lincoln." A delegate arose and said he had but one serious fault to find with the banner. It seemed too narrow in sentiment and application; he therefore desired to amend it so as to read, "Illinois for Abraham Lincoln." His amendment was carried amid such a whirlwind of applause as those present had never before witnessed. The entire convention sprang to its feet, gave three times three cheers for the new banner, whereupon the amended resolution was passed amid such applause and such feeling as to wring tears from the eyes of many present. In his great speech at this convention Mr. Lincoln used these memorable words: "A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe this Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved. I do not expect the house to fall, but I do expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing or all the other."

The Press and Tribune of July 14 said: "The masterly refutation of the leading points in Senator Douglas' speech, made by Hon. Abraham Lincoln in his speech of Saturday evening last, is a subject of constant congratulation among the political and personal friends of the latter gentleman. It is desirable for the good of the cause that the two speeches go out side by side broadcast over the State."

Upon his return from Congress in July, 1858, Senator Douglas was given a magnificent reception by the Cook county Democracy. He was received at the railway station on the lake front by an immense crowd and escorted to the Tremont house and there immediately delivered a speech from the balcony. The Times declared that 30,000 people heard this speech. The Press and Tribune figured the number at from 12,000 to 15,000. The following night a crowd estimated at 12,000 heard Mr. Lincoln's reply here to Senator Douglas. Mr. Lincoln also spoke from the Tremont house balcony.

"The Times publishes Douglas' speech twenty-four hours after everybody had read it in the Press and Tribune. It promises to insert Lincoln's speech tomorrow. We doubt whether Douglas will allow it. We make the Times an offer: We will publish the speeches of Douglas and Lincoln side by side in our weekly of this week if the Times will do the same. Dare you do it, neighbor? Dare you let the Democrats of the rural districts read both sides of the questions? Are you afraid of free speech and free discussions?"—(Press and Tribune, July 12, 1858.)

"Hurried and imperfect as his preparation for a lengthy and important effort must have been, we can point to the speech itself as signal evidence of Mr. Lincoln's thorough and appreciative acquaintance with the facts of the country's political history, his devotion to the Republican cause, his eminent ability as a controversialist and his sterling worth and honesty as a citizen and a statesman. More than that: We point to it as a clear, comprehensive and overwhelming refutation of the sophistries and charlatanisms with which Senator Douglas had only twenty-four hours before enveloped the questions discussed and the momentous consequences involved. Plain in form of expression, in fact characteristically idiomatic in its construction, without a trace of rhetorical display for effect, with no appeals to the passions or prejudices of his hearers—it is a clear exposition of political truth—an epitome of the policy of his party—a sovereign prescription in its recommendations and suggestions for the disorders of the times. We can proudly compare its honest and indisputable statements of fact—its legitimate and logical deductions therefrom—its candid review of the opinions of his opponents, with the equivocations, subterfuges, concealments, misstatements, bad logic and bad manners of the Senator. We shall show our confidence in the superiority of Mr. Lincoln's speech—whether considered as an oratorical effect or as a document for political effect—by printing the two speeches side by side in the weekly Press and Tribune and trusting the judgment of their merits to the thirty thousand readers to whom that sheet will be carried."—(Press and Tribune, July 12, 1858.)

R. R. Hitt, stenographer, took down in shorthand the above mentioned speeches, both of Douglas and Lincoln and they were reproduced and used during the campaign of 1858. In September, 1858, Carl Schurz of Wisconsin spoke here in the cause of the Republicans. The most noticeable part of his speech was a telling analysis of popular sovereignty. He declared that "this was the first successful attempt in the history of the country to raise slavery from an obnoxious fact to a national principle. It was the first broad declaration that slavery had rights outside of the local law which made it possible—that it was the sister and the equal of freedom under the American flag." In September, 1858, Isaac Cook's county convention, as it was called, met at the courthouse. This convention declared in favor of the Buchanan administration and favored the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, condemned the anti-Democratic course pursued by Senator Douglas and his coadjutors from Illinois and their affiliations with their allies the black Republicans, and objected to his attempt to advance his personal interests and gratify his unbounded ambition by advocating doctrines repugnant to the people of the United States. At the Republican county convention I. N. Arnold was declared to be the choice of the Republicans for Congress. The Democrats requested Mr. Wentworth to run for the senate in opposition to Mr. Lincoln. At this time Mr. Douglas lived at the Lake View hotel. On July 16, one of his first great speeches was delivered at Bloomington. Mr. Lincoln was present but deferred an answer to a subsequent date. On July 17, both delivered powerful speeches at Springfield. It was at this time that the demand arose for Lincoln and Douglas to stump the state together, though the latter began his campaign before a conclusion was arrived at. Attached to his train was a cannon which was fired upon entering a city to call the people together. On July 23, the Buchanan Democrats held a large meeting here on which occasion the Douglas wing endeavored to control it. R. J. Hamilton presided and Col. R. B. Carpenter delivered the principal speech. He contended that Douglas and his followers were "bolters" from the national Democracy. Immediately following this meeting Mr. Lincoln challenged Mr. Douglas to public debate. Finally Mr. Douglas accepted the challenge. The result is history.

The Buchanan wing of the Cook county Democracy, in September, 1858, nominated Col. R. J. Hamilton for sheriff and M. Shaughnessy for coroner. At a Republican meeting held here October 6, 1858, Frank Blair, of Missouri, Senator Dolittle, of Wisconsin and Cassius M. Clay, of Kentucky, were the speakers. On October 18, 1858, at Metropolitan hall, the Douglas Democracy held a rousing meeting at which S. S. Hayes, E. A. Van Buren, Frank C. Sherman, Dr. Hahn and others were the speakers. At a German Republican meeting at Metropolitan hall, October 25, 1858, Frederick Hecker, of St. Clair county, Francis A. Hoffman and George Schneider delivered addresses. At a large Republican meeting at Thornton, October 26, there were present about 1,000 persons. Schuyler Colfax in a rousing speech sustained Republican principles; John Wentworth and A. C. Hensing were also speakers. On October 26, 1858, Salmon P. Chase entertained Chicago Republicans with a speech two hours in length. Owen Lovejoy was called out and delivered one of his eloquent addresses, continuing for half an hour; Mr. Lovejoy also spoke at West Market hall; Ex-Gov. W. F. Johnson, of Pennsylvania, was also here.—The Press and Tribune thus referred to the Lovejoy speech: "He was logical, brilliant, witty, sarcastic, and pathetic by turns, and eloquent all the while. There was not a man who listened to his burning words, fervent appeals, and terrific denunciations, who did not feel that it was good for him to be there."

The Douglas Democracy also held a large meeting at Metropolitan hall and were entertained for three hours by an extremely eloquent and sarcastic speech from Henry Clay Dean of Iowa. He was succeeded by Lieut.-Gov. McComas. In the issue of October 29, the Tribune editorially published a splendid eulogium of Abraham Lincoln. Both parties on Saturday, November 1, held strong meetings in every part of the county, and particularly was Chicago brilliant with torch light processions and with eloquent speeches from its most distinguished orators. The Press and Tribune of November 2 said:

*"Citizens of Chicago—*This is the last appeal we can make to you in behalf of the everlasting right before you cast your votes in the most important election you have ever participated in. For many months the eyes of the Union have been fastened upon you. From the forests of Maine to the lakes of Minnesota it is believed that the destiny of the American people hinges on the event in Illinois today. We believe so. You believe so. It is a most grave and serious trust that is reposed in your hands." . . . The Douglasites were groaning and cursing alternately at the prospects of fair weather today, enabling all the voters to come to the polls. Remember that this day, fair or foul will never come again; and that every Irishman in the city limits will be on hand, voting twice if he can though he has to swim to the polls. Republicans of Chicago, do you the same thing if need be."

When the returns of the election of November, 1858, were counted it was found that Mr. Farnsworth, Republican candidate for Congress, had received 10,109 votes, Mr. Dyer, Douglas Democracy, 8,259 and Mr. Black, Breckinridge Democracy, 304 votes. This was the Cook county vote and indicated the majority of the rest of the ticket. On November 17, 1858, Senator Douglas, who had been absent, was given a splendid ovation upon his return and delivered one of his characteristic and artful addresses to an immense audience from the balcony of the Tremont house.

In December, 1858, and January, 1859, Chicago was called upon to consider a new city charter. One was prepared here and was called by the Republicans "Tom Dyer's Charter" and also the "Le-compton Charter." The Press and Tribune charged that Mr. Wentworth desired the passage by the Legislature, of the Dyer charter, but this was denied by Mr. Wentworth. At this Time Ebenezer Peck and Norman B. Judd were the objects of sharp and sarcastic attacks in the newspaper edited by Mr. Wentworth.

When it became necessary to select a new municipal ticket in the Spring of 1859, the important questions were whether the last administration had been economical, successful and fair. The Tribune of February 21 said: "The city has never had an administration that has more honestly and faithfully appropriated its revenues. During the year the city has not lost by defalcation or peculation a single dollar. . . . When Dyer's administration went out of power in March, 1857, it had consumed the proceeds of fourteen mills taxation and all the other revenues it could lay its hands upon. It also ate up one hundred thousand dollars of borrowed money and added the same to the permanent debt of the city, on which Wentworth and Haines have since been paying the interest; and over and above this it bequeathed to its successors a legacy of $194,092 of debts which the Republicans have since been struggling to pay. In other words the expenses of the Dyer administration in a single year exceeded its income by $294,092. Wentworth came into power in March, 1857. He caused a tax of seventeen mills to be levied—fifteen outside of the lamp districts and largely increased the revenues from fines and licenses. He managed to carry on the government without adding to the funded debt, and reduced to some extent the floating debt. He paid $119,003 of Dyer's debts, leaving $75,089 for Haines to pay. But there were turned over for Haines to pay various items, such as $34,000 for improving the courthouse and square; $21,152 bonds of George E. Lee, belonging to the funded debt which had fallen due; $21,602 for improving Dearborn park, contracted for under Wentworth; $20,839 belonging to the sewerage fund collected in 1857; and $4,919 for the steam engine 'Long John,' besides some small items, making in all $110,216. So that in truth when Haines came into office he found a floating debt upon his hands amounting to $185,305. He has reduced the floating debt to $131,300, which is less by $53,945 than he found it a year ago. Wentworth levied a general tax of seventeen mills inside, and fifteen mills outside of the lamp districts, which yielded him $567,000. Haines levied thirteen mills inside and eleven mills outside of the lamp district, which yielded him $430,000. Consequently the taxes this year are $137,000 lighter than last year. All the outstanding floating debt was created by the last Democratic administration and not a dime of it by either Wentworth or Haines."

The Democrats nominated M. D. Gilman for mayor and the Republicans nominated John C. Haines, the latter being re-nominated. His administration was abundantly satisfactory to the Republicans at least. At this time Dennis Coughlin of the "Bloody Tinth" Ward was a prominent local politician. During the campaign the North Side was called "Over the Rhine," owing to the large number of Germans residing there. Bridgeport was the reverse, consisting of a large number of natives of the Emerald Isle. When the votes were counted it was learned that Mr. Haines had received 8,587 and Mr. Gilman 7,728 votes. The Press and Tribune of March 2, 1859, said: "For a month past the Democracy of Chicago have been engaged in a still hunt. With candidates long ago selected—with the aid of a new secret society of Democratic origin—with money stealthily but lavishly spent—with a magazine of falsehoods in relation to the administration in power—with appeals for economy of expenditures and complaints of high taxes—with every Republican jealousy skillfully fomented—with every prejudice fostered and flattered—with all machinery of the party in working order—with every train laid and every gun charged, they went into the contest with confident assurances of victory. They contested every inch of the ground—fought as men ought to fight for a better cause than that in which they were engaged. But their labor went for naught. The Republican party of the city, true to its principles, the men of its choice and itself—has again triumphed by an emphatic majority.”

It must be considered that this was a partisan view of the contest. The Democrats charged extravagance and unfairness upon the Republicans, and declared that they had won the mayoralty contest only through gross fraud practised at the polls.

The judicial election for superior judge in April, 1859, was hotly contested. It is doubtful whether any man ever before in this county was so lampooned and abused as was Van H. Higgins, candidate of the Republicans for that position. Grant Goodrich was the other candidate of the Republicans and both were elected by a majority of over 3,000 votes in the whole county. In May, 1859, the Democrats elected the sewerage commissioner, Mr. Conley, over the Republican candidates because there were three of the latter, and they received in the aggregate more votes than the Democrat candidate.

During the summer of 1859 a strong fight to oust Isaac Cook, postmaster of Chicago, from his office was made, but failed to succeed. Lincoln's great speeches in Ohio in September, 1859, in answer to those of Mr. Douglas, attracted the attention of the country and were particularly scanned and enjoyed by the Republicans of Cook county. On November 19, 1859, the Press and Tribune came out with a strong editorial for the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for the presidency in 1860. During the November contest of 1859 a fight was made over the county treasurer. A. H. Boyden, the Republican candidate, received 6,401 votes and Mr. Maher, the Democratic candidate, 4,877, and Mr. Speer, an Independent candidate, 131. This was not a political contest, but was conducted almost wholly along personal lines.

In December, 1859, several public meetings, on the occasion of the execution of “Old John Brown,” were held in Chicago. The desperate attacks of the Southern wing of the Democracy in Congress, about this time, caused bitter comment in the local newspapers. It was decided in December, 1859, that the National Republican convention of 1860 should be held in Chicago. Norman B. Judd was national chairman from Illinois.

On January 6, 1860, Isaac Cook, postmaster, and a few others in sympathy with him called a public meeting, endorsed the administration of President Buchanan, pronounced in favor of the Cincinnati platform and against “squatter sovereignty” and therefore against the Douglas wing of the Democracy. In January, 1860, the Pennsylvanians residing in Chicago organized a Cameron and Lincoln club. On January 16, 1860, the Republicans held a mass meeting and selected a new county executive committee for the coming municipal campaign. Among those who took an active part were: Luther Haven, chairman; I. N. Arnold, N. B. Judd, A. C. Hesing, John Wentworth and E. C. Larned. It was decided to organize clubs in every ward in the city. At the Democratic municipal convention held in February, 1860, Walter S. Gurnee was nominated for mayor, E. I. Tinkman treasurer, and J. A. Mulligan city attorney. In February, 1860, the Press and Tribune again came out with strong editorials for the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for President. The Republicans nominated for mayor, John Wentworth; treasurer, Alonzo Harvey; and city attorney, John Lyle King. What was called the Chicago Union club, in February, 1860, nominated a city ticket with Eliphalet Wood for mayor. The spring campaign of 1860 was lively. All realized that the condition of the country might be seriously affected by the way in which local affairs were administered, and hence they took an active and a fighting interests in the results here. It was asserted that voters sat up all night in order to be ready to cast their votes the next morning. It should also be noted that the Republican newspapers referred to the Democratic ticket as the Irish-Catholic ticket. The Republicans carried the election by a goodly majority, Wentworth for mayor receiving 10,007 votes and Gurnee 8,740. The Press and Tribune of March 7, 1860, made the following comment: "Yesterday was a day notable in the annals of Chicago, without a parallel in the history of our charter elections. It was the most exciting contest that ever was witnessed here. It called out, as will be seen, more votes than were ever cast in Chicago before. There was no resistance—no disturbance. Not a citizen was deprived of his vote if he had one."

Lincoln's great speeches in Connecticut in the spring of 1860 caused a sensation in all parts of the Union and were regarded with delight by the Republicans of Cook county. In March, 1860, it was decided to build a commodious temporary structure for the accommodation of the Republican national convention and for the convenience of the Republicans of Cook county during the campaign. The plan met with general favor. It was decided that the structure, which afterwards was called the "Wigwam," should be built on the corner of Lake and Market streets, on the site of the old Sauganash hotel. The cost was estimated at $5,000, which must be raised by subscription among the Republicans. It is a singular fact that in Chicago a number of Republican presidential clubs were formed and that in almost every instance Lincoln was named second on the ticket. There were clubs called Cameron and Lincoln, Seward and Lincoln, Read and Lincoln, Banks and Lincoln, etc. The committee chosen to superintend the erection of the Wigwam and to receive and disburse the fund were Peter Page, Sylvester Lind, C. N. Holden,

G. S. Hubbard and Erastus Rawson. At this date E. C. Larned was president of the executive committee of the Republican club. The Wigwam was built in about thirty days. It fronted 180 feet on Market street and 100 feet on Lake, and was made to accommodate 10,000 people. It had a large gallery and was lighted with gas. A ladies' committee was appointed to provide suitable decorations. It was dedicated May 12, 1860, and 25 cents admission fee was charged. Many speeches were delivered, one by Joshua R. Giddings being especially noteworthy. Letters were read from Charles Sumner and Cassius M. Clay, and the Ellsworth Zouaves gave one of their inimitable drills for the entertainment of visitors from abroad. Giddings in his Wigwam speech said:

"When I look back but the short space of twenty years I remember when I stood in Congress without a single sympathetic heart, proclaiming doctrines which we all, which the vast host of Republicans all, now exult in upholding, and had no conception that I should live to see this the prevailing sentiment throbbing in every heart. We have come here with our souls baptized with the love of truth, justice and liberty. We know we shall have a man who will maintain those doctrines. We have no fears about it. Who that man is we don't care a cent. It is the principle, the rights of the people, those great immutable, unchangeable truths for which your fathers and mine contended on the hundred battlefields of the Revolution. We are fighting those battles over again."

As early as May 2 delegates from several states secured their headquarters in the city. The leading hotels at the time were the Richmond, Tremont, Sherman and Briggs houses. During the National convention rallies of Republicans at the Wigwam occurred nightly. Chicago succeeded in caring for all the delegates and visitors present at the National convention. At the meetings it was noted that there was great diversity of opinions on the question of slavery and the Union, but the prevailing opinion was that the Union must be preserved and that slavery must be restricted. Every evening the streets were brilliant with processions of wide-awakes and militia; rockets and Roman candles were shot off at the leading headquarters. Concerning these meetings the Press and Tribune said: "No one who saw the scene of this juncture will ever forget it. The artillery pealing, the flight of the rockets, the gleaming windows of the entire residence front of our city, the vast depot edifice filled with the eager crowd, the excursion train safe from its flying trip across the peninsular state about to land its passengers, many of them for the first time on the Western shore of Lake Michigan, all constituted a tout ensemble wonderful and rare."

Gilmore's famous band of Boston was present. The Republicans here strongly and urgently demanded the nomination of Mr. Lincoln. It was declared that he was the soundest, safest, most conservative and truest to Republican principles. It was urged that he was not a candidate, that he had no apologies to make, was a Southern man with Northern principles, was one of the people, was acceptable to all factions of the Republicans, was an honest man, and could be elected. Gen. James W. Nye of New York, who for a number of years had been a favorite orator of the Chicagoans whenever he came here, spoke as follows at one of the meetings:

"The labor that this convention is called upon to perform is of more importance than that of any convention that has ever convened in this nation. We behold on all sides ruin scattered broadcast, promises made to the head that are broken to the heart, pledges of fidelity to principles that are only made to be broken. We behold an old, gray-headed man (Buchanan) yielding implicit obedience to the mandates of an imperious oligarchy. The lower that this administration can stoop, the blacker it can get its face and its heart, the more in keeping it seems to think itself with its masters. To break this thralldom, to dispel this national darkness, its the work of no small moment. . . . The Charleston convention sat for ten long days and fifteen States backed out. The fifteen that backed out were affirmatively for slavery and those that stayed in were affirmatively opposed to freedom. They were afraid of each other. They ran, and the South when last heard of was as near destination as the swine that were possessed of devils were when they were last seen on land. And the Northern wing have come home to take counsel, I suppose, of their wives, for there is nobody else that will counsel with them, and they would not were it not for the marital vow. They have adjourned to Baltimore, and the fact reminds me of a story that was told of a nobleman of England who, when told that a certain friend of his had the smallpox twice and had died, inquired whether he had died of the first or second attack. Now if there are any Democrats present—and I hope there are some here, for 'I came not to call the righteous, but the sinners to repentance'—I will tell you where to hide—hide in the rich bosom of Republican redemption. Come back, after having fed on husks long enough, to your old father's house where there is bread enough and to spare."

The Press and Tribune of May 16 said: "The city swarms like a beehive. The hotels are full. Multitudes of our private residences have their quota of guests. The rush from the country will commence today. The delegations have established their headquarters at the several hotels. All trains come loaded with passengers. The great Wigwam is the marvel and admiration of all our visitors and will do a work in the coming campaign worth ten times its cost."

David Wilmot of Pennsylvania was made temporary chairman of the convention and in the opening speech said: "A great sectional and aristocratic party or interest has for years dominated with a high hand over the political affairs of this country. That interest has wrested, and is now wresting, all the great powers of the Government to the one object of the extension of slavery. It is our purpose—it is the mission of the Republican party and the basis of its organization, to resist this policy of a sectional interest. It is our mission to restore this Government to its original policy and place it again in that rank upon which our fathers organized and brought it into existence. It is our purpose and our policy to resist these new Constitutional dogmas that slavery exists by virtue of the Constitution, wherever the banner of this Union floats. . . . Our fathers regarded slavery as a blot upon this country. Had the proposition been presented to them in the early conflicts of the Revolution or outside of that grand movement that they were called upon to endure the hazards, trials and sacrifices of that long and perilous contest for the purpose of establishing on this continent a great slave empire, not one of them would have drawn his sword in such a cause. No, citizens! This Republic was established for the purpose of securing the guaranties of liberty, of justice and of righteousness to the people and to their posterity. That was the great object with which the Revolution was fought; these were the purposes for which the Constitution and the Union were formed. Slavery is sectional; liberty national."

Among the notable men present were Horace Greeley, William M. Evarts, George S. Boutwell, Frank P. Blair, Carl Schurz, John A. Kasson, David Davis, Preston King, Governor Reeder, David Wilmot and Montgomery Blair. George Ashmun of Massachusetts was made permanent chairman. He said: "No ordinary call has brought us together. Nothing but a deep sense of the danger into which our Government is fast running could have rallied the people thus in this city today for the purpose of rescuing the Government from the deep degradation into which it has fallen. . . . Allow me to say that I think we have a right here today in the name of the American people to say that we impeach the administration of our general government of the highest crimes that can be committed against a constitutional government, against a free people, and against humanity. . . . Allow me to congratulate you and the people upon one striking feature of our meeting in this beautiful city. It is that brotherly kindness and generous emulation which has marked every conversation and every discussion, showing a desire for nothing else but their country's good. Earnest, warm and generous preferences are expressed, ardent hopes and fond purposes are declared, but not have I heard one unkind word uttered by one man toward another. I hail it as an augury of success."

At the opening of the convention Norman B. Judd presented to the chairman a gavel made by a Chicago mechanic from Perry's ship, the "Lawrence." The Board of Trade invited the convention to take a ride on the lake, and E. E. Ellsworth invited the convention to the Wigwam in the evening to witness an exhibition drill of his Zouaves.

One of the most interesting events connected with the great convention was the reception given to Abraham Lincoln at the Wigwam upon his appearance there. While he was present Mr. Oglesby, of the Illinois delegation, announced that an old Democrat of Macon county desired to make a contribution to the convention. On motion his contribution was accepted. Thereupon two old fence rails were brought in and carried up the aisle, decorated with flags and streamers and bearing this inscription: "Abraham Lincoln, the Rail Candidate for President in 1860. The two rails were from a lot of 3,000 made in 1830 by Thomas Hanks and Abraham Lincoln, whose father was the first pioneer of Macon county." The Illinois Journal said: "The effect was electrical. One spontaneous burst of applause went up from all parts of the Wigwam, which grew more and more deafening as it prolonged, and which did not wholly subside for ten or fifteen minutes after."

Mr. Lincoln was called out amidst a burst of applause and explained how and when the rails were split and the fence was built. On the great day of the convention when Mr. Lincoln was nominated there were packed into the Wigwam, by actual count, 12,150 persons; outside in the streets were fully 12,000 more. The weather was extremely warm and at least four women in the audience fainted. One of the notable features of the convention was the singing of national and patriotic songs by Frank Lumbard. On the third roll-call, when the Ohio delegation saw that about three more votes would nominate Mr. Lincoln and before the result was announced, enough of them promptly changed, insuring his nomination. When the call was read and it was known that Mr. Lincoln was the nominee, the entire audience rose to their feet cheering, waving flags, hats and caps and continuing thus for many minutes. Quickly, one state after another changed to Mr. Lincoln until he had a total of 364 votes. The Tribune of May 19 said: "The Scene in the Wigwam.—It is absolutely impossible to describe, as it is equally impossible for one who was not present to imagine, the scene in the Wigwam when Mr. Lincoln was nominated. Without attempting, therefore, to convey an idea of the delirious cheers, the Babel of joy and excitement, we may mention that stout men wept like children—that two candidates for the gubernatorial chairs of their respective states, who looked at the nomination of Honest Old Abe to carry the Republican cause at home through the storm, sank down in excess of joy. The tumultuous emotions of men all over the platform, who had not closed their eyes during the last forty-eight hours, trembling between hope and fear—laboring for what they deemed the best interest of the noblest cause under the heavens—acted with electrical effect on the immense auditory. Men of stern countenances and strong nerves, upon arising to speak, were almost disabled by their agitation. But the scene is not to be pictured."

"The speech of Mr. Evarts of New York in moving that the nomination of Abraham Lincoln be made unanimous is upon every lip. The words of the eloquent gentleman will be found in another column, but the majestic grace and dignity of their utterance are not to be known to those who are readers merely and not hearers."

Lincoln was nominated by Mr. Judd of Illinois. William H. Seward was nominated by William M. Evarts. Simon Cameron and Salmon P. Chase were also nominated. Mr. Deland of Ohio, who seconded Mr. Lincoln's nomination, referred to him as "the man who can split rails and maul Democrats." As soon as it was known throughout the city that Mr. Lincoln had been nominated, Chicago practically went wild with delight and impromptu celebrations on the street corners and in public buildings were held. It is said that the Pennsylvania delegation telegraphed to Decatur to secure the whole fence built by Lincoln and Hanks in 1830. At the close of the convention were the great speeches of Evarts of New York, Andrews of Massachusetts, Schurz of Wisconsin, Browning of Illinois—all sound, harmonizing, eloquent and brilliant. All felt sure of success at the November election.

At a big Republican rally held May 19 the speakers were J. R. Giddings, General Nye, Ossian E. Dodge and General Swift. The speech of General Nye was unusually strong and effective. Mr. Giddings, as he always did, became eloquent and during his address scores were moved to tears. An interesting feature connected with the convention was that on Thursday, May 17, the night Mr. Lincoln was nominated, Mr. Greeley telegraphed to the New York Tribune that the nomination of Seward could not be prevented. Immediately after the nomination of Mr. Lincoln, his speeches and those of Mr. Douglas during the memorable campaign of 1858 became the strongest campaign documents. They were distributed by thousands in all parts of the Union.

Among those who took part in the Democratic county convention in June, 1860, were Dr. Brock McVicker, S. S. Hayes, H. L. Stewart, Alderman Comisky, J. B. Bradwell, A. G. Foreman, Aaron Haven, William Carpenter, W. A. Richardson, R. T. Merrick, J. M. Rountree, Utah Drummond, J. W. Sheahan, H. D. Colvin, J. A. Hahn and Henry Greenebaum.

Both parties during the fall of 1860 were thoroughly organized and carried on a campaign that was never surpassed for enthusiasm, vigor and brilliancy. The Democrats were divided, which put them at a disadvantage, particularly so as the Republicans were united and had drawn largely from their disorganized ranks. Dozens of rallies by both parties were held in Chicago, Evanston, Thornton, Blue Island and elsewhere, on which occasion wide-awakes paraded with torches, bonfires lighted up the surrounding country and the leading speakers from Chicago entertained the people with brilliant addresses. In June, 1860, Norman B. Judd began suit against John Wentworth for libel.

On July 7, 1860, at night, the Democrats held an immense meeting ratifying the nomination of Douglas for the presidency. They took possession of North's amphitheater and made this the opening night, on which occasion they dedicated the building to Democracy for the fall campaign. Soon after Mr. Lincoln's nomination a delegation of fifty-one carloads of enthusiastic Republicans visited Springfield to congratulate the nominee and to hear him speak. At a Breckenridge and Lane meeting held August 12, Thompson Campbell and Henry S. Fitch were the speakers. At a Republican rally on the North Side on August 30, "on the forty-acre vacant lot," the speakers were Cassius M. Clay, J. F. Farnsworth, A. C. Hesing, S. M. Wilson and others. On September 1, James Allen, Democratic candidate for governor, spoke to a torchlight procession from the balcony of the Tremont house.

The local questions of importance during the fall of 1860 were as follows: To amend the city charter; to fund the floating debt; to deprive the Council of power to run into debt; to limit expenses and revenue; to consolidate the sewerage board, board of water commissioners and the street commissioners in a single board; and to cut down the number of office holders. William B. Ogden was Republican candidate for state senator at this time. At a big meeting in the Wigwam on September 15, Messrs. Ogden, Scammon, Bradley, Arnold and Driscoll were the speakers.

On October 1, 1860, upon the appearance here of Gov. William H. Seward, he was given a splendid reception and responded with an eloquent speech on the famous balcony of the Tremont house. Lady Franklin, widow of Sir John Franklin, who was lost in the Polar sea, occupied a place on the platform while he was speaking. The next day he delivered another address here and was followed by General Nye and Owen Lovejoy, both of whom were favorite orators of Chicago audiences. It was declared that on this occasion 75,000 people from abroad were in the city. It was no doubt the biggest crowd ever here up to that date. All of the surrounding counties and nearly every township in Cook county sent large delegations. A prize of $100 in cash was offered to the best delegation and was captured by Libertyville; 10,000 wide-awakes were in procession and 500 mounted rangers occupied a conspicuous place in the parade. The crowd was larger than at the National convention or at the United States fair. The speeches were delivered from a stand erected nearly opposite the Wigwam on the west side of Market street; in fact, the crowd was so large that it was concluded to hold speaking outside of the Wigwam, which would hold only 12,000. Seward's speech was two hours in length and was a splendid exposition of Republican principles. Lovejoy and Nye spoke in the Wigwam. On October 4, upon the return of Mr. Douglas, he was given a magnificent reception by the local Democracy. He delivered a short speech from the Tremont balcony in the evening, but the following day, October 5, delivered one of his masterpieces to a crowd almost as large and almost as enthusiastic as the big meeting of the Republicans. On October 24, Thomas Corwin, "The Wagon Boy" of Ohio, addressed an immense audience in the Wigwam. The election of November occurred on the 6th and the same evening more than 6,000 people gathered in the Wigwam and heard the returns read. Of course, interest centered in the presidential ticket, but a strong local fight was made over the office of sheriff. Mr. Sherman was the candidate of the Democrats and Mr. Hesing the candidate of the Republicans; the latter was abused unstintedly during the campaign. When the returns were in the Republicans went wild with joy, 200 guns were fired at the Randolph street bridge, the Wigwam was thrown open, the wide-awakes appeared as if by magic, and at Randolph and Clark streets a splendid display of rockets, roman candles and bonfires was enjoyed. In Cook county Lincoln received 14,589 votes and Douglas 9,946. In the city of Chicago the vote stood Lincoln 10,697, Douglas 8,094, Bell 107, and Breckenridge 87. At the same election was submitted the question of a convention to form a new constitution. The vote in Cook county was: For the convention, 24,369; against the convention, 260. The famous "Tenth ward" went overwhelmingly for Douglas, the vote being Douglas 1,359, Lincoln 991. It was humorously stated at the time that that ward threatened to secede from the Union.

At the time of the fall of Fort Sumter Chicago was in the midst of its municipal campaign, and immediately the question of sustaining the National administration in its coercive policy became all-important. The candidate of the Democracy for mayor, Thomas B. Bryan, was an unswerving Union man, as was also the candidate of the Republicans, Julian S. Rumsey. Both parties called their tickets "Union," and in public meetings indorsed the prosecution of the war to sustain the Government. At a meeting held in Bryan hall on the evening of April 15 the Democrats took the following action:

"Resolved, That the people of Chicago—Republicans, Democrats, Bell and Breckenridge men—should now know no party but that of patriots and should unite earnestly and cordially in support of the Government. To do so the People's Union ticket should be voted for with such unanimity as to render its triumph a most emphatic declaration of our whole people, ignoring all party, in favor of the Union, and in support of the Government."

The Republicans, while admitting the loyalty, popularity, ability and high character of Mr. Bryan, condemned the ticket as a whole, because it had the support of the Times and of men who had opposed coercive measures and had favored permitting the Southern states to dissolve the Union. The Tribune of April 17 said: "Aside from the endorsement of the Times and the special nursing of its Virginia cliques, there was no taint of secession on Mr. Bryan's garments and the people so understood it. Whether on the score of patriotism, respectability, sound judgment, or public spirit, there was nothing to choose between the two men—Rumsey and Bryan.”

When the votes were counted it was found that Rumsey's majority was 1,673 in the total city vote of 14,875. It was seen that the parties had divided squarely on party issues and that the superior prominence of Mr. Bryan over Mr. Rumsey had cut no figure in the face of the momentous questions then shaking the country. The Tribune of April 18, 1861, said: “The result shows that the city divided nearly on the old party lines. After the nominations were made both sides adopted platforms pledging their firm and unceasing support of the Government in its war with the rebels. Was it the duty of either party to withdraw its candidates? If so, which party? Perhaps if more time had been allowed for the interchange of views, such an arrangement could have been made. Mr. Rumsey had no desire to be mayor. On the contrary, he was averse to the office up to the very closing of the polls. But he was not authorized to withdraw without consulting his friends.”

In March, 1861, Herman Kreismann of Chicago was appointed secretary of legation at Berlin by President Lincoln. At this time the entire police force was discharged by Mayor Wentworth. The death of Mr. Douglas in June, 1861, was deeply lamented and in many ways was regarded as a public calamity by the members of both parties. He had come out strongly in favor of the war and his past was forgiven by the Republicans. All felt that the war had lost a staunch friend. He died at the Tremont house and lay in state in Bryan hall for several days.

In October, 1861, a convention of Republicans and war Democrats was held for the purpose of uniting all persons favoring the preservation of the Union at any cost. A large committee was appointed to carry into effect a plan for dividing among the two parties delegates from the city precincts. This committee consisted of the following men: C. N. Holden, Julian S. Rumsey, Joseph Medill, J. C. Paine Freer, Homer Wilmarth, Jacob Rehm, Republicans; and W. C. Goudy, J. B. Turner, D. Cameron, W. B. Scates, Philip Conley, S. S. Hayes, F. C. Sherman and Andrew Schall, Democrats. This convention was held in Bryan hall in October and was called afterwards “The Bryan Hall Packed convention.” There were adopted at this convention a series of resolutions, just as the convention closed, that were not in harmony with the notions of a large portion of the Democracy. Objection particularly was taken to the following: “Resolved, That we call upon the administration to use every legal means of warfare to suppress the Rebellion, including the confiscation of all the property of the rebels and even to the liberation of their slaves.” This was carrying recommendations farther than many of the Democracy desired. The result was that two other tickets were nominated. The objectors wanted changes made upon the basis of the Crittenden resolutions.

Among the objectors were S. S. Hayes, Philip Conley, Thomas Lonergan, Walter B. Scates, Andrew Schall, John B. Turner and others. The Bryan hall ticket was called the Regular Union ticket. There were, in addition, the People's Union ticket and the Anti-People's Union ticket. The Regular Union ticket won by a large majority.

In March, 1862, the city of Chicago, indeed, the whole county of Cook, was shaken to its foundation by the "cutting and carving of Cook county." The representatives of the county in the Legislature redivided all the wards and constituted new election precincts to suit themselves. It was declared to be the act of the Secessionists in the Legislature. The Tribune of April 5, 1862, said:

"Certain partisans calling themselves Democrats are opposed to having the Republicans nominate a ticket for the charter election in this city. They want the Republicans to let the election go by default so that they may clutch the offices and control the city administration in the interests of secession. The people of Cook county tried those fellows last fall. The right hand of fellowship was cordially extended to them. Offices and honors were heaped upon them, and the treatment received in return all men know. They used these very gifts to render more certain the deadly blow aimed at the heart of their benefactors. Their behavior toward the Republicans who elected them has been treacherous and infamous, and no Republican with the least spark of self-respect will again consent to be insulted and betrayed by these tricksters. There are honorable exceptions among the Democrats. Republicans are perfectly willing to unite and coöperate with earnest and sincere Union Democrats who advocate a vigorous prosecution of the war until the Rebels submit unconditionally to the National authority. This class of Democrats is always welcome."

In the spring of 1862 the Republicans nominated for mayor C. N. Holden and the Democrats F. C. Sherman. The election was uneventful and the vote light, considering the importance of the questions pending. The Democrats elected their entire ticket. The Times declared it was a triumph of "Democracy and the conservative citizens over Abolitionism." That paper said, as follows, in the issue of April, 1862: "The Waterloo of Abolitionism.—The joy in Chicago over the victory of the Union arms at Fort Donelson was scarcely greater than that manifested last night over the Union victory won in the municipal election yesterday. Bonfires burned in all directions, the streets swarmed with happy faces, and the air was filled with jubilant shouts. Great as the victory was at Fort Donelson, we doubt if it was of so much value to the Union cause as will be the civil victory of yesterday in this city. And it will cheer the Union men of the South. If this be the voice of Chicago, they may well reason that Abolitionism has culminated as a power in the North. All honor to the Democracy and other conservative people of Chicago who have won the victory."

In April, 1862, the famous Wigwam, which had been sold to the Garrett Biblical institute, was in the hands of carpenters to be fitted up for Brayton and Young, commission merchants. It was to be divided into ten stores, seven fronting on Canal street and three on Lake street, and the papers said, "Sic transit gloria wigwam." At the August election in 1862 an important question was on the new constitution. The vote for the constitution was 7,970 and against it 8,633; for the bank clause 9,164, against the bank clause 7,206; for a new congressional apportionment, 7,724; against new congressional apportionment 8,690. All these questions were lost in the state. The constitution was rejected by over 16,000 in the whole state.

In September, 1862, Judge Walter B. Scates joined the war Democrats and sided with the Republicans. Owing to his great prominence, the act gave encouragement to the Republican party. He advised the war Democrats to side against the Springfield convention and repudiate its principles and platform. On September 27, 1862, the best and most loyal members of both parties, Democrats and Republicans, forty-two in number, signed and called for a meeting to consider the Emancipation Proclamation. This was the time also that John A. Logan, S. W. Moulton, A. J. Kuykendall, General McClelland and C. E. Ingersoll, all Democrats, decided to act with the Republican party so far as management of the war was concerned. The speakers at the meeting to pass on the Emancipation Proclamation were C. E. Ingersoll of Peoria, Mat H. Carpenter of Wisconsin, U. F. Linder, F. A. Eastman, R. S. Blackwell and S. A. Goodwin, all Democrats. The newspapers described this meeting as a "Carnival of Joy." Not half of those who wished could get into Bryan hall. All favored carrying into effect the Emancipation Proclamation and decided that the war should be finished on the lines of the Republican administration. The Tribune said: "Whether considered in regard to the numbers in the audience, the quality of the exercises, the appropriateness and earnestness of the speeches, this was the largest and most successful war meeting ever held in this city." Among the prominent Democrats present and active were the following: Charles H. Walker, Daniel Brainard, S. A. Goodwin, Mathew Laflin, P. L. Yoe, Alderman Schall, Michael McCauley, C. T. Wheeler, T. B. Bryan, Sydney Smith, H. W. Beecher, Henry Greenebaum, J. B. Bradwell, U. F. Linder, John Van Arman, Colonel Cummings, Michael Diversy, John K. Pollard, William Raps, Judge Otis, J. Y. Munn, Morgan L. Keith and H. D. Colvin. A small meeting was held about the same time and for the same object on the courthouse square.

In October, 1862, the Republicans nominated for Congress Isaac N. Arnold, and the Democrats F. C. Sherman. The latter was mayor of Chicago and proprietor of the Sherman house. The newspapers made fun of Mr. Sherman's candidacy owing to his lack of education. Some time previously in a speech Mr. Sherman had used the expression, "Hove in a few remarks to facilitate business." This expression was taken up by the newspapers and Mr. Sherman was often referred to as "Hove-in Sherman." The Republican members made the most of this defect during the campaign. In October the Democracy held a strong meeting, on which occasion Richard T. Merrick openly denounced the Government for its management of the war. Present at this meeting were also F. C. Sherman, S. S. Hayes, W. F. Storey, Francis Peabody, Philip Hoyne, J. W. Sheahan, Dennis Coughlin, O. J. Rose, William Lill, Martin Casey, Barney Caulfield, Doctor Hahn and Charles Walsh. This meeting decided that the Emancipation Proclamation was unnecessary and uncalled for. On November 3, at a big Republican meeting, the speakers were T. B. Bryan, Governor Yates, Judge Scates, E. C. Larned and Emery A. Storrs. The latter became a favorite with Chicago audiences owing to his wit and his eloquent utterances. The Republicans were the victors at the November election. The Tribune of November 5 said: "God be praised! Chicago has redeemed herself. Glory enough for one day. Glory enough to have wiped out Toryism from our midst. The last vestige of Tory Democracy is swept away. They flooded the wards with illegal voters and counterfeit tickets. They deprived our gallant soldiers, so far as they were able, of the right to vote. But the war men of Chicago stood shoulder to shoulder and fought the battle like veterans. The result is the complete success of the Republican Union ticket."

Mr. Arnold was elected over Sherman for Congress by 1,740 votes. For sheriff in Cook county D. S. Hammond, Republican, received 10,085 votes and Charles Walsh, Democrat, 9,369 votes. The rest of the ticket gave about the same Republican majority. During 1862 the citizens of Chicago had prepared a new charter for the city and sent strong delegates to Springfield to have the same passed by the Legislature. It was during this campaign that the religious question as against the educational question cut a strong figure in local politics. The new charter divided the city into sixteen wards instead of ten as before. The Council was equally divided between the two parties, so that it was deadlocked and no meetings were held until March 23, 1869. The Tribune of March 25 said: "On Monday night the Council met for the first time since December 22, 1862. The reasons of the long interim are familiar as household words to the public—the dastardly attempt while Union members were absent from the city to throw the political power into the hands of an unscrupulous Copperhead faction by foul means to undermine the school system. To prevent this the Union men refused a quorum. A week ago a caucus was held by the whole Council to settle a basis by compromise, if possible, upon which they could meet. The caucus was a stormy one and after several hours' debate the Union men offered to let the Copperheads divide Bridgeport into two voting precincts and allowed them to name five men as school inspectors to take the place of the five members of the old board."

During the spring campaign of 1863 there were sharp contests between the two leading parties. Resolutions introduced in the Council by Alderman Holden were vetoed by Mayor Sherman on the ground of their being of too partisan a nature. Undoubtedly the Republicans at this time desired to commit the Democrats in the Council to a stronger support of the war measures of the administration. Back of Mayor Sherman, and no doubt sustaining him, was the old Invincible club, an organization of the Democracy more or less opposed to Mr. Lincoln's policy of carrying on the war. Alderman Shimp, a Democrat, held the balance of power in the Council. Whether he was purchased or not, he sided with the Republicans and thereafter voted with them, casting his vote for the patriotic resolutions introduced by Mr. Holden. During this campaign the Tribune said that Mr. Sherman was sound on the question of the war, but that he was in bad company when he affiliated with the Times and the Copperhead element. In the spring of 1863 Mr. Sherman was renominated for mayor by the Democracy and T. B. Bryan was nominated by the Republicans. It should be noticed at this time that the Democrats did not condemn the war, but only the management of it. Their attitude is shown by the following resolution passed at one of their public meetings; also will be shown the following opinion of the Tribune concerning an act of the mayor:

"Resolved, That we deplore the want of success of this administration in putting down this most wicked rebellion; that we arraign the party in power as responsible for the failure so far to vindicate the majesty of the Constitution and the supremacy of our flag; that we condemn the manner in which the war is conducted and firmly believe that the restoration of the Union is dependent upon the strong arm of Democracy—our conservative American people."

"An Infamous Outrage.—The Mayor of Chicago has Released the Inmates of Bridewell.—Yesterday the mayor of Chicago, 'Hove-in Sherman,' released nearly all the inmates of the bridewell on condition that they would vote for him today. This is an actual fact! Our streets are now filled with these jail birds, who will vote the Copperhead ticket. Union men of Chicago, will you endure this outrage?"

At the municipal election of the spring of 1863 twelve Republicans and nineteen Democrats were chosen, there being one vacancy. The Bridgeport ward was called the "Egypt of Chicago." Before the election the Democrats claimed that Bridgeport alone would elect Sherman, and the result showed that it did. Nearly the whole Democrat ticket was elected by majorities ranging from 250 to 300. Mr. Sherman, Democratic candidate for mayor, received 10,252 and Mr. Bryan, Republican, 10,095. The majority was narrow and the Republicans claimed that the Democrats carried the election by fraud. They appointed a committee to investigate and Mr. Bryan notified Mr. Sherman that he would contest the seat for the mayoralty. In June, 1863, Chicago was intensely excited over what was known as the "Gridiron Bill." It was an attempt to unite all the street railways of Chicago and to secure a ninety-nine-year franchise. Notwithstanding the protest of Chicago in public meetings and the fact that an immense petition against the measure was sent to Springfield, the Legislature passed the bill. On June 10 Governor Yates prorogued the Legislature and later vetoed the "Gridiron Bill," but the Legislature passed it over his veto.

On June 18, 1863, the Democratic party here came out boldly in opposition to a further prosecution of the war and demanded that a convention be named to secure peace upon a Union basis. During the fall the campaign was exciting. For superior judge, Joseph E. Gary was nominated by the Republicans and Buckner S. Morris by the Democrats. Gary was elected, his vote being 10,450 to 5,634 for Mr. Morris. The Republicans swept the county. At this time there were two precincts in each ward; there had previously been but one in each.

At the municipal election in 1864 the Republicans carried the mayoralty contest by a little over 300 majority. The Common Council was pretty equally divided. In order to secure a quorum Mayor Sherman was more than once obliged to arrest and bring into the room a reluctant Republican. At this time Alderman Valentine Ruh, a ward Democrat, came out for the Republicans and thereafter in the City Council voted with that party. The Council was deadlocked for eleven consecutive hours—from 8 in the evening, May 16, until 7:30 in the morning, Tuesday, May 17. After coming out in their favor Mr. Ruh was serenaded by the Republicans, and on this occasion Alderman Shimp, likewise a deserter from the Democrat ranks, addressed and congratulated him for his course. In May, 1864, at the convention which nominated a candidate for governor, Cook county cast its entire delegate vote of forty-nine for Richard J. Oglesby. On June 10 the Republicans formally opened the campaign here at Metropolitan hall, on which occasion Mr. Oglesby was the principal speaker. He was followed by Grant Goodrich; Frank Lombard sang "Old Shady" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom."

The most important event in political circles during the summer of 1864 was the Democratic National convention held here. It was fixed for August 29, but delegates began to arrive by the 24th. Soon all the leading hotels were filled with the delegates and their friends. Among the prominent men who came here were Fernando

Wood, Ben Wood, Clement L. Vallandigham, Horatio Seymour, S. J. Tilden, Dean Richmond, August Belmont, ex-Gov. William Allen of Ohio, George Francis Train, Joseph E. McDonald and Sunset Cox. The Tribune of August 26, 1864, said: "Vallandigham took a walk last evening and returned to the Sherman house about 8 o'clock. He was followed by a suffocating crowd, the large hall being densely packed within three minutes after he had entered. Great enthusiasm was manifested, hats were thrown up, and loud calls were made for a speech, which, however, were not honored."

The Democratic campaign cry was, "An armistice and then peace." On August 26 Vallandigham delivered an extended speech on the courthouse square. Other leading speakers in the city were Henry Clay Dean of Iowa, Vallandigham, Fernando Wood, Sunset Cox and Samuel J. Tilden. The latter was one of the committee on resolutions. John Wentworth, who had previously been the most influential Democrat in Northern Illinois, was called upon for a speech and responded by endeavoring to answer Mr. Vallandigham. Gen. W. S. Rosecrans was in the city at the time. William Bigler of Pennsylvania was temporary chairman, but the convention was called to order by August Belmont, chairman of the national committee. The convention declared in favor of the Union, but also asserted that, as the administration of Mr. Lincoln had failed to restore the Union, hostilities should cease with the view of a convention to establish peace and to restore the Union upon the basis of states. The latter was the clause to which the Republicans objected. Horatio Seymour was made permanent chairman. The newspapers stated that Vallandigham was clearly the hero of the convention. McClellan was nominated on the first ballot by a big majority and then pandemonium broke loose. Vallandigham was one to move that McClellan's nomination be made unanimous.

During the fall the Republicans nominated John Wentworth for Congress and the Democrats nominated Cyrus H. McCormick. On October 6 Robert G. Ingersoll spoke on the issues of the campaign at Bryan hall. There were many personalities in the contest between Mr. Wentworth and Mr. McCormick. The Tribune could not understand on one occasion why the Times should hang out the Stars and Stripes with the names McClellan and Pendleton inscribed thereon. It was called "rank sacrilege." On one occasion the Tribune misquoted Mr. McCormick and was corrected by the latter, who said: "My statement was that the Union ought not to be restored on the subjugating, confiscating and exterminating terms of Mr. Lincoln."

One of the largest political rallies ever held in Chicago, up to that date, assembled here on November 3, 1864. All of Northern Illinois was represented; the adjacent counties and every town in Cook county sent large delegations. Lyons was represented with nineteen wagons; Evanston by a delegation at the head of which was an immense wagon containing thirty-five young ladies, who represented the States of the Union, dressed with blue caps with golden stars and with small flags on their sleeves. It was estimated that 75,000 people were present. Everybody was given a meal at Bryan hall; at night there was an immense torchlight procession. Many speakers held forth on public corners and at various halls. The next day Salmon P. Chase delivered a speech three hours in length. When the returns came in it was seen that the Ninth ward was the banner Republican ward of Cook county. Lincoln received there 1,428 votes and McClellan 784. The Tenth ward came next. Palatine was the banner Republican town; it gave Lincoln 280 and McClellan thirteen. Hyde Park came next with 115 Republicans and eleven Democrats. Lake went to Lincoln by a majority of one. Lincoln carried Cook county by a vote of 18,667 to 14,351 for McClellan. This was by far the largest vote ever polled in Cook county up to that date. On November 10 the Republicans held an immense meeting to celebrate the election. The speakers were: William Bross, lieutenant governor elect; I. N. Arnold, E. C. Larned and J. V. Farwell. During the week of the election the Tribune claimed to have circulated daily an average of 46,900 copies. In January, 1865, the all-absorbing question with the people was "The Ninety-nine Years Street Railway Extension Franchise." An immense meeting was held at Metropolitan hall and strong resolutions in opposition to it were passed. Only one representative from Cook county, William Jackson, had stood against the bill and was thanked publicly by this meeting. Two of the resolutions were as follows:

"Resolved, By the citizens of Chicago in mass meeting assembled, that it is the firm and deliberate conviction of his meeting that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the residents and property holders of said city are earnestly and unalterably opposed to any extension of the franchises of said corporations and to any further legislation on the subject.

"Resolved, That we hereby most firmly and decidedly censure and reprobate the conduct of such of our representatives as voted for this most obnoxious monopoly."

The bill was called "The Century Franchise" and was not a partisan measure. All people except those who expected to reap a benefit firmly opposed it. It was also called "The Ninety-nine Years Steal." On January 26, 1865, the friends of the bill in the Legislature applied the "Gag Law" and it was forced through successfully. Two days later an immense meeting in opposition to the bill was held in Bryan hall. The friends of the measure packed the meeting with from 200 to 300 of their employes on the front seats, but over 2,000 citizens assembled and ruled the meeting. All speakers opposed the bill that would unite all the Chicago street railways for a term of ninety-nine years. It was shown that 9,000 people here in one day had signed a petition in opposition to the measure and that in the Legislature, although two-thirds of the Cook county representatives opposed the bill, it was forced through. The speakers declared that if the Chicago street railways were strong enough to force such a measure through the Legislature, they should be resisted at once and to the bitter end. The following resolutions were passed:

"Resolved, By the citizens of Chicago in mass meeting assembled, that we view with astonishment and regard with indignation the bill recently passed by the two houses of the Legislature of this state in relation to horse railways in this city.

"Resolved, That said bill is a fraud upon the rights of the city and citizens and creates an odious and perpetual monopoly which is of great and permanent injury to the public interests and dangerous to the public right and welfare."

The Tribune of January 30 said: "Never has a larger or more enthusiastic meeting been held in the city of Chicago to protest against the invasion of popular rights." It was realized that the rights thus given away were worth to the public millions of dollars. A delegation was sent to Springfield to urge the governor not to sign the bill; the Board of Trade publicly condemned it; accordingly, on February 5 Governor Oglesby vetoed the same. The Legislature promptly passed it over his veto and intense excitement and indignation were kindled in Chicago. It passed the senate eighteen to five and the house fifty-five to twenty-three; only three Cook county men voted for it, viz., Eastman in the Senate and Huntley and Dolton in the House. Governor Oglesby was thanked by the County Board of Supervisors for his veto. Immediate steps were taken to have the measure reconsidered.

The new city charter which came into effect under the law of February, 1865, provided that each town and each ward should have one county supervisor. In the city of Chicago it was provided that each ward should have one member of the board of education. The police commissioners were to be elected by the county and were to have county jurisdiction. The mayor was excluded from membership on the board of county supervisors, board of police commissioners and board of public works. In March, 1865, a citizens' committee of all parties was appointed to report on a method of instituting reform in the public service. County and ward associations were organized and, in fact, the association was extended to the county towns. The following is a form of the association:

"We hereby form ourselves into a ward association under the name of the Ward People's Anti-Monopoly and Reform association, to coöperate with the citizens' committee and agree to support a ticket for the next municipal election to be composed of honest and able men, without distinction of party, who are opposed to monopolies and to all unnecessary taxation and in favor of a strict economy in the administration of public affairs."

The officers of the central association were E. C. Larned, president; M. F. Tuley, secretary and L. C. P. Freer, treasurer. This organization seems to have died a natural death. In March, 1865, Samuel Hoard succeeded John Scripps as postmaster of Chicago. In March all voters were required to register. The Republican newspapers charged at this time that "Wabash C. Goudy and Wilbur F. Storey are the real mayor of Chicago." The Republicans nominated for mayor John B. Rice and the Democrats renominated F. C. Sherman. The Republican ticket was elected by a large majority. It will be noted that the new city charter gave the three members of the Board of Police extraordinary powers; they were clothed with power over the Police department, Fire department and Board of Health. There was one police commissioner to each of the three principal divisions of the city.

RUNAWAY SLAVES

IN the year 1802 a special convention of delegates from the respective counties of Indiana Territory petitioned Congress for the suspension of the Sixth article of the Ordinance of 1787, concerning slavery. In 1805 a majority of the Legislature of Indiana Territory remonstrated with Congress on the subject; but in 1806 such Legislature passed sundry resolutions, addressed to Congress, "declaratory of their sense of the propriety of admitting slaves, and as the citizens of the Territory decidedly approve of the toleration of slavery" the Legislature communicated to Congress the reasons which influenced them to favor the measure. Accordingly the usual arguments in favor of slavery were set forth and ended with the request that the aforesaid Sixth article be suspended for a term of years, passed Sept. 19, 1807.

On October 10, 1807, the citizens of Clark County, Indiana Territory, assembled at Springville agreeably to previous notice "for the purpose of taking into consideration the resolutions passed at the last session of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying Congress to suspend for a certain time the sixth article of compact contained in the Ordinance of 1787." Abraham Little, John Owens, Charles Beggs, Robert Robertson and James Beggs, were appointed a committee to draft a memorial to Congress in opposition to the proposed suspension of the sixth article. This memorial contained two important points: That the resolution of the Indiana territorial Assembly asking for a suspension of the Sixth ordinance had in all probability been unfairly passed, and that it was better, before admitting slavery into the territory, to wait until the people could decide the time the territory should be admitted as a State. As Congress was divided on the question—the House favoring the suspension and the Senate opposing it—the measure failed to become a law, and so slavery was for all time excluded from Cook county, Illinois.

As early as August, 1834, the Democrat, which had been started the previous November, published a notice from a St. Louis owner offering a reward of $200 for the recovery of a run-away slave and the horse which he took with him. In August of 1835 the Democrat published another similar notice from a St. Louis slave owner. Some time after this date the Chicago Anti-Slavery Society was organized, the precise date not being accessible. The Democratic-Republican party of Cook county from the start deprecated any interference whatever with the institution of slavery. At a large meeting of that party held at the courthouse on October 7, 1835, the following resolution was passed: "Resolved, That we view with the deepest disgust and abhorrence the course of the fanatical Abolitionists of the North in circulating their incendiary publications among the slaves of the South; and that some measures ought to be taken to compel these fanatics to answer in those states whose laws are set at defiance, and the feelings of whose citizens they have outraged by their reckless course." Among those present at this meeting were James Curtiss, S. G. Trobridge, E. B. Williams, William Jones, Hiram Hugunin, Luther C. Chamberlain, B. F. Knapp, G. H. Kercheval and Peter Pruyn. In June, 1839, Rev. R. R. Gurley on behalf of the American Colonization society lectured at the City Saloon on the subject of transferring colored people to Liberia in Africa. A few weeks later he formed the Chicago Colonization society, among the early members of which were R. J. Hamilton, Rev. Isaac T. Hunter, William B. Ogden, Harry Brown, Thomas Hoyne, George M. Merrill, William H. Brown, William H. Clark, John S. Wright, Nathan H. Bolles and William Stuart. At this date there was an elaborate discussion in the newspapers of Chicago concerning the relative merits of colonization and Abolitionism.

In August, 1841, Frederick Collins, Abolitionist candidate for Congress in this district, received a total of thirty-five votes. In October, 1841, an Abolitionist who had subscribed for the American ordered the paper stopped because it continued to publish runaway slave notices. He particularly objected to a notice offering $100 reward for the recovery of a slave woman named Henrietta and her husband Nicholas, together with three children which they had taken with them. The owner was John Finney of St. Louis. In March, 1842, the quarterly meeting of the Chicago Anti-Slavery society was held at Chapman's rooms; A. Johnson was secretary. In May, 1842, the fifth anniversary of the Illinois State Anti-Slavery society was celebrated in this city. In the fall of 1842 a total of thirty-seven votes were polled in Cook county for the Abolitionist candidate for governor. In October, 1839, a Mr. Magehan, of St. Louis came here to recover his runaway slave Polly. While here he discovered another runaway named Henry, owned by John Kerr of St. Louis. Mr. Magehan caused the arrest of both Polly and Henry, but "the Abolitionists, aided by some Abolition officers, succeeded in preventing his bringing them away." The St. Louis Republican of October, 1839, said: "Mr. Magehan requests us to tender his thanks to the business and especially the mercantile portion of the citizens of Chicago for the kindness and assistance they showed him in the attempt to regain his property, and in releasing him from the imprisonment which the Abolitionists inflicted upon him, but for which he is likely to make them suffer. We are glad to find that the substantial and respectable portion of the community at Chicago discountenance and reprobate the nefarious attempts of the Abolitionists to conceal and protect runaway slaves. Mr. Magehan saw and recognized some three or four runaway slaves from this city during the time he was in Chicago. The citizens of the latter place owe it to themselves to put down the attempts of these fanatics to interfere with the property of their neighbors. Already the travel from the South to the East is fast setting toward Chicago, but should the South become alarmed for the safety of their slave property in that city, it will do much to divert it. Chicago will be avoided as Cincinnati now is by a majority of Southern men." During the campaign of 1841 the Abolitionists endeavored to make the strongest showing possible. A petition calling for a public meeting of Abolitionists was signed by thirty-eight of that party residing in Chicago and vicinity. The American, which was bitterly opposed to the proceedings of the Abolitionists, gave the following notice on August 5:

"The result shows the small potato nature of political Abolitionism—only thirty-four Liberty tickets were polled, notwithstanding the most desperate electioneering. Never did we see more zealous and devoted canvassers than the few Whig Abolitionists who attended the polls as a committee of special vigilance. They offered their tickets to strangers with the most brazen assurance. They even submitted with a good grace to the jeers of the bystanders. . . . But where were those cunning dogs—the Locofoco Abolitionists? Some few of them voted the Abolition ticket to keep up appearances and get their Whig brethren into a trap. . . . The red hot political Abolitionists in this city are said to be about sixty. They are, we understand, about equally divided in politics, viz.: goats or Locofoco Abolitionists, and sheep or Whig Abolitionists. About election day the goats always scramble away and the silly sheep are left to their fate. . . . There are many in this community who entertain opinions adverse to slavery, but there are very few who join in the treasonable practice of voting for a ticket opposed to the Constitution of the United States."

The growth of Abolitionism in Cook county was very rapid from 1840 to 1846. Late in 1845 a petition was circulated and signed by over 1,000 persons asking the Legislature to repeal the "black laws of Illinois." Instead of complying with the petition the Legislature, in the language of the Chicago Democrat, "not only left those laws as they were but added another chapter to the catalogue more outrageous and revolting than any which had preceded it." During 1845 the colored population of Chicago nearly doubled. This led the Democrat to observe that the Abolitionists must be doing a good business about these days." In October, 1846, two runaway slaves were pursued to this city, arrested by the agent of the owner and taken before Justice Kercheval to be dealt with according to law. While there they were rescued by negroes and Abolitionists to the number of several hundred. The officers were overpowered and the fugitives were freed. At a large Democratic mass meeting in April, 1848, resolutions declaring the Democracy of Chicago opposed to the extension of slavery were passed. The resolutions were severe in their restrictions upon the idea of extending slavery to the new territories. In February, 1848, a negro who had lately arrived in Chicago was seized by the colored people, conveyed to the lake shore and publicly whipped. He was suspected of coming to Chicago for the purpose of revealing here the presence of runaway slaves. The offenders were arrested and fined. Rev. James Mitchell, who kept in his family as servants two colored girls, was prosecuted for harboring runaway slaves, but was promptly exonerated. His attorney was Isaac N. Arnold; Grant Goodrich appeared for the prosecutor. Late in May, 1848, a free colored man of this city was kidnapped by several slave catchers and spirited out of the city. A posse was sent in pursuit, but the colored man succeeded in effecting his escape and returned to the city. The kidnappers, Field and Thurston, were committed by Justice Rucker on the charge of kidnapping. They were released by a writ of habeas corpus. At this time the Yancy house was the aristocratic hotel of the colored people of Chicago; there they held their consultations and formulated their plans to prevent all rescues of fugitive slaves. It should be said that the Democrat edited by John Wentworth helped more than any other power in Northern Illinois to restrict the extension of slavery, render odious the fugitive slave law and assist by every means in its power the escape of fugitive slaves. Wentworth, himself, opposed any interference with slavery as it then existed, but used as a motto in his paper, "no more slave territory." That was the cry of the Whigs in 1847-48 and in that respect Wentworth although a staunch Democrat stood with the Whigs of the North. An article which appeared in a St. Louis paper and spoke of a drove of negroes and described them in detail like a herd of black cattle kindled the wrath of the Abolitionists and opponents of Chicago. The following resolutions were adopted at the Industrial convention, which assembled here on June 6, 1850:

"Resolved, That as a moral, social and political evil slavery cannot exist without inevitably producing the destruction of the nation which permits it. It is therefore an absurd and impious mockery of Jehovah and of his inevitable decrees to flatter ourselves that we can perpetuate the joint existence of slavery and freedom.

"Resolved, That we are opposed to the further extension of slavery and view with abhorrence the idea that to satisfy the South and to secure the perpetuation of the Federal Union, the people of the United States must agree that the slave power and the free power shall be held in equilibrium by the admission with equal or proportional pace of slave and free states; or that the slave as well as the free area shall be extended; neither if it were attempted could a basis of this kind ever support a union of Republics, for so long as Divine justice exists slavery can never be a bond of union and of freedom.

"Resolved, That greatly as we favor all Constitutional legislative provisos against the further extension of slavery into territories now free, yet the most sure proviso against slavery extension and all unjust servitude, is a free land proviso, securing homes to all, prohibiting the further sale of public lands, recognizing and guaranteeing the unbought, natural, and inalienable right of man to a home on earth, and limiting the amount of land that any one person or company may hereafter obtain title to, so as eventually to abolish and for the future prevent the undue monopoly of land by the few.

"Resolved, That factory lords, land lords, bankers, speculators and usurers in the North may and do advocate slavery non-extension, while they hold their fellow men under oppressive, and ruinous conditions of service, but the free land proviso would everywhere on the cotton plantations of the South and in the Cotton factories of the North, unite all lovers of freedom and humanity against all haters of freedom and humanity, and would strip the question of liberty of all prejudices resulting from sectional and partial agitation."

The above resolutions were reported by H. H. Van Arminge, and on motion of C. T. Gaston they were referred to a select committee consisting of J. K. Ingalls of New York, Jeriel Root of Illinois and Edward Daniels of Wisconsin. The following resolution was adopted separately, "Resolved, That woman's rights are the same as those of men on all subjects including rights to liberty, property, self-government, the elective franchise, and eligibility to office." The fundamental principles set forth alluringly at this convention were largely socialistic and anticipated many of the reforms of late years.

In October, 1850, the colored people assembled at the African Methodist Episcopal church on Wells street and formed a Liberty association composed of people of color or of African descent; they denounced the recently passed fugitive slave law. The entire colored population of the city joined the association and made every preparation to resist to the utmost the execution of that law. More than a dozen meetings were held in Cook county for the purpose of resistance. At one of these meetings Senator Douglas attempted to force upon the people the passage of resolutions submissive to the law. One of his greatest speeches was delivered on this occasion—October 23, 1850. The day before the one on which Senator Douglas spoke the City Council adopted resolutions denouncing the passage of the fugitive slave law. One of the resolutions was as follows:

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the free states, who aided and assisted in the passage of this infamous law and those who basely sneaked away from their seats and therefore evaded the question, richly merit the reproach of all lovers of freedom and are fit only to be ranked with the traitors, Benedict Arnold and Judas Iscariot, who betrayed his Lord and Master for thirty pieces of silver."

The aldermen who voted in favor of the resolutions denouncing the law were Milliken, Lloyd, Sherwood, Foss, Throop, Sherman, Richards, Brady and Dodge. Those who voted against the resolutions were Page and Williams. The passage of the law was denounced in the severest terms. The next day Senator Douglas in his speech assumed that he and Senator Shields were meant in the resolutions above where the Council spoke of Benedict Arnold and Judas Iscariot. He skillfully, adroitly and sarcastically answered the resolutions of the Council. He made the strong point that the resolutions of the Council amounted to open nullification of an existing national law, but his answer was unsatisfactory to the opponents of slavery in this vicinity.

Upon the passage of the fugitive slave law George W. Meeker was appointed commissioner for the commitment of fugitive slaves under the law. Mr. Wentworth in the Democrat said: "we had thought that in the whole city no one could be found whose sense of justice and humanity and all those feelings that designate the man were so blunted as to accept such an appointment, but it seems we were mistaken." During October and November, 1850, the colored population of Chicago underwent a period of great excitement. Numerous agents of owners were here to identify colored property. The African Methodist Episcopal church on Clark street lost nearly half its membership owing to their sudden and precipitate flight for Canada. A colored barber named Jackson was horrified one day to see his master enter the shop to be shaved. Jackson promptly evacuated and in the end managed to escape capture. Mr. Wentworth said in the Democrat of November 16, "There should be at least a regiment of troops sent to this city at once by Mr. Fillmore. They are absolutely necessary to enforce the late fugitive slave law. There are several hundred negroes in our city, every one of whom might be arrested and sent South under the late law if there was only a regiment of troops here to assist the catchers. A single company could do no good. Nothing but a regiment will answer for Chicago." During the exodus of the negroes Orrington Lunt, N. C. Holden, William H. Taylor and Thomas Richmond were a committee of the Abolitionists to raise provisions, clothing, etc., for the colored people thus forced to leave their homes. Old clothing partially worn was especially solicited by order of the committee.

The old Anti-Slavery society seems to have died out, because in December, 1850, another was organized at a public meeting of which Sylvester Lind was chairman and James McClellan, Jr., secretary. Among those who took active part in this meeting were Z. Eastman, Rev. A. St. Clair, L. C. P. Freer and James Curtiss. The residents of Chicago who desired to curry favor with the South and with the administration made it a point to assist in the capture of fugitive slaves by their masters. This led to numerous sharp clashes between them and the Abolitionists. Friends of the South endeavored to make political capital by recapturing fugitives. In June, 1851, they captured a negro fugitive while passing through this city on his way to Canada, put him in irons and publicly conveyed him in a carriage to jail. The Democrat said: "Nabbing a negro was not enough; it must be done so as to outrage public decency in broad daylight. He must be gagged in this city. He must be thrown into a carriage like a stick of wood in the presence of women and children and hurried off, as if in this peaceable community there would be an effort to rescue anybody from a legal officer." This negro, Moses Johnson, was taken to the United States court room and there guarded by many special constables. In spite of the fact that no demonstrations looking to the rescue of the negro were made the militia was called out. The Democrat said: "But the insult and outrage did not stop here. The troops when called out were insulted and were not asked to guard the negro or the court, but were left to march around and overawe the people if possible." The Tribune, although one of the strongest against slavery and in favor of free soil, disapproved any attempt to rescue the negro. The Western Citizen, the organ of the Abolitionists at Chicago and edited by Z. Eastman, favored strenuous action to prevent the negro from being "kidnapped." He was claimed by Crawford E. Smith, of Lafayette, Missouri, who was represented here by an agent. It was decided to make this a test case. The claimant was represented by Z. T. Fleshman, Ebenezer Peck, B. S. Morris, and A. W. Windett and the colored man was represented by George Manierre, E. C. Larned, L. C. P. Freer, Calvin DeWolf and others. The courtroom could not hold one-tenth of those who wished to hear the trial. The negro was arrested on June 3 and brought to trial the same day. The overseer of the owner identified the negro fugitive. The Democrat under the personal influence and ability of John Wentworth did everything in its power to defeat the claimant and free the negro. At the trial the case really hinged on the identification of the fugitive and this in turn rested with Commissioner Meeker. The points made by the defense were as follows: First, that the record to prove the escape and servitude was invalid; second, it did not show that the negro described was a slave and owed servitude; third, the record described the slave as copper-colored, while the defendant was black. The defense ably conducted prevailed and the commissioner discharged the fugitive. The Democrat of June 7 said: "No sooner had the commissioner pronounced the words 'I discharge the defendant,' than a shout arose which shook the building. The fugitive was snatched from the hands of the officers and was in the street and in a wagon hurried off by the crowd in a shorter space of time than it takes to tell it." The Democrat also said: "The agent of the owner narrowly escaped chastisement from the crowd in the street as he passed from the courtroom. He was saluted with hisses and groans and thought it best to make himself scarce as quickly as possible." The trial took place in the Swedenborgian Church. The Democrat of June 6 further said: "The speech of Mr. Larned for the defense was a brilliant one, every way worthy of his reputation, and is considered one of the most splendid efforts ever made in this city. . . . Mr. Fleshman, for the owner, has conducted the case remarkably well. . . . For legal ability and research, and for critical analysis and acumen, we have heard the speech of Mr. Manierre for the defense spoken of by members of the bar as an effort that would do abundant credit to a lawyer of the most extended reputation. . . . There is no doubt of the negro's discharge." This action of Commissioner Meeker was bitterly denounced by every pro-slavery advocate in the West. It was referred to for several years as a standing disgrace to Chicago, but the Abolitionists here and the free soil advocates were proud of the record and continued their tactics of every description to defeat the execution of the fugitive slave law. The colored people of Chicago at a public meeting voted to raise means to present to George Manierre and E. C. Larned suitable gifts to reward them for their gratuitous services; silver cups suitably engraved were selected. These two men and also Grant Goodrich and John M. Wilson, who had aided them, were publicly thanked by the colored people of Chicago.

In July, 1851, an educated colored man from Boston, S. R. Ward, lectured on "Inalienable Rights." In September, 1851, at the National Abolition convention in Buffalo, when Gerritt Smith was nominated for president, James H. Collins, of Chicago, was nominated for vice-president; he declined and Charles Durkie, congressman, Racine, Wisconsin, received the nomination. In 1851, a colored man named John Jones succeeded in raising, mostly here, $800 to be used in purchasing the freedom of his brother in slavery in the South. The Democratic Press of November 12, 1852, said: "The vote at the late election in those localities which comprised the Anti-Slavery strength in 1848 proves conclusively that that element in our politics has about expended its force. In the County of Cook, for example, the vote for Mr. Van Buren in 1848 was 2,120—being 512 over the vote for Taylor and 598 over the vote for Cass. In 1852 the vote for John P. Hale was 793, being 2,974 less than that of Mr. Pierce and 1,296 less than that of Gen. Scott. . . . The vote has been reduced down to near the level of what it was before the days of the Wilmot Proviso."

Late in 1852 Judge John Pearson was the colonization agent here. In December, 1852, the colored citizens of Chicago held a mass meeting to consider the "disabilities which the state laws imposed upon them." The colored speakers were named Jones and Johnson. In February, 1853, the Legislature still further strengthened the laws against the settlement in Illinois of free colored persons. During the debate on the bill Mr. Judd then in the Senate moved to amend the title so that it would read "A bill to establish slavery in Illinois." The entire representation in the Legislature from Cook county voted against the bill. One of the newspapers here said, "we should like to see the man that would mount the auctioneer's block in this town and sell a freeman to the highest bidder and we should like to see the bidder." In November, 1853, the colored people polled 245 votes in this congressional district. To a state convention of the colored people Cook county sent twenty representatives. In September, 1854, a colored man named William Turner was seized near Wells and Jackson streets by three white men who claimed to represent the owner; but he broke away and ran, one of them firing at him without hitting him. In a moment a large crowd of his friends gathered, whereupon the three white men were arrested and jailed on the charge of assault with a deadly weapon and attempt to kidnap. A large crowd gathered at the trial. The three men were bound over by Justice DeWolf. The Democratic Press said: "Knowing the light in which slave hunting is regarded in this portion of the state it is not a little remarkable that men can be found of sufficient temerity to undertake it without authority of law and the requisite proofs in broad daylight and in a thickly settled part of the city. Every such effort cannot but result in failure and the parties making it may deem themselves fortunate in getting off as easily as those did yesterday."

At the Abolition convention held in Ottawa, May, 1853, twelve citizens of Chicago were appointed as a state board to advance the interests of the Abolition party in Illinois. As a matter of fact the passage of the negro bill, so-called, by the Legislature in 1852-3, was important because it led to the reorganization of the Abolition party in Illinois. From 1848 to 1852 the party had remained comparatively quiet in this state, but the act of the Legislature prohibiting free colored people from settling in Illinois again roused that party into action. The Western Citizen was the state organ of the Abolitionists; it was issued in this city. Late in 1853 a large convention of the colored people of the state was held here. One John Jones of Chicago presided. They adopted resolutions denouncing slavery, criticising clergymen who did not work against it, asserted that the fugitive slave law was an outrage, and that the "black law" of Illinois was unbearable. Letters from Horace Mann, Cassius M. Clay, William H. Seward, Horace Greeley, David P. Brown and Charles Durkie were read. Speeches by A. H. Richardson, White of Galena and Rev. Byrd Parker, colored, of Chicago were made. On the second day of the convention Fred Douglas addressed the assemblage at Warner's hall. Later he stumped the state in the interests of the Abolition party.

In September, 1854, Henry Dwight of New Haven, Connecticut, representing the Kansas Emigrant society, came here for the purpose of forming a branch organization. The Democratic Press said: "There is but one feeling we believe among the people, and that is that in spite of the machination of corrupt politicians this territory consecrated by our fathers to freedom shall be free." He referred to Kansas and Nebraska. In July, 1854, Cassius M. Clay lectured before the Young Men's association. He declared that Mrs. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin was a "fair and equitable demonstration of slavery as it exists." He further said, "in Kentucky in the Green river country I have seen a man surrounded by a gang of dogs, trained and kept to track and run down a fugitive slave. But recently a gentleman from Georgia informed me that a pack of dogs which had been trained to follow runaway slaves had been sold in his state for $1,100." In December, 1854, there were in the hands of the United States Marshal, Col. Harry Wilton, warrants for the arrest of four fugitive slaves. Anticipating trouble, he had succeeded in having ordered out two militia companies, the Light Guards under Lieutenant Harding and Company A, National Guards under Captain Shirley. Soon the city was astir. Judge Rucker announced that the United States marshal had no power to order out the state militia, whereupon the two companies dispersed. The marshal made no attempt thereafter to execute the warrants. However, the runaway slaves taking alarm started for Canada. The Democratic Press of December 9 said: "We have known of many attempts being made to take fugitives away from Chicago, but we have yet to learn the first instance in which the thing has been done." "Dr. Dyer at this time was a very active Abolitionist. He assisted many runaways to reach Canada. On one occasion a Kentuckian expressing himself too pointedly in favor of slavery was publicly caned by the pugilistic doctor. For this act he was widely congratulated and was presented with a gold-headed cane suitably inscribed. At this time the St. Louis and other Southern newspapers declared that the fugitive slave law was wholly inoperative in Chicago. Southern men were advised not to come here with their slaves.

It was true that many here who denounced Abolitionism and Abolitionists were also opposed actively to slave hunting and slave catching. They opposed the fugitive slave law, opposed the extension of slave territory, but objected to any interference with slavery where it already existed. The Democratic Press asked: "Would the editor of the St. Louis Republican engage in the business of slave catching? Would ninety-nine hundredths of the readers of that print do so? No, they would shrink from it as they would shrink from a leper. So do the great mass of the citizens of Chicago. No earthly power can make slave catchers of our people. Ten thousand fugitive slave laws cannot do it. Such is the general sentiment here." In March, 1855, a Kansas Aid society was organized in this city, Messrs. Goodman, Chapman, High, Slater and Sloat were appointed a committee to set the organization in operation. In April, 1855, the Kansas Scotch Free Settlement society was organized in this city with George Leslie as secretary. The object of these societies was to raise men who were willing to become settlers of Kansas. Early in 1856 public meetings denouncing the decision in the Dred Scott case were held in this county. At this time it was discovered that several policemen were guilty of slave catching. One of them attempted to arrest a colored man passing through Chicago to Canada, but soon learned that he could not do it owing to the sentiment of the people and open opposition to any such step. In March the Democratic Press said: "Hundreds are now passing through this city every week for Kansas to be on the ground in the territory at the opening of spring. In 1856 Chicago people contributed about half the money to purchase Aunt Sally, a slave held in Alabama, the mother of Rev. Williams, a colored pastor of a church in Detroit. In January, 1857, at the State Colonization society convention held in Springfield, Shelby M. Cullom and Abraham Lincoln represented their respective counties. J. L. Scripps of Chicago was one of the vice-presidents. In July, 1857, in a suit by a colored man for assault and battery, the court overruled the plea of the non-citizenship of the defense. In August, 1857, several negro catchers arrived here and applied for help to the lieutenant of police but were refused. One of them asked: "Shan't I want some help to get the two boys away from the city?" The officer answered, "Well, I rather guess you will." The negroes remained in Chicago.

In September, 1857, a Southerner from Alabama attempted to carry off a colored boy, but was roughly handled by the colored people who set the boy free. A mass meeting of the colored citizens held on November 18, 1857, denounced in the severest terms the course of Senator Douglas on the slavery question. In the fall of 1857, while a negro congregation were baptizing some of their would-be members at the Illinois Central basin on the lake front, a crowd of roughs broke up the meeting amid great confusion. About this time a colored woman who was being taken from Canada to St. Louis was stopped in this city and freed, greatly to the indignation of her owner.

Late in August, 1859, seven colored fugitives, two women and five men, who were being rapidly pursued by their owners, were assisted through Chicago on their way to Canada. About three weeks before two colored men from near New Orleans had also passed through Chicago, bound for Detroit. In the southern part of Illinois were organized bands of slave catchers. They attempted to invade Chicago, but were warned with emphasis to stay away. In October, 1859, the Northwestern Christian Anti-Slavery convention, one of the largest assemblages of its kind in the West, was convened here. The resolutions which were adopted covered every phase of the slavery question and were pronounced in opposition to any extension of that institution and to the execution of the fugitive slave law. At this convention a large sum was raised to purchase the freedom of a certain colored person. The Press and Tribune of November 19, 1859, said:

"The Underground Railway in Operation.—On Thursday night the Underground Railroad train arrived here with thirty passengers, five from the vicinity of Richmond, Virginia, twelve from Kentucky, and thirteen from Missouri. The thirteen from Missouri were sold to go down the river the very day they started. They are now all safe in Canada. A stalwart six-footer and a Sharp's rifle were the only guards."

It should be stated in this connection that the municipal court records of Chicago at that date are full of cases of small crimes committed by the colored population. In proportion to numbers the crimes thus committed by them seem greatly to outnumber those committed by white offenders. It is difficult to ascertain why this state of affairs existed. Perhaps the colored people were so discriminated against in labor circles that they were forced to steal in order to live.

In December, 1859, eight citizens of Ottawa were indicted by the United States Grand Jury for violating the fugitive slave law in rescuing Jim Gray from Southern claimants. Four of the principals, John Hossack, James Stout, Dr. Joseph Stout and Claudius B. King were brought to Chicago and put in jail. The Abolitionists proceeded to make martyrs of these men. The best lawyers of Chicago volunteered to defend them. In January, 1860, these men addressed the following letter to the editors of the Ottawa Republican: "We wish through the medium of your paper to inform the citizens of Ottawa that as humiliating and formidable as this prison life would seem under any other circumstances, to us it is rendered quite tolerable by the sympathy expressed by the liberty-loving people of Chicago. We wish to bear testimony to you of the capacious souls—first of our custodians, then of sheriff John Gray and the jailor, John Haskins; next of the bar; next of the editors; then of the citizens; and last but not least of the ladies. To our wives and children we would say, be of good cheer—the day is not far distant when we hope we shall be released from these bonds. Chicago is a large place, and could it be otherwise, where such big hearts abide." The Press and Tribune of January 4 sympathetically said: "Let our citizens remember that prominent citizens of a sister city are in our jail charged with interfering with the return of the fugitive slave "Jim" to his master. We have need to utter no suggestions." At the trial which was largely attended Hossack was sentenced to ten days imprisonment and a fine of $100, Joseph Stout to ten days imprisonment and a fine of $50 and Claudius B. King to one day's imprisonment and $10 fine. The total expenses to the defendants were about $1,600. Every dollar of this was raised by subscription in Ottawa and Chicago. In 1859 and 1860 negro catchers were particularly active in this locality. The Press and Tribune said: "The goodly number of fine fat chattels most provokingly free about this vicinity, and their market value down the river, are two circumstances that are constantly inviting the scant moral sense of the 'nigger stealers.' Almost every week attempts are made in the direction of the ultimatum—the conversion of these chattels into cash."

Almost every device conceivable was resorted to by the catchers to effect their object. On one occasion a hackman was offered $50 if he would convey four passengers (colored) to a railway station thirty miles from Chicago. The plan was to drug the negroes. The hackman refused. On another occasion a negro named Bill was loaded into a wagon and carried off a considerable distance before he recovered and escaped. It was shown that he had been overpowered with chloroform purchased at Buck & Rayner's drug store. A contract agreeing to pay $500 when Bill and his two children Andrew and Martha were delivered in St. Louis was found upon the person of one of the abductors. The colored people of Chicago on August 1, 1860, celebrated Emancipation Day of the West Indies. In November, 1860, Stephen F. Nucholls of Nebraska came here to re-capture his slave Eliza Grayson. He called upon Deputy Sheriff George Anderson to assist him, but that officer refused and assisted the woman to escape. Nucholls thereupon demanded $800 payment from Anderson for the loss of the slave. The Tribune of December 20, 1860, said, "Look out for him—a long, shabby fellow, a large operator in running off niggers is in town. He has come to save the Union probably by pocketing the profits of a kidnapping job. If what we hear is true, no man in the state has operated more successfully in this way. A party from Texas accompanies him and their sublime mission may be imaginable."

In January, 1860, two colored men and three colored women from a plantation near Jackson, Mississippi, were passed through Chicago in charge of the Underground Railroad bound for Canada. In May, 1860, a colored man, James Mann, raised a balance of $220 here to free his son then in slavery in Virginia. Previous to this he had paid $2,400 for himself, wife and two other children. In 1860 the colored people established a circulating library and asked for a colored school.

In the case of Eliza Grayson the grand jury indicted white residents of Chicago for participating in her escape. Among them were Deputy Sheriff Anderson, Justice Calvin DeWolf, Chancellor L. Jenks and J. H. Williams. All gave bail in the sum of $2,500 each. In the end they received but a nominal punishment.

In July, 1859, it was remarked that a colored man named William Turner had come back to Chicago as the agent of Southern owners to assist in identifying and recapturing their runaway slaves. The colored people made such hostile demonstrations toward him that at his own request he was placed in jail. About this time it transpired that white detectives of Chicago were really kidnappers of colored people. Among them were Charles Noyes and Charles W. Smith. They succeeded in decoying three colored men to a car which had been chartered from the Illinois Central Railway company and were conveyed to St. Louis and delivered to their owner. It was afterward learned that they were beaten nearly to death and that Noyes and his associates had been paid more than $1,000 for their services. Noyes managed to escape, but afterward committed a crime in New York for which he was punished. Upon the outbreak of the Rebellion Southern men who had lost slaves made desperate efforts to recapture them before the progress of the war should prevent. Chicago was visited late in 1860 and early in 1861 by more than a dozen agents of owners from the South. The Tribune of April, 1861, said: "There was a general stampede yesterday among the fugitive slaves harbored and residing in this city, and within a day or two, hundreds of them will have left for Canada, a course we advise to all who cannot make up their minds to save their country by going back to their masters." . . . "The city is overrun with slave owners and manhunters. The most extraordinary excitement prevails among our colored people and within the past few days hundreds of fugitives, some of them long residents here, have found safety in the British dominions. Some of these have left their homes here under circumstances of peculiar hardship, but the hunter of human flesh was upon them. In some cases most narrowly was capture evaded. On Thursday a mother and her young children were concealed under a heap of manure in the rear of a barn on Buffalo street in this city, when the master of the mother was turning over the hay in the hope of finding them there. . . . We object to a Federal office-holder under Abraham Lincoln surpassing in zealous manhunting all his predecessors in office. There is a distinction between doing one's painful duty under the law and making that duty a delight, and yet the latter has been chosen by Mr. Jones."

"There has been an immense state of excitement among the colored people generally, as a class our most quiet citizens, and the actual presence of numerous slave hunters in town and the knowledge that several writs were in the officers' hands has created a perfect stampede among the numerous fugitives resident here. Within the week ending with Sunday last nearly three hundred colored people from this city have sought refuge in Canada. We give the above figures on the best authority as the outside limit for the reason that the number is greatly exaggerated by rumors and accounts rife about town. All through last week they left in parties of from four to twelve or fifteen, quietly and without attracting attention. They went by the regular trains and generally at second-class fares. There was, however, a large share of those for whom an early departure was deemed prudent who were still in town when the week closed.

"A party of thirty were concealed for several days in the hold of a schooner whose destination was the other side of the lake. Sunday came and found upwards of one hundred pressing and anxious to go, for whose transportation late in the week preparations were made in the contract with the Michigan Southern railroad to take them through to Detroit in freight caboose cars at an average of $2 apiece. Sunday was made memorable by such an exodus as no city in the United States ever saw before. While the church bells were calling our congregations to praise and prayer, the same was a signal for a great gathering at the Baptist church on the corner of Buffalo street near Edina place, most remarkable in its character. The house, a neat structure erected by our colored residents, was densely packed. The services were impressive and deeply affecting. The occasion was to be the farewell of one hundred and fifteen who were to leave by the train for Canada."

L. C. P. Freer, who was very active in assisting the slaves to escape, issued the following notice in April, 1861: "To the late Liberty Guard: The new United States marshal is inaugurating a reign of terror among our colored population. Do you wish to take any steps in the matter? If you do, you are invited to meet at my office, 51 Clark street, at half past 7 o'clock this evening. No ones but live men are invited."

It was declared by the newspapers at this time that secession sympathizers were arranging to arrest a fugitive slave with the expectation that a rescue would be effected. The object was to so kindle the wrath of slave owners of the border slave states that they would join the secession movement. J. R. Jones was United States marshal in the spring of 1861. He arrested a colored man named Harris and delivered him in St. Louis before the people here were aware of the occurrence. He also arrested a colored man, wife and three children and delivered them to their owner in Missouri. He was so active that a mass meeting of the citizens demanded his removal and passed vigorous resolutions in opposition to his course. Among the most active in opposing him were L. C. P. Freer, Philo Carpenter, John Jones, J. F. Temple, Watson V. Coe, Chancellor L. Jenks and Dr. W. H. Kennicot. It was disclosed that the colored man Harris who had been conveyed to St. Louis by Marshal Jones had been betrayed by another colored man named Hayes, who when the facts became known was obliged to flee the city in order to save his life. The Tribune investigated the Harris case and announced that Harris was really a free man and had been abducted. A number of colored men in this city who had assisted the colored man Hayes were fined in small sums. They appealed and Chancellor L. Jenks signed their bonds. In April, 1861, the Baptists of Chicago held an immense anti-slavery meeting. During 1860 and 1861 the colored people of Chicago were guilty of many offenses against the city ordinances. They had established gambling houses and in open defiance of the law continued to conduct the same in spite of the officials. After 1861 all further attempts to recapture runaway slaves were abandoned by Southern owners. The progress of the war prevented the Southerners from recovering their property. The abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia in 1862 met the warm approbation of the colored people here. In June, 1862, there were polled in this county 994 votes against Section 1 of the negro act, 9,875 votes for Section 2 of the negro act, 9,620 votes for Section 3 of the negro act of the new constitution. When the announcement was received that Lincoln had declared the Emancipation Proclamation should take effect on January 1, 1863, the colored people held a jubilee of a week's duration. The principal services were at Quinn's chapel on Jackson street, on which occasion sixteen colored men enlisted in the Union Army. On January 1, 1863, when the Proclamation went into effect, they likewise held continued and elaborate services to celebrate the important event. In 1862 the colored people started a school of their race, with a white teacher, Theodore J. Ellmore. The first winter the term was six weeks, but during the second winter it lasted six months. It was located at 640 West Lake street. A colored evening school also was conducted. The repeal of the infamous black laws of Illinois in February, 1865, received the plaudits of the colored people here. This was a step for which they had prayed for more than a score of years. The act probably was passed largely in response to an elaborate petition which had been circulated here and uniformly signed by both black and white residents. The petition was taken to the Legislature by John Jones, colored, of this city. After the war the colored people had nothing to prevent their advancement in education, morals and general prosperity.

THE MEXICAN WAR 1846—1848

ASIDE from the companies raised in Cook county for the Black Hawk war and the early militia companies, nothing of a warlike nature occurred until the war with Mexico in 1846-48. In May, 1832, the militia of this vicinity were mustered and Gholson Kercheval served as captain and George W. Dole and John S. C. Hogan as first and second lieutenants. This company did not enter the service, but was supposed to be in readiness for emergencies. During the Black Hawk war Robert Kinzie commanded a company of Pottawatomie scouts. Capt. J. B. Beaubien also commanded a company of militia and a few Indians.

Under the law of 1829 the militia of Illinois was organized. Another law of 1833 provided for the organization of the militia of Cook county. It was provided that they should organize themselves into one regiment of two battalions. Under this law J. B. Beaubien and John Mann were candidates for colonel of the Cook county regiment. At the election held on the Des Plaines river on June 7, 1834, Beaubien was elected colonel "by an almost unanimous vote." The two battalions of this regiment were located as follows: All of Cook county from the Des Plaines river to the Oak Woods and northward was to constitute the first battalion, and all southward of that line was to constitute the second battalion. At that time, of course, Cook county embraced a portion or all of the present Will, Du Page, Lake and McHenry counties. The above election was held at Laughton's tavern, distant about twelve miles from Chicago and near the present Riverside on the Des Plaines. The Cook county regiment came to be called the Sixtieth and later the companies organized at Chicago were usually attached to the same. However, a number of companies organized here acted independently. In 1847 Colonel Beaubien became brigadier general of the Second brigade, Sixth division, Illinois militia, and J. B. F. Russell became colonel. Among the independent companies was the Chicago City Guards, organized in 1839, also the Dragoons, which had been organized before 1839. There was another company called the Washington Guards, organized as early as 1842. The Chicago Cavalry was organized in the spring of 1842. The Montgomery Guards were organized about the same time.

A short time previous to the outbreak of the war with Mexico a public meeting of the citizens, to be held at the courthouse, was called early in January, 1846, by Mayor Garrett. The object was "to take into consideration the best method of defending our city in case of war." While war with Mexico had been talked of, the real reason for this call was fear that some trouble with Great Britain might arise in the near future whereby the safety of Chicago might be jeopardized. Upon the outbreak of the war with Mexico and the call of the governor for volunteers immediate steps to raise two companies under Capt. Lyman Mower and Capt. Elisha E. Wells were taken and the companies were ordered to rendezvous at Alton. Another company was promptly raised in Lake precinct of Cook county under the command of William H. Davis, captain. Both of the companies of Captains Mower and Wells were mustered into the service late in June. Mower's company was assigned to the First regiment under Colonel Hardin, and Wells' company was assigned to the Second regiment under Colonel Bissell. Both of these regiments were promptly sent to the relief of General Taylor and participated in the battle of Buena Vista and others. Other calls for volunteers spurred Chicago to raise additional companies. One was recruited by Capt. C. C. Sibley and another by Capt. E. B. Bill, both of which joined General Scott and participated in the battles of his campaign. Early in 1847 another company was raised by Capt. T. B. Kenny and another by Capt. William Rogers, and a little later companies were raised by Capts. George W. Cole and James R. Hugunin. Captain Kenny's company was accepted May 8. Captain Roberts with his company tried to join the regiment under Colonel Hays, but arrived too late and was forced to go independently. The Democrat of July 2, 1847, said: "We have raised nine companies and are ready for the tenth. The United States recruiting officers should be here at the Harbor and River convention if soldiers are wanted for Mexico." Previous to this date three or four companies which had been raised in Cook county were compelled to disband and join miscellaneous commands because their services could not be accepted. The company of Captain Rogers was begun in February, 1847, but the enlistment was so slow that it was not ready until June. It was claimed that the slowness in raising volunteers was owing to the "inexpediency, injustice and inhumanity of the war with Mexico." Generally the Democrats favored the war and the Whigs opposed it. The opposition of the latter was based upon the fact that the territory to be acquired as a result of the war would be devoted to slavery; thus the South as well as the Northern Democracy favored the war and all who opposed an extension of slavery opposed also the war. The company commanded by Captain Kenny was called the Chicago cavalry. Late in 1847 the company raised by James R. Hugunin took the field. Companies by Captains R. K. Swift and Harvey were raised in 1847. The company under George W. Cole was named the Shields Cadets. Col. R. J. Hamilton was very active in raising recruits for the war.

Captain Harvey's company reached Alton July 14, 1847. A company called the City Guards was organized here in November, 1847, principally by W. D. Danenhower. With the end of the year 1847 the enlistment in Cook county for the war with Mexico was practically ended. The county of Cook furnished a total of about ten companies for the Mexican war—say in all about nine hundred men. In December of that year a peace convention assembled in Chicago and demanded that the ante-bellum status should be adopted. They demanded the immediate cessation of the war and the restoration of former conditions. The Democrat argued against the resolutions of the convention, declaring that such a step would be nonsensical. In the issue of December 24 that paper said:

"Call home your troops, Mr. President of the United States! Sheath your sword, General Scott! Drop your heads, trail your arms and sneak out of Mexico, noble veterans, for the Chicago Peace society DEMAND this most peremptorily at your hands, and by its potent influence it will enforce its mandate!"

The year 1848 was principally characterized by the return and ceremonious reception of the Mexican volunteers. Numerous militia companies remained as a heritage of the war spirit kindled by the Mexican war. Among the companies organized between that date and the outbreak of the Rebellion were the Montgomery Guards, the German Rifle company, Ringgold Guards, Chicago Hussars, Emmet Guards, Chicago Light Guards, Jackson Guards, Garden City Guards, National Guards, Washington Battery, Chicago Battery, Shields Guards, William Tell Guards, Highland Guards and others. J. B. Beaubien was general of the Cook county militia. In the spring of 1848 the Sixty-third regiment, Illinois militia, was organized at Blue Island with Theodotus Doty as colonel. The Sixty-second regiment of Cook county militia was organized at Wheeling, on the Des Plaines, in 1848, with Joseph Filkins as colonel. J. B. F. Russell continued to be colonel of the First regiment Cook county militia at Chicago. In the spring of 1854 a reunion of the soldiers of the war of 1812 and of the Mexican war was held at South Market hall, Chicago; the object was to secure pensions for survivors of those wars. In 1854 Col. W. H. Davis commanded the Sixtieth regiment Illinois militia. In June, 1856, the annual encampment of the state militia was held on the lake shore four miles south of Chicago. The camp grounds afterwards became Camp Douglas at Cottage Grove. Gen. J. B. Beaubien was supreme commander on that occasion. In the spring of 1858, upon the call of volunteers for the war against the Mormons in Utah, several hundred volunteers were raised in Cook county. In April of that year thirty-two recruits were sent to Jefferson barracks, Missouri, thence to be marched to Utah. As a matter of fact a full regiment of Cook county militia for the Utah war was tendered and was refused. It was commanded by S. B. Buckner, colonel, who afterwards surrendered Fort Donelson to General Grant during the Rebellion. Late in the fifties the marvelous performance of the Zouaves under Col. E. E. Ellsworth attracted the attention of the whole country. Their triumphant trip throughout the East was noted by every newspaper in the land. As a whole the Cook county militia were in excellent condition when the Rebellion broke forth.

THE CIVIL WAR 1861—1865

THE election of Mr. Lincoln to the presidency in November, 1860, was variously received in this city. Chicago was peculiarly, if not unfortunately, situated at this time and during the entire continuance of the Civil war. Many of its foremost citizens had previously been residents of the slave-holding states—particularly of Virginia and Kentucky—and, as might have been expected, such residents sympathized with the South, decried and denounced Abolitionism, and from the start openly manifested their hostility to the probable restrictive measures of President Lincoln's administration. To them it was not a question of treason or disloyalty, but was one of protest against any interference by the Government with the institutions of the South—particularly slavery. As this interference was menaced, as they thought, by the election of Mr. Lincoln, they opposed his election and combated the views of the Abolitionists and of all who favored the restriction of slavery. Their views were openly expressed, bitter in sentiment and expression, and defiant when Abolition measures were suggested or advocated. This condition of local opinion caused the election of November, 1860, to be one of extreme tension, rendered all the more stringent when it became known that Mr. Lincoln had been elected. To most of the leaders here, strange as it may seem, the entire question was one of politics and expediency. The question of loyalty or treason had not yet confronted the people. The great war none was wise enough to forecast. So Democrats and Republicans contended over the lesser problems of political intrigue, hoping in case of the Democrats to avert the threatened rupture of the Union of the South by conceding their demands, and determined in the case of the Republicans to nullify the Kansas-Nebraska act and the Dred Scott decision and to prevent the threatened nationalization of slavery regardless of consequences.

"At midnight the special dispatches received at this office, and elsewhere given, told the story beyond peradventure that Abraham Lincoln had been elected by the people. The enthusiasm in our streets at the time was something tremendous. The air rang with jubilant shouts. The Wide Awakes were out, led by a splendid band. All was rejoicing and jubilation. Our entire community deserve credit for the eminently peaceable manner in which the immense vote was polled yesterday. There were no fights, few arrests, no rows, and less noise than we have ever witnessed here on much less exciting occasions."—(Tribune, November 7, 1860.)

On November 21, 1860, Mr. Lincoln and Mrs. Lincoln and Mr. Hamlin arrived and stopped at the Tremont house. They visited the various points of interest and held a public reception at the Tremont house parlors on November 23. It required two and a half hours for the line to pour through the hotel, but Mr. Lincoln shook hands with each individual. At his right stood Mrs. Lincoln and at his left Mr. Hamlin. This was a local event of great prominence—one long to be remembered by the celebrities of Chicago.

The immediate effects at Chicago of the election of Mr. Lincoln were somewhat marked. Soon orders for produce from old and reliable houses of Baltimore and New Orleans were declined unless accompanied with the cash. The secession of South Carolina and one by one of the other Southern states was regarded with direful forebodings by the people of Cook county. The attitude of Mr. Douglas in the United States Senate in December, 1860, particularly in his masterly replies to Wigfall, Iverson and other fire-eating disunionists, was highly praised by all residents here. Coercive measures began to be favored by all Republicans and many Democrats immediately after the secession of South Carolina December 20, 1860. The course of Maj. Robert Anderson in retiring to Fort Sumter late in December, 1860, received the warm approval of local Republicans. It was noted that during the Black Hawk war in 1832 the same Major Anderson had been inspector general of Illinois volunteers and under him had served Capt. Abraham Lincoln; now in 1860 the latter was soon to be commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, while the former was major of the First United States artillery located at the storm center of the Union. Early in the month of January, 1861, the ringing message of Governor Yates to the Legislature kindled the warmest comments.

Late in December, 1860, and early in January, 1861, the Times and its supporters here sharply censured Major Anderson for occupying Fort Sumter. The Tribune of January 3 in answering said: "We do not cite the Times article to prove its sympathy with the disunionists and traitors of South Carolina, because that is well known wherever the paper is read, but to show to what lengths partisan hate and malice may go with impunity in the North." The following call, signed by ninety-six leading citizens, was circulated on January 2: "The citizens of Chicago, without distinction of party, who are in favor of standing by the Constitution and the Union and the enforcement of the laws, are requested to meet at Bryan hall on Saturday evening, January 5, 1861, for the purpose of expressing their sentiments in relation thereto." Bryan hall was crowded at this meeting. S. S. Hayes, a Democrat, presided. Speeches were delivered by S. A. Goodwin, E. C. Larned, S. S. Hayes, William Bross, Henry Waller, E. Van Buren, I. N. Arnold and others. The committee on resolutions were as follows: S. A. Goodwin, W. K. McAllister, J. Lyle King, J. W. Sheahan, E. Van Buren, John C. Rogers, E. C. Larned, A. Van Arman and Digby V. Bell. There was no division of the sentiment to maintain the Union at all hazards. Gen. R. K. Swift presented this resolution, "the reading of which was followed by a perfect whirlwind of applause, the audience almost to a man rising to their feet in a tumult of enthusiasm": "Resolved, That we heartily approve of the decisive and patriotic course of Major Anderson at Charleston, and that in him we see the type of the hero of New Orleans."

This meeting of all shades of opinion on the exciting questions of that period was abrupt, violent and difficult to manage. Several wanted radical resolutions, others milder ones, and still others wanted concessions to restore the Union. The following was proposed: "Resolved, That while we disapprove and denounce all legislative or individual action calculated to impair or infringe upon the constitutional rights of the people of any section of the Union, we have neither compromise nor concession to offer disunionists arrayed in open rebellion to the Government, or their aiders or abettors." This was too severe to suit sympathizers with the South. All violent resolutions were rejected. The resolutions reported by the special committee were adopted. They declared: 1. That the Union must be preserved; 2. The right to secede was denied; 3. Federal laws must be enforced if necessary; 4. Peaceable measures should be exhausted before the sword was drawn; 5. There should be an honorable and constitutional settlement of the slavery question; 6. The action of Major Anderson was endorsed; 7. All differences between the North and South should be adjusted in a spirit of fairness. The resolution most vehemently objected to was as follows: "That whatever their difficulties may be (differences between the Northern and Southern sections of the Union), they will only be aggravated by a dissolution of the Union; and that men of all political parties in both sections of the country should be ready to make great concessions to restore peace and harmony between the different sections of the country."

The Tribune of January 8 said: "Had the meeting at Bryan hall on Saturday night last contented itself with the solemn declaration that the 'Union must and shall be preserved' and that 'the laws must be enforced at whatever cost and by the whole power of the Nation,' its action would have received the unqualified indorsement of the people not only of this city but of the whole Northwest, and the moral effect could not have been otherwise than good. In going farther than this, the good that might have been done was wholly defeated, and the whole moral effect of the meeting was to the encouragement of treason and secession. . . . It is due to many who participated in the meeting at Bryan hall to say that they were misled as to the real force of the resolution pledging to a willingness to make 'large concessions.' . . . The Tribune has only words of denunciation for any resolution or scheme that contemplates the surrender of one iota of the principles on which the late Republican triumph was achieved. The day of compromise has gone by. To make concessions in the face of treason and of threats is both dastardly and unpatriotic."

Dissatisfaction with the proceedings of the Bryan hall meeting continued to grow until another, of all persons "opposed to great concessions to the disunionists," was called. The "great concessions" resolution was written by E. C. Larned with the conscientious design of uniting all partisans to support Lincoln's administration in quelling the rebellion and saving the Union. While it was not satisfactory, the general effect here and throughout the state was conciliatory, quieting and therefore good. In the end, however, the sentiment of "no concessions to the slave power" prevailed here. J. K. C. Forrest openly, defiantly and eloquently opposed any concessions, and was the spokesman of hundreds of the best citizens. On the other hand S. S. Hayes and a large delegation favored the concession resolution. The proclamation of Mayor Wentworth to observe January 8 (Jackson's day) as a day of demonstration to approve the course of Major Anderson was recognized by the whole city. The flag was flung out everywhere, salutes were fired, and the militia companies paraded.

On January 14, 1861, a big meeting was called "to set the people right on the 'great concession' question," as it was called. Judge George Manierre presided and opened the proceedings with a strong speech in favor of maintaining the Union—with force if necessary. Grant Goodrich, William Bross, Gen. R. K. Swift, I. N. Arnold, J. W. Waughop, Van H. Higgins, J. K. C. Forrest, A. Huntington, S. B. Perry and A. D. Bradley were appointed a committee on resolutions. While they were being prepared, eloquent and loyal speeches were delivered by I. N. Arnold, John Lyle King, Grant Goodrich, A. D. Bradley, John Wentworth and others. Three of the resolutions presented and adopted were as follows:

"Resolved, That the Federal Government is a government of the people and not a compact between individual states; that as the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, secession or nullification is revolution and treason.

"Resolved, That while we disapprove and denounce all legislative or individual action calculated to impair or infringe the Constitutional rights of any section of the Union, we have neither compromise nor concession to offer disunionists arrayed with arms in their hands in open rebellion against the Government, or their aiders or abettors.

"Resolved, That we will maintain the flag of our country, that it shall remain the flag of the whole country, and that not a star shall be torn from it, neither by secession, rebellion or aggression."

The Tribune of January 15 said: "No one could have witnessed the vociferous and almost ravenous enthusiasm with which the stars and stripes were greeted at the immense Union meeting in Metropolitan hall last evening without believing that the men of Chicago are ready to follow their nation's flag into the most trying scenes that ever beset the pathway of a high and righteous patriotism. It was tumultuous and prolonged, rising and swelling like the waves in angry weather."

On January 24, 1861, the Democrats held a large meeting at North Market hall. Richard T. Merrick presided. Among the speakers were W. C. Goudy, Charles C. Cameron, T. Benton Taylor, M. F. Tuley, Robert S. Blackwell and Charles M. Willard. All shades of opinion concerning the state of the Union were expressed. The meeting endorsed the resolutions adopted by the recent Democratic state convention at Springfield, among which was the solemn declaration that a state had not the right to secede from the Union, but if it did the Government could not prevent it. The most of the speakers favored conciliation and compromise. Strong resolutions to suppress the rebellion, offered by Charles S. Cameron, were defeated by this meeting. This was one of the first Copperhead movements here.

On January 25, 1861, a big meeting was called at Metropolitan hall by 168 young men under the age of 30 years, "for the purpose of inaugurating a movement for the organization of the young men of the county in defence of the Constitution and the Union as they are." L. H. Davis presided. The committee on resolutions were as follows: Horace White, G. A. Forsyth, J. O. Parker, G. W. Whittle, W. H. Blodgett, J. W. Merrill, C. T. Scammon, D. L. Leiter, W. S. Cadman, G. P. Williams and H. D. French. Several sets of resolutions, all fervent, strong and loyal, were adopted. The C. S. Cameron resolutions which had been defeated at the Democratic meeting the night before were adopted amid roars of applause by the young men.

"The meeting of the young men at Metropolitan hall last evening was overwhelming in numbers and uproarious in enthusiasm. The boys were out in full force and had a jolly season of speeches, resolutions, songs and cheers. Every patriotic allusion to the stars and stripes and every determined expression of adherence to the Constitution as it is elicited irrepressible applause."—(Tribune, January 26, 1861.)

The young men's meeting adjourned to reassemble on January 29. The enthusiasm was even stronger than before. Excellent resolutions to uphold the Union were passed amid tumultuous cheers. One was as follows: "Resolved, That we young men of Chicago do hereby tender our personal services to the Governor of Illinois, whenever in the judgment of the President and Congress of the United States it may be necessary to call for volunteers to aid in vindicating the Constitution, executing the laws and maintaining the Union exactly as our fathers established it."

On February 4, 1861, the reception here of the unfounded rumor that Major Anderson in Fort Sumter had been reinforced occasioned much excitement and enthusiasm. Upon the receipt of this rumor the value of Southern and other stocks declined heavily in New York and in Chicago; exchange and gold advanced. The Tribune from the start took a radical Union course, while the Times assumed an ultra Southern view. The Times in January and February sharply criticised Douglas for his course in Congress in opposing the rebels. The Post was the organ of the Douglas wing of the Democracy. The Journal was Republican, but less radical than the Tribune. The Staats Zeitung was thoroughly loyal, as indeed were the Cook county Germans generally. As a whole the Irish favored Democracy, and many of them took the Times and imbibed its Southern views. As might have been expected, Chicago's trade with the South as a whole and with New Orleans in particular was almost wholly cut off. This occasioned strenuous complaint from business men here who suffered thereby and who were unable or unwilling to look beyond mere commercialism. Finally they issued the following call: "We, the undersigned Republicans of the city of Chicago, who have heretofore left all political matters to politicians and editors (who we think have more or less always misrepresented us), deeming it high time and highly important that a meeting be called to have a fair expression on the political differences that now distract and divide the country, do call a meeting on February 13, 1861, at Bryan hall." This was really a movement against the strong course of the coercionists and in favor of concession and conciliation. Many of the packers and wholesalers whose trade had been injured were concerned in this call. Their minds were more on Mammon than on the Union. The meeting was held, and resolutions deploring the distracted state of the country and recommending conciliation were adopted.

As a matter of fact this was a period of change in principle. The political standards of the past were thrown down. A revolution in thought swept the country. There were the Abolitionists who were determined to destroy slavery at any cost. Then came the radical Republicans who cried, Save the Union and restrict slavery! Other Republicans and the Douglas branch of the Democracy cried, Save the Union and leave slavery as it is! Another branch of the Democracy declared that the South should not be coerced and could dissolve the Union if they wished to do so. All of these factions were well represented here at the outbreak of the Rebellion and all held separate meetings to announce and disseminate their particular views. Party lines were largely obliterated, many Democrats in particular joining the Republicans who favored, if necessary, the coercive policy in order to save the Union. "Leave slavery alone and save the Union" was the cry of the majority, perhaps, of Cook county. Thus the Union sentiment prevailed here at the outset; the momentous step of obliterating slavery came at a later stage of the war to distract still further the revolution in sentiment and principle.

An immense Union meeting was held at Metropolitan hall on February 19, 1861, B. F. Millard serving as chairman. Brilliant speeches were made by the chairman, J. J. Richards, Ichabod Codding, E. C. Larned, A. D. Bradley and John Wentworth. Determined resolutions to save the Union at any cost were passed. In February Joseph Medill, representing the Tribune in Washington, was attacked by William Kellogg, one of the Congressmen from Illinois, for having sharply criticised the public course of that gentleman. Never before was Washington's birthday celebrated here so fervently as it was in 1861. The peril in which the Union stood aroused all the latent patriotism of the people. The memorable journey of Mr. Lincoln from Springfield to Washington, with its report of plots to assassinate or to wreck the train, ending finally by the sudden and secret advent of Mr. Lincoln into Washington, swayed and rocked this county as by a tornado. Immense relief was felt when Buchanan stepped down from the chair he had disgraced and Lincoln assumed the scepter of state. The Tribune in its transport said: "Thank God! This (Monday, March 4) is the day of deliverance. . . . Henceforth a new career is open to the Republic. . . . The Government is rescued from the grasp of the slave power. . . . This Government—for the last forty years the creature of despotic institutions—the machine for propagating human bondage—is to be hereafter on the side of human rights and human liberty."

In March the appointment by Mr. Lincoln of Norman B. Judd of Chicago as minister plenipotentiary to the court at Berlin pleased the residents of this county. After the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln many here, including the Tribune, wanted and expected immediate action to recover the forts and other property of the Government which had been taken possession of by the South. But such a step was not yet the policy of the administration. Local patriotism could not understand the delay and hence grew restive and fault-finding even with "Honest Abe." The Tribune of March 18, voicing the impatience effervescing here, said: "The condition of the country demands action. A 'masterly inactivity' policy is the wisest for some emergencies, but it is not adapted to our present needs. The Government must indicate its power in the face of treason and rebellion or its destruction is certain." But the delay continued for causes later well known, until anxious hearts, in the darkness, almost lost hope.

To the Government loan early in March, 1861, Walter L. Newberry subscribed $40,000. It was such acts that encouraged the Government and furnished it with the "sinews of war." Cook county and indeed the whole North, like Micawber, was waiting for something to turn up, and they did not have to wait much longer. Late in March it was advertised that the famous Wigwam in which Lincoln had been nominated would be sold at auction. It was bought by Orrington Lunt for the board of trustees of Garrett Biblical Institute.

Generally, nearly all of the military companies were meeting and drilling, though even they were waiting to see what was going to happen. Finally the attack on Fort Sumter awoke the waiting county and city like an earthquake. Lincoln's plan of throwing upon the South the burden of commencing the war had succeeded. The Tribune of April 13 and 15 said: "War Inaugurated.—By the act of a handful of ingrates and traitors, war is inaugurated in this heretofore happy and peaceful Republic. While we write the bombardment of Sumter is going on. . . . The duty of the Government from this moment is plain. The resources of the Republic must be put forth with no grudging or tardy hand. The strife must be short and the war quick, sharp and decisive. . . . The traitors commence the strife. They crown their months of insult, aggression and robbery by the act which plunges the country into war. Heaven and the civilized world needed not this last enormity to justify the Government in putting forth its utmost power to crush the men by whom it is assailed. But rather upon the traitors than upon the friends of the Union be the responsibility for blood which must now be spilt. The most ample apologist for treason is henceforth silenced. This on the part of the Government is today a war of self-defense. Tomorrow let it be one of quick aggression. . . . Yesterday was a day long to be remembered in Chicago. Whatever the future has in store to continue or increase the present excited state of feeling, the earliest effect of the war news of Saturday evening on and throughout yesterday was of too marked a nature readily to be paralleled in a city usually so quiet on the Lord's day. The city was given up to intense and all prevailing excitement the like of which has never been known in this community."

An immense Union meeting was held at Metropolitan hall on the evening of April 15, called to voice the sentiments of the people. Norman B. Judd presided. Among the speakers were Elliott Anthony, R. S. Blackwell, I. N. Arnold, J. S. Rumsey, T. J. Sloan, A. D. Bradley, B. F. Millard, George W. Gage, S. M. Wilson, U. F. Linder and Owen Lovejoy. Mr. Linder delivered a speech of great power and eloquence. In fact, all of the speakers, under the inspiration of the hour, surpassed themselves. It remained with Owen Lovejoy, however, to unfetter the patriotism burning in the bosoms here and to give it vent in enthusiastic cheers and in the blazing spirit of war. He entered the hall while the speaking was in progress and was promptly called to the stand by the whole audience amid immense cheering. The Tribune of April 16 said: "Our brief limits can do no justice to his fervidly eloquent harangue, which characteristically passed through every range from telling hits and biting sarcasm to the most eloquent and pathetic pathos and beauty. At times his voice was drowned in tumults of applause; at times the very breathing of the vast audience seemed hushed as he painted in feeling terms the evils of the times on which we have fallen. The speech of Mr. Lovejoy was followed most appropriately by the Star Spangled Banner sung in splendid style by Frank Lombard, the vast audience swelling the chorus with an intensity of feeling and effect we have never seen equalled. . . . Chicago was the scene of vast excitement yesterday. Men gave themselves and the day up to the hearing and the discussion of the exciting news. It is most gratifying to note how little the varied political antecedents had to do with the all-prevalent and fervid glow of patriotic feeling. Men of all parties talked of the American flag and its honor as a common possession and heritage. Men of peace and ordinarily quiet and pacific citizens seemed to walk with fuller chests and to draw in long breaths, and as they heard this and that accession of exciting news spoke and acted as if in a war time. Men became intolerant all at once, and those who last week and in the time past have heard our institutions attacked and the aggressions of slavery defended, who have dared heretofore to quote the political and national gospel according to Jefferson Davis, sang small or not at all and were made to do little and say less that should indicate their sympathy with the assailants of the Stars and Stripes. The war footing was taken on suddenly. . . . Throughout all yesterday the city was brilliant with flags. They floated from the hotels, public buildings, newspaper offices, and from many of the stores. The newspaper offices were thronged all day, and the bulletins, issued as fast as the dispatches came, found eager perusal by thousands and passed from lip to lip. . . . And foremost among those who are ready to dare all, brave all, sacrifice all, are the women of Chicago. . . . In this city there is much stir and consultation among our military men, and preparations for the immediate future are in progress."

On the evening of April 16, 1861, two companies of United States troops which had been stationed in Minnesota passed through Chicago on their way to Washington under command of Major Pemberton. So intense was the military spirit at this time that fully 10,000 cheering people turned out to see them as they marched through the streets from one depot to another. By April 17 the effervescent state of public feeling had to some extent given place to the determined sentiments of war. Immediately upon the fall of Fort Sumter all the fragmentary militia companies here began mustering volunteers and held daily, almost hourly, drills. Public meetings in all parts of the city and county, both of native and foreign born citizens, were held preparatory to active work in the field. The old United States Zouaves (Colonel Ellsworth's pride) were reorganizing under Captain Hayden. The Irish companies were filling up. The German Turners were nearly ready. The Union Cadets were almost the first to be prepared for their arms. The Highland Guards were drilling almost nightly under Captain McArthur. Their services were tendered to Governor Yates about April 16. Capt. Charles R. Baker left for Springfield Tuesday evening, April 16, for the purpose of inducing the authorities to accept his company of Chicago dragoons. The students at Bryant and Stratton's college began forming a company. Another company was called to rendezvous at the Tremont house. All of the old companies were calling for recruits. The Tribune of April 18 said: "Chicago Volunteers.—Last night the city was alive with volunteer meetings. The coolest resolution, coupled with the most stirring enthusiasm, marked all the gatherings. Between 1,500 and 1,600 men are already on the muster rolls. Tonight there will be a general rendezvous at Bryan hall for further enlistment and to provide a fund for meeting the contingent expenses of the companies until the state shall make provisions for the same. The work must go on. Though Illinois has been drawn on for only six regiments, it is inevitable that the call will soon be doubled or trebled. There is no time for delay."

In a letter to the Tribune, dated April 18, 1861, Mr. H. Cox asked if some step should not be taken to provide for the families of soldiers. The Chicago Light artillery under Col. Ezra Taylor had four brass pieces and two howitzers and were nearly ready. By April 17 the Washington Independent regiment under Col. Thomas Shirley had seven companies nearly filled. They were the Highland guards, Washington Light cavalry, Washington rifles, Chicago grenadiers, Lincoln rifles, Union rifles and Illinois rifles. The company raised at Bryant and Stratton's was tendered to the Governor April 17. The Tribune of April 19 said: "A movement is on foot, started by private citizens, to uniform and equip the Zouaves by private subscription. A wealthy, well-known citizen heads the list with $1,000." The Times of April 16 spoke of "His Excellency President Davis." This act kindled the wrath of the Union enthusiasts. Before April 18 Chicago bankers had subscribed over $500,000 to the state war fund to be used in carrying on expenses prior to the assembling of the Legislature.

The Tribune of April 19 had this to say of an immense double war meeting held here: "It would be impossible to describe the wild enthusiasm of the double meeting at Bryan and Metropolitan halls last evening, called to procure subscriptions for the immediate expenses of our volunteers. The money came down like rain, and the people rushed forward in unprecedented numbers at the various military headquarters to enroll themselves among the defenders of the flag. Lighted tar barrels illuminated the horizon, and the streets were alive till midnight with martial music and the shouting multitude. . . . The wires are burdened with dispatches offering men to the Governor. Democrats are struggling with Republicans and Republicans with Democrats, for places in the ranks. The cry is 'Still they come!' How different from the sluggish movements which preceded the war with Mexico, when three successive proclamations from Governor Ford failed to start a volunteer in Chicago, and when the civil authorities well nigh despaired of raising the Illinois quota. Then the consciences of the people were not enlisted. Now they are touched as with a live coal from off the altar of their country."

On April 18 Capts. Charles W. Barker and Fred Harding returned from Springfield with the joyful news that their companies had been accepted by Governor Yates. Another immense war meeting was held at Bryan hall on the evening of April 18. Among the speakers were Judge Drummond, S. S. Hayes, ex-Governor Baker of New Hampshire, but in 1861 residing in Iowa, George W. Gage, Judge Gookins of Indiana, John Wentworth, I. N. Arnold, Philip Conley and Rev. Mr. Corning. A splendid series of resolutions was adopted, among which was the following: "Resolved, That the armed Southern rebellion against our beloved and cherished Union is without excuse or patriotism, an outcry against freedom and humanity, a most wicked and diabolical scheme to subserve selfish and ambitious ends, and that the traitors who have armed themselves and confederates against our government shall be conquered, disarmed and crushed out, cost what blood and treasure and time it may."

At this meeting $8,386 was subscribed in a few minutes to be used to meet current expenses in equipping the first Chicago companies. Among the subscribers were: John Wentworth, $500; R. M. Hough, $500; S. F. Gale, $500; J. L. Hancock, $500; Walter L. Newberry, $500; and E. W. Willard, $500.

The same evening (April 18) a big neutral meeting was held at Metropolitan hall, among the speakers being Rev. Mr. Cox, Senator Bestor of Peoria, H. E. Seelye, Murray F. Tuley, G. A. Much, S. S. Hayes, Col. Thomas Shirley, C. G. Wicker and John A. Thompson. Modified or conciliatory resolutions were adopted. This meeting was not a credit to the participants, numbers of whom in after years were ashamed of the proceedings. The same evening an immense war and patriotic meeting was held in West Market hall by the Scandinavians. On the evening of April 17 a deputation of West Side Germans waited upon the editor of the Chicago Democrat and demanded that he display the Stars and Stripes from his office, as his was the only newspaper office in the city that had not already done so. He complied. The war meetings were so large and so numerous that the Wigwam was prepared for that service and renamed "National hall." By April 19 the fund to equip volunteers amounted to $36,000. The Board of Trade had subscribed $5,000 toward the fund, but private individuals of the board had given $5,000 more. It was announced April 19 that Washington Independent regiment, consisting of ten companies, had been accepted entire by the state. Captain Harding's company drilled at the old Board of Trade rooms. Men past forty-five years talked of organizing a company of home guards. Captain Barker's company drilled at the Armory; his Dragoons numbered 120 by April 19. George Smith, the banker, subscribed $1,000 to the volunteer fund.

The first volunteers of Cook county left here on Sunday night, April 21. The Tribune of April 22 contained the following notice: "The train on the Illinois Central road which left at 10 o'clock last night carried off seven hundred men—comprising a fine body of troops, armed and equipped for active service, however immediate: The Light artillery of Capt. James Smith, the Lincoln rifles under Captain Michalozy, Captain Clybourn's company, Captain Harding's company, the United States Zouaves under Captain Hayden, and the Union Cadets under Captain Kowald. . . . The scene at the station was a thrilling one as the hour for departure drew near. Parents crowded about to bid good-bye to sons, wives to take leave of husbands, sisters to brothers, lovers parted, friends exchanged farewells. It was bringing the war home—the departure of these troops. An immense concourse of spectators were present, who gave them a parting cheer as the long train of twenty-six cars, drawn by two engines, moved slowly out along the pier."

The remainder of this regiment was to be sent forward within two weeks. April 21 was the busiest Sunday Chicago had ever experienced. All day the streets echoed with the tread of troops, the voices of the bugles and the roll of the drums. The headquarters of Gen. R. K. Swift and of the war committee was on Wells street between Lake and South Water. General Swift commanded the troops that left Sunday night, April 21, for Springfield. Roger Fowler was appointed commissary general here and Colonel Baldwin brigade inspector. The following day (Monday) was as stirring as Sunday. Troops paraded the streets almost constantly. The excitement caused all the courts to adjourn. Solomon Sturges offered to arm and equip at his own expense a company of eighty sharpshooters. Henry Farnam, J. Y. Scammon and the Chicago Gas Light company each gave $1,000 to the war fund. New companies were springing up all over the city. Captain Barker's Chicago dragoons and the Rumsey guards under Captain Kellogg left for Springfield April 22. A company of engineers, sappers and miners began enlisting at the surveyor's office. Four companies of a Reserve corps were nearly organized by April 22. Company A of the Highland guards, commanded by Captain Raffan, became the color company of the Washington regiment. The Union rifles, a German sharpshooting organization, were ready April 23. The Irish citizens were busy. At North Market hall on April 20, in one and a half hours, 325 names were enrolled for an Irish regiment. Recruiting stations for this organization were opened in many places throughout the city and county. Captain Mulligan was active in recruiting and organizing it. He later became its colonel. It formed the famous "Mulligan's brigade." The first Cook county troops to take the field were sent to Cairo, Illinois, to guard that section from a threatened attack.

At a preliminary meeting of ladies held April 22 at Bryan's hall, thirty of them, married and single, volunteered as nurses, to be ready when called upon. The Chicago Medical society passed a resolution to give to the families of absent soldiers medical service gratis. At this time organized provision to care for sick and wounded soldiers was taken. The committee of safety were A. H. Burley (president), E. I. Tinkham (vice-president), James Lang (vice-president), Samuel Hoard (secretary and treasurer), E. H. Haddock, W. T. Mather, Julian S. Rumsey, Thomas B. Bryan, L. P. Hilliard and Orrington Lunt. A crack Zouave regiment was commenced by George E. Gage, W. T. Barron, A. F. Chadbourn, L. P. Bradley, John Van Arman, John M. Loomis, Frank T. Sherman, F. W. Buckingham and others. By April 23 there was strong talk of the necessity of a vigilance committee to hold in check Southern sympathizers. In his message to the Legislature April 23, 1861, Governor Yates recommended the organization of ten regiments and the appropriation of $3,000,000—all for war purposes. Tuesday, April 23, was as busy a day in military affairs here as were Sunday and Monday. Casper Butz, who had served in the Baden revolution of 1848, and Charles Torbahl began recruiting a German battalion April 23. The companies before and after April 23 began leaving for Springfield, often without ceremony and without notice. By April 24, according to the Tribune of that date, nineteen full companies had left Chicago for Cairo and Springfield, but quite a large number of them had come here from adjacent counties. The Chicago Home guards, by April 23, consisting of men over age, numbered 140 and were commanded by Capt. C. E. Thompson. By this date companies commanded by the following captains were either entirely filled or nearly so: Shambeck, Rolshansen, Lippert, Becker, Putz, Mattern, Poull, George Schneider of the Staats Zeitung, Van Horn and Hersch. The Swiss citizens were organizing a reserve corps, and some half dozen other companies, without commanders as yet, were nearly ready. Thus Chicago and Cook county, though bitterly opposed, criticised and insulted by local Southern sympathizers, were doing their full duty to aid the Government to save the Union. On April 23 about 1,000 ladies assembled at Bryan hall to complete an organization to carry on a systematic plan of preparing lint and bandages for the hospital department of the army. Forty-nine of them volunteered to become nurses. Senator Douglas on his way home from Washington made several speeches—one at Columbus and one at Indianapolis—and in each vigorously advocated the prosecution of the war for the Union. One of the duties of the committee of safety was to stop shipments of contraband to the South. By April 24 Mulligan's brigade comprised about 500 men; they received $400 from the citizens' committee for equipment. Captains Fuller and Snyder had companies about ready by April 26. Several of the companies of the "Yates Phalanx" were started about this time. The "Ten Regiment Bill" passed the Legislature May 2, and $2,000,000 was appropriated to cover war expenses. The ten regiments were for state service, and were in addition to the six regiments raised under President Lincoln's call for 75,000 volunteers. Capt. Chas. R. Walsh was elected colonel of the Irish (Mulligan's) brigade, according to the Tribune of May 2, 1861. Capt. E. L. Brand had recruited a company by April 24. The colored men of the city held a public meeting April 24 and passed resolutions of regret that they were not permitted to enlist and fight for the flag and freedom. A company of sailors was well advanced by April 25. The companies of Captains Kellogg and Cooper left for the front April 24. On April 25 Senator Douglas was invited to address the Illinois Legislature. He did so and made a ringing and eloquent Union speech. The Tribune reporter wrote: "The effect of this most powerful oratorical effort was electric. The whole house rose to their feet and gave cheer after cheer for Douglas, for the Union and for the Stars and Stripes." A big war meeting was held at Lemont on April 23, H. M. Singer serving as chairman. Strong Union resolutions, offered by B. F. Brown, were adopted. A whole company was enrolled on this occasion, though the town had only about 400 inhabitants.

By April 26 Van Arman's company was half filled; the Irish brigade was 600 strong; Captain Slaughter's rifle corps was well advanced; Colonel Peaslee's "Yates Phalanx" regiment was nearly completed; Captain Bross' company was almost ready; the Shields guards were ready—both companies A and B; the Sturges rifles, under Capt. James Steele, were complete; a fusileer company was nearly filled; a full company was raised April 25 at a public meeting at Canal and Mitchell streets—George W. Spofford presided at this meeting; Henry Deal was elected captain of the Seaman's brigade; at a war meeting held in Palatine April 24 and addressed by J. B. Bradwell, thirty men were recruited; the ladies here organized soldiers' sewing societies; boxes of delicacies and medicines were sent to the Cook county boys at Cairo; the gunsmiths of Chicago were overrun with work; all tailors were busy making uniforms and hatters making Zouave caps; one house had made

3,000 cartridge boxes; the stock of guns and pistols in the city had been exhausted before April 26. At this date exchange was at 10 per cent premium, and gold at 15 to 16 per cent premium selling. On April 27 the Sturges rifles were armed with Sharp's rifles, at the expense of Mr. Sturges. The two companies of Shields guards were commanded respectively by Capts. James Quirk and Daniel Quirk. They were ready April 27. Capt. M. C. J. Stolbrand commanded the Scandinavian company which was ready April 29. By May 1 the activity in military affairs at Chicago had apparently not abated in the least.

Senator Douglas upon his arrival here May 1, 1861, was given a great ovation by all Chicago, regardless of party. His emphatic and vigorous course in support of the war for the Union wiped out all bitterness here against him. He delivered another of his powerful speeches for the Union. The Tribune of May 2, 1861, said: "Three weeks ago there was not a full military company in the city, even for holiday purposes. Today Chicago has thirteen companies in actual service, with a reserve corps of twenty-five full companies ready to march at the tap of the drum—twenty-five exclusive of the Home guard and Van Arman's regiment, not yet complete. These companies will average, rank and file, ninety men each—a total of 3,420. If any large city has done better in proportion to population we would be glad to know its name."

A few of the old Chicago Zouaves joined Colonel Ellsworth's New York regiment. He left New York for the front April 29. The thirteen companies in actual service were as follows:

Chicago Light Artillery.....	Captain Smith
Chicago Dragoons	Captain Barker
Chicago Light Infantry.....	Captain Harding
Rumsey Guards.....	Captain Kellogg
Union Cadets (German).....	Captain Kowald
Lincoln Rifles (Hungarian).....	Captain Michalozy
Washington Light Cavalry (German).....	Captain Tobowhertz
Highland Guards.....	Captain Raffin
Zouave Company A.....	Captain Hayden
Zouave Company B.....	Captain Clybourn
Zouave Company C.....	Captain Conner
Zouave Company H.....	Captain Inness
Union Rifles	Captain Cooper

The above companies averaged fully ninety men each. Early in May, 1861, a large war meeting was held in the Presbyterian church at Dunton, on which occasion there was present a full company under Captain Heeler, recruited in Palatine, Dunton and Barrington. William H. Dunton was chairman and Ira Clark secretary. William Bross, from Chicago, addressed the assemblage. Gen. James H. Lane of Kansas delivered a strong Union speech in National hall (the Wigwam) on May 5. There was complaint from Chicago at this time that the companies of Captains Smith, Michalozy and Kowald had been assigned to detached duty and had not been placed in one of the early Illinois regiments. By May 5 many of the companies that had been formed were disbanded, because it was reported that they would not be needed. By May 6 the Irish brigade numbered 864 men; they voted not to disband. In May Solomon Sturges offered the Government six steam tugs, one of which, the "McQueen," was the best on the lakes. The Sturges rifles were accepted directly from Washington by Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, and went into camp at Cottage Grove, on the spot which soon afterward became Camp Douglas. The German Jaeger regiment had four companies ready by May 10. Edward Hamilton of Chicago invented a breech-loading rifle cannon which was tested on the lake shore in May. The first death of a Chicago volunteer was that of George Matthie, who died at Camp Yates, Springfield, about May 11. Many of the Illinois volunteers at Springfield, finding they could not be accepted for the Illinois regiments, entered the Union army in Missouri. Six companies of the German Jaeger regiment were complete by May 14; Col. Frederick Hecker was its commander. Its captains thus far were Van Horn, Lange, Knobelsdorf, Becker, Marschner and Endres. At this date, also, the Yates Phalanx regiment had 900 men ready under Col. W. S. Peaslee. The captains of its nine complete companies were Cooper, Ranstead, Vaughan, Light, Dudley, Slaughter, Snyder, Lambert and Barry. Norman B. Judd left for Berlin May 14. Col. J. A. Mulligan, who had gone to Washington in the interest of the Irish brigade, wired to Chicago May 17 that the brigade had been accepted by the President. Great was the rejoicing. Capt. J. M. Loomis was recruiting a company at this time. Capt. H. D. Booth was raising another. There still was much complaint at the alleged discrimination against Cook county troops. The Tribune said: "The citizens of Chicago would like to know why the discrimination against their volunteers has assumed the character of a relentless persecution. They would like to know whether this fault lies principally at the door of the Governor or the adjutant general. They would like to know how it happens that with all the expenditure of money and all the enlistment of men in this city, barely three Chicago companies have wormed their way into the service of the United States through the avenue of the executive chamber of Illinois. They would like to know why the first companies on the ground at Cairo (Captain Michalozy's and Captain Kowald's), after being mustered into the service of the United States by Captain Pope, have been excluded from any place either in the first or second levy of six regiments. They would like to know some reason for the jealousy that exists at Cairo against Captain Smith's artillery and Captain Barker's dragoons. No less than 4,700 men have been raised in this city, drilled and tendered to the Government. Of this number 252 have run the gauntlet at Springfield so as to get into the service of the United States in regimental order."

Late in May, 1861, the Irish brigade went into barracks in the old Kane brick brewery building on West Polk street. Early in June the board of Supervisors of Cook county appropriated $30,000 for the equipment and sustenance of the Irish brigade and Hecker's Jaeger regiment. The Tribune of June 12 said: "Our city is all astir with military preparations. We have now far more troops in the city than at any time since the war began. In addition to our from twenty to thirty home companies the home guard, and other volunteer corps, who will await the future exigencies of the war, we have here, formed and forming, three fine regiments, all of whom have been accepted by the Government and are pushing forward their preparations with all celerity."

One of the regiments here referred to was encamped on Cottage Grove avenue near the Sturges rifles. Near them, at what was temporarily called Camp Hecker, was Hecker's Jaeger regiment. About this time a new regiment called Douglas brigade was commenced. Companies were leaving for camp almost every day. The appointment of George B. McClellan to the Western Department and his rapid rise in military affairs gave much satisfaction here where he was well known. On June 16, he visited Chicago and inspected the military camps. There had been some contention as to who should be colonel of the Irish Brigade; James A. Mulligan was finally elected to that position on June 15. The first regiment of ten full companies to leave Chicago was Hecker's on June 18. They marched from Cottage Grove to Union Station on the West Side and filled twenty cars. A beautiful flag was presented to them upon their departure. They went first to Alton. About this time the Sturges rifles left for Marietta, Ohio, ordered there by General McClellan. The Zouave regiment under Col. J. M. Loomis was well advanced by this time.

Late in May and during the month of June many here, including the Tribune, joined in Horace Greeley's cry of "On to Richmond." They had become impatient at the long delay and wanted action. It was assumed that it would be no great military undertaking to march down from Washington some fine morning before breakfast and take possession of the rebel capital. They learned a little later that Bull Run was one of the obstacles in the way of that maneuver.

About July 3, 1861, the Irish brigade was transferred to Camp Fremont at Cottage Grove. That locality was known as several camps before it was formally named Camp Douglas. The Zouave regiment under Col. John B. Turchin left for the seat of war in Missouri on July 12; the captains of its ten companies were Hayden, Stewart, Guthrie, Colby, Raffin, Allard, Williams, Garriott, Howard and Clybourn. As they marched through the streets sharp eyes detected a girl dressed as a man among them; she was taken from the ranks against her protest; her name was Olson. There was great joy here in July, 1861, over McClellan's success in Virginia. The Chicago Dragoons under Captain Barker, the Sturges Rifles under Captain Steele and the Hoffman Dragoons under Captain Shambeck were with McClellan in Virginia. Many troops passed through Chicago, going East or West, during the summer and fall of 1861. On July 15, the Irish brigade left for Missouri; the captains of its ten companies were as follows: McDermott, Gleeson, McMurray, Simonds, Hurlburt, Moriarty, Phillips, Coffey, Fitzgerald and Quirk. They were given a brilliant sendoff. A few days later Hecker's regiment left Alton for the war in Missouri. About the middle of July, 1861, the three months' men returned from the field; the most of them soon reenlisted. The Audubon Rifles under Captain Litchfield were ready July 17.

The news of the disaster at Bull Run was received here July 22, 1861, and caused the utmost consternation. The Tribune of July 24 said: "The thronged streets, the eager crowds watching till far past midnight for further tidings from the field of flight and retreat, the anxiety of friends and relatives in behalf of their own brothers and friends engaged in the fearful scenes at Manassas, all constituted Monday and Monday night memorable and marked above all others in the annals of the war thus far."

The Yates Phalanx was ready late in July, 1861. Its colonel was Austin Light and its ten captains were Ranstead, Light, Clark, Pugh, Clark, Mann, Slaughter, Vaughan, Munn and Knapp. It was noted that the favorite song of the volunteers at the camps in and around Chicago was "John Brown." The death of General Lyon in Missouri caused much grief here, and the bulletins were scanned by immense crowds. As early as May a Soldiers' Sewing Circle had been organized here by the ladies. By August 12, they had made 449 flannel shirts; 100 pairs of trimmed pants; 188 hickory shirts; 120 camp blankets; 60 rubber blankets; 1523 havelocks; 106 pillows; 453 pillow slips; 177 hospital shirts; 156 sheets. The Union Defence committee in August, 1861, consisted of the following persons: John M. Wilson, Grant Goodrich, Van H. Higgins, E. W. Willard, J. M. Douglas, Thomas Hoyne, Thomas B. Bryan, A. H. Burley, E. C. Larned, J. H. Bowen, J. C. Dore, Thomas Drummond, George Manierre, H. D. Colvin, John Van Arman, George Schneider, Eliphalet Wood, R. M. Hough, P. L. Yoe, C. G. Wicker and J. H. Tucker.

In April or May, 1861, a lodge of the Knights of the Golden Circle was instituted here, and from this event forward a spirit of resistance to the war continued to flame and expand. At the head of this opposition to the war was the Chicago Times edited by Wilbur F. Storey. The Tribune of August 28 said, "There are more Secessionists in Chicago than people generally suspect. It is well ascertained that a lodge of the Knights of the Golden Circle was formed in this city last spring and still exists, holding stated secret meetings." Early in the war Mayor Rumsey recommended the passage of a resolution by the City Council, requiring all persons who were unwilling to take the oath of allegiance to the United States, to leave the city, and empowering the Citizens' Defense committee to investigate all suspected cases and report names for publication. This recommendation stirred up a storm of protest from all the Southern sympathizers. The cry of the opposition almost from the start was, "Peace! peace!"

Colonel Turchin's regiment became the Nineteenth Illinois; and Colonel Hecker's, the Twenty-fourth. The Northwestern Rifle regiment was being formed here in August, 1861. Wilson's Dragoons under Captain Thielman left for Alton on August 21. The Fremont Rifles under Col. Julius White numbered 850 men by August 31. Their camp was in Wright's Grove at the northern limits of the city. Later this rendezvous was called Camp Fry. Capt. J. W. Wilson recruited a corps of fusileers here in August and September. A Georgia regimental flag captured in Virginia was exhibited here in September, 1861. Miss Dix, head of the female nurses of the army, was in Chicago September 8, the guest of E. W. Blatchford.

Under the resolution of the board of supervisors of January 8, 1861, Superintendent Burley of the Committee appointed for the purpose reported that Hecker's Jaeger regiment had been provided with the following equipment: Uniform jackets, 830; brogans, pairs, 672; woolen socks, pairs, 1,200; uniform trousers, 830; knapsacks, 830; the whole costing $9,416.72; also camp utensils, tools, lumber for barracks, provisions, etc., amounting to $1,379.80. Total, $10,796.52. Also that the Irish Brigade had been supplied as follows: Uniform jackets, 1,000; uniform trousers, 1,000; knapsacks, 1,000; brogans, 950 pairs; caps, 950; woolen socks, 1,900; the whole costing $11,265.75. Other expenses $1,131.59. Total $12,497.34. The war fund orders issued amounted to $25,-901.94. Correspondence from Washington indicated that this expense would in the end be borne by the Government.

The Northwestern rifle regiment left for St. Louis September 14. They had rendezvoused at Cottage Grove, were 1,000 strong, and were commanded by Colonel Knobelsdorf. They departed amid much ceremony of speech making and flag presentations. This regiment was among the first to be wholly equipped by the Union Defence committee. Colonel Bracket's cavalry regiment occupied the ground at Cottage Grove just vacated by the Northwestern regiment. The camp at Wright's Grove was early called Camp Webb. Upon the departure of the Fremont rifle regiment September 19, 1861, its colonel, Julius White, was presented with a beautiful black charger. The regimental flag had Fremont's portrait on one side. On the other were scenes from Fremont's exploits painted by D. P. A. Healy, the artist. Isaac N. Arnold was present at Bull Run as a volunteer aid of General Hunter.

In September, 1861, the county board of supervisors passed a resolution that a committee be appointed to disburse the fund raised by tax for war purposes; that the unappropriated portion of such tax and what might be refunded by the Government be used for the care and relief of soldiers' families. It was decided at first to pay to soldiers' families each week $2 for each adult and 25 cents for each child.

Two regiments called the Douglas brigade were completed here in August and September, 1861. By September 18, the first under Colonel Webb left Cottage Grove for St. Louis; these men were equipped by the War committee. The other regiment of this brigade was half filled at this time. S. F. Wilson, accused of being a Secessionist, took the oath of allegiance and was exonerated by a majority of the county board committee. The Chicago legion which became the Fifty-first Illinois regiment was organized here in September. Its colonel was G. W. Cumming, and its captains were Westcott, McWilliams, Heffernon, Rose, White, Brown, Hale, Wentz, Gardner and Roland. The fight of Mulligan's brigade at Lexington, Mo., in September, 1861, stirred and fired Chicago as scarcely anything had done up to that date. Though captured and paroled, he had fought gallantly, and the news inflamed the people, and the whole county rang with his praise. The formation of a regiment was begun here in August by Col. S. B. Baldwin. Turner & Sidway, 208 Randolph street, were making and shipping over one hundred cavalry equipments daily. Nearly all military supplies were manufactured here in immense quantities. Thousands of horses were bought here monthly for the army.

On September 29, 1861, Northeastern Illinois was constituted a separate military district. The camp for this district was located at Chicago and was named "Camp Douglas." Col. Joseph H. Tucker was appointed its first commandant. Previous to this date the camps had been in existence in different parts of the city, though the leading localities were on the spot where Camp Douglas was established and at Wright's Grove on the northern boundary. They were called Camps Long, Mulligan, Fremont, Ellsworth, Mather, Webb, etc. The various commands were soon consolidated at Camp Douglas. The Yates Phalanx, Douglas brigade, Mechanic Fusileers and Col. Bracket's regiment were removed to this new camp if they were not there already. The Chicago legion numbering about 400 under Colonel Cumming was also ordered there. Several of the previous commands had occupied the Wigwam temporarily. Camp Douglas was built during October and November, 1861, mainly by the Mechanic Fusileers, all of whom were good mechanics. A cut of the camp as it was first built is contained herein. Strong efforts to secure the location here of the contemplated United States arsenal were made during the fall and winter of 1861.

On October 10, 1861, five companies of Mulligan's brigade returned to Chicago, having been paroled. The Tribune said, "An immense crowd of friends and curious spectators assembled about the depot and thronged the adjacent streets. As the train approached the depot a universal welcome burst forth from thousands of hearty throats for the gallant heroes of Lexington." They were entertained with a supper, and then ceremoniously at the Wigwam.

The Yates Phalanx left for Missouri on October 11. It had been more difficult than any other to recruit. Its uniforms were furnished by the Defence committee. They had their own band of eighteen pieces, besides fifteen drums and fifes. On October 11, 1861, Capt. J. C. Phillips of the Irish brigade assaulted J. W. Sheahan, editor of the Post, for having, as he claimed, published an unjust article concerning him. Early in October, 1861, a Mrs. Onderdonk was arrested here on the charge of being a rebel spy. She admitted being Secessionist, but denied being a spy. She had two sons in the rebel army. She was taken to Washington. In October, 1861, about 300 United States Regulars were in Camp Slemmer at Maine Station on the Northwestern Railway. The camp was on the Des Plaines river and was one of instruction. The several regiments of Douglas' brigade was ready November 1, under Col. David Stuart. The battle of Belmont, November 7, 1861, roused Chicago to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

Upon his arrival in Chicago November 8, 1861, Col. J. A. Mulligan was given a reception a king might envy. He was met at Joliet by a delegation from the Common Council, the Board of Trade, the city clergy, judges and many military men. The Tribune said concerning his arrival in Chicago, "The train arrived at Chicago about ten o'clock. Thousands of people had gathered in the depot grounds and swarmed in the adjacent streets for a distance of several blocks. As the train neared the depot a signal rocket flamed through the air, and upon that instant cannon boomed a noisy welcome; the bands struck up patriotic airs; the immense procession waved their torches which turned night into day and set the sky aglow with the livid light; deafening cheers again and again repeated rent the air. The scene beggars description. Probably no man ever received such a spontaneous and triumphant welcome to the city or was ever greeted by such a vast assemblage." He was taken in a coach drawn by four white horses to the Tremont house amid an immense and shouting multitude. There he was tendered the hospitality of the city by B. F. Ayer on the famous balcony on behalf of the municipal authorities. He was invited to a public banquet on November 9, but declined. Soon after this he made an attempt to reorganize his old regiment.

At Camp Douglas, on November 15, 1861, were 4,222 men. They were Bracket's Ninth cavalry of 1,021 men; Cumming's Fifty-fifth regiment of 512 men; Baldwin's Fifty-third regiment of 202 men; Stuart's regiment of 974 men; Winslow's regiment of 432 men; Lynch's regiment of 184 men; Wilson's Mechanic Fusiliers of 653 men; Hartman's German Guides of 175 men; and Kurth's Lyon color guard of 69 men.

Colonel McArthur's Highland guard regiment became the Twelfth Illinois. Late in November, 1861, a delegation of citizens visited Paducah to present a stand of colors to the regiment and supply the "boys" with delicacies. Colonel Turchin's regiment became the Nineteenth Illinois. An immense meeting of Chicago ladies to devise means to assist the soldiers in the field was held on November 29, 1861; delegates were present from the three city divisions. Mulligan's brigade, as such, was officially dropped from the army rolls, as it was found that the men could not be exchanged by December, 1861. A. G. Throop, George Strong and A. H. Burley, committee of war fund of the county board, reported December 5 that they had issued orders to date to the amount of $28,598.66, of which $1,500 had been handed to the Union Defence committee to be used for soldiers' families. The latter reported that between 300 and 400 families, drawing from $700 to $800 per week, would have to be provided for during the winter. The county board finally appointed a new war fund committee of five—A. G. Throop, George Strong, H. Z. Culver, Aaron Haven and A. B. Johnson—and authorized them to work in conjunction with the Union Defence committee for the relief of soldiers' families. The Chicago branch of the United States Sanitary commission was in receipt of large contributions in money and supplies from all parts of the West. The second regiment of the Douglas brigade under Colonel Stuart left Camp Douglas for St. Louis about December 9, 1861. This branch was organized about the middle of October, 1861, and Judge Skinner was elected its president. Doctor Tiffany reported about the middle of December, that forty large boxes had been sent to St. Louis alone; they contained 10,234 shirts; 925 pairs of socks; 1,749 pillow cases; 169 dressing gowns; 441 comforters; 127 blankets; 125 handkerchiefs. Twenty boxes containing similar articles had been sent to Cairo.

The news of the capture of Fort Henry early in February, 1862, caused great rejoicing here. Colonel Baldwin's Fifty-eighth regiment left Camp Douglas for Cairo about February 8, 1862. Colonel Cummings' Fifty-first Illinois regiment left Camp Douglas for Cairo February 14, 1862. Colonel Bracket's regiment was also ordered to take the field. It was reported here February 13, 1862, that Camp Douglas would be fitted up for the detention of 5,000 rebel prisoners. Captain Waterhouse's battery left for Cairo February 14; they had six superior James' rifled cannon. Colonel Bracket had succeeded Colonel Tucker in command of Camp Douglas, but about February 14, Col. J. W. Bell succeeded Colonel Bracket.

The news of the storming and capture of Fort Donelson about the middle of February, following as it did closely upon the heels of the capture of Fort Henry, caused intense excitement and great rejoicing here. The Tribune in its delirium of joy said, "The storming of Fort Donelson is the turning point of the war. The back of the secession serpent was broken by the blow that captured the rebel fortress. It was the center of their western lines of defense—the key of their position which in our hands opens wide the door that leads into the heart of Rebeldom. The Kingdom of Davis will now quickly tumble about his ears like a cob house. It is beyond the strength and resources of the rebels to make a successful stand at any point. . . . The disgrace of Bull Run was wiped out at Donelson by the Western boys. The stigma no longer stains our national escutcheon. The Bull Run debt is liquidated in full."

"Yesterday was a day that will be long remembered in Chicago. The breathless anxiety of the public throughout Saturday night and Sunday found full vent at an early hour on Monday. At nine o'clock this dispatch was received: "Fort Donelson is ours.' The dispatch was read to the crowd on the street. It was followed by a pause whose hushed stillness might be felt, and then broke out such a cheer as men do not often hear in a lifetime. The scene that followed beggars description. Men went crazy with delight. We have in our eye the spectacle of strong men weeping amid the shouts they gave. One elderly and sedate judge threw himself bodily upon a stout member of the bar and the two embraced like urchins just blessed with a holiday. We do not forget the loved ones who were in the fight; but grief however is lightened of half its load by this victory, and while sympathy will drop a tear for the bereaved, humanity will bless God for a great work accomplished in Liberty avenged and triumphant, while Treason totters to its crumbling base. . . . There were thirty Illinois regiments engaged in the contest. Here in Chicago the feeling of suspense is painful in the extreme, as some thousand of our boys were in the fight. . . . Chicago was on the rampage yesterday; was crazy with delight and insane with jubilation upon receipt of the glorious news from Fort Donelson. In fact Chicago didn't care an expletive whether the school house was kept open or not. The people heard nothing, saw nothing, knew nothing, except that our boys had taken Fort Donelson. The revulsion of feeling and the sudden and magical change from Sunday was most noticeable. . . . Like lightning the glorious intelligence sped from lip to lip and men wrung each others' hands; embraced each other; rushed hither and thither shouting the glad news, all the more gladly that the thirty regiments of Illinois troops had so nobly vindicated the old flag and added new incentives for State pride and shed new glory upon State arms. Hour by hour the dispatches came, each received with wild shouts of ecstasy until men fairly grew crazy. The excitement culminated in the intelligence that the renegade Buckner was captured. Shout after shout rent the air. Men sang and danced and indulged in all sorts of patriotic gymnastics. Flags were flung out from every window and roof-tree and across every street. Everywhere the air was resonant with thrilling strains of music pealing out national anthems. The bells rang with a wild jubilatory tintinnabulation. The windows of the hotels swarmed with the ladies who answered the shout below with the waving of handkerchiefs. At no time in our remembrance has Chicago so suddenly, so spontaneously, so thoroughly burst into a wild delirium of joy and rejoicing as yesterday. . . . Judge Manierre's court room was in a whirl of excitement and the officers attempted to check the uproar. The Court arose, and letting legal dignity, law books, and law cases slide, fairly carried away with the fire and enthusiasm of the moment, proposed three cheers for the victory. Three rousing cheers were given and the Court adjourned for the day. In the United States Court, Superior Court, and Recorder's Court, the same scenes took place."

The whole city was on the streets. Camp Douglas was furnished the news by fast messengers. In a few minutes the entire camp was ablaze with lights and bonfires and ringing with the cheers of the volunteers. At night the theaters appropriately recognized the victory. Miss Anderson of the Rob Roy company grouped her players as the American flag and then sang the "Star Spangled Banner." The bright men of the board of trade went wilder than they ever had in any wheat panic; they adopted appropriate resolutions. Half a dozen impromptu meetings assembled. H. G. Miller presided over one in the courthouse. Immediate steps were taken to care for the wounded. A large sum of money was subscribed, but the following committee of ten was appointed to collect more; N. P. Fairbanks, C. G. Wicker, Doctor McVickar, A. D. Titsworth, William Bross, Walter B. Scates, Grant Goodrich, S. G. Catlin, George Manierre, and A. E. Kent. Among the speakers at this meeting were C. G. Wicker, Mark Skinner, Mayor Rumsey, Dr. J. V. Z. Blaney, and Charles Walker. A total of $2,783.80 was subscribed the first evening. Nurses were sent to Cairo to meet and care for the wounded. A disbursing committee of fifteen was also sent to that city. The Tribune said, "If the day was exciting the night was Bedlamite." A humorous proclamation issued in the forenoon that "any person found sober after nine o'clock in the evening would be arrested," was taken literally and apparently accomplished its object. The city was illuminated with rockets, lights and bonfires. The rebel General Floyd was hung in effigy by the North Market boys and then burned.

Every battery at Camp Douglas was now called to take the field. Now it became certain that rebel prisoners would soon be at Camp

Douglas. On February 19 it was announced that 7,000 would arrive the following Saturday; this news caused a great sensation. The newspapers noted that during the big war meetings held at this time, disloyal women objected to the wearing of red, white and blue as "it was distasteful to them." The Sanitary Commission had for some time been sending out from twelve to fifteen boxes daily. Twenty car loads of Fort Donelson prisoners arrived here February 21 over the Illinois Central railway. At this time Col. Arno Voss was commandant at Camp Douglas; he ordered that no person be permitted to see the prisoners without a pass. The prisoners were from Tennessee, Texas, Mississippi and Alabama.

Scarcely had they been established in their quarters than the leading Secessionists here inaugurated the plan of lionizing them and supplying them with food, clothing, delicacies and comfort. This course caused much indignation, and the Board of Trade passed resolutions condemning the act. The first lot of prisoners numbered about 3,200. About 1,500 more arrived on February 23. Colonel Tucker again took command of the camp February 23. There was a great rush of visitors to see the prisoners. One-half of the Chicago Relief committee of fifteen sent to Cairo continued on to Fort Donelson. On February 28 there were 4,459 prisoners at the camp. They were in such bad condition upon their arrival that they began to die rapidly; soon 200 to 300 were in the hospital, but all were given reasonable care and attention, and all had the same food that was furnished the Union soldiers. On March 4 about 325 were in the Camp hospital. The dead were buried in the city cemetery. The County War Fund committee reported about March 1, 1862, that they had supplied money to 441 families and paid out $10,236.63. Colonel Mulligan was commandant at the camp in March, 1862. The Camp Douglas Hospital association of ladies were doing excellent work. The fight between the Merrimac and Monitor roused everybody early in March. Rebel sympathizers held regular consultations with the rebel prisoners. At first the prisoners were submissive, but under such influence soon became outspoken and violent. About March 8 visitors were forbidden at Camp Douglas.

The special message of President Lincoln in March, 1862, recommending gradual and compensated emancipation, was well received here. The Tribune favored freeing the slaves at once and arming them. When President Lincoln modified General Fremont's proclamation concerning the slaves in 1861, the Tribune opposed the President.

The Democratic Invincible Club, a partisan organization, had been established here many years before March, 1862. They held meetings every Tuesday night, and were outspoken against the war. Often the orators spoke entirely from the Southern standpoint. Rev. Wm. G. Brownlow ("Parson") was publicly received here April 9 and delivered one of his characteristic addresses in which he paid special attention to the Times. On April 14 there arrived here about 1,500 rebel prisoners from Island No. 10. Chicago men killed at Shiloh were to be brought here, so it was decided, and buried in a lot at Graceland donated by Thomas B. Bryan. The deaths of rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas prior to April 18 were 219. Henry C. Work's famous song "Kingdom Coming" was very popular at this time. Colonel Mulligan raised a battery here early in 1862 and received his guns—four 6-pounders on April 18. At this time the Scotch regiment under Col. D. Cameron was at Camp Douglas.

News of the battle of Shiloh was slow in reaching Chicago, but when it came the anxiety and suspense were intense. The Tribune of April 10 said, "Our brave Western troops have achieved another glorious victory in Tennessee. The whole country from Maine to California is in a blaze of excitement. The valor of our men, the sacredness of our cause and the imperishable glory of the result—all conspire to make this a most memorable day." The Board of Trade promptly donated $5,000 and raised $975.50 additional to care for the wounded. Nineteen physicians and over forty volunteer nurses (men) left for Cairo at five o'clock p. m., April 9, taking with them 104 boxes of hospital supplies. They chartered a special train and on the way down thoroughly organized themselves for work. At Cairo the hospital boat "Louisiana" was placed at their command and on April 11 at 4 o'clock p. m., they reached Pittsburg Landing and immediately went to work. They distributed apples, butter, dessiccated vegetables, tapioca, brandy, bandages, tea, tin cups, oranges, lemons, eggs, brooms, bed ticks, pillows, socks, drawers, plasters, chambers, urinals, etc. The commission, upon their return, said: "We busied ourselves till after midnight in waiting upon these sad objects brought from the tents on the bank through the rain, groaning with pain at the motion, with filthy clothing, and wounds that had not been dressed since the day of the battle, many with limbs needing amputation, or balls not yet extracted from their bodies. Oh, how gratefully they received the soft beds, the clean shirts and drawers and the refreshing water and lemonade."

It was found necessary to build a prison in Camp Douglas for the close confinement and punishment of offenders. It was built of heavy oak, and the first story had no windows and was the dark room into which malefactors were placed when severe punishment was meted. This jail was called "White Oak" and in the end was something of a terror. Squads of rebel prisoners continued to arrive weekly or oftener and escapes were frequent. At this time there were about twenty-five rebel surgeons confined in Camp Douglas. They were permitted on daily paroles to visit the city for supplies, etc. News of the capture of New Orleans was received with joy. Members of the Chicago artillery, killed at Shiloh, were brought here and with much ceremony buried at Rose Hill. Before this there was organized here the Chicago Female Nurse's association. Rev. Dwight L. Moody, who had spent three weeks on the Shiloh battlefield described his experiences at Bryan hall in May. General Sigel visited Chicago in May, 1862, and was serenaded at the Tremont house; he spoke from the balcony.

There were hurried calls from the front for troops in May, 1862. The Ellsworth Zouaves, Light Guard and Home Militia were left alone to guard Camp Douglas. Soon they were joined by the Anderson Rifles under Captain Cole. The confiscation bill gave satisfaction here to all who favored the war. In May Cook county learned that one or two regiments for the three months' service would have to be raised. Promptly a big war meeting was called in Metropolitan hall on May 24. Mayor Sherman presided. Adjutant-General Fuller, from Springfield, explained the call. Washington, the capital, was in danger. All organized bodies must be sent forward, and short time men must be raised to take their places. Within a few days a dozen recruiting offices were opened in the county. By May 30 Captain Bond had 35 enrolled; Captain Van Buren, 35; Captain Hall, 34; Captain Manchester, 60; Captain Caldwell, 34; the Signal Guards, 40; Captain Hallagren, 35; Captain Heilig, 40; Captain Freund, 12; Captain Turner, 40; Captain Dudley, 60, and others smaller numbers. Other war meetings were held. Order No. 3 of General Halleck forbidding fugitive slaves to enter his lines, was severely denounced by the Tribune and others. About 1,000 rebel prisoners were sent to Camp Douglas from Madison, Wis., so that the Nineteenth Wisconsin regiment could take the field.

Mulligan's battery was ready for the field June 2, 1862. By this date 496 rebel prisoners had died at Camp Douglas. Cook county was now being recompensed by the Government for the money spent in equipping the earliest companies sent to the field. A total of 310 families of soldiers were receiving assistance in June, 1862, from the County War Fund committee. The report showed that they had been paid regularly on borrowed money. Captain Round's Emmet Guards were ready June 7, 1862. The War committee of the Young Men's Christian association held regular meetings while the war continued and sent large quantities of papers, magazines and books to the various hospitals.

In June, 1862, Camp Douglas, which had been enlarged, embraced 114 acres, but had at first only 87 acres. On June 8, 1862, there were 8,962 rebel prisoners confined there. About 2,000 more could be accommodated. Their rations consisted of potatoes, pork, beef, flour, beans, rice, coffee, sugar, molasses, vinegar, soap, candles—in all respects just the same as the Union soldiers there. They were required to exercise regularly and were permitted to play ball, pitch quoits, etc. Of the prisoners 5,717 had come from Fort Donelson; 736 from Shiloh; 1,809 from Island No. 10, and 700 from other places. The Scotch regiment and the Irish brigade left for the East early in June, 1862.

The Tribune of June 10, 1862, said, "A Day of Rejoicing.—Yesterday was a day of general rejoicing and jubilation over the glorious news from Memphis. Everybody was happy and overflowed with joy at the downfall of that prison hole of secession in the Southwest. The rejoicing was doubly significant from the fact that probably not less than five hundred of our citizens were expelled from Memphis by the Regulators. A still greater number had property and business interests there confiscated by the rebels. Many of our citizens were not only driven out, but were beggared by the sweeping confiscation. Hence their great joy at the overthrow of this nest of secession."

The Sixty-seventh regiment of three months' men under Col. R. M. Hough was placed on guard at Camp Douglas about June 10. The splendid letter of Governor Yates to President Lincoln in July, 1862, advocating a still more vigorous prosecution of the war, struck a responsive chord in many loyal hearts here. Greenbacks began to make their appearance. When they first arrived the Democratic county treasurer refused to receive them in payment of taxes. The Tribune of July 16, 1862, said, "One of 'Em.—The man in the city of Chicago who is most blatant and abusive in his talk of Republicans, designating them as "nigger worshipers," promoters of "nigger equality," etc., is, we are told by good authority, the father of at least five children by a negro woman—not a yellow woman, but a regular African with all the peculiarities of her race. And it is hinted by our informant that of these children four were sold into slavery by their father though the mother was free. Of such are the Secession Democracy." The Tribune of July 19, said, "Chicago is full of Secessionists—a startling but true assertion. There are Secessionists in our schools, in our churches, in almost every civic organization in Chicago. There is scarcely a hotel in the city that does not contain them. You will find them in every saloon, and in some of these holes it is fairly unsafe to proclaim yourself an unconditional Union man. You can find them on the street corners. It was not an insignificant boast nor an infrequent one, made yesterday at the corner of Clark and Randolph streets, that, 'By God, Jeff Davis will be up here pretty soon and then we will fix things all right.' It is not unknown to everybody that a law office in this city is in the confidence of the Confederate Government and that it received funds to pay out to the Confederate surgeons at Camp Douglas. It may be a matter of news to some, but not to all, that regular meetings of Secessionists are held in this city, at which most treasonable sentiments are uttered, and at these festive orgies, healths to Jeff Davis and his crew are drunk, sometime with as much enthusiasm as to be audible to parties in the street."

The Union Defence committee called a mass meeting at Bryan hall on July 19, 1862, for the purpose of devising measures to meet the last call for volunteers. They asked the Board of Trade, the Mercantile association, Young Men's association, Young Men's Christian association and the Common Council for assistance. An extra session of the County Board was also called. The meeting assembled and Thomas B. Bryan presided. He delivered the opening speech, and was followed by Doctor Tiffany, H. G. Miller, Robert S. Wilson, J. Y. Scammon, George Steele, E. C. Larned, J. C. Van Arman, Rev. W. W. Patten, and others. Mr. Scammon said he had already given $50,000 and his only son for the war, but would give $50,000 more. George C. Cook offered $200 bounty for the first two volunteers. Eliphalet Wood and J. H. McVicker made similar offers. George Manierre, chairman of the committee on resolutions, introduced them with a strong speech and they were unanimously adopted. The speech by E. C. Larned was especially eloquent and loyal. At its conclusion J. G. Lumbard sang "Three Hundred Thousand More," with thrilling effect. One verse was as follows:

"If you look upon our valleys where the growing harvests shine,
You may see our sturdy farmer boys fast forming into line;
And children from their mothers' knees are pulling at the weeds,
And learning how to reap and sow to meet their country's needs;
And a farewell group stands weeping at every cottage door;
We are coming, Father Abraham—three hundred thousand more."

The resolutions adopted recommended a county tax to be used as a bounty to raise volunteers—$200,000 asked for, $100 to each volunteer. T. J. Sloan of Sloan's Commercial college announced that he and others had just raised two full companies for the war. J. H. Read & Co., druggists, subscribed $500; J. L. Hancock, $500; A. C. Hesing said he was willing to take the field at the head of a company or a regiment of colored troops. The same evening a big meeting in the courthouse square was addressed by George C. Bates, Robert S. Blackwell, William C. Goudy, Robert Collyer, U. F. Linder, E. G. Asay and Gilbert C. Walker. Still another meeting at Metropolitan hall was addressed by John Knox, U. F. Linder, and William K. McAllister. The war people were terribly in earnest, but the volunteers were slow in coming forward, because definite bounty was not yet offered.

In this emergency the Board of Trade came bravely to the rescue. Previous to July 19, 1862, they had given about $10,000 to the war. Now they resolved to raise a battery and appropriated $10,000 with which to raise the volunteers. They subscribed $5,121 in a few minutes the first evening—July 21. By July 23, the subscriptions amounted to $17,000 and 172 volunteers were enrolled—more than enough for the battery. This was accomplished so quickly, that the Board resolved to raise a whole regiment and immediately began work. A dozen or more fragmental companies were promptly turned over to the Board of Trade regiment. Captains Williams and Robinson furnished nearly two companies. The Young Men's Christian association, upon certain conditions and through the influence of J. V. Farwell and J. C. Wright, tendered five companies for the regiment. All this gave assurance of the speedy completion of a full regiment in addition to the battery. The County Board passed the asked-for $200,000 ordinance and ordered the levy of a five mill tax for war purposes. By July 25 the Board of Trade fund amounted to $29,000. Other immense war meetings were held July 26. The speakers were O. H. Tiffany, I. N. Arnold, Colonel Farnsworth, Joseph Knox, Colonel Eastman, Rev. W. H. Ryder, Daniel McLlroy, Michael McAuley, S. B. Perry, Grant Goodrich, E. C. Larned, R. S. Blackwell, William Bross, Henry Greenebaum, W. S. Cameron, J. S. Wilson, George C. Bates, Elliott Anthony, U. F. Linder, Daniel Brainard, Lambert Tree, J. C. Van Arman, E. G. Asay, W. Campbell, Dr. Davis and Judge Gookins. Mr. Sloan agreed to furnish six full companies if the Mercantile association would furnish the other four. So easily was the first Board of Trade regiment raised, that the Board determined to raise a second one. About July 23, 1862, a band of rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, assisted by Secessionist friends here, broke out and escaped, but nearly all were finally recaptured. The Tribune of July 25 said:

"There is a fact vividly brought up by the affair at Camp Douglas. It points most clearly to an active rebel element in this city. The whistles and signals heard in the vicinity of the camp throughout the night, the attempted assault upon a Federal officer just below the camp early in the evening, are to be added to the other facts. If there is evidence implicating the citizens of Chicago in acts tending to incite and aid outbreaks at Camp Douglas let us have the needed light on the subject. It is not enough for Col. J. H. Tucker to point to a pile of letters in his possession, seized and intercepted by his officers and men and avow that 'in those letters exists damning evidence against many of our first citizens,' and that at such exposure of the writers and actors 'the city would stand appalled' and the development 'fall like a thunderbolt'—we want to have that appallment take place. It is precisely that thunderbolt we would call down. He is recreant to his trust and false to the country whose commission he bears, if he withhold the evidence against these home traitors at this juncture. Let it be sent to the Secretary of War at once. What have they been doing—these Chicago men and women sympathizers with treason? Go to the Provost Marshal's office at Camp Douglas and see a wagon load of arms and ammunition smuggled in by their agency to the rebels.

It is time that this should cease. We would invoke no frenzied mob to drag sleek lawyers and smug bankers and simpering dilet-tanti to their doom at the lamp posts; least of all would we make tender women, however venturous their treason, the victims of popular fury; but we ask that all the evidence against them be brought to light and men and women, rich and poor, high and low, punished as traitors unsparingly."

Of the county tax of $200,000 it was proposed to pay $60 to each recruit, which, with the $40 of Government bounty, would give each volunteer $100. On July 21 there was deposited here $2,500,000, brought from Cincinnati to escape possible capture by the rebel army which threatened that city. In July, 1862, a draft was threatened. Late in July the Common Council ordered, at a cost not to exceed $30,000, about 1,000 stand of arms and a battery of artillery for home defense. In July the recruiting was lively in the extreme. Nearly fifty would-be captains applied to the adjutant general for authority to raise companies. The express companies here offered half pay to those of their employes who would enlist. Authority to enlist men was given to nearly all applicants, but they were informed that unless they could fill their companies within ten days the men would be merged with other squads. Among the men recruiting at this time were John A. Bross, W. P. Knight, John Reid, A. S. Chadbourne, E. L. Brainard, D. Whittle, Stockton and Chester, Underwood and Sexton, Holbrook and Mowry, J. E. Burk, Joseph Scates, Jr., G. W. Smith, J. R. Morgan, M. R. Hawley, Evarts Van Buren, O. H. Miller, Jesse Ball, H. W. Handy, Sylvester Titsworth and N. W. Wright. By the last of July the Board of Trade had raised its battery and its first regiment and was well advanced in its second regiment. Governor Yates was received here July 30 with a salute of fifty guns. He was serenaded and delivered a strong speech. Hon. John Sherman of Ohio, who happened to be in the city, was present and was called out. In his speech he used these words: "I regard the present chief magistrate (Lincoln) of the nation as a pure, patriotic and honest man; but he is unfortunate in some degree as to his surroundings; he has not yet caught the spirit which should animate him in the prosecution of this gigantic war. We have used honeyed words and conciliatory terms heretofore, but now this must be ended. Now we must use more potent instruments—every means which God has put into our hands—bond and free, white and black." Time showed that he was wrong and Lincoln was right. Had not the latter used just the policy he did, he would not have received the support of war Democrats, without whose help the rebellion would not have been crushed nor the Union saved. Governor Kirkwood of Iowa also made a speech on this occasion. Owen Lovejoy delivered a speech of rare power. War meetings were held in all parts of the county—Palatine, Evanston, Blue Island and Thornton leading. A Union Typographical battalion was started. Intense effort was made, and the cry at every war meeting was, "Arm the slaves! Fight, confiscate and emancipate!"

A resolution of the Board of Trade on August 3, 1862, caused an inquiry as to the presence of traitors in Chicago. A committee appointed to investigate reported that Colonel Tucker claimed not to be in possession of sufficient evidence to warrant action against suspects. Early in August, when the call for 600,000 more men was announced, the Tribune said: "The country will hail with joy this new call. It means that the work of every citizen from this time until the end of the war is to save the Republic. The whole trade of the country is to be war until the last rebel succumbs. There is to be no shrinking now. Six hundred thousand men! What joy it will carry throughout the lines of our army to know that in ten days time their shattered regiments are to be filled up, that our fighting force is to be more than one million strong with another million ready to follow if need be. The war has begun in earnest, and henceforth the enemies of the country will not be spared nor sheltered."

The draft was threatened early in August and dozens of cowards and disloyalists began to leave for Canada. Disloyalty was rampant here in August. On August 3 a Secessionist tore down a Union flag at 557 Wabash avenue. In all parts of the city disloyalty was openly and often furiously manifested. Numerous personal encounters occurred. Exempt citizens began to form a company of home guards. The Tribune of August 6, 8 and 10 said: "The cowards' hegira for Canada still continues, and people are leaving daily for that region, which is soon likely to be populated with sneaks. Why cannot martial law be proclaimed here at once until after the draft and stop the cowards? . . . "The Cowards.—Two hundred and fifty cowards left by the Central line and lake for the Canadas on Monday, we understand to avoid the draft. A woman ought to be stationed at every landing place in Canada to horsewhip them back. Shame on the sneaks!" . . . "Sneaks.—Seven hundred cowards left on the evening train of the Michigan Central Wednesday night for Canada. At Ainsworth station (South Chicago) four wagon loads of sneaks, leaving the city to avoid the draft, took passage for Her Majesty's dominions." . . . "Chicago is at last under martial law and the exodus of cowards and sneaks is henceforth to be stopped. Every man hereafter must stand by his post will he nill he. For nearly a week our city has presented the disgraceful spectacle of full-grown, able-bodied men slinking off to Canada like whipped curs, by rail and lake, with no apparent method of stopping them. The prompt and stern action of the War Department, however, has put a period to this hegira."

In August, 1862, Dr. Levi D. Boone, ex-mayor of Chicago, was arrested for furnishing money to rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas contrary to orders, and was confined at the camp, but later managed to explain what he had done, to the partial satisfaction of the authorities, and was released. In August the enrollment of all persons liable to do military duty was carried into effect. The draft was fixed to begin August 15 unless the quota was full by that date. Many persons bound for Canada were arrested—nineteen were taken August 8 at Hyde Park, where they had gone to board the train. Men going East were required to have passes.

There was much indignation expressed here in August, 1862, over the court-martial of Col. John B. Turchin. He was called a martyr and was tendered an immense and enthusiastic reception upon his arrival here August 19. Colonel Turchin in the end was made a brigadier general and the court-martial was set aside. The charge against him was disobedience of orders for failing to protect the property of rebels in his district in Alabama.

By August 7, 1862, the following recruits had recently been raised here: By Chandler, 140 men; Holbrook, 116; Williams, eighty-two; Cooley, 101; James, Jr., fifty-six; Bruning, twenty-five; Murphy, twenty-one; Kelly, twenty-nine; Weihe, twelve; Greenhut, forty-five; Breman, thirty-three; Whittle, sixty-two; Brainard, sixty; Bross, eighty; Underwood, eighty; Casey, forty; Horton, about 100; Smith, twenty-five; Morgan, fifty-three; G. S. Hubbard, about 400; Swarthout, fifty; Hughes, eighty; Prior, seventy-two; Hall, forty-two; Spaulding, about a dozen; Chester, eighty; Board of Trade battery, 160 strong—in all about 1,878 men. Previous to 4 o'clock p. m., August 8, 1862, the War Fund committee of the County Board had paid $60 to each of 700 volunteers—total, $42,000. It was found necessary, owing to the occupation of Camp Douglas by the rebel prisoners, to form other camps for the Union recruits. Camp Hancock was located a few hundred yards south of Camp Douglas. A big camp was at Wright's Grove on the North Side. Capt. C. P. Bradley was acting provost marshal. The exempt battalion of home guards numbered 412 by August 9. By August 11 Board of Trade subscriptions amounted to $48,779. The Tribune of August 16 said: "Sheriff Hesing yesterday mustered in 101 volunteers in the little towns of Palatine and Barrington in this county. They are all farmer boys. Palatine and Barrington will have hardly enough men left to take care of the women and children."

A big war meeting in the interest of the Irish legion was held at Bryan hall, the leaders being Father Dunne and Thomas J. Kinsella. In August the Jews of Chicago subscribed $6,000 and pledged $4,000 more for a Jew company to be organized. The new Gatling gun, invented by Dr. R. J. Gatling of Indianapolis, was exhibited here August 13. The captains of the First Board of Trade regiment were Stockton, James, Sexton, Holbrook, Curtiss, Prior, French, Williams, Haynie and Reid. By August 15, when the draft was to begin, there had been recruited here under the last call about 3,700 men, of whom probably two-thirds were from Cook county. The Second Board of Trade regiment was about ready and the Third was commenced. So great was the demand for bread in August from the large numbers of rebel prisoners and Union recruits in this vicinity that the bakers ran short and continued to be so for several days. The Palatine company under Captin Sutherland was named Bradwell guards to signalize the fact that J. B. Bradwell had done much to raise it. The Railroad regiment, composed largely of railway employes, was started here in July, 1862. By August 19 the first two Board of Trade regiments were ready for the field and the third has seven companies recruited. By August 19 the $200,000 county war bonds had been sold to C. C. Parks & Co. of Chicago, bankers, and G. S. Robbin & Sons of New York, at a little above par. Col. F. A. Starring became commander of the First Board of Trade regiment. In August the soldiers here were paid in greenbacks. The First Board of Trade regiment became the Seventy-second Illinois. Capt. W. B. Holbrook's men received the stand of colors offered by Gilbert Hubbard & Co. and the $100 offered by C. H. Walker, by becoming the first company organized for the First Board of Trade regiment. This command left Camp Hancock, near Camp Douglas, on August 23 for the South and were given a beautiful and ceremonious send-off. The Second Board of Trade regiment became the Eighty-eighth Illinois, the Railroad regiment became the Eighty-ninth Illinois, and the Irish regiment became the Ninetieth. Dr. Stanley was arrested on the North Side in August on account of his expressed Secessionist sentiments. The secrets and purposes of the Knights of the Golden Circle were published here in August. James H. Stokes became captain of the Board of Trade battery, and C. G. Cooley of the Mercantile battery. Recruits were being sent to all the old regiments in the field.

John Ross, chief of the Cherokees in Indian Territory, a thorough Union man, and his party of fifty persons passed through Chicago late in August, 1862, on their way to Washington; they stopped at the Adams house. Frank T. Sherman, son of Mayor Sherman, became colonel of the Second Board of Trade regiment. Governor Campbell of Tennessee was here August 29 and secured the release of 387 rebel prisoners who took the oath of allegiance. Sloan's Commercial regiment rendezvoused at Springfield. The Railroad regiment rendezvoused at Cottage Grove near Camp Douglas. The Second Board of Trade regiment and the Railroad regiment were ordered to the front early in September, 1862. All of the rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, having been exchanged, started South in squads early in September. The Christian community of Chicago generally addressed a memorial to President Lincoln in September praying for an "emancipation decree." The big meeting held to prepare this memorial was presided over by Judge Otis, and addressed by Owen Lovejoy, Grant Goodrich, J. W. Wilson, Dr. O. H. Tiffany, Rev. T. M. Eddy, Nathan Culver, H. L. Hammond, J. E. Ray, Mark Skinner, Revs. Evarts and Patton, and others. The ladies here organized a new War Relief committee in September, 1862, to assist the Board of Trade regiments; it consisted of Mesdames H. Reynolds, Van Higgins, O. E. Hosmer, Smith Tinkham, J. C. Haines, C. N. Holden, H. M. Simmonds, W. V. Coe, J. G. Hamilton, G. M. Gray, M. T. Dewey and E. Peck.

The Railroad regiment was commanded by Col. John Christopher. At a big war meeting held September 6, 1862, on the courthouse square, the speakers were Gen. S. R. Curtis of Iowa and Gen. John A. McClernand. At the evening meeting in Bryan hall the speeches were made by Lyman Trumbull, ex-Governor Randall of Wisconsin, Gen. H. Walbridge of New York, and General McClernand. Powerful resolutions were adopted; one recommended the organization of all the militia of the state by Governor Yates. Another war meeting was held at Bryan hall September 7. The County War Fund committee reported September 12 that $199,260 bounty had been paid to 2,321 volunteers. Gen. John Pope, fresh from the Army of the Potomac, was here September 12; he was entertained at the Fremont house. Governor Yates appointed John C. Haines draft commissioner for Cook county. The Third Board of Trade regiment was completed about the middle of September and became the One Hundred and Thirteenth Illinois. By September 21 there were no rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas except those in the hospital; the barracks were thoroughly renovated after their departure. Soon all the Union squads were collected there and numbered about 3,500, consisting of six regiments and three batteries in process of formation. Col. John Van Arman's One Hundred and Twenty-seventh regiment was nearly ready. The Ninety-third regiment, from other counties, was there. The Third Board of Trade regiment under Colonel Barry was about complete.

President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, issued in September, 1862, to take effect January 1, 1863, was heralded here with delight by the Union element and received with contempt by the Secessionists or Copperheads. The Abolitionists particularly and the Tribune were almost hysterical with joy. The Tribune of September 3 said: "President Lincoln has set his hand and affixed the great seal of the nation to the grandest proclamation ever issued by man. . . . So splendid a vision has hardly shone upon the world since the day of the Messiah. From the date of this proclamation begins the history of our Republic as our fathers designed to have it—the home of freedom, the asylum of the oppressed, the seat of justice, the land of equal rights under the law, where each man, however humble, shall be entitled to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Let no one think to stay the glorious reformation. Every day's events are hastening its triumph, and whosoever shall place himself in its way, it will grind him to powder."

Five regiments and three batteries at Camp Douglas—in all nearly 5,000 troops—were nearly ready by September 23. They had come from all parts of Northern Illinois. The batteries were Miller's Elgin and the Mercantile of Chicago. Late in September, 1862, General Tuttle, then at Cairo, telegraphed to Mayor Sherman, asking permission to send to Chicago a number of negroes and requesting him to appoint a committee to find work for them, but was answered in the negative by the mayor, and the Common Council approved his course by a vote of eleven to six. The Times and the Secessionists here generally bitterly and fiercely assailed President Lincoln for the Emancipation Proclamation.

Late in September there arrived here about 8,000 Union soldiers who had been captured at Harper's Ferry and paroled. They were given quarters at Camp Douglas. At this time there were at Camp Douglas about 13,000 Union troops and a few hundred rebels. The old Kingsbury block in Chicago had been owned by Major Kingsbury of the United States army, whose son, Colonel Kingsbury, a graduate of West Point, was killed at Antietam, aged 25 years, commanding the Eleventh Connecticut regiment. Colonel Kingsbury had married a niece of President Taylor. His sister was the wife of the rebel General Buckner, who was captured by General Grant at Fort Donelson. General Buckner had had an interest in the Kingsbury block in Chicago, but, fearing confiscation, sold out when the war commenced and went South. Two carloads of negroes arrived here October 6, and many found work on the adjacent farms. The battles of Iuka, Corinth and Perryville roused the citizens in October. By October 10 there had arrived here thus far in 1862 about 136,000 bales of cotton on their way East; they were immensely valuable. By October 6 there were at Camp Douglas and vicinity about 9,000 paroled Union troops from Harper's Ferry and about 7,000 new recruits. The fair grounds adjacent were occupied by part of them. Immediately after the Emancipation Proclamation, the cry of the Times was the "Africanization of Illinois." War meetings were held throughout the county in October, 1862—Worth, Thornton, Northfield, East Wheeling, Evanston, Blue Island, Palatine, etc. These meetings were addressed by I. N. Arnold, Grant Goodrich, E. C. Larned, A. C. Hesing, L. Brentano, J. L. King, J. B. Bradwell and other good speakers from Chicago. In October, on three or four different occasions, fire destroyed the old barracks at Camp Douglas. The Tribune of October 18 said: "The rapidity with which these fires occur precludes entirely the theory of accident and points directly to camp incendiaries who are taking this method to abate nuisances of which there has been much complaint." Gen. Ben Prentiss, of Shiloh fame, arrived here October, 1862, and was given a formal reception. Parson Brownlow delivered one of his unique and epigrammatic addresses here October 25. The Knights of the Golden Circle held regular meetings here during 1862. The following recruits were at Camp Douglas October 31, 1862: Ninetieth regiment, Colonel O'Mara, 781 men; Ninety-third regiment, Colonel Putman, 956 men; One Hundred and Thirteenth regiment (Third Board of Trade), Colonel Hoge, 883 men; One Hundred and Twenty-seventh, Colonel Van Arman, 156 men; Elgin battery, Captain Rennick, 117 men; total, 3,797 men. The Tribune of November 3 said: "It is reported that 1,600 persons who have been in the habit of voting at every election in this city have taken out British protection papers to prevent from being drafted."

The Third Board of Trade regiment (One Hundred and Thirteenth), under Colonel Hoge, left for Kentucky on November 6; only four of its companies were from Cook county. The Ninety-third, Colonel Putman, left for the same field November 9. The Mercantile battery and the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh left November 8 and 9. The enrollment of September, 1862, showed in the county 29,293 liable to draft, and that 3,839 had enlisted under the recent call. The War Fund committee of the County Board reported about December 1, 1862, that they had paid $60 bounty to each of 3,633 men, and had borrowed $20,000 from the banks to be used to assist soldiers' families. The bounty received by the soldiers was in many cases placed with the War Fund committee to be by them disbursed to the families; and as the soldiers received their pay in the field much of it was sent to the committee to be likewise disbursed. In December two men named Johnson and Sheehan, who had been arrested for treason, confined in Fort Lafayette and released, tried to deliver treasonable speeches from the balcony of the Sherman house, but were hissed and hooted down by the people. They were permitted to say what they desired before the Invincible club, a Democratic political organization.

About December 31, 1862, the Board of Trade passed the following resolution: "Resolved, By this Board of Trade, while disclaiming all partisan feeling and being actuated by no other motive than the public welfare and the fair fame of our city, that the Chicago Times is unworthy of countenance or support and that the directors are hereby requested to exclude it from the reading rooms of this Board."

Early in January, 1863, the Chicago branch of the Sanitary Commission sent by special messenger thirty-three large boxes of hospital stores, clothing, etc., to the wounded soldiers of the battle of Murfreesboro. The Board of Trade War committee promptly dispatched agents and nurses to care for the sick and wounded at Murfreesboro, Vicksburg and Memphis. The Second Board of Trade regiment, Colonel Turchin's regiment (the Nineteenth), and the Board of Trade battery participated at Murfreesboro, while the Third Board of Trade regiment and the Mercantile battery had been fighting near Vicksburg. On January 6, 1863, 150 ladies were at work in the committee rooms, State and Randolph, preparing bandages and other hospital supplies. On January 8 the Young Men's association passed the following resolutions: "Resolved, That the Chicago Times be excluded from the reading room. Resolved, That the files of the Chicago Times for the past year be publicly burned next Monday evening on Clark street opposite Bryan hall."

In one week 176 boxes of hospital supplies were sent to Murfreesboro and 301 boxes to Vicksburg. Also $3,000 in cash had been raised and spent for tea, tobacco, arrowroot, barley, farina, butter, eggs, whisky, etc., all of which was promptly forwarded. On January 27 about 1,500 rebel prisoners from Murfreesboro arrived at Camp Douglas. It cost $7,652 to replace the barracks burned by the paroled Union soldiers at that camp.

Immense meetings to indorse the Emancipation Proclamation and commemorate its going into effect were held here January 12, 1863. All of the best Union men of the city, Republicans and Democrats, were present at the meetings held in Bryan and Metropolitan halls, the First Baptist church and elsewhere. At Bryan hall the speakers were G. C. Bates, E. H. Bracket, Dr. Daniel Brainard, S. A. Goodwin, Emory A. Storrs, Prof. M. C. Butler of Lake Forest, Rev. F. W. Fisk, Rev. Robert Colyer and John Wentworth. At the Baptist church the speakers were Rev. W. W. Evarts, Elliott Anthony, G. C. Bates, Prof. Haven and John Wentworth. At Metropolitan hall were Casper Butz, William Rapp, Caroun Schmidt and others, this being an assemblage of Germans. In Lower Bryan hall the speakers were D. V. Bell, J. Y. Scammon, C. R. Jones, Paul Cornell and J. R. Druman. At all the meetings the Proclamation was warmly welcomed, Lincoln was glorified, and the vigorous prosecution of the war was advocated. Every meeting adopted strong resolutions. The Tribune of January 13 said: "The people of Chicago love liberty. Never in the history of the city was this truth made more manifest than by the monster meetings of last night to endorse the President's edict of freedom. By it they believe the rebellion is hit a death blow and hence they rejoice. By it Abraham Lincoln has placed his name beside that of Washington and all the noblest benefactors of the race."

By February, 1863, the Chicago Times had suffered the following repulses without having its secession utterances checked in the least: Three of its editors had been imprisoned; it had been expelled from the Board of Trade and Young Men's association reading rooms; many news dealers had refused it; General Sullivan had banished it from his lines; the same of General Hurlbut at Memphis; General Curtis had sanctioned its banishment from his army in Missouri;

special dispatches had been denied it by the military telegraph. An attempt was made early in 1863 by the Times and its warmest supporters to establish here a chamber of commerce. This was in retaliation for having been expelled from the Board of Trade reading room. They managed to put through the disloyal Legislature a bill incorporating such an institution. The Conscription bill passed Congress late in February, 1863. The Union League lodges were springing up over all the North to offset the Sons of Liberty. By March, 1863, the County War Fund committee had paid in bounties $217,989 and had spent much of its $41,786 of family relief fund. On March 6, 1863, Supervisor Rexforth of Worth offered the following preambles and resolution at a meeting of the County Board:

"WHEREAS, Our country is passing through a crisis such as she never experienced before; and WHEREAS, She demands to know her strength as nearly as may be; and WHEREAS, It is feared that we have those in the North who sympathize with the rebels in their wicked deeds; and WHEREAS, We wish to record our votes in some way that will unmistakably place us on the side of loyalty to our Government and that a record of the same be kept for future generations to look upon, therefore be it

"Resolved, That we will in every lawful and laudable way strengthen the arms of the President of the United States in his efforts to put down this rebellion; that we frown indignantly on any and every attempt to discourage or demoralize our army now in the field; and that the efforts of one portion of the Legislature, calculated in their very nature to give aid to the rebels and discourage and dishearten our brave army, meet with our deepest detestation and abhorrence; and we believe for such traitorous acts the civilized world in all coming time will assign them a place in public esteem to which the tories of the Revolution bear no comparison."

These preambles and resolutions were warmly opposed and defended and were finally voted on with the following result: Ayes—Allen, Alger, Baer, Brown, Cornell, Culver, Dolton, Dunlap, Edbrook, Farwell, Gibbs, Gund, James, Johnson, Kott, Kingsley, Morgan, Pahlman, Pennoyer, Reed, Rees, Russell, Randall, Rexford, Strong, Shierding, Werner, Ward, Eli Whitney, S. S. Whitney and chairman. Nays—Gebel, Gormly, Hoffman, Kean, Murphy, Newhouse, Pendergast, Sheils, Taylor. Absent during the session, Cammack, Doty, Gallagher, Niles, Haskins.

The smallpox first made its appearance at Camp Douglas about November 10, 1862, and spread rapidly after the 3,800 rebel prisoners arrived in January, 1863. By March 11 there were 125 cases in the hospitals there, and about 700 had died of smallpox and other diseases. The Times charged neglect, but the Tribune of April 4 said: "The per cent of mortality is large, but no deaths have occurred from any neglect, want of care or proper medical attention. When they arrived fully one-third of them were only fit for the hospital. Especially was this the case with those from Arkansas Post. Those who have just gone have greatly improved in condition during their imprisonment here. They have been well fed, carefully treated by the surgeons, and most of them have new suits of clothing. They are all much better clad now than the soldiers in the rebel army."

Pursuant to act of the Legislature, the County Board in April ordered $100,000 worth of war bonds sold. In April, 1863, the War committee of the Board of Trade reported that they had collected $51,366 and had paid out $36,566, leaving on hand $14,799. Of the collections $30,000 had been invested in United States 7-30 bonds, which had been sold as money was needed. The War Fund committee of the County Board gave a big dinner party to soldiers' families in April. An immense Union meeting was held at Bryan hall April 9, Judge Thomas Drummond presiding; he delivered the first speech, and was followed by W. A. Howard, Senator Trumbull, John F. Farnsworth, John Wentworth and Mason Jones. Of this meeting the Tribune said: "Many great and successful meetings have been held in this city, but never was a meeting of any sort convened here that was greater, more successful or more gratifying to the promoters of it than the Union mass meeting held at Bryan hall last night. . . . But our home orators on this occasion—all strong and full of loyal zeal—must stand aside for once. The great speech of the evening was by Mason Jones, the Irish orator. We do not remember an address in this city by any distinguished orator or statesman on any occasion, that was more fraught with good sense and more replete with eloquence. It was as close and logical as Webster's and as burning as Clay's best off-hand speeches."

The Sixty-fifth regiment, which had been at Camp Douglas on parole from Harper's Ferry for about seven months, left about 780 strong for Kentucky on April 19. There was received here about May 1, 1863, for the families of soldiers in the Eighty-second and Eighty-eighth regiments, about $18,700. The following is an extract from the inaugural address of Mayor Sherman, May 4, 1863:

"This devotion to law as the only arbiter of public rights necessarily requires that the Democratic party should give their undivided support to the Government, no matter by whom administered, in every effort to maintain the Constitution. This rebellion is an effort to overturn the Constitution and destroy the Union; it must be put down, no matter at what cost of money or sacrifice of life; it is a struggle for national existence, in which the individuals must be prepared to sacrifice all that the nation may legally demand to preserve the national life. No Democrat can be true to his principles who does not render to his Government all the aid in whatever form it may be legally required to put down the rebellion. . . .

If there be men in this city who have any sympathy for the rebellion, who desire the recognition of the Southern Confederacy, who desire a withdrawal of our troops from the rebel states and coast, who desire a peace that will directly or indirectly impair the territorial or political integrity of the Union, such men are strangers to me personally and politically. I have no relations of any kind with them; I am not their friend nor are they my friends."

Early in May, 1863, William James, ex-coroner of Cook county, was appointed provost marshal. News of the bloody battle of Chancellorville moved Chicago profoundly. The Tribune of May 9 said: "All day Thursday the Copperheads came out of their holes and stood upon the street corners chuckling to themselves over the supposed defeat of Hooker. . . . Twelve hours passed by and the news changed. There might have been a disaster—not a defeat. There might have been a retrograde movement—but no dishonor. . . . The Copperheads were down in the mouth and hunted their holes. . . . Canard after canard was attempted by them on 'Change, but the loyal, staunch old board were not frightened; there was no panic on the market as the Secesh hoped." Cook county watched almost breathlessly General Grant's movements against Vicksburg. A sanitary gift concert in May netted $805 for the soldiers. On May 13 John L. Hancock was elected colonel of the regiment of Chicago City guards. The few hundred rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, except the sick, were sent East for exchange in May. Allotments for distribution to soldiers' families were received from all the Cook county troops in the field. General Grierson's raid through Mississippi was viewed with satisfaction here. Late in May Chicago became very much excited over General Grant's successes in Mississippi. The Tribune of May 26 said: "The news of the great successes of Grant's army has electrified the country. All loyal men, Democrats as well as Republicans, rejoice. But the Copperheads look glum. They deeply sympathize with their afflicted Southern brethren and, like Rachel mourning for her children, will not be comforted." During May the Sanitary Commission here forwarded 960 boxes of supplies to Grant's army, besides nearly $3,000 worth of beef, sugar, tea, condensed milk, candles, whisky, etc. The canal convention then in session here promptly subscribed $5,056 for the Sanitary Commission. Late in May enrollment under the Conscription act was begun. An enrolling officer for each town and two for each ward were appointed.

At 4 o'clock A. M. June 3, 1863, two companies of soldiers from Camp Douglas under Captain McDonald, pursuant to an order of General Burnside at Cincinnati, took possession of the Chicago Times office, destroyed a large number of papers just run off, and placed a guard over the establishment. This step was taken under an order to suppress disloyalty in this department. Mr. Storey and his friends, through hand-bills, called for a public meeting at 8 o'clock P. M., to be held on the street in front of the Times office. Of this meeting Judge Fuller was made chairman, and speeches were made by General Singleton of Quincy, M. M. Strong of Wisconsin, B. G. Caulfield, Wirt Dexter, M. F. Tuley, E. S. McComas and E. G. Asay. All pompously demanded the right of free speech and free press and denied that there was any necessity here for military rule to take precedence over civil law. The speakers were severe and disloyal, but all counseled moderation. At 12 o'clock M. on the 3rd a meeting of citizens was held in the Circuit court rooms and Mayor Sherman was chosen chairman. Conciliatory addresses were made by Van H. Higgins, Lyman Trumbull, Isaac N. Arnold, W. B. Ogden, S. S. Ayers, James F. Joy, A. W. Arrington, Samuel W. Fuller, Wirt Dexter and others. W. B. Ogden in the interest of local harmony presented the following preamble and resolution, which were adopted:

"WHEREAS, In the opinion of this meeting of citizens of all parties, the peace of this city and state, if not the general welfare of the country, is likely to be promoted by the suspension or rescinding of the recent order of General Burnside for the suppression of the Chicago Times; therefore,

"Resolved, That upon the ground of expediency alone such of our citizens as concur in this opinion, without regard to party, are hereby recommended to unite in a petition to the President, respectfully asking the suspension or rescinding of said order."

The proceedings of this meeting were telegraphed to President Lincoln, who immediately advised General Burnside to rescind his order, whereupon the following direction was issued by the latter: "By direction of the President of the United States, the order suppressing the circulation of the Times is hereby revoked. Take no further action in the matter." Thus the trouble ended as a matter of expediency only. A short time before this event the Times had said: "So long as the present political policies of the war are persisted in—so long as the war is continued as a war of a political party—every dollar expended in it is wasted and worse than wasted, and every life lost in it is an abominable sacrifice and a murder, indeed, by those upon whom the responsibility rests of the prevailing policies. The man who does not wash his hands of all participation in such a war shares the guilt of those by whom it is prosecuted. Support of this war and hostility to it show the dividing line between the friends and enemies of the Union. He who supports the war is against the Union, because the war is the most terrible engine for the destruction of the Union which Beelzebub himself could have invented. The professed Democrat, therefore, who has his senses about him and is deliberately for the war, is not a Democrat in fact, but an Abolitionist of the most radical, violent and destructive kind."

How extraordinary all that sounds now. What an astonishing difference of opinion concerning the war. It will not do to say that the editor of the Times did not speak his actual opinions, because many sensible and prominent men here held similar extraordinary views, took and read the Times with relish, and regarded Lincoln's administration with grief and indignation and as a great wrong. How different is the following from the Tribune of June 5, 1863: "It is here charged that the President and every man who supports the war is against the Union and is a murderer. No paper published in the seceded states has ever uttered more false, disloyal or atrocious sentiments. General Burnside directs that no more such infernal issues should circulate in his department. But the Government, at the instance of a few frightened, weak-kneed Unionists and the bellowings of a drunken Copperhead mob, revoked the order and humiliated its supporters. Is that the way to cultivate a loyal sentiment and to deserve the support of true men? Is that the way to encourage the army and to put down the slaveholders' rebellion? Perhaps it is, but we don't see it."

All the facts taken together indicate that the Secession or Copperhead element here was so strong as to make it advisable to revoke the order of suppression. Had it not been done, there would no doubt have been a riot, and, what is worse, the alienation of many of the war Democrats would have resulted. So while the suppression order was just and deserved, its revocation was a matter of wisdom upon the ground of prudence and expediency—was really an act of sound diplomacy after the prompt execution of the suppression order had produced a salutary moral effect and had shown the Copperheads the claws and teeth of the Administration. In order to give additional momentum to the suppression order and to show more clearly to the people the fairness and moderation of the Administration, a large public meeting was held in the Courthouse square on the evening of May 4 by the advocates of the prevailing war policy. John L. Hancock presided and explained in a strong speech the necessity of the war to save the Union and the wisdom, as a war measure, of quelling treason or disloyalty at home. Speeches to the same effect were delivered by Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, and Col. Jemison, of Kansas. Resolutions favoring the arrest of persons and the suppression of newspapers guilty of violating any law were passed. Many of the best Union men, rather than incur the ill-will of the Copperhead element, refrained from attending this meeting. The large number of Copperheads here rendered this course one of sound wisdom.

During June, 1863, many wounded soldiers from Grant's army arrived here almost daily. The first meeting to establish a temporary soldiers' home was held at the Scotch Presbyterian church (Dr. Robert Patterson) early in June, 1863, and was presided over by Thomas B. Bryan. Many ladies were present and interested. An adjournment was taken to Bryan hall, and there a committee was appointed to commence operations and report at a subsequent date. The Home was duly established. The prorogation of the Copperhead Legislature by Governor Yates on June 10, 1863, was hailed with delight by the Union men here. A big meeting held the next day indorsed his act. The speakers were Mark Skinner, Senator Mack, Adj. Gen. Fuller and F. A. Eastman. During June many arrests of persons charged with resisting or beating the enrolling officers were made. There was much excitement here in July, 1863, upon receipt of the news that General Lee had started to invade Maryland and Pennsylvania. Late in June the Tribune said, "The Crisis of the War.—We can hardly resist the conclusion that the next two weeks will prove the most thrillingly eventful of the whole war and go far toward furnishing the solution of the strife the most gigantic that ever shook the world." On July 2 the Tribune said, "Probably never in the history of human warfare was any present laden with a heavier burden than that on which our immediate future now waits. The entire armies of the Union and of the Rebellion are opposed to each other at five several points of contact—Port Hudson, Vicksburg, Rosecrans' new field, Pennsylvania, Richmond. If Port Hudson falls and Vicksburg becomes ours and Rosecrans finishes the lesson of Stone River and Meade defeats Lee and Dix marches into Richmond, it will only be answering what loyal men are hoping and praying in each case." Scarcely had these lines been published than the answer came.

"It never rains but it pours" was the thought here when all the victories became known early in July, 1863. First came the news of Gettysburg, and while not decisive was inspiring; this was on the morning of the 7th. Soon after came the news that Prentiss had taken Helena from Price. At eleven o'clock A. M. came the news of the capture of Vicksburg. Such news had come before and all more or less distrusted the report, but soon came official confirmation and then everybody gave themselves up to the free enjoyment of the glorious news. In the evening the bells rang merrily, cannon pealed and general jubilation and rejoicing pervaded the entire city. In the streets huge bonfires were built, and from the tops of several buildings splendid fireworks were exhibited.

All business was suspended. The board of trade adjourned at noon amid enthusiastic cheers. The courthouse bell rang out its joyful chimes. Flags appeared as if by magic everywhere. Everybody came down town and the streets were densely packed with the happy and shouting populace. The celebration continued far into the night. The Tribune was so delirious that it placed a light at every pane of glass, literally covered its building with banners, and from the roof let off a splendid lot of fire works. The clerks brilliantly illuminated the Postoffice building—had over six hundred tapers. The Staats Zeitung made a beautiful display. The Jour- nal was brilliantly decorated. Warner hall, occupied by the Union League, and Michigan terrace were covered with flags and decorations. Fireworks were set off from the Tremont, Sherman and other hotels and from scores of private dwellings. The Tribune of July 8 said, "The Times alone amid all this widespread and general rejoicing was silent. Not a shout, not a cheer, not a bonfire, not even the expenditure of a tallow candle, at the Copperhead concern on Randolph street, to testify their joy at the downfall of the stronghold of the rebellion in the Southwest. So far as actions are indicative of opinions we might be led to think that they regretted the glorious achievement. It is a noticeable fact in the history of this day's rejoicing that the great majority of our citizens, even those who profess to follow the teachings of the treasonable Times, were sincerely gratified at the glorious news. It speaks volumes for the loyalty of the mass of the Democratic party as compared with that of their leaders."

On the night of July 8 Governor Yates was serenaded at the Tremont house. He appeared on the famous balcony and delivered an eloquent speech that was received with vociferous cheers. In July the draft riots in New York caused Chicago to think of what might happen here. The enrollment of June, 1863, showed in the city 27,756 men liable to military duty, of whom 18,986 were first class or single men between the ages of twenty and forty-five and married men between the ages of twenty and thirty-five years. In the whole county including the city were 33,477 men liable, with 22,541 of the first class as above. Many sick and wounded soldiers were here in July, 1863—over 300 at a time. The capture of Port Hudson July 15 was hailed with joy. In July Alderman Comisky introduced an ordinance in the Council making provision for raising $120,000 "to be paid as bounties to members of the volunteer companies organized to take the places of men who should be drafted as conscripts." There was much opposition to the draft, but the Germans generally favored the step. In July great preparations began all over the county to enlist men to avoid the draft. The Germans were particularly active and loyal. By the last of July they had five or six companies about complete.

Late in July, 1863, the ladies of Chicago projected the first great Fair for the benefit of the soldiers. The first meeting was held in Bryan hall, and at a subsequent meeting the following officers were chosen: Mrs. Hoge, president; Mrs. Tinkham, secretary; executive committee: Mesdames Robinson, Hosmer, Medill, Ambrose Foster, Charles Follansbee, James Bowen, I. N. Arnold, N. Luddington, E. Higgins, Franklin, J. C. Harris, Colonel Foster, Allen, Hoge, Livermore and E. A. Haddock. It was resolved to hold the Fair at Bryan hall in October and November, 1863. During June a total of 2,937 packages were shipped to the front and the hospitals by the Chicago Sanitary Commission. The Comisky ordinance above mentioned was amended so as "to appropriate $120,000 in bounties to married men who may be conscripted in case they serve, or to substitutes that may take their places in the army."

The Knights of the Golden Circle, or as they were called at a later date Sons of Liberty, were the extreme peace branch of the Democracy. In June, 1863, at a secret state meeting in Springfield they concluded to oppose the war, resist conscription, make peace with the South and acknowledge the Confederacy. At this meeting lodges in all parts of the State were represented. The Chicago lodge was in touch and harmony with the other lodges and with the objects of the order. But the Union victories in the field in June and July completely disconcerted their designs. Had the rebels won in Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, Helena, etc., the order would have come out publicly with all their power for peace along the above lines. The certainty that the North was the stronger and would triumph in the end checked the order and in the end terminated its career.

On August 10, 1863, John A. Logan delivered here a powerful speech—so good that it was printed in pamphlet form and sent all over the State and the Union. The Tribune of August 14, 1863, said, "Deserters.—Within the last sixty days the commandant at Camp Douglas has returned to their regiments over four hundred deserters. Every night just before dark a squad of soldiers can be seen escorting these gentry to the depot whence they take passage for Cincinnati. On Wednesday night nineteen were so shipped, and yesterday another batch. These men were arrested by the Provost Marshal of this district and his deputies." The following articles were sent to Vicksburg the week ending August 15, 1863, by the Chicago Sanitary Commission, all valued at about $9,000: 200 tons of ice; 1,000 bottles of lemon syrup; 200 barrels of soda crackers; 20 barrels of dry peaches; 20 barrels of dry apples; 5,000 codfish; 50 caddies of green tea; 50 H. F. barrels crushed sugar; 50 ounces quinine; 50 barrels stock ale; 100 quarter barrels stock ale; 50 H. F. barrels of stock ale; 500 mosquito bars, 10½ barrels of pickled cabbage; 225 palm leaf fans; and 2,000 bottles of concentrated milk. This is a sample of the splendid work done by the Commission at all the emergency calls of the war.

The medical purveyor of the Army stationed here sent to the fields and hospitals immense quantities of drugs. About August 18 from 6,000 to 8,000 rebel prisoners arrived here for Camp Douglas; they were guarded by the First Michigan sharpshooters ordered here for that purpose; among the latter was a company of Indians. The Copperhead branch of the Common Council passed a resolution requesting the enrolling officers to submit to them copies of the rolls, but were refused. Many of the rebel prisoners here late in August were Morgan's guerrillas. A considerable subscription for the sufferers of Lawrence, Kansas, was raised here. The Soldiers'

Home, for the week ending August 29, furnished to soldiers 1,134 meals and 351 lodgings; there were 544 arrivals and 513 departures. The Home was located at 45 Randolph street.

Delegates to the Convention of ladies called to arrange the Great Northwest Fair, assembled in Bryan hall September 2, 1863. It was the largest assemblage of ladies ever convened in the Northwest up to that time, and was magnificent in its personnel and appearance. Complete preliminary arrangements for the Great Fair were made. By September 10 the Lawrence relief fund amounted to $2,169. In September there was organized a Freedman's Aid committee. The soldiers allotment receipts for several months in 1863 amounted to $49,263; of this sum $48,269 had been paid to soldiers' families. In September news of the battle of Chickamauga again roused the county to a fighting pitch. At this time residents of Chicago who wished to see their rebel friends in Camp Douglas were permitted to do so upon taking the oath of allegiance. On September 10, 1863, the Common Council appropriated $120,000 "to be expended in procuring volunteers to take the place of poor men of families who might be drafted from Chicago." The people of Chicago thought the enrollment of 28,000 men for this city was too large, when the highest vote ever polled was only about 23,000. Permission to examine the rolls was asked of President Lincoln, but he referred the inquirers to Governor Yates, who in turn referred them to Adjt.-Gen. A. C. Fuller. The latter instructed Col. James Oakes, provost marshal, to afford the inquirers every facility consistent with the public service to discover errors in the rolls. The rolls were placed before the inquirers, but did not satisfy them and more correspondence was had with President Lincoln. Mayor Sherman and Comptroller Hayes led the inquiry. During the month of September, 1863, the Soldiers' Home furnished 4,805 meals and 1,412 lodgings. There were 965 arrivals and 952 departures. Rebel prisoners from Cumberland Gap and Chattanooga arrived here in September. By October 4 there were 5,780 of them at Camp Douglas. On October 5 twenty colored recruits left to join the Rhode Island Black brigade. About this time Governor Yates authorized the formation of a colored regiment in Illinois. The Germans in two months from August 15 to October 15 raised six and a half companies for a regiment under Colonel Knobelsdorf. The people of Jefferson met October 14 at the town house and organized a Soldiers' Aid society. Mrs. William P. Gray was elected president; Mrs. William Dymond and Mrs. Augustus Boyington, vice presidents; Miss Almira Simons, secretary; and Mrs. John Gray, treasurer.

There were in Camp Douglas on October 18, 6,075 rebel prisoners, nearly half of whom had belonged to the Guerrilla Morgan's command. At this time there were many Southerners here, endeavoring by all sorts of schemes to liberate their friends or relatives from the Camp. About this time twenty-five of them escaped. The call for 300,000 more men in October spurred the county to redoubled action.

Early in October the ladies met and fully prepared for the Great Northwestern Fair. It was decided to open October 27 and continue to November 7. Mayor Sherman declared the opening day a holiday. A regular program was fixed for each day. The opening was celebrated with a grand parade three miles in length. The opening address was made by Thomas B. Bryan. The Fair was unique and in every way successful. The total receipts at the end of the last day amounted to $51,850.01. The largest receipts were $6,786.18 on November 5, and the lowest $3,005.47 on the opening day. The dining room receipts amounted to $6,074.27. The average daily attendance was 5,090. Miss Anna Dickinson was paid $600 for two lectures which netted the Fair $1,100. When every thing had been sold the Fair netted over $78,000. The Tribune of November 7 said, "No other Fair held for benevolent purposes has ever yielded similar results. It has been an enterprise that has doubly blessed and honored its originators, managers, and the people upon whose unflinching loyalty all its profuse drafts were honored. It is quite time to give credit due for such a result. And first, it is not to be arrogated as a Chicago institution. We may well feel a pride for the way in which our city has cradled and fostered the scheme. We cannot forget that on its altar were laid contributions attesting the kindred sympathy of all our Northern States. With this splendid result the whole people are to be credited and their great offering of sympathy and aid to the army and the Union and to Freedom will shine long after the turf has smoothed our scarred battle-fields and peace has turned our cannon foundries to the uses of her mechanic's art. Chicago is honored, in that it has thus been made temporarily a focus of loyalty."

A big fire at Camp Douglas on November 11 destroyed six thousand feet of barracks valued at $3,500. About this time the board of trade took steps to erect in Rosehill cemetery a monument to Union soldiers. Late in November came the welcome news of the battles of Lookout Mountain and Mission Ridge. Steps to build a permanent Soldiers' Home were taken November 30 by the ladies, at the head of whom were Mesdames Hoge, Hosmer, Sherman, Wadsworth, Lang, Bird and Fuller. There was much apathy shown here in November and December, 1863, concerning the enlistment of volunteers. Great efforts to secure the release of the rebel prisoners in Camp Douglas were made at this time. Mr. Bushnell alone had $36,000 belonging to them. For $1,200 a guard was bribed to permit a squad of about a dozen to escape. On December 2 seventy-eight of them escaped through a tunnel. The most were recaptured—many of them in the down-town hotels. Thomas B. Bryan was elected president of the Permanent Soldiers' Home association. From August, 1863, to December, 1863, Colonel DeLand, commandant at Camp Douglas, arrested and returned about six hundred stragglers and deserters. The enrollment lists of each ward were posted up therein for inspection in December, 1863. The Common Council appropriated on behalf of the city a bounty of $75 for each volunteer, and the County Board appropriated 25 bounty for each volunteer in the city and $100 for each outside of the city. The Ladies' Relief society for soldiers' families was organized December 13. Mrs. A. H. Hoge was elected president; Mrs. E. I. Tinkham, vice president; Mrs. C. A. Lamb, secretary; Mrs. H. D. Smith, treasurer; executive committee, Mesdames A. H. Hoge, R. I. Tinkham, C. A. Lamb, H. D. Smith, Eben Higgins, D. P. Livermore and Goodrich.

It was seen about the middle of December that much greater efforts would have to be made to evade the draft. Accordingly the County Board passed resolutions calling for war meetings in all parts of the county and city, and recommended systematic and vigorous work. This course met the approval of all Unionists and soon in all directions stirring war meetings were held and recruits secured. The County Board ordered a three mill tax to raise the "Cook County Bounty Fund." On December 11 a bounty of $112 for every volunteer outside of Chicago, and $28 for every one within the city limits, was paid by the county. Late in December the County Board passed resolutions asking the State authorities to permit Cook county soldiers in the field to vote at the Presidential election of 1864. Two Supervisors voted against this resolution. But the bounty offered by the city and county combined was not sufficient to cause rapid enlistments. Accordingly at a big meeting held December 16, of which Thomas B. Bryan was chairman and at which fiery and urgent speeches were delivered by Rev. O. H. Tiffany, E. Van Buren, Col. Hasbrouck Davis, George A. Meech, Edward Jussen, John Wentworth, Colonel Mann and others, a private subscription of $25,200, to be used as additional bounty, was raised in a few minutes. Ten men gave $1,000 each and twenty-two gave $500 each. After the meeting this subscription continued to grow. About 7,000 rebel prisoners were at Camp Douglas December 17. From about September 15 to December 15, over 10,500 horses were purchased here for the army. An average of $120 was paid for each horse. By December 21 about 700 volunteers had been secured under the last call. A new camp at Wright's Grove was named Camp Potter. Camp Fry was still there. Adj. Gen. Fuller in December officially stated that Cook county prior to October 1, 1863, had furnished 10,455 men for the war. This list did not include the three months' volunteers. On January 1, 1864, there were about 6,500 rebels in charge of about 1,800 Union soldiers. By January 4, 1864, there had been recruited here seventy-two colored volunteers for the Illinois colored regiment; they were organized into a company and were ready January 7. About 945 soldiers' families were on the relief rolls in January, of whom about 900 were paid weekly allowances. The effective fund for soldiers' families, etc., during 1861 and 1862 was $117,809.70, of which $5,722.63 went to the Sanitary Commission; $19,815.31 was spent for arms; $72,683.09 was paid to soldiers' families; leaving on hand $19,535.98.

The payment of bounty, which had been limited by the County Board to January 15, 1864, was by them extended to March 7. John H. Bross, of Chicago, became colonel of the Illinois colored regiment. The colored company eighty-eight strong left for Quincy January 10, and soon afterward thirty more joined them. As this company departed they sang "John Brown" as they marched through the streets. By January 11 bounties had been paid to 622 volunteers under the last call, though 912 had actually enlisted here and 250 more were at St. Charles; total, 1,162. During the severe cold weather early in January, 1864, there was much suffering among the soldiers at the camps. About 300 from Camp Fry were for a while quartered in Metropolitan hall. Fac-similes of the Emancipation Proclamation were sold for the benefit of the Soldiers' Home. Early in 1864 the three year regiments began to come home on "veteran furlough." By January 20, 1864, 1,062 volunteers had been paid bounties. Of the outside towns Jefferson was ahead with 15, Niles next with 12. About this time nearly all the big merchants here gave one day's profits of their stores to the relief fund. Many business establishments of Chicago secured contracts to furnish Government supplies—beef, bacon, mess-pork, hams, beans, rice, hard bread, corn meal, medicines, harness, etc.

On January 30, W. R. Messick was arrested, charged with being a rebel spy. Residents were implicated in his efforts to effect the escape of rebel prisoners. By February 1, 1864, 1,372 recruits under the last call had been paid bounties. The Cook county quota under the calls of 1861 was 4,036; under the calls of 1862 was 2,761, and under the calls of 1863 was 7,375, total 14,172. On October 1, 1863, the county was officially credited with having furnished 10,455, leaving a deficit of 3,717. To meet this deficit about 1,600 had been recruited by February 5, 1864. The call of February for 500,000 more men was hailed with joy by the Union men here, as it meant such an increase in the army as to crush the rebellion in a short time. Soldiers in considerable numbers passing through Chicago were compelled to scatter over the city in order to secure accommodations. To remedy this state of things the high-minded here in seven days' time erected between Randolph and Washington on the lake shore a building 50x200 feet and named it "Soldiers' Rest." Here thousands were provided at one time with a warm meal or meals and a place to sleep. As high as 3,000 men could be accommodated at once. It was a Godsend and should have been thought of before. The soldiers called it "Soldiers' Paradise." There was preaching there every Sunday. By February 9 bounties had been paid to 1,616 volunteers, and about 300 more were ready to receive bounties.

About the middle of February, 1864, the County Board ordered that veterans as well as new recruits should be paid the county bounty. An additional county war tax was levied. The quotas under the calls of 1861 and 1862 were assessed according to population, but the quotas of 1863 were made upon the basis of the first class enrollment—twenty to thirty-five years. Chicago was unfortunately situated. She had about 4,000 aliens who had voted here, but who became exempt when wanted for the army. They were unfairly counted when the Cook county quotas were fixed. By January 1, 1864, the Northwest Sanitary Commission had shipped to the soldiers a total of 28,618 boxes of supplies. County orders were at a discount in February, 1864, so that the Board was obliged to give an order for $112 for each $100 bounty paid. These orders were receivable for county taxes. By February 18, 1864, 1,930 recruits had been paid bounties. These recruits were assigned as follows: Chicago 1,749, Jefferson 31, Niles 12, Evanston 16, Elk Grove 8, Bremen 6, Wheeling 9, Lemont 6, Lyons 8, Bloom 14, Lake View 1, Calumet 4, Barrington 15, Thornton 2, Rich 2, Lake 3, New Trier 6, Leyden 7, Proviso 3, Cicero 5, Worth 7, Palatine 5, Palos 4, Northfield 4, Orland 2, Maine 1; total 1,930. The first enrollment gave 33,552 subject to draft in Cook county. Of these 2,996 were dropped from the rolls, but 4,883 had been added, making the number subject to draft in February, 1864, 35,439. It was a common occurrence for the new Soldiers' Rest to furnish meals to a whole regiment at one time. Previous to February, 1864, there were several hospitals scattered in Camp Douglas, but then all were concentrated in one two-storied building 116x160 feet, each story 13½ feet high. Camp Fry at Wright's Grove enclosed about ten acres. The Government corral was on the west side of State street between Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth streets. It covered twenty acres and accommodated 2,500 horses with stabling. About four hundred yards south of Camp Douglas and twenty yards apart were the Union and the rebel pest-houses. Each contained small-pox patients in February, 1864. On February 29 about $4,000 worth of barracks and tools were destroyed at Camp Douglas. All the local regiments returning and all regiments passing through here were fed at Soldiers' Rest. By March 1 bounties had been paid to 2,380 recruits; but the provost marshal reported 833 recruits and the United States mustering officers 1,934 more, total 2,767, all since October 1, 1863. Thus by March 1, 1864, Cook county was still short nearly 1,000 men, not counting the quota under the call of February, 1864. Colonel DeLand, of the Michigan Sharpshooters, had commanded at Camp Douglas during the winter of 1863-64, but in March, 1864, was succeeded by Col. J. C. Strong of the Thirty-eighth New York infantry.

Previous to March, 1864, the Union and rebel soldiers in Camp Douglas could mingle, but at that date a high board fence was built between them. Prior to and including March 5, 1864, bounties had been paid under the October call as follows: 1,067 orders for $112, total $119,504; 1,433 orders for $23, total $40,124; grand total $157,628. Gen. Phil. Sheridan was here March 10, 1864; he was feted at the Sherman house. Bounty payments were extended to the first Monday in June. Grant's elevation to the head of the army in March, 1864, gave great satisfaction in Chicago. By March 14 the recruits numbered 2,681. General Burnside was here March 19; he addressed the citizens at Bryan hall. Twelve rebel prisoners escaped from "White Oak" prison in Camp Douglas March 22. During the war there were liberal subscriptions here to the various Government loans. For three days in April, 1864, subscriptions of $62,550 to the 10-40 loan were received by the Second National Bank. Before the British consul alone, in April, 1864, 1,015 persons made oath that they were aliens, and yet nearly all had voted here and many were well-known ward politicians. Of this number 551 were Irish. Gen. Daniel E. Sickles was here April 20, 1864, and was given a splendid reception at the Tremont house and on 'Change.

The defeat of General Banks at Pleasant Hill, Louisiana, was deeply regretted here. The Illinois colored regiment became the Twenty-ninth United States Colored regiment. It arrived here April 27, 1864, under the command of Col. Bross of Chicago, and was entertained at Soldiers' Rest. After the repast the regiment turned the tables on the white ladies of the Rest, and served them a splendid supper from the restaurant of Ambrose & Jackson, the most popular eating-house of the city. Late in April, 1864, Governor Yates called for 20,000 men for 100 days for garrison duty within the State. Cook county recruited many very young men for this service. By May 3 three new regiments for this service were well advanced here. The colonels of the first two were John L. Hancock and R. M. Hough.

In May, 1864, the Soldiers' Home was removed to Fairview, near the grave of the Late Senator Douglas, where a house owned by Mrs. Langley was rented for temporary occupancy until the proposed new brick building could be erected on adjacent ground recently bought. The new brick Home was to be ready in September, 1864.

At a war meeting held in Bryan Hall on May 9, to advance recruiting for the Hundred Day service, Generals Hurlbut and White and Colonel Mulligan made speeches, Frank Lumbard then sang "Old Shady," after which E. C. Larned, General Fuller and Emory A. Storrs delivered spicy, brilliant addresses. The meeting ended with all singing the "Battle Cry of Freedom." In order to stimulate enlistments under the Hundred Day call, the board of trade offered as an additional inducement to each man $15 per month for three months or a total of $45. At this time recruits were being raised by Captains Lyon, Palmer, Baxter, Baldwin, Randall and by Colonels Hancock, Hough and Shimp. At Camp Douglas on May 12 there were 5,600 rebels in charge of two regiments of the Reserve corps.

The news of the terrific fighting in the Wilderness by Grant's army roused this city to the highest pitch of excitement in May, 1864. As the news came bulletins were issued, cheering crowds gathered, flags were flung out, and the people seemed wild with joy. The Tribune of May 14 said, "Yesterday was a day long to be remembered. We have seen this city excited, but never to that degree as yesterday. The loyal men of Chicago were utterly beside themselves with delight." Grant was doing what all here wanted him to do and what all felt was bound to win success—fight. The crowds on the streets were wrought up to fighting pitch. Mr. Storey of the Times and John S. Newhouse, police commissioner, were assaulted for uttering remarks derogatory to Grant's successes. Business was suspended—a remarkable event for busy Chicago—and the evening was given up to parades, fireworks and general jollification. The fact that Grant held on and was not repulsed, was the cheering sign. It was noted that the Copperheads kept in their holes all day, not caring to incur the wrath of the crowds. The Tribune of May 15 jubilantly said, "Saturday was marked by scarcely less excitement in the streets of Chicago than the day preceding. The exuberant flush was over, but the people were not less anxious. All along the streets the question resounded, What is the news? . . . Now all feel that the clouds are indeed breaking. . . . Loyal men rejoice as only they can who have watched and waited and longed for the morning till hope was almost gone." But Richmond was not yet to be captured as they ardently hoped nor was the galling and bloody war soon to be ended. At this time the Copperheads had much to say of "Grant the butcher and Butler the beast." By May 17 the board of trade had raised about $30,000 to be paid under their offer to recruits for the Hundred Days' service. Gen. Richard Oglesby visited Chicago May 16.

About the middle of May a new enrollment for the whole State was ordered. Owing to the large number of rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, Camp Fry was made headquarters for recruiting. The colonels of the three Hundred Day regiment were Hancock, Hough and Shimp. By May 20 Hough's regiment had 741 men, Hancock's 704 men and Shimp's about 200. At a meeting of the ladies held about this time it was resolved not to indulge in finery and delicacies during the remainder of the war. Hough's regiment became the One Hundred and Thirty-second Illinois; and Hancock's the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Illinois. Chicago citizens made large contributions to the Pittsburg Sanitary Fair.

The following table, furnished by Captain James, provost marshal of this district (Cook county), showed, first, the total quota of this district under all calls from the commencement of the war, including that of July 18, 1864, arranged by sub-districts; second, the total credits of July 1, 1864, arranged as above; third, the deficit of each sub-district on July 1, 1864:

Important changes in Camp Douglas were made in June, 1864. The barracks were cut in two, raised four feet and arranged in streets. They were placed four abreast and nine deep. Under the new arrangement the camp could accommodate 12,000 prisoners.

The Camp Douglas Hospital Aid society was founded December 18, 1861, mainly by the ladies of Grace church who wished to aid the Federal soldiers at the camp. The operations were extended to soldiers' families and to other hospitals, particularly to the city hospital when it passed to the United States. In the Spring of 1863 they opened a repository at 51 State street to aid wives of soldiers. Later the society changed their name to St. Luke's Hospital society and established free beds and care at 539 State street. Their report June 20, 1864, shows total receipts of $4,451.89 and total expenses $4,110.38. Scores of soldiers' families suffered for food in July, 1864, and urgent calls for help were made of all the aid organizations. Protracted sickness had caused the resignation of Mark Skinner from the presidency of the Chicago Sanitary Commission in December, 1863, greatly to the regret of everybody. John V. Farwell was treasurer of the Freedmen's Aid Commission.

The call of July, 1864, for 500,000 men to serve one, two and three years, staggered the county, but all went resolutely to work to raise the quota. The Tribune of July 19 valiantly said, "The strain is hard. The trial is severe. But the people are equal to the effort. We have suffered too much; we have fought too successfully; we are too near the end to fall back into defeat, anarchy and endless civil war for want of the reinforcements for which the country through the President has now called." In all parts of the county and city tremendous effort began. Stirring calls and eloquent appeals were made by press, pulpit and rostrum. It was hoped and believed that this effort would be the last. Many of the prisoners at Camp Douglas took the oath of allegiance at this time and were provisionally released; there were 6,575 in the camp. An immense war meeting at Metropolitan hall on July 20 was addressed by John Wentworth, Grant Goodrich, J. D. Ward and Emory A. Storrs; the latter ridiculed in his humorous and inimitable style the Niagara Peace convention just adjourned. News of the capture of Atlanta was received with joyful acclaim. The death of Colonel Mulligan caused much sorrow in July; his public funeral was large and impressive. On August 13, 1864, the County War Fund committee was paying weekly allowances to about 1,200 soldiers' families. Wealthy men in all parts of the county were busy hiring substitutes, in order to have their names taken from the draft rolls. Among those who obtained substitutes about this time were J. V. Farwell, C. B. Farwell, Wilbur F. Storey, W. C. D. Grannis, Samuel S. Kellogg, U. R. Hawley and Nelson Morris. A number of Canadian negroes arrived here about this time to enlist as substitutes for the large private bounty offered. Col. John A.

Bross of the colored regiment died of wounds in August; he was hated by Secessionists and rebels for having taken command of a colored regiment, and his death may have been the result of that hate.

The draft was set for September 5, 1864. Recruiting was slow, but many substitutes were hired late in July. The County Board late in July, 1864, sent Col. J. L. Hancock to Springfield to secure definite information as to the quota of the county under the recent calls. Upon his return he made the following report: "The total quota of this district (First or Cook county), under all calls from the commencement of the war, including that of July 18, 1864, is 20,005; total credits to July 1, 1864, is 16,177; the deficit is 4,128. This number will be reduced somewhat by credits from enlistments for the navy and substitutes procured since April 1, 1864. It appears by the records that about sixty counties are deficient a total of 32,347 men, while about fifty counties have furnished 16,165 over their quota on all calls, leaving a balance due from the state of 16,182 men. By giving to Cook county her proportion of the surplus of 16,165 men, it leaves to be raised 2,064 men, from which is to be deducted the enlistments since July 1, numbering some hundreds, counting seamen and soldiers. The number to be raised at this time is somewhere in the neighborhood of 1,500 or 1,600 men, which, it seems to be understood, might be procured without resorting to conscription, if proper steps were immediately taken."

The National Democratic convention had been set to be held in Chicago in June, 1864, but was postponed to August 29. Elaborate arrangements for an immense building on Michigan avenue were made. The Tribune called the building the "Copperhead amphitheatre." It was erected in the park north of Park Row. Gen. W. S. Rosecrans was in Chicago during the convention and made a speech on 'Change. A committee of the citizens appointed at a public meeting to devise means to fill the quota of Cook county reported that it would be necessary to raise $900,000 by taxation to accomplish that object. On September 2, 1864, it was officially announced that the Cook county deficiency to date was 4,128, but the Tribune insisted that the real deficiency was only about half that number. Cook county constituted the First Congressional or draft district. The County Board was petitioned by the citizens September 5 to appropriate not to exceed $500,000 to be used to secure recruits to fill the county quota. It was argued that, while the county quota was 4,128 men, as many of the counties were ahead, the real quota of Cook county was thus reduced to about 1,600 men. Acting upon this petition, the County Board appropriated $500,000 on September 6, to be issued in county orders payable to bearer, $300 to each recruit, the scrip or bonds to bear 10 per cent interest. With $300 from the county and $100 from the Government, a substantial offer could be made to volunteers. The highest number of votes ever polled in Cook county was 20,347, but the enrollment of July, 1864, was 38,262; thus it was thought a big mistake had been made somewhere.

Upon receipt of the news of the capture of Atlanta the Board of Trade appropriated $200 with which to fire a salute in honor of the event. "Flesh brokers" was the term applied to persons engaged here in obtaining, for a consideration, usually commission, substitutes for men in any part of the Union. As soon as it was ready, everybody in the county was appealed to to take county scrip. The County Board ordered the expulsion from the courthouse square of all recruiting officers except those engaged to clear the Cook county quota. The War Fund committee reported on September 12 that they had paid to date in bounty a total of $323,843, and that from sixty to 100 recruits were yet to be paid. From July 1, 1864, to September 1, 1864, they had paid to soldiers' families $20,492.15. The cry of the Democracy at this time was "Peace at any price!" Under the Government call of July, 1864, for 500,000 men for one, two and three years, the bounty offered was $100, $200 or $300 respectively for those periods. Thus three-year recruits were offered $300 by the Government and $300 by Cook county. With his wages, board and clothing added, every recruit was thus offered over $1,000. As shown above, the total quotas of the county to July 1, 1864, were 20,305, total credits 16,177, deficiency 4,128. The Government, for prudential reasons, ordered a reduction of 50 per cent in the state quota for the first draft of September, 1864, leaving thus to be raised by Cook county on July 1, 1864, 2,064 men. But many had been recruited since then. The Tribune of September 22 said that about 1,817 men were yet to be raised.

The victory of Sheridan over Early in the Shenandoah valley in September was publicly celebrated here. People realized that the great armies of Grant, Sherman and Sheridan had the hydra of secession by the throat and was slowly but steadily and surely choking the life out of it. On September 26, 1864, the draft was commenced here. There was no excitement at the provost marshal's office at 132 South Clark street where the wheel revolved, or rather where the names were drawn from a box by some person selected at the moment and blindfolded. Leyden was the first town to receive the draft; Alderman Lawson with bared arm drew out the slips, and Frederick Rust was the first person drafted. On the first day twenty-five were drafted in Leyden, seventeen in Schaumburg, ten in Palos, twenty-nine in Wheeling, twenty in Northfield and twenty-one in Maine. The county supervisor and enrolling officer of Leyden, Benjamin L. Hopkins, was the thirty-sixth to be drafted. The second day the draft was: Rich, twenty; Lyons, thirty-three; New Trier, fourteen; Proviso, twenty; Lake, twenty-two; Lemont, twenty-three. Subsequent days showed the draft thus: Calumet, twenty-eight; Thornton, twenty-one; Niles, twenty-one; Orland, fourteen; Bremen, nineteen; Elk Grove, thirteen; Palatine, seven; Jefferson, nineteen; Bloom, thirteen; Worth, twenty; Cicero (only five short, was postponed upon request); Lake, twenty-two. John Foley, who drew for Lemont, produced his own name at the second draw. Cicero cleared herself of the draft—raised $10,500 by private subscription—and thus was the first subdivision of the county to be clear officially. Draft insurance societies flourished at this period; for a consideration they took their chances of guaranteeing any man clear. Clubs were formed, each member paying in $100, the sum raised to be paid to those drafted or paid to substitutes. On September 21, 1864, the County Board agreed that the $300 county bounty would be paid to any person applying on the quota—volunteers, drafted or substitutes. While the draft was in progress the greatest efforts yet made were inaugurated along these and other lines. A large private and additional bounty was raised in nearly all towns and wards. Substitute brokers appeared with elaborate signs at every street corner. The Thirteenth ward cleared itself by securing nearly a full company from one of the discharged regiments. In the Sixth ward 121 were drafted; in the Seventh, eighty; in the Eighth, eighty-three; in the Ninth, seventy-seven; and in the Twelfth, eighty-six. Money was poured out like water. The Fifth ward (Bridgeport), though forty-nine short, cleared itself in about three days by raising a large private fund. So great was the effort to raise recruits at this time (October 4 to 10) that the draft was suspended. By October 10 the county deficit had been reduced to the following: Northfield, seven; Maine, six; Leyden, eight; Lyons, twenty-three; Lake, one; Lemont, nineteen; Worth, seventeen; Calumet, seventeen; Brown, three; Thornton, three; New Trier, one; Bloom, one; First ward, one; Third, twenty-two; Sixth, ninety-five; Eighth, seventy-four; Ninth, fifty-six; Eleventh, seventy-seven; Twelfth, eighty-five; total, 516. All the other subdivisions had cleared themselves by October 10. By October 17 the following was the shortage; Maine, three; Lyons, seventeen; Lemont, eleven; Worth, seven; Calumet, eleven; Bremen, one; Thornton, three; Sixth ward, forty-three; Eighth, eight; Ninth, nineteen; Twelfth, eight; total, 131. On October 21 the deficit was as follows: Lyons, fourteen; Calumet, eleven; Lemont, two; Worth, six; Bremen, one; total, thirty-four. On October 23 the deficit was: Lyons, one; Calumet, four; Bremen, one; total, six. The next day the deficit vanished. All in all, this was perhaps the most extraordinary effort ever made by Cook county. The county deserves the highest credit for its herculean exertions in this emergency. Several of the subdivisions (wards and towns) raised each $20,000 to $30,000 and used the same as an additional bounty. John Wentworth was given great credit for his efforts at this date—giving his time and money without stint.

On September 28, 1864, about thirty rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, in a sortie, tried to batter down a portion of the wall and escape, but the leader was shot and the attempt failed. Col. J. B. Sweet was commandant. The Tribune of October 3 said: "The past week has been one of intense excitement in Chicago. The fall in gold and the consequent sweeping away of margins; the draft in Cook county; the continued military successes of the Union armies; the suspension of payments of three banks; the run on several others by depositors; the heavy decline in the price of grain and cattle, dry goods and groceries—all occurring during the closing days of September, made the week one long to be remembered." On October 6 there were 7,404 rebels at Camp Douglas, of whom 470 were in the hospital. Immense quantities of supplies were shipped daily by the Sanitary Commission in October, 1864. Gen. Joseph Hooker was here October 16; he appeared on 'Change and made a speech that was received with tumultuous cheers; he was given a splendid reception at night. Solomon Sturges, who had done a vast amount to aid the Union cause, died here in October, 1864. Receipts for the Soldiers' home were as follows: Collections from June 17, 1863, to September, 1864, $1,939.22; strawberry festival, $1,006.26; sale of Emancipation Proclamation, $3,000; net profits of same, $2,100; permanent home subscriptions, $12,941.33; premium on United States bonds, $831.53; total receipts, $24,818.34. The expenses were: Current, $12,599.22; paid for real estate, $11,207.50; total, $23,806.72; balance on hand, $1,011.62. A big festival in Rosedale for the benefit of the soldiers, given by the ladies of the West Side in October, netted over $500. The families of colored soldiers were aided the same as those of white soldiers. Many of the business houses in October and November, 1864, devoted one day's profits to aid soldiers' families.

The Sanitary fair at Chicago in 1863 had set an example that was imitated in all the states of the North. In October, 1864, another on a much larger scale was projected. "The Northwestern Sanitary commission and the Chicago Soldiers' home (which includes the Soldiers' rest), having resolved to institute a great joint fair for the benefit of both institutions, elected the following persons respectively on the executive committee: E. W. Blatchford, Mrs. A. H. Hoge and Mrs. D. P. Livermore for the Sanitary commission; T. B. Bryan, Mrs. O. E. Hosmer and Mrs. E. F. Dickinson for the Soldiers' home. These two committees, having united in pursuance of their appointment in forming the executive committee, and by virtue of the discretion delegated to them, added to their number Mark Skinner, Col. C. G. Hammond and E. B. McCagg, have completed their organization by the election of the following officers: President, Mark Skinner; vice-presidents, Col. C. G. Hammond, E. B. McCagg and T. B. Bryan; treasurer and secretary, E. W. Blatchford; corresponding secretaries, Mrs. A. H. Hoge, Mrs. O. E. Hosmer, Mrs. D. P. Livermore, Mrs. E. F. Dickinson. The committees have determined upon the 22d day of February, 1865, as the opening day of the fair and the 4th day of March as its closing day. It has also been definitely agreed that the net proceeds of the fair shall be divided between the Sanitary commission and the Soldiers' home; so that the latter institution shall be entitled to and shall receive the first $25,000; and all the residue of the said proceeds, regardless of the amount, shall belong to the Northwestern Sanitary commission."—(Extract of the Executive committee report in Tribune, October 28, 1864.)

On Sunday, October 30, 1864, James A. Garfield delivered a strong Union address at Bryan hall. On October 28 twenty-five or thirty rebels at Camp Douglas tried to escape by battering down the outer wall; five or six managed to get out, but the others were checked. The election of Lincoln and Johnson in November, 1864, greatly elated the Union leaders here, because it meant a continuance of the war policy and the overthrow of the rebellion and slavery. The total vote in Chicago was 27,029, or 6,650 larger than ever before polled in the city. The draft of 1864 was upon the basis of one-half of the quota of Cook county, and as the war advanced into the winter of 1864-65 it was seen that the other half would have to be raised by the county. Recruiting, therefore, continued. As high as $800 had been paid here for substitutes; but when the "flesh brokers" were driven out by act of the county and the city authorities the price fell to $500. The Sanitary fair held at Evanston under the auspices of the Female college in December, 1864, netted several hundred dollars for the soldiers. On November 28, 1864, the City Council passed an ordinance that no persons except those acting under city authority should enlist any men in the United States service, and particularly that substitute brokers should be thus prohibited. On November 27 about 550 rebel soldiers from General Hood's army arrived here; they were miserable looking objects. At this time there were about 8,000 rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, guarded by the Eighth Reserve corps, the Fifteenth Reserve corps and the Twenty-fourth Ohio battery—in all about 796 men. A board wall twelve feet high, upon which walked about twenty-five guards at one time, was all that stood between the prisoners and liberty. Often many of the 796 were away on special detail. Early in December the County Board authorized its War Fund committee to borrow $20,000 for six months at 6 per cent interest, to be expended for the benefit of the soldiers' families. On December 6, 7 and 8, 1864, over 1,000 prisoners from Hood's army arrived for Camp Douglas; by December 12 there were nearly 10,000 of them in the camp. The victory of General Thomas over

General Hood at Nashville in December, 1864, caused keen delight here; it was one step nearer final victory. The Northwestern Freedmen's fair was held at Bryan hall, December 19 to 25; it was opened by Theodore Tilton at Metropolitan hall. Sherman's triumphant "march to the sea" and capture of Savannah occasioned great rejoicing here in December. Recruiting still continued in all parts of the county; all felt that the war was near the end and that now was the chance to get the large bounty for short service. On January 1, 1865, there were at Camp Douglas 11,780 rebel prisoners. The opening of the Great Northwestern fair was postponed until May, 1865. Its officers were as follows: Gen. Joseph Hooker, president; E. W. Blatchford, secretary and treasurer; Mrs. A. H. Hoge, Mrs. D. P. Livermore and Mrs. O. E. Hosmer, corresponding secretaries. The fair had become so immense that it was found necessary to postpone it. By January 16, 1865, 248 new recruits had been secured. The Tribune humorously referred to each Union victory as "Another peace movement." The Chicago branch of the United States Sanitary commission reported that from January 1, 1861, to December 31, 1864, its receipts were $103,317.82, and its expenditures $100,003.68; its office was at 109 Clark street. In January, 1865, 178 rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas took the oath of allegiance and were released. Early in 1865 came the call for ten new regiments from Illinois, and again the county and city became active. The rendezvous was at Camp Fry, under Col. J. L. Hancock; the One Hundred and Forty-seventh Illinois regiment was to be formed there. By February 2 there were 416 new recruits. The Illinois "black laws" were repealed by the Legislature in February. By a vote of thirty-one to twelve the County Board in February passed an order to pay a total of $400 bounty to each recruit under the last call. On February 8, 1865, it was disclosed that out of 3,223 rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas slated to be exchanged, 715 refused to be exchanged. They saw the Confederacy tottering. The big bounty offered by the County Board greatly stimulated enlistments. Though the Union leaders of the county felt that their quotas were based upon an unfair enrollment, all dispute was stopped and every man did his best to clear the deficiency. Special bounties, in addition to the others, were raised by many of the subdistricts. Camp Fry was very lively at this date. From January 31 to February 10 about 1,000 recruits poured into that camp. Of the 11,061 rebels at Camp Douglas on February 10, squads almost every day thereafter continued to take the oath of allegiance. By February 17 it was shown that previous to the late calls Cook county had put in the service 18,876 men, and had raised in addition, under the last calls, about 1,300 more, or a total of 20,176. To this number there must be added the three months' men and the one hundred days' men, in order to get the full credit of Cook county. By February 19 there had been received at Camp

Fry 1,925 recruits. Before this date the One Hundred and Forty-seventh regiment was complete and Hiram L. Sickles had been elected colonel. These recruits came from other counties as well as from Cook. It has been the custom of local historians and other writers not to give Cook county the credit it deserves for the efforts made and the men enrolled. The county is certainly entitled to credit for the men raised, regardless of whether they were mustered into the service or not.

The One Hundred and Fifty-third Illinois regiment was mustered at Camp Fry by February 24, with Stephen Bronson as colonel. It left for Nashville early in March. Of the first detachment of 500 rebel prisoners exchanged in March, 1865, about 200 of them refused to cross to the rebel lines after they had reached the front and had learned how near their cause was crushed; they were brought back to Camp Douglas. The capture of Charleston and Columbia, South Carolina, by General Sherman kindled great joy in Cook county. Salutes were fired in all parts of Chicago. An appeal by Chicago citizens to President Lincoln to order a revision of Cook county's enrollment was turned down as impolitic at this stage of the war. It would have occasioned hundreds of other revisions in all parts of the Union. A dozen delegations were in Washington at the time waiting the result of the Chicago appeal. Secretary Stanton said: "It cannot be done; the result would be to set back—postpone—the draft at a critical time." It was agreed to correct the trouble by a subsequent new enrollment. By March 10 the county had raised 2,123 new recruits and had about 3,087 yet to raise. Early in March, it having been reported that about 2,000 rebel prisoners in Camp Douglas were willing to enlist to fill the Cook county quota, the County Board ordered an investigation. The One Hundred and Fifty-sixth regiment left Camp Fry for Nashville March 15, under Colonel Smith. Recruiting was extremely rapid. By March 23 there had been raised 2,583 men, with 2,625 yet to be recruited. They numbered 3,075 by April 5, and 3,312 by April 12. By April 13, 1865, when Secretary Stanton ordered all recruiting stopped, the County Board had paid the $400 bounty to 3,390 men. In addition about 100 more had enlisted, but had not yet drawn their bounty. On January 1, 1865, the county was credited with having put 18,876 men in the field. If to this number be added the above 3,490 men, a total of 22,366 is obtained as the apparent credits of the county when recruiting was stopped. But in order to get the actual total credits of the county, there must be added to this number the three months' men and the one hundred days' men (in all about 2,500 men), besides 2,092 Union seamen enlisted here, and about 2,000 Camp Douglas rebels who were induced to enter the service, making in all, without the rebels, about 27,000. It may thus safely be said that the county's total credits during the war were not less than 27,000, a splendid showing—one that should stand forever as a magnificent memorial to the loyalty of Cook county.

The aggregate cost of the Civil war to Cook county was substantially as follows: County bounty, $2,571,272; city bounty, $119,742; substitutes, $56,350; special by wards and towns, $734,453; Chicago families of soldiers, $90,809; county families of soldiers outside of city limits, $166,034; Board of Trade direct to families of soldiers, $220,000; Mercantile association to soldiers' families, $75,000; grand total cost, $4,033,660.

The severe fighting of Grant's army in and around Petersburg the last of March and the first of April, 1865, was believed here to be the beginning of the end. The Tribune of April 3 said: "The crisis of the war, so eagerly expected, has come at last. The final campaign of the Army of the Potomac has opened with a splendid success, promising no less than the speedy capture of Richmond and the total overthrow of the rebellion." Immediately afterward came the joyful news of the capture of Richmond. The Tribune of April 4 thus gave vent to its delight:

"A Day of Joy.—The news yesterday of the capture of Petersburg and Richmond caused the people of Chicago with one consent, or rather with one wild furor of enthusiastic joy, to give the day to the country. No sooner had the good news spread from our bulletins throughout the city than business was in a great degree suspended. Within half an hour the city was ablaze with the banner of beauty and symbol of freedom waving from every available staff, from the spires of our vessels, from all our principal public buildings, mercantile houses and private residences. Processions of workingmen and teams filled the streets; bands of music discoursed their stirring and eloquent strains; artillery and other pomp patrolled the streets. Everybody extended his benediction to everybody, or by 'laying on of hands' more forcible than apostolic smashed his neighbor's hat to express his congratulatory appreciation of the last 'big thing' of General Grant. Everything that smelt of gunpowder, from a cannon or a caisson to a pistol or a fire-cracker, was brought into requisition, and the day rivaled the Fourth of July in its patriotic uproar. Certainly yesterday has no rivals in the history of Chicago. Three years ago we threw up our hats in a fury of enthusiasm over Grant's first victory at Donelson, because we saw that our country had found her man. We have followed him faithfully through Shiloh, Vicksburg, Chattanooga, Spottsylvania and in all his campaigns before Richmond, and now Illinois proudly rejoices to have contributed not only the largest quotas of men, but both the civil and military leaders who have conducted us to victory in this contest. Beyond any portion of the country, therefore, Illinois has reason to rejoice in this day of rejoicing."

* * * *

"The rebel citadel has fallen. Richmond is ours! The news sped through the country yesterday on the wings of lightning, and lighted up the nation with a blaze of glory. . . . We do well to rejoice, for this is the grandest event that ever happened to us as a people. . . . Thanks be to God Who giveth the victory! . . . The beloved country for which so many precious lives have been given, so many tears have been shed, so many prayers offered to the Almighty Father, is saved. We have a home and a heritage, a government and a flag from which not a star has been erased or ever shall be. We have passed through a trial which no nation has ever before encountered and survived. The future henceforth is full of the promise of greatness to America and freedom to the world."

* * * *

"The glad tidings were received here about 10 o'clock, and the news was quickly bulletined in all the principal parts of the city. Great crowds gathered, and as they scanned the magic writing rent the air with their exultant shouts, telling the people far and near 'Richmond is taken!' The welcome sound was taken up by others and passed from lip to lip till it echoed all over the city and thousands of men, women and children fairly danced for joy. The scene was exciting—sublime."

* * * *

"If the day scenes were imposing, the night display was magnificent. The most extensive preparations were made during the day for a grand illumination in the evening, and the idea was carried out on a scale far surpassing anything ever before seen in Chicago. All the public buildings in the city were lighted, the hotels and offices blazed with candles and gas jets, while private residences by the hundreds had every window lighted, not alone in the center of the city but in its outskirts. Thousands of rockets and other fireworks illumined the sky with their glare; falling rain, Chinese lanterns, balls of fire, exploding crackers, the hiss of serpents and the whirl of the fire-wheel combined to produce a brilliancy such as cannot be described. While the air was filled with fireworks, the ground was alive with bonfires. Tar barrels and dry goods boxes and other lumber were brought out in large quantities and the torch was applied. All over the city, North, South and West, their flames lighted up the evening sky, presenting a truly magnificent spectacle. The street rejoicings were kept up till a very late hour, and the appearance of daylight found hundreds yet in the streets."

All the courts adjourned, cheering as they hurried to the streets. The saloons were never so crowded. It seemed that everybody had to blow off his enthusiasm or blow up. Many of the churches held prayer meetings in the afternoon. Dearborn Light Artillery fired a salute of one hundred guns at Camp Douglas. The rebel prisoners there were silent and sour, but the Union troops shouted with joy. The courthouse bell was set ringing the good news over the prairies as soon as the first bulletin appeared. Ladies carried small flags in their hands or on their hats. All the bands were soon out. Impromptu processions went cheering through the muddy streets. Lake street from the bridge to the lake was a bewildering mass of flags. Many Secessionists did not rejoice; they disappeared. Horses, wagons and street cars were gaily and often amusingly decorated. The Tribune of April 5 said: "It was amusing to witness the feigned joy of the Confederate print (Times) over the glorious news of the capture of Richmond and the rout of Lee's army. It actually had the hardihood to hang out the Star Spangled Banner—the Abolition emblem—and to pretend to rejoice, but it was hollow hypocrisy."

The news of Lee's surrender was received here late Sunday night, April 9. Immediately 100 guns were fired by Dearborn Light Artillery. This brought the people from their houses as bees from a hive. All the remainder of the night was given to raving celebrations, the crowds eagerly watching the bulletins as they were posted up. The next day schools, courts and Board of Trade adjourned and nearly all business was suspended. Speeches were delivered on 'Change by Rev. Arthur Swazey, W. D. Houghteling, Colonel Hancock, Colonel Hough, George C. Bates and Gov. William Bross, and all joined in singing "My Country, 'Tis of Thee" and "Praise God, from Whom all Blessings Flow." In the afternoon an immense procession paraded the streets under U. P. Harris, fire marshal. For variety of turnouts, for effervescent joy, it was never before equalled. A bulletin issued in the morning stated there would be a procession in the afternoon, and it was left to the imagination, joy and patriotism of the individual to accomplish the rest. So they came in all sorts of shapes and in all varieties of conveyances. Everybody got in line and manifested his delight according to his own feverish fancy. The floats and mottoes were spicy and varied. Among them were the following: "Grant has opened trade with the South;" "Confederate notes, 10 cents per pound;" "Union Blue, Raleigh, N. C.;" "Bacon & Co., Galveston, Texas;" "First National bank, Mobile, Ala." (on a lot of empty dry goods boxes); "J. Davis, Mexico, per Am. Exp., C. O. D.;" "How are you, Last Ditch?" "One box of Kearsarge Pills for Lord John Russell;" "J. Davis' baggage" (on an old worn-out trunk out of which peeped a pair of butternut pants); "Soothing Syrup for the Nation, by Phil. Sheridan;" "Sherman's Eradicator;"

DR. NICHOLAS SENN.

"Lee's mistake and Grant's treat;" "Medical supplies, Gen. Grant, Danville;" "Sherman's Vermifuge for Joe Johnson;" "Babylon has fallen." Everything concerning Jeff Davis made the people roar. A rude coffin sketched on the side of a broad board had over it the epitaph, "Jeff Davis departed this life April 3rd." This caused great merriment. There were almost continuous cheers for Grant, Sherman and Sheridan. All the colored people of the city were in the procession—exhibiting their ivories. The procession marched up Lake and Franklin, thence to Washington, thence to Clark, thence to Van Buren, thence to Michigan and thence to Lake. It was nearly four miles long and required nearly an hour to pass a given point. The mounted escort amused the people by running scrub horse races on Lake street. Many effigies of Jeff Davis were carried in the procession. At night the furor was continued with even greater intensity, with fire and noise. The Tribune of April 11 thus effervesced:

"If the fall of Richmond and Petersburg produced a spontaneous, off-hand outburst of rejoicing, the surrender of Lee culminated that rejoicing yesterday with such a universal uprising, outpouring, procession-forming, speech-making, banner-displaying, bonfire-burning, rocket-blazing day of glory as Chicago and its people have never before seen. . . . Grave men of business paraded the streets blowing tin horns. The Board of Trade sang "Old Hundred" in mighty chorus and followed it with "John Brown" and all the doxologies in the hymn books. Light men carried heavy men on their shoulders. Bulls embraced bears, and bears felicitated bulls in the most absurd fashions. The great procession came together as by magic. From all parts of the city they came, on foot, on horseback, and almost on their heads, with single carriages, double teams, four-horse teams and six-horse teams, a mighty army with banners. At night the city was illuminated with miles of bonfires. Such a carnival was never before witnessed in our goodly city."

* * * *

"It is literally true that yesterday the people of Chicago turned out en masse. Nothing like it was ever before witnessed in our streets. Where the vast multitudes all came from, was the wonder of every observer. It would be no exaggeration to say that in a radius of two-thirds of a mile, whereof the courthouse was the center, there were in the procession and on the streets and in the public square not less than 100,000 men, women and children, participating in the carnival of joy. The surrender of Lee and his army was of itself an event sufficient to evoke a great popular demonstration, but it was the belief that immediate, honorable and enduring peace would follow the surrender which caused the tremendous outbursts of jubilation and forced the whole population on the streets to shout, sing, laugh, dance, huzza and cry for very gladness. If grave men acted like a parcel of boys broke loose from school, it was because a heavy load was lifted from their hearts. The Nation's cause was won. The Republic was saved and free. These were the reasons that drew together and caused an impromptu celebration of 100,000 glad souls."

The news of Lincoln's assassination was received in Chicago about 4 o'clock on the morning of Saturday, April 15, 1865. It was immediately heralded all over the city. The revulsion in public feeling was heart-breaking. The Tribune of April 16 said: "Sorrow and indignation struggled for mastery in thousands of breasts. The grief of the people scarce knew bounds. Strong men wept in the streets, and loud sobs were frequently heard. These were almost the only audible sounds emitted. Even in telling the news to friends who had not before heard it, men spoke almost in a whisper. All business was of course suspended. The banks, the Board of Trade, the public offices, all closed for the day. A majority of the saloons even closed their doors; same of nearly every place of amusement. The city was draped in mourning. Even pedestrians on the streets wore crape upon their arms and rosettes of white and black upon their breasts. Horses were similarly decked. Democrats and Republicans, the rich and the poor, the high and the low, showed by their solemn countenances that they felt that a great calamity had fallen upon the Nation. Ladies dressed in black. Every shop, store and dwelling, the courthouse, customhouse, hotels and business buildings were draped."

Late in April full preparations were made for the reception of Lincoln's body. On May 1 at about 11:15 o'clock in the morning the catafalque was taken from the Michigan Central train at Park Row and, followed by an immense procession, marched with suitable escort under the beautiful memorial arch that had been erected there down Michigan avenue to Lake street, thence to Clark, thence to the east gates of the courthouse and within the yard around to the south door and thence into the rotunda. The crowd poured through from south to north, viewing the white face of the dead martyr. It had rained during the morning, but just before the arrival of the train beautiful sunshine flooded the city. The courthouse square was kept clear by sentries, the grass was green and the fountain tossed its spray high in the air. On the outside of the south door were the words:

"ILLINOIS CLASPS TO HER BOSOM HER SLAIN AND GLORIFIED SON."

The funeral arch at Park Row faced east and west and was triple Gothic and appropriately draped. Ten thousand school children and all of the colored people were in the procession. Every society in the city was out in its regalia. The pall bearers here were Lyman Trumbull, John Wentworth, F. C. Sherman, E. C. Larned, F. A. Hoffman, J. R. Jones, Thomas Drummond, William Bross, J. B.

Rice, S. W. Fuller, T. B. Bryan and J. Y. Scammon. Many notables were present. Religious services in honor of the loved dead were held in the churches. The colored people held special memorial services in Quinn chapel. The Tribune of May 1 and 2 said:

"A few weeks hence he had hoped and promised to come among us at the opening of the Sanitary fair. We had hoped to grasp his hand, to welcome the commander in chief of all our victories, the emancipator of America, the foremost man of our age and the most powerful ruler of this century, to hear his plain but prophetic soul-inspiring words, to share his genial kindness and his irresistible good nature. But all this is sadly changed. Where we had hoped to rejoice we weep with a sudden stunning, bitter anguish, such as no nation ever before felt. The features we had hoped to welcome wreathed in their expressive smiles, so full of candor, kindness, firmness and honesty—now come to us silent in death. This fearful rebellion which had already entered almost every household with its individual grief, now fills the cup of a nation's bitterness with one great woe that spares no loyal heart. Many before had lost a father, brother or son. Now we have all lost our noblest son, our bravest brother, our kindest father. Our cup is drained. The sacrifice is ended. The battle is over and the field won. The crime of slavery has been expiated. Liberty is redeemed. The memory of the last great martyr is embalmed forever in the hearts of the American people. Looking upon his remains today, let us consecrate ourselves anew to the great cause of freedom and union for which he yielded up his life."

"All that is mortal of Abraham Lincoln, the honest and good man, the prudent and sagacious counsellor, the saviour of the country from the nefarious schemes of treason—the blackest and most desperate the world has yet seen—now reposes in our city, the city that he loved and that loved him, while the mourners go about the streets and every house wears the funeral symbols of sorrow and every voice is hushed in the presence of the great dead. . . . Slain as no other man has been slain, died as no other man has died, cut down while interposing the hand of his great charity and mercy between the wrath of the people and the guilty traitors, the people of Chicago today tenderly receive the sacred ashes with bowed heads and streaming eyes."

In March, 1865, when recruiting was at its highest crest, about sixty assistants were employed at the provost marshal's office. The office was closed for good April 29 by order of the War Department. Dr. J. Winslow Ayer, whose office was in the McCormick block, early joined the Sons of Liberty, which met in that building, for the purpose of exposing its objects, if they were disloyal. Finding that its objects were treasonable, he notified Gen. Joseph Hooker, then a resident, and later was publicly thanked by the latter. Robert Alexander assisted Doctor Ayer. After the rebellion had collapsed the Sixth regiment of United States volunteers, 1,000 strong, was raised here from the rebel prisoners in Camp Douglas, and in May, under Col. C. H. Potter, left for the West to do frontier duty. On May 17 there were 6,000 rebels still at Camp Douglas. Many every day were taking the oath and leaving for the South. The Soldiers' Home and Rest, from June 15, 1864, to June 18, 1865, received 60,003 soldiers and gave 167,253 meals to soldiers. The receipts of the home and rest from June, 1864, to June, 1865, were $33,081.17; expenses, $35,849.99. Thomas B. Bryan, an heroic figure here during the entire period of the war, was still president of the home and rest at the latter date. The Permanent Soldiers' home had gone into operation in June, 1864. The return of the regiments from the war was an important event. Invariably they were received with touching ceremony and were often addressed by their former generals in the field. On June 13, 1865, there were as many as thirteen regiments here at one time—not as they went forth to war 1,000 strong, but each reduced from ravages to from 200 to 500 men. By June 20, 1865, all the rebel prisoners except the sick had left Camp Douglas.

A short time before the date of the Presidential election of November, 1864, Col. B. J. Sweet, commandant at Camp Douglas, arrested here a number of prominent Chicagoans and others, charged with treasonable conspiracy against the Government. Their trial occurred at Cincinnati and lasted several weeks. Many startling circumstances were revealed in the evidence. It was shown that ever since 1861 the treasonable organization, known at different times as Knights of the Golden Circle, Sons of Liberty, Society of Illini, etc., had an organization here; that they were part of a general organization throughout the North, instituted to oppose the war policy of Mr. Lincoln's administration; that they were the real backbone of all disloyalty shown here; that even during the National Democratic convention squads of men present carried concealed weapons; that as the Presidential election of November, 1864, was certain to decide whether the war policy of the administration or the peace policy of the Democracy was to prevail, the time for them to act was on that date; that for several months preceding the election the conspirators had been pledged the assistance of over 1,000 men of this city; that about 100 butternuts or Copperheads from Southern Illinois arrived here just before the election, prepared to take part in the outbreak; that about 500 rebels from Canada, men who had escaped from Northern prisons, were to join the revolt when all was ready; that at the November election hundreds carried concealed arms to the polls; that Charles Walsh and A. T. Semmes were actively concerned in the plot; that scores of Chicagoans were implicated in the same; that at the proper time Jesse's guerrillas were to come here to aid in the attack; that large quantities of arms were shipped here for use in the movement; that ammunition for the conspirators was manufactured here; that at the time there were not over 600 available Federal troops at the command of the city; that rebel Col. G. St. L. Greenfell, formerly a British officer, was to command the attacking force; that Gen. Vincent Marmaduke, a rebel prisoner at Camp Douglas, was to command one branch of the conspirators' forces; that the Richmond house and the Brighton house were two of the resorts of the plotters; that the plan was to attack with about 200 men each of the four sides of Camp Douglas, batter down the walls, capture the battery there, set free all the rebel prisoners and arm them with revolvers, shotguns or carbines previously provided, and then capture Chicago, burn the public buildings and sack the city, and then march South and join the rebels in Kentucky. About eighteen persons were arrested and taken to Cincinnati. Charles Walsh and A. T. Semmes were found guilty and the former was sentenced to five years and the latter to three years imprisonment in the penitentiary at Columbus, Ohio. Buckner S. Morris and Vincent Marmaduke were acquitted and discharged upon taking the oath of allegiance. Daniels escaped and Anderson committed suicide. Mrs. B. S. Morris, upon confessing, was released and sent to her father's home in Woodford county, Kentucky. The complete thwarting of the plot was mainly due to the efforts of Col. B. J. Sweet, commandant of Camp Douglas. From the start his agents kept him apprised of every step of the conspirators. So really meritorious were his services that he was publicly thanked by the County Board "for his energy and prompt action in arresting the disloyal and wicked in our midst." They said that "the recent arrests made in this city reveal a plot conceived by wicked and disloyal men for the destruction of our city, which, without the vigorous and prompt action of the military commander of the post, would, we fear, have been successful." Of course the Democracy as a party had nothing to do with this conspiracy, and the most of its members involved had been misled as to the objects of the movement. It seems to have been a movement of the rebels in the city and at Camp Douglas to form a guerrilla band for purposes of plunder and to aid the Confederate cause in case of the elevation of the Peace party to power.

During the winter of 1864-65 the Great Northwest Sanitary fair was steadily advanced. By the middle of February all the departments had been projected and the organization was perfect. The strongest encouragement was received from all parts of the West—indeed, from the East as well. Finally the fair was opened on June 8, 1865. Generals Grant and Sherman were present, remained several days and were the cynosure of all eyes. While here General Sherman addressed several of the returning regiments, but General Grant excused himself from speaking at the receptions. There were about thirty different departments, all designed to make money. The buildings were on the lake front. The fair was on such a large scale that in ten days the receipts amounted to $230,827.22. The Fine Arts hall and the Floral hall were strikingly beautiful. By June 20 it began to close. It had been decided to dispose of the net proceeds of the fair as follows: Fifty thousand dollars to the Christian commission, one-half of the balance to the Sanitary commission, and the other half of the balance to the Soldiers' home. Horticultural hall of the fair was taken apart and reërected at the Chicago Driving park for the State fair to be held in September, 1865. The final report on the fair published in the Tribune of August 21 showed the gross receipts to be $358,070.38, and the expenses $117,257.35, leaving the net receipts $240,813.03, a splendid exhibit. By this great fair Chicago showed what she could do when she tried. It was to begin with a noble conception, carried to fruition by patient and loyal hearts that knew not how to falter, and executed in a manner so elaborate and far-reaching, so varied and artistic, so successful and magnificent, that it is recalled with pride to this day by the old residents as one of the high water marks of Chicago's energy, self-sacrifice, generosity and patriotism.

COOK COUNTY ORGANIZATION, ETC. 1819-1865

THE act of March 22, 1819, established the courts of County Commissioners. It was provided that it should be a court of record; that two should constitute a quorum to do business; that there should be four sessions annually; that they should appoint or remove their own clerk; that the jurisdiction should cover the whole country; that the jurisdiction should embrace revenue, tax, licenses, roads, lands, turnpikes, toll and other bridges, writs, warrants, processes to the extent required by their powers; that they should have a seal; that the clerk should keep records of the proceedings of the board; that called sessions could be held; that the court could not have "original or appellate jurisdiction in civil or criminal suits or actions wherein the state was party or any individual or individuals, bodies politic or corporate, are parties, but should have jurisdiction in all cases where the matter or thing brought before the said court related to the public concerns of the county collectively and all county business; that it could punish for contempt, and have all power necessary to its duty under the law; that it should be entitled 'The County Commissioners' Court' and the process be 'in the name of the people of the State of Illinois'; that it should have the power and jurisdiction to compel and enforce by writ or writs of attachment or other processes the orders, decrees and judgments of said court on all those named therein and bear testimony in the name of the clerk." The law of July 1, 1827, made each county in the state a body corporate and politic—could sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded.

By act approved January 15, 1831, "All that tract of country, to wit: Commencing at the boundary line between the States of Indiana and Illinois, at the dividing line between towns thirty-three and thirty-four north; thence west to the southwest corner of town thirty-four north of range nine east; thence due north to the northern boundary line of the State; thence east with said line to the northeast corner of the State; thence southwardly with the line of the State to the place of beginning—shall constitute a county to be called Cook; and the county seat thereof is hereby declared to be permanently established at the town of Chicago as the same has been laid out and defined by the Canal commissioners." An election was held at Chicago for one sheriff, one coroner and three county commissioners. The act further provided that "the public buildings as Chicago shall be erected on the public square, as laid off by the Canal commissioners on the south side of the Chicago river." It was further provided that if the canal commissioners should donate any lots to the county commissioners, the latter were authorized to sell same and apply the proceeds to the erection of a courthouse and jail. Ferries under the control of the county commissioners were provided for. The same act provided that "the county commissioners' court of Cook county is hereby authorized to purchase of the Government of the United States a quantity of land in Section 10, Town 39 north, Range 14 east, not exceeding eighty acres, to be laid out into town lots and sold from time to time as they may think proper, the proceeds of which, when sold, shall be appropriated to the erection of a courthouse and jail." It was also ordered that "all the country north of Cook county and parallel with the lines of the same, as far northward as Rock river, is hereby attached to Cook county."

In 1831 the Commissioners' court was organized. It opened in March, 1831, the first record being as follows: "Samuel Miller, Gholson Kercheval and James Walker, Commissioners of Cook county, were sworn into office by J. S. C. Hogan, justice of the peace. William See was appointed clerk of the Commissioners' court, who after being duly sworn and giving bonds according to law, the court proceeded to business. Archibald Clybourn was appointed county treasurer and an order passed that the Southwest fraction of Section 10, Township 39 north, Range 14 east of the Third principal meridian be entered for county purposes. At the next meeting, March 9, the treasurer was authorized to borrow one hundred dollars with which to enter the land before mentioned and he is directed not to give more than six per cent. interest. It was also ordered that Jesse Walker be employed to enter the land, that Jedediah Wooley be nominated to the Governor for county surveyor, and that there be three precincts in the county of Cook, to-wit: The Chicago precinct, the Hickory Creek precinct, and the Dupage precinct. The boundaries of these three precincts were established, judges of election appointed and the time and the places of holding the same were fixed. Grand and petit jurors were selected and some other minor business transacted when the court adjourned until Court in course."—(Annual Reviews of Chicago, 1853, in the Chicago Historical Society Library.)

On April 13, 1831, Miller and Kercheval present, it was "Ordered, That there be a half per cent. levied on the following description of property, to-wit: On town lots, on pleasure carriages, on distilleries, on all horses, mules, and neat cattle above the age of three years, on watches with their appurtenances, and on all docks." Elijah Wentworth and Samuel Miller (one of the commissioners) were licensed to keep tavern in Chicago and were taxed $7 and $5 respectively. "Ordered, That the following rates be allowed to tavern keepers, to-wit:

Each half pint of wine, rum or brandy.....	25	cents
Same, pint.....	37½	cents
Half pint of gin.....	18¾	cents
Same, pint.....	31¼	cents
Gill whisky.....	6¼	cents
Same, half pint.....	12¼	cents
Same, pint.....	18¾	cents
Breakfast or supper.....	25	cents
Dinner.....	37½	cents
Horse fed.....	25	cents
Horses over night.....	50	cents
Man lodging.....	12½	cents
Cider or beer, one pint.....	6¼	cents
Same, quart.....	12½	cents

Miller was one of the two commissioners to pass on his own tax as tavern keeper. The first licensed merchants in Cook county were B. Laughton, Robert A. Kinzie and Samuel Miller; first auctioneer, James Kinzie. Russell E. Heacock was licensed to keep tavern at his residence. All this was ordered at the meeting of April 13, 1831.

At this time also preliminary steps to establish ferries across both branches of Chicago river were taken, but the people of Cook county with their "traveling apraties" (apparatus) could pass free. A ferry scow was bought of Samuel Miller for $65. At the next term Mark Beaubien, under $200 bond with James Kinzie as security, was licensed as first ferryman at Chicago; he agreed to pay $50 for the license and further agreed "to ferry all citizens of Cook county free." During the vacation of 1831 licenses to sell goods were granted to Alexander Robinson, John B. Beaubien and Madore Beaubien.

The next term of the County court began June 6, 1831. Jesse Walker reported that he had been refused permission to enter the land of fractional Section 10 as ordered by the Court at a previous term; he returned the entry fee to the Board. This land was under the management of the Canal commissioners. The County commissioners received $1.50 per day for their services. In June, Joseph Leframboise, Mark Beaubien and Oliver Newberry were licensed to sell goods. The county officers were paid in county orders.

The commissioners ordered the sale of the lots given to the county by the Canal commissioners, reserving the public square only. The sale was ordered for the first Monday in July, 1831. The County commissioners were treated liberally by the Canal commissioners and in return it was "Ordered, That the county pay the Canal commissioners' ferriage during their stay at Chicago on canal business; the charge for this service was $7.30 by Mark Beaubien, ferryman. At this time also (June, 1832), two roads were ordered viewed by the County board; one "from the town of Chicago to the house of B. Laughton, thence to the house of James Walker on Dupage river, and so on to the west line of the county." Elijah Wentworth, R. E. Heacock, and Timothy B. Clark were appointed viewers. The other was to extend from Chicago by the nearest and best way to the house of the widow Brown on "Hycary Creek," and James Kinzie, Archibald Clybourn and R. E. Heacock were appointed viewers. "What would widow Brown think now were she to count from the cupola of the Tremont house the eighty trains of cars that daily arrive and depart from this city? And for aught we know she may have anticipated the present, for it is only twenty-three years since her house was made the terminus of the 'original survey' of one of the first avenues from Chicago."—(Annual Reviews of Chicago, January, 1854, in Chicago Historical Society Library.)

"Whether our present splendid court house is square or skew does not cut much of a figure in view of the fact that only twenty-three years before "Court adjourned until Court in course to the house of William See."—(Annual Reviews of Chicago, 1854.)

James Kinzie, auctioneer, about 1832, was allowed a county order for \$14.58, being $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the first \$200 and 1 per cent. after that amount for his services as auctioneer in selling the county lots.

During the summer of 1831 there started up among others the following merchants: Brewster, Hogan & Co., Peck, Walker & Co., Joseph Naper and Nicholas Boilvin. Mark Beaubien was chief ferryman, was also a merchant and was in the summer of 1831 licensed to keep a tavern. He was fined $10 "for a fracas" with John F. Hall, but the fine was remitted. Beaubien's prominence and influence gave him a "pull" with the board evidently. Doctor Kimberly charged that Mark Beaubien kept two race horses and that during the day time would get up races with the Indians and thus neglect his ferry; and so the Board after investigation ordered him to ferry the citizens of Cook county "from daylight in the morning until dark without stopping," meaning that he should be there at all times during the day.

It is notable that sick, disabled or needy strangers or travelers were provided for at public expense as shown by the Commissioners' records. The early county officers seem to have been men of honesty and fidelity. In the case of the first road located from the public square to the west boundary of the county, some or all of the viewers, it became evident to the Board, were influenced by selfish purposes, hence their "report is rejected and the viewers shall have no pay for their services." Richard J. Hamilton was appointed clerk of the county court in place of William See, resigned, and assumed the office April 2, 1832.

In April, 1832, more roads were ordered viewed, streets laid out, election precincts opened, magistrate districts set apart, judges of election appointed, etc. The return of the sheriff April 4, 1832, showed that the amount of the tax list on real and personal property for the year ending March 1, 1832, was $148.29. The treasurer's report for the same year shows that $225.50 had been received for tavern licenses, retail goods, etc. The tax actually received on the sheriff's list was $132.28; total tax receipts for the year $357.78. License tax delinquencies amounted to $88.50; paid on county orders, $252.35; balance in the treasury, $16.93. This was the report in the spring of 1832. By the spring of 1854 the tax collected by the city treasurer for 1853 was $135,752.03, and by the county treasurer was $245,057.07; total tax collected for 1852, $380,809.10. The sum of $357.78 was what ratio to $380,809.10 in twenty-two years? In 1853 the entire valuation of Cook county was as follows: Personal, $4,450,630; real, $18,487,627; total, $22,938,257. The actual value was four times as much, or nearly $100,000,000.

As several of the tavern keepers had proved delinquent it was ordered in April, 1832, that their licenses should not be issued until the tax had been paid. The tax of one-half per cent. was continued on all personal property. Archibald Clybourn was reappointed treasurer for 1832-33. The sheriff was authorized to procure a room or rooms at the house of James Kinzie, provided it could be done for $10—for the use of the Commissioners' court at the April term, 1832. John R. Clark was the first coroner—1831-32. The first inquest was on the body of a dead Indian. The second was on William Jewett, a passenger, found dead.

On April 25, 1832, the first street was opened through the town to Lake Michigan. It was surveyed by Jedediah Wooley, county surveyor, and was described as follows: "From the east end of Water street in the town of Chicago to Lake Michigan; direction of said road is south 88½ degrees east from the street to the lake 18 chains, 50 links." The street was laid out 50 feet wide. The first public building was an estray pen erected on the southwest corner of the public square—was built by Samuel Miller, who was paid only $12 for his work, it not being finished "according to contract." It seems that he, though a county commissioner, was guilty of slighting his contract. At the March term of 1833 the road commissioners previously appointed reported their survey of a state road from Vincennes to Chicago. The jail was the second public building erected. The first contractors failed to do as they agreed and were sued. The jail was finally completed in the fall of 1833 and was built "of logs well bolted together" and was located on the northeast corner of the public square. It stood until 1853 and was then torn down, a new courthouse and jail having been erected. —(Annual Reviews of Chicago, 1854, in Historical Society Library.)

The minutes of the Commissioners showed that the first Circuit court was held on September 6, 1831, in Fort Dearborn "in the brick house and in the lower room of said house."—(Annual Reviews of Chicago, 1854.) B. Laughton kept a tavern and store near Lyonsville and later on the Southwestern plank road.

In 1834 the military commandant of the State ordered the organization of the militia of the county. The election was held at Laughton's tavern on the Des Plaines. All Chicago went out there with brandy, sugar and lemons and made a large punch bowl with the spring water after the election. John B. Beaubien was elected colonel. The official surveyors of the Government in 1817 fixed the southernmost point of Lake Michigan at 41 degrees, 38 minutes, 58 seconds north latitude.

By the Act of February 13, 1831, Cook county was made a part of the Third Congressional district. Joseph Duncan was the first representative in Congress after Cook county was created. In 1833 he was succeeded by William L. May, who served until 1839, when John T. Stuart succeeded him. At that date the State was divided into seven congressional districts and Cook county was embraced in the Fourth. In 1843 John Wentworth succeeded Mr. May as Congressman for this district. He continued to serve until 1853, when Richard S. Malony succeeded him. At this time Cook county became a part of the Second Congressional district. Wentworth served again in Congress from 1853 to 1855; James H. Woodworth from 1855 to 1857; John T. Farnsworth from 1857 to 1861; Isaac N. Arnold from 1861 to 1865; John Wentworth from 1865 to 1867; Norman B. Judd from 1867 to 1871.

In 1832 and 1833 Cook county formed a fractional part of a large senatorial and representative district in Northern Illinois. James M. Strode served as senator at this time and Benjamin Mills as representative. From 1834 to 1836 the senators were James W. Stephenson and James W. Strode, and John Hamlin was representative. From 1836 to 1838 Cook county alone constituted an Assembly district, but was united with Will county to form a Senatorial district. Peter Pruyne was senator and Albert G. Leary, John Naper and James Walker were representatives. In 1836 Will county was separated from Cook and in 1839 Lake and Dupage counties were separated. In 1838-40 Cook, Will and McHenry counties formed an assembly district. Ebenezer Peck was senator but resigning was succeeded by James H. Woodworth. The representatives were Gholson Kercheval, Richard Murphy and Joseph Naper. From 1840 to 1842 John Pearson served as senator and Albert G. Leary, Richard Murphy and Ebenezer Peck as representatives. By 1842 Cook county alone had again become a Representative district. The county was represented by Isaac N. Arnold, Hart L. Stewart and Lot Whitcomb. From 1844 to 1846 Cook and Lake counties were united in one Senatorial district and were represented by Norman B. Judd.

In 1834 there were but four election precincts in Cook county, viz.: Chicago, Hickory Creek, Walker's Grove and Naper's Settlement. Of these Hickory Creek was at Joliet and Naper's Settlement in Dupage county. At this time the total vote of the county was approximately only about 500.

In 1823, what is now Cook county was an organized part of Fulton county. In 1825 it was attached to Peoria county and was designated as the first precinct and the necessary officers were ordered elected.

In 1831, when Cook county was organized, Richard J. Hamilton became clerk of the Circuit court, judge of probate and notary public. A little later the position of clerk of the county commissioners court becoming vacant, Mr. Hamilton was given the position. T. J. V. Owen at first held the position of school commissioner, but resigned and it was given to Mr. Hamilton by the county commissioners—Walker, Miller and Kercheval. In 1835 Mr. Hamilton said in the American of August 1: "Up to September, 1834, that office (school commissioner) has yielded me in all about $200. Up to the present time the gross receipts of the office of notary public have probably not exceeded $50. The judge of probate's fees since the appointment in this county have not amounted to more than $50; and I have not realized from all these offices, including that of recorder, more than the sum of $1,500."

The County Commissioners' court held its sessions of 1834 in Fort Dearborn; so also did the Circuit court. Beginning in 1835 the sessions were held in the churches. During 1835 a small brick house was built on the public square and there the County Clerk and the county records were domiciled in October. In June, 1836, when Judge Thomas Ford held Circuit court here, there were on the docket 230 civil and 50 criminal cases, the latter being mostly for contempt. In November, 1835, when the county showed a population of 9,773, it must be recollected that it still had its original boundaries. In 1836 the poor-house stood on the public square. In 1836 Will county took from Cook the precincts of Hickory Creek, Jackson's Grove, Spring Creek, Kankakee and Old Mound Joliet.

At the election of August 6, 1834, the total vote polled in Cook county was 528. This included Will, Kane, Dupage, Lake, part of McHenry, and the present Cook.

In the early settlement of the Western country the Cumberland road was the most important public highway leading to that section. By 1830 it was completed to Vandalia, Illinois, and from that point to Jefferson City, Missouri, the road had been laid out. In 1830, also, President Jackson signed the bill providing for the survey of a road leading from Detroit to Chicago. In the decade of the thirties the most important roads leading from Chicago were those to Vincennes, Alton and Galena. The Vincennes road was ordered surveyed by act of January 15, 1831. By the fall of 1831 the road from Detroit to Chicago had advanced eighty-six miles. The early trade of Chicago was largely from the Wabash valley. This led to the construction of the Vincennes road. The design was to extend the road from Detroit to Chicago westward to Galena. A memorial of the legislature to congress, both in February, 1833, and December, 1833, had this object in view; at the same time congress was asked to grant land for the completion of the Chicago and Vincennes road.

The act of January 16, 1836, ordered the survey of the road from Chicago in the direction of Peoria; James B. Campbell, of Chicago, was one of the commissioners to view this road. By act of January 15, 1836, the road from Meacham's Grove in Cook county, to Galena by the way of Elgin, was ordered surveyed. The act of January 20, 1836, provided for the location of a State road from Bloomington to Chicago. Prior to this date a State road from Shelbyville to Chicago to intersect the Chicago & Vincennes road near the Iroquois river was ordered surveyed. In 1837 the Chicago and Fox river turnpike road was incorporated. In 1839 the State road from Naperville through Babcock's Grove, Meacham's Grove, Elk Grove and Indian Creek in the direction of Madison, Wisconsin, was ordered surveyed. In February, 1839, the legislature authorized George W. Smith to build a toll bridge across the Des Plaines river on the northeast quarter of Section 11, Township 39 north, Range 12 east, and also one on the southeast quarter of Section 2, same town and range. The act of February, 1841, changed into a State road the public highway, the turnpike extending from Chicago to Sand Ridge in the direction of the Des Plaines river. This road had been built largely by the citizens of Chicago and it was urged at the time that the county commissioners should make the necessary appropriations to keep the same in good condition. In February, 1841, the legislature authorized George Dolton to build a toll bridge across the Calumet river in Cook county on the southwest quarter of Section 34, Township 37, north, Range 14 east, the said Dolton being the owner of the said quarter section.

In 1845 the Aurora & Chicago Plank Road company was incorporated. Among the commissioners were Eli S. Prescott, Silas B. Cobb and Alson S. Sherman of Chicago. This road was to be a branch of the Chicago & Rock River plank road. The act of January, 1845, incorporated the Chicago & Rock River Plank Road company. Among the incorporators were Walter L. Newberry, Mark Skinner and William H. Brown, of Chicago. The road was to extend from Chicago to Rockford by the way of Elgin and Belvidere. In March, 1845, the Chicago & Joliet Turnpike company was incorporated. William B. Egan, John Frink, Isaac Cook, Henry G. Hubbard, Joel A. Matteson and J. Young Scammon were commissioners to view and locate this road. The State road from Chicago to Miller's Grove by the way of Elk Grove was located in 1845. Homer Wilmarth, Eben F. Colly and Stephen Pennoyer were the commissioners. In 1847 State roads were re-located from Chicago to Big Rock Creek, from Chicago to Brook's Bridge on the Des Plaines river, also to Elk Grove, to Dundee, to Pleasant Grove near Smith's Tavern, etc. The contract to build the plank road from Chicago to Des Plaines river was let to A. J. Douglas, of Chicago, in January, 1848. In February, 1848, the plank road was projected from the Milwaukee road between Dickinson's and Roberts on the Sand Ridge, thence to Smith's Tavern on Union Ridge, thence to the Des Plaines river near Brook's Tavern, thence to the house of F. W. Page at Elk Grove. In 1849 the Sycamore & Chicago Plank Road company was incorporated; also the Chicago & Southwestern Plank Road company. Among the incorporators of the latter were Theodorus Doty, Isaac Cook, Thomas Richmond, Robert Hugunin, James Peck, J. A. McDougal, T. S. Morgan, Festus Clark and S. C. Hopkins & Company. This road had already been in operation but it was now proposed to plank it. In 1851 the legislature confirmed the act of the Cook County Board in permitting the Chicago and Southwestern Plank Road company to occupy the public highway from Chicago to the west line of Cook county. In 1853 the Chicago and Calumet Plank Road company was incorporated. In 1853 a state road was ordered established to run from the Southwestern plank road to Calumet. In 1854 the Northwestern Plank Road company was incorporated by Thomas Richmond, John Gray, Joseph Filkins and others. This road was projected from Chicago to the north line of Cook county by the way of Oak Ridge and Wheeling. The act of February 18, 1859, gave to the board of supervisors of all counties where township organization had been adopted, entire control of all the State roads in their respective counties. In other counties control was vested in the county court. In 1865 a State road was located from Blue Island and Archer road juncture southwest to the Calumet feeder between Palos and Worth towns to Section 24, town of Palos. In 1867 the Illinois and Indiana Turnpike company was authorized to occupy in part Cottage Grove avenue. The act of 1869 authorized the widening of the Southwestern plank road (or Ogden avenue), within the city limits.

The American of September 28, 1839, said: "The present debt of the county is estimated at about $20,000. It was officially reported on the first of March last at $15,000. The revenue under the new law in connection with a few other sources of receipts will this year amount to about $10,000. The expense of supporting the poor of the county for the last year was $5,000. The paupers who applied for relief were principally from the canal and many from Will county. This expense is increasing rather than diminishing. The criminals confined in the jail for the three months preceding the last term cost $3,000. This is a serious tax. County orders from the increase of the expenses in a ratio greater than of the revenues are becoming worse instead of better—the county is obliged to pay double price for provisions which they procure for the relief of the poor. . . . In fact county orders have been refused for meat and groceries at fifty cents on the dollar. This discount and embarrassment in obtaining a circulation for the orders on any terms operate very oppressively on the county, and in fact on its creditors who have to take its orders at par. This cannot be avoided for the present except by funding the scrip according to the provisions of an act authorizing the county to effect a loan which passed on the 10th of February, 1839, and which the county commissioners are very anxious to do and have repeatedly applied to individuals of supposed public spirit for that purpose. . . . Under the laws of this State and especially under the manner in which they are in some cases obeyed, the tax of supporting paupers, etc., is very severe upon such a county as Cook—swarms of destitute persons coming in through the canal. Our State, especially our county, should take measures to protect us from this influx of paupers. The statute of this State 'for the relief of the poor' provides that when any non-resident or any other person not coming within the definition of a pauper shall fall sick or die in any county of this State, not having money or property to pay his board, nursing and medical aid, it shall be the duty of the overseers of the proper township, or if there be none, then of the nearest county commissioner of the county, upon complaint being made, to give such assistance to such poor person as they may deem just and necessary. . . . This provision is very general and embraces in a city like this a large portion of its floating population, and the duty of the overseer becomes highly arduous and responsible. The act of February 21, 1839, provides that the County Commissioners' court in each county may establish a poor-house whenever it sees fit, and that justices of the peace in each justice's district, in conjunction with some person to be appointed by the County Commissioners' court, shall be overseer of the poor, and be vested with the entire and exclusive superintendence of the poor in their respective counties, until the County Commissioners' court shall have established a poorhouse, when their authority ceases. Cook county has enough to do to take care of its own poor. The act authorized the commissioners to borrow $10,000 at 8 per cent for not over twenty years. Is it right that she should take care of the paupers along the canal—a State work? We think that the State should erect one or two or more hospitals on the line of the canal for the support of the sick—one perhaps at the end and one at Lockport."

The grand jury of Cook county in October, 1841, after an extended examination of the finances of the county, reported that the same were and had been since the commencement, in a deranged condition; that the practice of furnishing fuel for certain county offices to be paid for from the treasury be discontinued; that all allowances from the treasury not explicitly granted by law be stopped; that several ex-county officers were indebted to the county and should be required to pay up at once; that the jury and docket fees be required to be paid differently; that a law be asked for requiring each county to publish at the end of each Commissioners' court a paper setting forth all important proceedings; that important changes should be made in the method of issuing county orders for the payment of county officers and others; that the action of the county regarding a poorhouse be approved. The grand jury were John Rogers, N. H. Bolles, Nathaniel Pitkin, Frank C. Russell, Henry Tucker, Charles M. Gray, Robinson Tripp, Benjamin Wilder, E. S. Wadsworth, W. L. Newberry, J. Mark Smith, Frederick Bailey, E. A. Mulford, A. D. Taylor, W. B. Egan, A. S. Perry, Albert H. Guild and Henry Hugunin, foreman.

By act of February 16, 1839, the county commissioners of Cook county were authorized to borrow a "sum not exceeding $10,000 at not to exceed eight per cent. interest for not to exceed twenty years, and to issue bond or script therefor, under the seal of the commissioner's court of said county," the sum borrowed to be expended for the benefit of the county. The county revenues were to be pledged to redeem the scrip. The county commissioners, in March, 1841, petitioned Governor Carlin to call an extra session of the Legislature to consider the canal question. The act of February 23, 1843, made it the duty of the county commissioners to provide a good and sufficient safe for the records of the county. The recorder was required to make a complete index of the county records.

The law of 1842 required the county commissioners to make an appropriation in March of each year to keep county roads in repair.

On September 12, 1844, a large mass meeting to consider building a road between Chicago and that city that would be good all the year round, was held at Elgin.

In 1845 the following mail routes were established: Chicago to Monroe, Elk Grove, Wickliffe, Miller's Grove, etc.; Blue Island via Bachelor's Grove and Hadley to Joliet; Chicago via Babcock's Grove to St. Charles and other points; Chicago via Blue Island, Thornton, Crete, Kankakee, etc., to Lafayette. In January, 1845, at a special election J. S. C. Hogan was elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of F. C. Sherman, county commissioner.

In February, 1846, a new mail route from Chicago via Blue Island, Thornton, New Strasburg, Crete, Loraine and other points was laid out. In 1846 the tax for county purposes was four mills on the dollar; it was three and a half mills for state purposes and one mill for special purposes. The total county tax amounted to $20,285; total State tax, $17,750, and the total special tax to $5,071.

The act of January 16, 1847, provided that each county commissioner in the State should be paid $2.50 for each day's service.

"Under the arrangements for the relief and care of the poor, our county revenue has nearly all been swallowed up. Indeed, it is now feared that the poor expenses since the last report have exceeded the proportion of the revenue accruing for the time. This state of things has alarmed the community and the commissioners have resolved upon discontinuing all out-door relief. It is believed that this out-door system has led to great impositions as it most surely has to an enormous expenditure. All are very anxious to do everything in their power to relieve the poor, and at the same time economize for the county as much as possible."—(Daily Democrat, January 5, 1848.)

It should be noted that land which had been entered in 1842 was not taxable until 1848 and the same of all land entered prior to and including 1846. All land entered after February 19, 1847, was taxable from and after the date of entry.

This county alone was a Representative district, its members in the House being Isaac N. Arnold, Francis C. Sherman and Hart L. Stewart. Judd continued to serve as senator until 1848; J. J. Everett, Francis C. Sherman and Mark Skinner were representatives. By the Constitution of 1848 Cook and Lake counties were constituted the Twenty-fifth Senatorial district and Cook alone was constituted the Fifty-fourth Representative district. Mr. Judd continued to serve until 1860, when he was sent as envoy extraordinary to the court of Berlin. Cook county was represented in the House from 1848 to 1850 by Philip Maxwell and Francis C. Sherman; from 1850 to 1852 by Philip Maxwell and Thomas Dyer; from 1852 to 1854 by W. B. Egan and Homer Wilmarth. Under the act of February 27, 1854, Cook county was made the Fifth Senatorial district and was divided into two Representative districts—the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh. Each of the latter under the new apportionment was entitled to two representatives. Those who served in the lower House from 1854 to 1860 were as follows: Robert H. Foss, Thomas Richmond, M. L. Dunlap, George F. Foster, John H. Dunham, George W. Morris, Isaac N. Arnold, A. F. C. Mueller, Van H. Higgins, Samuel L. Baker, Ebenezer Peck and Casper Butz.

The Constitution of 1848 authorized the General Assembly to provide a general law for township organization and empowered the County Court to assume charge of the change from the former township system to the new organization. Accordingly, by the Act of February, 1849, the General Assembly ordered a general election held throughout the State in November of that year to determine whether or not counties desired to be established under the new township organization. Counties voting in favor of the township system were made subject to the provisions of the Act of April, 1850. At the general election in 1849 and again in 1850 Cook county voted to adopt the new township organization system and proceeded to put the same into execution. During the change county affairs were administered by the County court. The old Cook County court which had managed county affairs since 1831 was succeeded in 1850 by the new Board of Supervisors. The law of 1849 for township organization was found to be defective and was repealed in 1851 and a new law was passed covering the same ground and supplying the defects of the former act.

In 1848 Cook county paid into the State treasury more than any other county in the State—$25,848. At this time the county commissioners were George O'Brien, Homer Wilmarth and Charles Santer. At this date a new mail route from Lyons via Summit, Flag Creek, Long John, Plainfield, Plattville, thence on to Ottawa, was established.

It was noted in 1848 and 1849 that large numbers of German emigrants direct from the Fatherland were rapidly settling in all parts of Cook county. They were welcomed because of their industry, frugality, honesty and good citizenship generally.

In March, 1848, the number of inmates in the county poor house was forty-six, in June the number was sixty. There had been discharged in three months twenty-two of the inmates. The numbers being supported there on July 6, 1848, were thirty-four and at this date George Dayis was supervisor of the poor farm.

By special act of January 25, 1849, A. Getzler, late assessor of Cook county, was granted $75 to reimburse him for money he had paid out in 1846 for office assistance.

In 1831 Cook county was embraced in the Third Congressional district. In 1836 the county was assigned three representatives and one senator. The act of February 20, 1841, gave Cook and Lake counties one representative to be chosen from Lake and three representatives to be chosen from Cook. The two counties together were given one senator to be chosen from Cook; elections were to be returned to Chicago. By act of March 1, 1843, the State was divided into seven Congressional districts, Cook county being one of seventeen counties constituting the Fourth district. Each district was entitled to one congressman.

Under the apportionment of 1847 Cook county alone was entitled to one senator and four representatives. The counties of Cook and Lake were made the Twenty-fifth Senatorial district and Cook county alone was made the Fifty-fourth Representative district. In 1847 Cook county was given five delegates to the convention held to revise the State Constitution. Under the census of 1850 Cook county became entitled to nine congressmen and was assigned to the Second Congressional district with the counties of Dupage, Kane, Dekalb, Lee, Whiteside and Rock Island.

The act of February 27, 1854, constituted Cook county the First Senatorial district with one senator. It also constituted the towns of South Chicago, Lyons, Lake, Lemont, Palos, Worth, Orland, Bremen, Thornton, Rich and Bloom the Fifty-sixth Representative district, entitled to two representatives. At the same time the towns of West Chicago, North Chicago, Jefferson, Leyden, Ridgeville, Niles, Maine, Elk Grove, Schaumburg, Hanover, Northfield, Wheeling, Palatine, Barrington, Proviso and New Trier were made the 57th Representative district, entitled to two representatives.

Under the act of January 1, 1861, the following were constituted the Twenty-fourth Senatorial district, the Seventh ward of Chicago, the Eighth ward, the Ninth ward (which three wards constituted the town of North Chicago); the First ward, Second ward, Third ward, Fourth ward and the Precinct of South Chicago (all of which constituted the town of South Chicago), and the towns of Lake, Worth, Thornton and Bloom. The Twenty-fifth Senatorial district consisted of Lake View, Evanston, New Trier, Northfield, Wheeling, Palatine, Barrington, Hanover, Schaumburg, Elk Grove, Maine, Niles, West Chicago, Cicero, Jefferson, Leyden, Proviso, Lyons, Palos, Lemont, Orland, Rich and Bremen. By the same act the following Representative districts were created: The Fifty-ninth with three representatives to consist of the Fifth, Sixth and Tenth wards and the precinct of West Chicago (all of which constituted the town of West Chicago) the towns of Cicero, Jefferson, Leyden, Proviso, Lyons, Palos, Lemont, Orland, Bremen and Rich, the Sixtieth with two representatives to consist of the First, Second, Third and Fourth wards and the precinct of South Chicago (all of which constituted the town of South Chicago), the towns of Lake, Worth, Thornton and Bloom. The Sixty-first with two representatives to consist of the Seventh, Eighth and Ninth wards (which constituted the town of North Chicago), the towns of Lake View, Evanston, New Trier, Northfield, Wheeling, Palatine, Barrington, Hanover, Schaumburg, Elk Grove, Maine and Niles.

"These two tables must not be considered absolutely accurate," said the Democrat of April 4, 1850. Owing to the disappearance of several of the books of account and to the lack of a correct system of keeping receipts and expenditures absolute accuracy, it was stated, could not be expected. The statement "is sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes and in all cases of doubt the balances have been charged against the county, so that the future errors, if any shall be discovered, will inure to the credit side of the county," said the same newspaper. The two tables (1831 to 1840 and 1841 to 1849) were prepared after much labor by Judge Rucker and Dr. Kimberly. The Democrat of April 4, further said: "The people will be gratified to learn that the county debt is so small. The impression heretofore has been that the county was very deeply in debt, and consequently county orders are at a great discount. We should think that this expose of its financial condition would have the effect of bringing the orders up to par, especially when we consider that the amount of outstanding orders does not exceed the amount of the uncollected tax of the current year."

The act of February 2, 1865, made it lawful to levy and collect a tax of not more than 3 per cent. in any one year in all the towns of Cook county except those of North, West and South Chicago; and the revenue thus raised was to be used in paying bounties to volunteers, substitutes and drafted men and such revenue was called "county tax."

Taxes.—The people of Cook county, which includes the city of Chicago, pay in taxes the sum of $39,000 a year, as follows: State and county, $22,000; city, $17,000; of the State and county tax only $7,000 goes to the State, leaving the sum of $15,000 for county purposes, to which add the city tax of $17,000 and we have the sum of $32,000 to govern and take care of the public interests of Cook county for one year. Under such circumstances it is truly wonderful that the people of this county come forward with such unanimity and petition for an increase of taxation to pay interest on the public debt. It shows a virtue and integrity well worthy of intelligent freemen. . . . We are glad to observe that the County Commissioners have begun to curtail expenses by fixing the old clerk and recorder's office into a courthouse, with rooms for the various county offices, so as to save quite a sum which has heretofore annually been paid for rent. . . . Our city taxes are undoubtedly too high, especially when it is considered how little the public are benefited with the $17,000. The interests of the whole people have been wonderfully subserved by the sacrifices which the council have made to Neptune to appease his anger and keep him from taking possession of that magnificent gift of the Government known as the Lake Park. And many people have spoken to us of the impropriety of spending money enough on one schoolhouse to build comfortable ones in all the school districts in the city; and of commencing a system of schoolhouse building which will require an enormous tax for a series of years to come to carry it out, at a time when the State, county, and city are all overwhelmed with debt.—(Chicago Democrat, December 25, 1844).

In April, 1850, Palmyra Township was changed to Somerset; Trenton to Palos; Taylor to Proviso; Monroe to Leyden.

At the first meeting of the Board of Supervisors of Cook county, held on April 30, 1850, at the courthouse, there were present from: North Chicago, George W. Dole; South Chicago, N. H. Bolles; West Chicago, Henry Smith; Bloom, Joseph Holbrook; Bremen, Leonard H. Scott; Jefferson, M. N. Kimball; Lake, Osgood Kimball; Lyons, Samuel Marrs; Niles, Samuel E. Ferris; Northfield, J. E. Kennicott; Monroe, M. L. Dunlap; New Trier, James Hartry; Palmyra, John Kittering; Ridgeville, Edward Murphy; Schaumburg, Daniel H. Johnson; Thornton, Andrew H. Dolton; Worth, Henry Douglass; Wheeling, Stephen M. Salisbury; Elk Grove, Ransom F. Clough; Trenton, M. A. Powell; Palatine, Thomas A. Clark; Orland, William Jackson; Rich, Eli Taylor; Taylor, Stephen Pennoyer; Maine, Curtis Clarke.

The following is from the report of the finance committee of which N. H. Bolles was chairman, on June 6, 1850: "It is well known to the public that for many years past the finances of the county have been in a deranged condition. Your committee deeming their correct administration a matter of great importance to the welfare of the inhabitants of the county, feel called upon to make such suggestions and recommendations as we think if adopted will renovate the credit of the county. Publicity of all accounts allowed by the Board of Supervisors; strict accountability of all county officers; and a perfect system in keeping the accounts of the county, are the great means of securing a faithful administration of the county finances. It is the opinion of your committee that no allowance should be made from the county treasury not clearly authorized by law; that the Board of Supervisors should hereafter settle with the county officers at every regular meeting of the Board; that once a year at least there be published a finance report, giving a full and detailed statement of the revenues, expenses, debts, credits and prosperity of the county to be taken from the books"—(Democrat, June 7, 1850).

"Your committee to ascertain and report to this body the names of all such persons as are supposed to retail ardent spirits in this county without license, would beg leave to report as follows: The supervisors of twenty-nine towns have reported names to the committee in compliance with an order passed at the former meeting of the Board in May last, from which report there appear to be fifty-three persons retailing without license and sixteen with license. Seven of the last named were not reported by any supervisor, making a total of sixty-eight persons retailing spirituous liquors. There are ten supervisors who have not reported to the committee. Your committee would recommend that this Board refuse to grant any more grocery license in the county"—(S. Pennoyer, Chairman of Committee).

Mr. Pennoyer then offered the following resolutions: "Resolved, That the Board reject all applications for licenses to keep groceries." Passed—ayes 16, nays 11, as follows: Ayes—Dole, Smith, Bolles, C. Clarke, T. A. Clark, Clough, Johnson, Devol, Herrick, Douglass, Jackson, Taylor, O. Kimball, Kennicott, Pennoyer, Salisbury and chairman. Noes—M. N. Kimball, Marrs, Kittering, Powell, Holbrook, Dunlap, Scott, Murphy, Hartrey, Ferris and Dolton.

"Board of Supervisors.—This board, composed of some of the most intelligent and best business men in the county met yesterday. We are confident that our board will not suffer in comparison with any other legislative body in the State. And as for dignity, their proceedings are conducted in a manner which is worthy the imitation of some of our larger legislative bodies"—(Democrat, December 3, 1850).

At this meeting S. M. Salisbury was elected temporary chairman. The report of the commissioners to divide the county into townships was approved and ordered to be recorded. The following committees were then appointed: Committee on bills against Cook county—M. L. Dunlap, William Jackson, Curtis Clarke, Nathan H. Bolles and Stephen Pennoyer; Committee on the condition of the county—Henry Smith, George W. Dole and Osgood Kimball; Committee on rules—N. H. Bolles, Samuel Marrs and Martin N. Kimball; Committee on poor and poor asylum—Henry Douglass, Leonard H. Scott and Osgood Kimball; Committee on jail and jail accounts—George W. Dole, J. E. Kennicott and R. F. Clough, E. S. Kimberley was county clerk.

In June, 1850, the county owned a toll bridge on the Calumet and employed a tender to care for the same. At this time Hiram Squier was warden of the poor house; he and his wife were paid for their services $350 per year.

In 1849-50 the expenses of the Chicago postoffice amounted to $12,488; the proceeds were $1,795. The expenses of all postoffices in the county outside of Chicago were $561 and the proceeds were $730. At this date there were twenty-eight postoffices in the county outside of Chicago, and of all seventeen were comparatively new.

In July, 1850, the Supreme Court sitting at Ottawa decided that the old Cook County court had jurisdiction over the affairs of each county until the new Township Organization System had been adopted and put into effect by a "majority of all the legal voters of said county." In November, 1850, N. H. Bolles was chairman of the County Board.

In June, 1850, the County Board determined to unite with the Common Council of Chicago in a petition to the Legislature to annul the criminal code so that a workhouse could be brought into requisition. The Board also concluded to accept the offer of the city to erect a public building on Block 39.

The commissioners who divided Cook county into towns in 1850, were W. L. Church, S. Rexford and M. Winchell. At the June session, 1850, the following resolution was passed: "Resolved, That the County of Cook is hereby organized into election precincts for the general elections, in accordance with the present town organization, provided that the three towns of Chicago shall each be entitled to have two or more places designated for holding elections, as follows: North Chicago two places, West Chicago two places, and South Chicago three places."

In December, 1850, it was announced that the County Board had concluded to sell half of the public square in order to raise means with which to erect the necessary county buildings. The Democrat, Journal and Western Citizen opposed the plan. The Democrat said: "The City of Chicago is represented on the Board by but three supervisors while at the same time in population it is two-thirds of the whole county;" it was therefore argued that the decision was unfair because Chicago was not properly represented on the Board.

In 1850 it was estimated that the quantity of swamp land in the Chicago drainage district was 367,485 acres. In December, 1850, the County Board petitioned the Legislature for a law to authorize them to borrow $10,000 with which to build a new court house. At this time a committee of the County Board was appointed to sell a part of Block 39, Original Town.

In December, 1850, it was ordered that county obligations to the amount of $50 should be issued in $5 orders; from $50 to $200 in $10 orders; and over $200 in $20 orders.

"During the last ten years we have had all sorts of men for sheriffs and also all sorts of men for County Commissioners, yet there has been an evil genius in our county affairs somewhere. We call the attention of the people of Cook county to the fact that our orders are now the lowest, and yet we are the richest county in the State. We have had no expenses for public buildings and there has been nothing to warrant the existing state of things. Our Cook county orders are where they were about ten years ago, and some reform seems absolutely necessary."—(Daily Democrat.)

For the fiscal year 1850-51 the total amount of orders issued was $26,487. Previously there were outstanding orders to the amount of $19,478, making a total indebtedness of nearly $46,000. Of this amount over $35,000 in orders had been taken up and cancelled leaving outstanding about $11,000 in orders. The whole amount of liberalities of the county in March, 1851, was about $20,000. The assets of the county were as follows: Block 39, Original Town, valued at $50,000; poorhouse and farm $2,700; live stock on the poor farm $310; fees to be collected $992; taxes of 1851 not yet collected $10,000. Total $64,000. The net balance in favor of the county was $45,000.

"Cook County Wealth.—In 1839 the value of real and personal property in Cook county was $1,829,420. In 1849 the value of real estate was $5,733,760; personal property $1,833,342; total $7,617,102. The revenue and special State tax in 1839 was $3,658.84; the net amount of State tax $3,408.64. In 1849 the revenue and special State tax was $44,190.08; the net amount of State tax $41,896.23. The interest of school fund in 1839 was $1,326.89; in 1849 it was $1,442.60"—(Democrat, February 12, 1851).

In 1850-51 the County Board desired to purchase a new poor farm and to exchange the present one on the South Side several miles below the city for the same so far as it would apply. In 1850-51 when it seemed probable that the county would succeed in obtaining a new law authorizing them to sell a portion of the public square, the city took immediate action and sent a representative to Springfield to prevent the passage of such a bill. In February, 1851, the Legislature passed a law permitting counties to vote themselves back from the new Township Organization system to the old County court system. A law about this time gave Chicago an additional supervisor for each ward. This was demanded in order that the city might have proportionate representation on the County Board.

The County Board advertised for sale a portion of the public square and was duly served by the city with an injunction to prevent such a sale. It should be said to the credit of the county perhaps that in early times the greatest item of county expense was in behalf of the poor. On March 14, 1851, the County Board appointed a committee consisting of A. K. Swift, George W. Dole and N. H. Bolles to negotiate a loan of $30,000 with which to build a jail, etc.

In November, 1850, the following assessments were made: Barrington, $83.96; Palatine, $113.37; Wheeling, $600; Northfield, $98.50; New Trier, $150; Hanover, $50; Schaumburg, $138.15; Elk Grove, $225; Maine, $125; Niles, $150.50; Ridgeville, $200; Leyden, $81.13; Jefferson, $350; Proviso, $62.06; West Chicago, $300; Lyons, $18.13; Lake, $200; Lemont, $23.13; Worth, $175; Orland, $95.63; Bremen, $200; Thornton, $51.50; Bloom, $73.56.

It seems that the new Township Organization law conflicted with the previous one as follows: That the County court under the old law should attend to county business and that the County Supervisors under the new law should also attend to county business. This was corrected by a special law.

"Two systems of county organization are now in use in this State—one called the 'County Court System,' where the county business is transacted by a judge and two associate justices. The other is called the 'Township System' and conducted by a Board of Supervisors. Under the first we collect three taxes: The State tax and the county tax, in which is included the residue of road taxes not collected by the supervisors of roads before the first of January, and the tax for school purposes as levied by the several school districts. In giving a receipt for these several taxes it is necessary for the collector to give the amount of each tax, to-wit: State, County, Road and School; and as these taxes are levied for different purposes, it is necessary to place them in separate columns. Under the town system other taxes for special purposes are required. These all come under the head of town tax. The auditor in his form of tax rolls first enumerates State and county tax on real estate, and then repeats in separate columns State and County tax on personal property. This is all plain, but an unnecessary repetition and when other taxes are to be extended on the same page rather inconvenient, yet the objection to the unfinished books did not arise from this cause as it was only objectionable from inconvenience. The objection was from the fact of the clerk's mixing up with the county tax, the town, school and road tax making it a perfect hotch potch. It was to correct this that the new books became necessary. The Board very properly came to the conclusion to dictate a form which would be concise and easily understood; they rejected the bungling repetition of the auditor and also separated the total of real and personal tax for obvious reasons. As the rolls now are, we have State, county, town, road, and school tax"—(Democrat, January, 1851).

"Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the propriety of the measures of the Board of Supervisors during the year, all accord them the credit of having labored faithfully and honestly for the public good and of having brought a good share of talent and sterling good sense to bear upon the complicated affairs of the county, for it was no small matter to entirely revolutionize the whole method of doing business from the old system to the new"—(Democrat, March 14, 1851).

"Cook county pays one-thirteenth of all the State taxes of Illinois. If the population of the State was 500,000 and we were taxed according to population, this would all be proper; but as it now is this tax is too much by three-fifths. It was this condition of things that gave rise to the following resolution of Colonel Filkins of Wheeling: 'Resolved, That the Supervisors of the several towns in Cook county use their influence with the Assessors of the several towns to equalize the valuation of the property in proportion to the other counties of the State'."—(Democrat, May 3, 1851.) The County Board adopted the following resolutions, December 11, 1850:

"Resolved, That in the erection of jail and workhouse, the county pay three-fourths, and the city one-fourth of the expense of the construction and maintenance of such a building, and that the said building shall be under the joint control and management of the Board of Supervisors and the Common Council, under the following restrictions, to-wit: In proportion to their respective interests or as three to one."

"Resolved, That, inasmuch as Block No. 39 in the original town of Chicago was conveyed to the County of Cook to aid in the expense of erecting proper buildings for the use of the county, which expense will be greater than ought to be borne by the tax payers of the county, it is the duty of this board to provide for the sale of such portion of said block as may be necessary for that purpose."

"Resolved, That Supervisors Bolles, N. M. Kimball and Penoyer be the agents of the county to prepare a plan for a courthouse and jail; that they contract for and build said courthouse on the south side of block 39; that they be empowered to purchase a suitable lot or lots for the building of a jail; and that they contract for the erection of the same as soon as the money can be obtained for the sale of the north half of block 39. The jail to be first constructed out of the proceeds of the sale of lots or otherwise."—(Democrat, December, 1850.)

A large public meeting was held on Monday, May 31, 1851, for the purpose of arriving at some definite conclusion, if possible, regarding the public buildings about to be erected. A number favored the location of all the proposed buildings on the public square; others wanted them located in the square south of the public square—such land to be bought; still others wanted the courthouse located on the public square and the jail somewhere else. The whole matter was finally referred for permanent settlement to the following committee: Doctor Boone, ex-Mayor Woodworth, Dr. Daniel Brainard, William Jones and Dr. Evans. The meeting then adjourned to reassemble later to hear the report of the committee. The report favored the construction of the courthouse on the public square and the jail on a lot to be bought in the suburbs, and was adopted by a great majority of those present. In the end the authorities decided to build the courthouse of stone if the cost did not exceed $20,000, otherwise of brick. Another $20,000, making in all $50,000 for public buildings, was appropriated by the County Board for the proposed public buildings. The city appropriated $15,000 for a city hall in the new courthouse.

The act of February 17, 1851, provided for the appointment by the Circuit court of Cook county of "three competent and discreet persons residing in Chicago to be port wardens of said county." It was made their duty to examine the condition of vessels, the condition of cargoes, estimate damages in case of wrecks, and to keep a record of their acts.

At the spring meeting of the Board of Supervisors in 1852 the following was the condition of county affairs: There had been borrowed $20,000 in 10 per cent coupon bonds, payable in New York and Boston; the poorhouse was in good condition; an examination of the poorfarm had been ordered; the agents of the county were authorized to draw on Chicago for its proportion due for the use of the new county building; claims against the towns of the county were presented and audited; the Board met in the City Council rooms; the new poorfarm selected was a tract of eighty acres located on the Northwestern plank road and had cost $1,200; Judge Dickey was consulted as to the legality of the steps necessary to be taken to vote for or against the Township Organization law; it was noted that country towns with 300 population had as much to say about governmental affairs as 3,000 persons in some parts of Chicago; as the new Board had the power to levy and collect county taxes they could, if they choose, be unfair; there were noted several minor defects in the Township Organization law; the chief complaint of the city and the county at this time was on account of "the unequal and therefore unjust system of taxation and representation."

"Much of Cook county is still unsettled for the want of good roads, and liberal appropriations now will return themselves in a very few years by the enhanced value of real estate and the new improvements. For instance, take the country between Bridgeport and Summit, on the old Archer road. The old thoroughfare is now entirely deserted for the want of road improvements, when it contains some of the richest lands in Illinois and has every other inducement to make people settle upon it. In making appropriations for roads the County Supervisors should look at facilitating the settlement of the country and the increase of the taxable property as well as at the convenience of existing settlements. Nothing is lost by liberal appropriations for roads and bridges."—(Democrat, May 25, 1852.)

The act of February 11, 1851, authorized the supervisors of Cook county to borrow not to exceed $50,000 on the faith and pledge of the county, and to issue therefor bonds or scrip under the county seal. It was provided that not over $5,000 of the sum thus borrowed should fall due in any one year, and that the money should be spent to pay county debts, to purchase a lot for a jail, to build the same. The County Board was authorized to levy and collect a special tax sufficient to pay the interest on the sum borrowed and to retire the principal.

It was argued that both Democrats and Whigs depended upon the county, which held the balance of power in all politics, even when there was not a man from the country upon the regular county tickets.

"Shall we now, in view of all this, stop the country from electing its own officers, from being heard at the County Board about its own roads and about its own rights in general? Shall we inflict such a wrong, such an outrage, upon the country, that they nevermore will support men from the city? . . . People in the country will never support a party opposed to Township Organization. . . . Will you thus pursue a policy that will reduce the value of country real estate 25 per cent? We look upon it that the defeat of Township Organization now would retard the settlement of Cook county and all its religious, educational and social advantages ten years at least. . . . Our citizens this day should be liberal—should be just to the country and vote for Township Organization."—(Democrat, April 6, 1852.)

On March 5, 1852, the Board of Supervisors met at the court-house "to take into consideration the propriety of continuing the system of Township Organization." Charles McDonnell was made chairman and E. Everett secretary. Speeches covering every feature of the subject were delivered by Messrs. Davis, Bolles, Bond, Jackson, Dolton, Coleby, Marrs, Filkins and DeWolf. The following resolutions were adopted:

"WHEREAS, The question of Township Organization, for or against, is again to be submitted to the voters of Cook county in their several towns at the annual election; therefore,

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting Township Organization is the most republican and the best system of county government.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting there are many defects in the present law of Township Organization, to which the attention of our next Legislature should be particularly called.

"Resolved, That we pledge ourselves individually to vote for and support Township Organization and to use all honorable means to spread throughout the several towns which we represent every information in our power on the subject."—(Democrat, March 22, 1852.)

"When a county government is to be organized for the transaction of county business, in a county where three-quarters of the population reside in one city and three-quarters of the county tax is paid in that city, is it not right, is it not necessary, in order to secure harmonious action, that the preponderance in the County Board (which levies and expends all the county taxes) should be secured to the inhabitants of that city? The number of members of the County Board should not be increased. The number is already too great and should be decreased, yet be so apportioned in supervisors' districts as to approximate more to the principle of equal representation."—(Letter in Democrat, March 31, 1852.)

"The prosperity of our city is greatly identified with that of Cook county, which after all is but a suburb of our city. Now, while our municipal government may be sufficient for us, what becomes of the rest of the county when the Township Organization is abolished? How are the towns left? What is to be their boundary? Who is to take charge of the county roads? What becomes of the town schools? Who are to act as justices and constables? Justice to the country requires that Township Organization should continue. The country has never been jealous of city influence. . . . Chicago now has the United States Senator; has had the member of Congress for eight of the last ten years; has always had the State senator; has had for the last four years both representatives and, except two terms, has always had them; has, and we believe has always had, the sheriff; has the judges of the Circuit and of the Common Pleas courts; has the clerks of both of these courts; has the judge of probate and the county clerk; has the county treasurer; has the coroner. Now as an offset to all this what has Cook county out of the city got? Will some one opposed to Township Organization tell us?"—(Democrat, April 6, 1852.)

Cook county census, 1850: Dwellings, 7,674; families, 7,755; white males, 23,480; white females, 19,519; colored males, 224; colored females, 162; total population, 43,385; farms, 1,857; manufacturing establishments, 227.

In April, 1851, Francis C. Sherman was president of the County Board of Supervisors. In 1851 the Supreme Court decided that the several counties of the State, and not the separate towns, should take care of their paupers. The county tax of October, 1851, was 40 cents on the $100. Of this tax 7½ cents were to pay interest on loans and 32½ cents were to be used for county purposes.

In October, 1851, there was much complaint because it was claimed that there were only three good roads leading south from Chicago, and one of these ran along the lake shore. Next to the west was the Southern plank road to Kyle's tavern, extending ten miles from the city; and still farther west was the road leading to Lockport via the Summit. The latter was in very bad condition. To the north and west there were eight or ten excellent roads. The Democrat of October, 1851, said: "Cook county jail has become so rotten that it requires a regiment of soldiers to keep the prisoners within its walls." In September, 1851, the County Board, pursuant to the act of February 11, 1851, advertised for sale $20,000 worth of county bonds.

In 1850 the tax for county purposes was 40 cents on the $100 and for state purposes 58 cents on the $100; total, 98 cents on each $100.

The act of June 15, 1852, authorized the commissioners of Cook county to borrow on the credit of the county an additional sum of money not exceeding $60,000, and to issue bond or scrip therefor under the seal of the County court. Of the amount thus to be borrowed, not to exceed $5,000 was to be repaid in any one year. The money was to be used for the benefit of the county "either in the erection, purchase or improvement of public buildings in and for said county" or for other county purposes approved by the Board. The revenues of the county were pledged for the payment of the loan, and a special tax was authorized to meet the obligation.

In 1852 the total value of property in Cook county was reported at $11,945,593 and in 1853 at $21,648,442. The total tax received in 1852, exclusive of the interest on school fund, was $65,806.07. The revenue and special state tax in 1852 was $72,963.30 and in 1853 was $108,532.12.

In 1852 the most of the land outside of Chicago was assessed at from $3 to $5 per acre. It was argued that with good roads the same land would be worth from $20 to $25 per acre. This fact caused the County Commissioners residing in Chicago to strongly favor every movement to secure good roads. Particularly as this date Archer road was extremely bad. At this time West Chicago was building a bridge at Bridgeport and opening a road to the same. South Chicago had planked its main street to the city limits, had macadamized the same to the bridge and then had turnpiked the same to the town line. It was argued that unless the other towns continued the work on to the Summit no good would result. At this date, also, South Chicago, Lake and Lyons determined to unite to improve the condition of Archer road. The County Board at every session made heavy appropriations for roads and bridges in the several towns. It was at this time, also, that the first great advancement in drainage was being carried into effect. It was no uncommon event for the County Board to appropriate at one session from $1,000 to $5,000 for the improvement of roads. The Cook County Drainage Commissioners, with office at 76 State street, advertised in September, 1852, for drainage plans, with the design of digging ditches in many parts of the county. Particularly was the attention of the drainage trustees directed to the West Side.

In September, 1852, the County Board ordered the public square cleared of all incumbrances and inclosed with an iron fence. In January, 1853, the county offices were removed to the new courthouse.

The following is from the Democratic Press of February 8, 1853: "The new court room undoubtedly is the best of the kind west of the Alleghenies, and we believe equal to any used for a similar purpose in our country. It was opened yesterday for the accommodation of the Court of Common Pleas; Judges Dickey and Skinner."

An act of February 10, 1853, was for the relief of James Lang, late treasurer of Cook county. Under instruction from the state auditor he had advertised the delinquent tax list of lands in June, 1851, and had petitioned the County court in July of the same year to sell the same, but the latter refused to grant such authority until September, whereby the treasurer was compelled to advertise again, which he did at his own expense. This act was for his relief, $108.

An act of February 12, 1853, made it unlawful to kill deer, fawn, prairie hen or chicken, quail, woodcock or wood partridge in Cook county between January 1 and July 20 of each year.

On April 30, 1853, the following committee was appointed by the Cook County Assessors to fix a uniform ratio of taxation throughout the county: D. Bishop, Northfield; J. Gray, Rich; William Scoville, Wheeling; R. F. Clough, Elk Grove; and D. S. Hammond, Hanover.

In December, 1853, the Cook County Commissioners passed a resolution requesting the Governor to call an extra session of the Legislature to consider that Cook county was entitled to double its representation in both House and Senate.

By November, 1854, the new Cook county poorhouse, located nine miles northwest of Chicago, was nearly finished. The building was of brick, three stories and basement high, cost about $25,000, and was located in the town of Jefferson. Upon the opening of this poorhouse the ladies of that vicinity thought best to give a house warming, on which occasion feasting and dancing were enjoyed. This act was regarded as very odd and was laughed at by the county newspapers. Connected with the poorhouse was a two-story wing and basement for the insane poor. The old poorhouse was situated about four miles south of the city.

On June 4, 1855, a severe frost fell in all parts of Cook county; water froze, and when the sun came up the moisture on the leaves melted and, running down, formed little icicles several inches long. However, the frost was superficial, and aside from checking vegetation no serious damage was done.

The act of February 12, 1855, constituted Charles E. Peck, William H. Garland and Jacob C. Bloom commissioners to lay and superintend the construction of a ditch or ditches throughout the whole length of the wet lands in Townships 42, 43, 44 and 45 north, Ranges 12 and 13 east, in Cook and Lake counties, and extending same to Lake Michigan. They could determine the number and size of the ditches, could take private property by condemnation proceedings, could assess all costs to the lands benefited, and could employ engineers and surveyors. The assessments were to be a lien on the land. The name of the corporation was "The Cook and Lake County Drainage Company."

In 1855 the county tax levy was 33 cents on each $100. The county liquor license was reduced from $100 to $50. The county census of 1855 gave Cook county a population of 103,960. The number of schools in the county was 162. There were 8,180 pupils. During the fifties each County Supervisor received annually $900 for his services. The county attorney was paid $500; the county poor warden $600, and the two county physicians each $400.

In July, 1856, the County Board duly considered the question of building a new lunatic asylum.

In August, 1857, the Cook County Agricultural and Horticultural society was organized by a large number of citizens, among whom were Messrs. Blaney, Kennicott, Reilly, Benson, Miner, Hurd, Brooks and others. The grounds of the society were located one mile north of the river, on the property of W. B. Ogden, and embraced a tract of twelve acres. The first exhibit during the fall of 1857 was entirely creditable. The society had a Fine Arts hall, an Agricultural hall, Mechanics' hall, Floral hall, and a large reception tent. The exhibit was much better than had been expected.

Property owned by Cook county: Block 39, Old Town of Chicago; 13-18 of improvement in Block 39; poor farm in Jefferson; old poor farm in Lake.

The act of February, 1857, provided that the Cook County Court of Common Pleas within six months should appoint three commissioners to select and survey a tract of not less than 100 acres nor more than 300 acres for a public park. The land selected was to be south of Twelfth street, west of Michigan avenue and east of Stewart avenue. In April, 1857, a new engine for the Chicago waterworks was installed. The stroke of the piston was ten feet and the diameter of the cylinder was sixty inches. The entire weight of the engine was 40,000 pounds. It was regarded as a wonder. In the spring of 1857, almost for the first time in considerable quantity, the newspapers began to issue supplements. At this time J. D. Graham, major of topographical engineers, fixed the longitude of Chicago at 5 hours, 50 minutes and 31.16 seconds west of Greenwich. In 1857 important repairs to the new courthouse were considered by the County Board. In September, 1857, R. R. Hill was the shorthand reporter of the courts of Chicago. In 1856 and thereafter considerable quantity of Nicholson pavement was laid on the streets of Chicago.

In 1858 there was distributed to Cook county interest on the school fund, $3,244, and on the school tax fund, $35,694.15; total, $38,938.15. In 1858 the value of personal property in Cook county was fixed at $6,718,826, railroad property $2,058,353, lands $5,536,378, total $44,313,557; moneys and credits 1,482,386, goods and merchandise $2,740,097. It was decided throughout the county that on March 30, 1858, all towns should hold their annual meetings for the purpose of settling their debts and making contracts for bridges, schoolhouses, salaries of officers, etc. In 1858 Homer Wilmarth was president of the County Board.

In 1857 the committee on country relations of the Common Council of Chicago made an investigation of the sessions, wages, etc., of the County Supervisors and learned that they had paid themselves more than was due them under the law at $1.50 a day. It was shown that they had charged considerable extra time. During the spring session of 1856 it was shown that while $553.50 was really due them, they had actually drawn $1,483; that at their July session, 1856, they had been paid $719 when only $171.50 was due them; that at the September session of 1856 they had been paid $1,647 when only $360 was due them; that at the December session, 1856, they had been paid $1,379 when only $300 was due them. The report showed that for 1857 the same over pay had been charged. It was thus shown that during 1856 and the March session of 1857 they had drawn a total of $6,667 when the actual amount due them was only $1,860, or 1,240 days at $1.50 per day. In their report the committee used the following language: "A state of facts like this would seem to require no comment at the hands of your committee. So far as the record goes to show there has been a plain and palpable violation of the statutes on the part of the Board of Supervisors in voting themselves a compensation to which they were not legally entitled." The committee recommended that the entire matter should be brought to the attention of the Grand Jury.

The report of the poor warden showed that for the quarter ending February 28, 1859, there had been 616 persons admitted to the poorhouse. The law of 1859 required that township collectors should settle annually with the county treasurer on March 1 instead of March 15, as was the case in other counties. In September, 1859, the committee on equalization of taxes of the County Board reported "a great discrepancy in the valuation of real estate by the assessors of the different towns of the county." The Board proceeded to correct the discrepancy.

In 1860 A. G. Throop was chairman of the County Board. At this time there were reported in the county 3,498 improved farms. The population of Chicago was 109,420 and of Cook county outside of Chicago 36,159.

At the session of the County Board in December, 1861, the following resolution was proposed: "Resolved, That the delegates from this county to the Constitutional convention to meet in January next be requested to inquire into the expediency of reducing the city and county governments into one and to incorporate the same under the title of 'The City and County of Chicago.'" This resolution failed to carry. At this time also the County Board passed a resolution favoring an immediate enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal upon the urgent grounds that military necessity required the early completion of that means of inter-communication.

In September, 1861, John A. Washington was killed in Virginia. He left three pieces of real estate in Cook county valued at nearly $30,000. This land was in Sections 11 and 21 in Township 39, Range 13, and Section 32, Township 39 and Range 14. He left seven children.

For the year 1861-62 a tax of 40 cents on the $100 was levied by the County Board.

In 1861 the following tax was levied in the different towns of the county: Northfield, $496; Bremen, $3,000; Barrington, $350; Palos, $120; New Trier, $524; West Chicago, $2,500; Richmond, $269; Jefferson, $1,641; Maine, $6,425; Lake, $6,500; South Chicago, $1,000; Proviso, $164; Leyden, $494; Hanover, $325; Orland, $256; Lyons, $472; Bloom, $535; Thornton, $562; Palatine, $6,118; Schaumberg, $427; Leavitt, $6,277; North Chicago, $1,600.

By a vote of twenty-five ayes to thirteen nays the County Board decided to allow tea, coffee and sugar to the paupers. This had been objected to as an unnecessary luxury. Early in 1862 the county clerk, in response to a resolution of the Constitutional convention asking for an exhibit showing the annual expense of the Board of Supervisors for the last five years, made the following report: That there were thirty towns in the county, three of which allowed assistant supervisors; that there were ten ward supervisors, there being one from each ward of the city; total supervisors in the county, forty-three; that there were four sessions of the Board annually of from five to six days each; that the expenses of the Board for a series of years were as follows: 1857, $3,562; 1860, $3,067; 1861, $3,180; that the Board had been in session as follows: 1857, for thirty-one days with forty-one members; 1858, for seventeen days with forty-two members; 1859, for twenty-seven days with forty-two members; 1860, for twenty-one days with forty-two members; 1861, for twenty-seven days with forty-three members; average number of members each year, forty-two; thus aggregating 5,040 days in five years for one supervisor at $2 per day, making a total legitimate expense at $10,080 and leaving a balance for committee, mileage, etc., of $66.39. This report was signed by Laurin P. Hilliard, county clerk. In March, 1862, a petition, numerously signed, for the division of the town of Worth, was presented to the County Board; also one as numerously signed remonstrating against such a division was presented.

In March, 1862, the citizens of Lyons and Palos towns petitioned the County Board to construct a bridge, at a cost of about $1,000, across the Des Plaines river at Willow Springs.

Concerning the reapportionment just completed by the Legislature at Springfield, the Tribune of March 7, 1862, said: "The foul deed is done, and in part by the aid of the Democrats elected by Republicans on Union tickets. The scoundrelly cutting and carving of Cook county is the work of Fuller, assisted by a pack of Secessionists. Wards are divided, election precincts are slashed into halves and quarters."

In 1862 the citizens of Lake and Worth petitioned for a new town to be called Hope, to be taken from the east half of Worth and that part of Lake lying in Township 37, Range 15. At this time, also, the towns of Worth, Thornton and Bremen petitioned for a bridge across the Calumet river and the same was recommended by the County Board.

In June, 1862, a petition from the voters and taxpayers of the town of Palos asked the County Board to reverse the vote taken at the town election for releasing the bail of Patrick Donahoe, absconding collector, for the following reasons: First, because the present supervisor had not called a special election on the petition of twelve legal voters; second, that there was no notice given of such a vote being taken; third, there was kept tapped a barrel of whisky, which served to keep all the non-taxpayers present ready to vote—it was also true of non-residents, boys, etc.; fourth, the vote was taken by dividing the house at near noon, the motion being put by one of the clerks of the Board.

At the June session, 1862, strong effort to abolish the dog tax was made by nearly every town in the county. After an elaborate and amusing debate the whole question was tabled. Mr. Dolton said that the dogs in his town had nothing to do but tear off cows' tails and bite sheep. Mr. Satroop expressed the opinion that if the dogs paid the tax they should be allowed to indulge in such little amusement.

In September, 1862, the towns of Lyons and Lake petitioned that a new town should be stricken from their boundaries, and the judiciary committee of the County Board recommended that the petition be granted.

Early in 1862 Dr. Aaron Gibbs was chairman of the County Board, but in December, 1862, J. M. Allen of Elk Grove was elected to that office. At this time the Board had thirteen standing committees, those of education, war, and license having just been added. An important new committee was one on the equalization of taxes. In December, 1862, the personal property of the county was assessed at $7,920,139, the realty at $26,568,141, and the number of acres under cultivation was reported at 103,770.

The Sherman house, which had first been erected as the City hotel by F. C. Sherman in 1837, was rebuilt in 1860-61.

Early in the Civil War a dog tax was levied throughout Cook county. Many of the towns wholly disregarded the law, and accordingly the tax in many instances became delinquent. The collection of this tax was assigned to the commissioners of highways to be collected in each town district by the overseers of highways, and was to be expended in accordance with the ordinance of the County Board. In May, 1862, the County Board voted twenty-two ayes to sixteen nays to allow the county judge a salary of $2,000 in addition to the $3 per day he was already drawing.

In May, 1862, the residents of Lake and Lyons sent a petition to the County Board praying that a new town might be organized from the west side of Lake and the east side of Lyons. The new town was designed to embrace the east half of Congressional Township 38, Range 13 (Lake), and the west half of Congressional Township 38, Range 13 (Lyons), thus including all of Congressional Township 38, Range 13. At this time the committee on judiciary of the County Board reported in favor of dividing the town of Worth and constituting a new town to be named Hope. In May, 1862, Supervisor Dolton offered the following resolution: "Resolved, That that portion of Sections 5, 6 and 8 in fractional Township 36, Range 15; heretofore lying in the town of Lake, become a part of the town of Thornton."

In June, 1862, a motion to appoint a standing committee on schools for the County Board was laid on the table. In June, 1862, a motion to call the new town of Hope by the name of Calumet was amended so that it should be called Sigel. The amendment was lost, but the original motion changing the name to Calumet was carried.

The Cook county poorhouse in the town of Jefferson, about ten miles from the city limits, was reported in good condition in November, 1862. Benjamin Chase had been in charge for three years. In May, 1862, there were 203 inmates, and in December 180. On December 1 there were fifty patients in the hospital and thirty-six insane. The farm consisted of 200 acres. On the farm were six horses, nine cows and five yearlings. The products for 1862 were 1,000 bushels of potatoes, 100 bushels of onions, sixty bushels of navy beans, 900 bushels of beets, flax to make 200 yards of cloth, hay, corn, oats, etc.

The act of February 21, 1863, authorized the Board of Supervisors of Cook county to issue and sell bonds, but not to exceed $150,000, for the purpose of meeting extra war expenses.

The dog tax ordinance was referred to the committee on poorhouse and paupers of the County Board. An attempt to annul the tax was lost; then an effort to reduce the license from $2 to $1 was made. That was also lost. Finally the following humorous amendment was offered: "Resolved, That this ordinance shall not apply to 'yaller dorgs' with straps around their necks and their tails cut off not over half an inch, inch, inch and a half or two inches long, and not less than half a mile, mile, mile and a half, or two miles from home." The latter failed to pass.

In March, 1863, the County Board appropriated $500 to improve Archer road in the town of Lake, and $300 to improve the same road in the town of Lemont. Both Lake and Lemont made supplemental appropriations for the same purpose.

In December, 1863, the bonded debt of Cook county amounted to $163,000; but there had been already appropriated, though not issued, for war purposes $250,000 in bonds. In 1863 the number of acres of wheat in Cook county was 30,587; acres of corn, 30,275; number of dogs, 4,388; hogs, 16,997; sheep, 10,144; cattle, 45,571; horses, 14,411.

The Chicago Historical Society collected considerable valuable statistics concerning Cook county in 1862-63. Of all the towns in the county Barrington led with 1,440 acres in fruit trees. Schaumburg had the least—only 40 acres.

In 1863 a petition from the citizens of Thornton asked the County Board to release Messrs. Caldwell and Johnson, two men on the bond of Dr. A. J. Richards, defaulting collector of that town, from the effect of a judgment of $1,900 and costs obtained against them by the county. They requested this action owing to the fact that Caldwell and Johnson had been to great expense to secure the arrest and conviction of the said Richards.

In March, 1864, the County Board authorized a wolf bounty of $5. Just before this Supervisor Kingsley of Barrington had paid $36 for twelve wolf scalps. In March, 1864, the Board passed a resolution extolling President Lincoln's administration and favoring his renomination for the Presidency. Thirty-seven voted for this resolution and eight against it. During two years ending August 31, 1864, Cook county paid internal revenue as follows: $5,127,749.

In December, 1864, Cook county scrip was rated at from 93 to 95 cents on the $1. In January, 1865, Cook county bonds sold at from 95 cents to 97 on the $1. In December, 1864, A. B. Johnson of the Eleventh Ward was elected by acclamation chairman of the County Board.

December 31, 1864, Cook county's debt was $774,000; but during 1865 the county paid $2,100,000 in bounties. This was war scrip with interest at 10 per cent. per annum. It was afterward refunded into long time bonds bearing 7 per cent.

In February, 1865, Cook county bonds sold as low as 73 cents on the $1. This was near the close of the war, when a considerable quantity of new bonds were thrown on the market. Within a month the price rose to about 85 cents on the $1. One reason for the fall in value of the county bonds was because unprincipled brokers circulated the report that their issue was unauthorized.

The act of February 2, 1865, authorized the Board of Supervisors of Cook county to issue and sell bonds from time to time as the same should be required, in any sum not exceeding one million dollars, to be applied to the payment of certain county orders or certificates issued and to be issued for bounties to soldiers and in aid of soldiers' families; but by act of February 15, 1865, the issue was increased to one million five hundred thousand dollars.

In February, 1865, the Legislature authorized the issue of bonds to take up the Cook county scrip or orders and further authorized the levy of a tax to retire the bonds.

BIOGRAPHY AND REMINISCENCES

DR. CHARLES ADAMS, a resident of Chicago since 1861, has achieved distinction as a surgeon and is a recognized authority in that particular branch of the medical profession. Born at Wellingborough, England, May 29, 1847, he is a son of John and Elizabeth (Clarke) Adams. In early youth he attended the schools of his native town, and at the age of ten years came with his parents to America, and resided at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where he continued his primary education. In 1861 the family moved to Chicago, where the father was engaged in the live stock commission business until his death in 1889. The mother died in 1893.

Upon coming to Chicago Dr. Charles Adams attended the Moseley school for a time, but early become a bookkeeper in his father's establishment. He read medicine under the tutelage of Dr. J. S. Mitchell and in 1869 entered the Hahnemann Medical college, from which he was graduated in 1872. The succeeding year he was house surgeon at Scammon Hospital, but better to equip himself in his chosen profession took a special course in surgery in the hospitals of London, England, in 1873. From that time until 1896, Dr. Adams was engaged in the general practice of medicine in Chicago, but the increased demand for his services as a surgeon led to his adoption of that line as a specialty and to that he has since confined his attention exclusively. In 1898 the degree of M. D. ad eundem gradum was conferred upon him by Rush Medical college.

From 1873 to 1875 he was professor of surgical pathology in Hahnemann Medical college, and from 1875 to 1884 was professor of the principles and practice of surgery in the Chicago Homeopathic Medical college. He is now consulting surgeon to the Chicago Nursery and Half Orphan asylum, and the Evanston, the Passavant and the St. Joseph's hospitals. Dr. Adams is a member of the American Medical association, the Chicago Surgical society, the Association of Military Surgeons of the United States and the Association of Military Surgeons of the State of Illinois, of the Illinois and Chicago Medical societies, has been a member of the Chicago Academy of Sciences since 1869, and is a fellow of the Royal Microscopical society of London, England. In 1882 he became assistant surgeon of the First Regiment, Illinois National Guard, of which, one year later and for eighteen years he was surgeon.

Upon the request of Dr. Nicholas Senn, surgeon general, he became his secretary and since Dr. Senn's death continued serving as secretary until October 9, 1908, when he was appointed surgeon general, Ill. N. G. In 1898 he was commissioned major and brigade surgeon of United States volunteers, serving as such during the war with Spain at Chickamauga and Montauk Point. Dr. Adams belongs to the Chicago Literary, the Caxton, the Onwentsia and the Saddle and Cycle clubs. In 1875 he married Mary, daughter of Thomas S. Curtis, of Wellingborough, England, who died in 1888 leaving one son, Cuthbert C. In 1889, he married Mrs. Elizabeth Gaylord, daughter of William H. Mitchell and widow of Henry Gaylord.

Alonzo Franklin Allen was born in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, on May 25, 1872, a son of Orrin F. and Mary O. (Hendry) Allen. He was graduated from the Belle Plain, Iowa, high school in 1887. In August of the same year he entered the service of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway company at Belle Plain, where he remained until June 1, 1890. He became an employe of the Illinois Steel company at the date last mentioned and on January 1, 1899, attached himself to the interests of the American Steel and Wire company. He was elected assistant treasurer of that corporation in April, 1900, assistant treasurer and assistant secretary in 1901, and has held the office of secretary and assistant treasurer since May 6, 1901. He is also secretary and treasurer of the Columbia Wire company, in which he is a director. Politically he affiliates with the Republican party. He is a member of the Congregational church and of the Union League club. He was married in Chicago on October 15, 1896, to Ida May Mershom and they are the parents of the following named children: Franklin Hendry and Lucile May.

Oscar D. Allen, son of Harvey Allen, a farmer and merchant, was born in Jefferson county, New York, June 1, 1833, was reared on his father's farm and obtained his education in public schools near his home and at Union Academy, Bellville, New York. When he was sixteen years old he became a clerk in his father's store. He bought that enterprise when he was about twenty-one and managed it until 1863, when he was compelled to sell it because of failing health. In 1866 he began merchandising at Adams, New York, where he lived until December, 1882, when he came to Chicago, locating at 432 Lake street, Oak Park, where he has since lived.

He has given attention to real estate and dealt successfully in flour and grain. Mr. Allen cast his first presidential vote for Fremont in 1856, and has been a Republican ever since. He was postmaster at Pierrepont Manor, New York, 1861-65, was for some years deputy internal revenue collector and was supervisor of the town of Adams, N. Y. In 1887 he was elected the first president of the town of Cicero and in 1890 was elected again to the same office, thus becoming the last president of the town before it lost its identity as a part of the city of Oak Park. In 1889 he was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners. By successive reelections he held that office until 1898. Then, under the Civil Service act, he was appointed clerk of the Board of County Commissioners and has held the office continuously to this time. Mr. Allen is a Mason and a member of the Congregational church. He married Augusta B. Holley, October, 1856, and they have two daughters—Louie (Mrs. George M. Woodward) and Grace H. Allen.

William A. Amberg, manufacturer, was born at Albstadt, near Hanau, Bavaria, July 6, 1847, a son of John A. and Margaret (Hoefer) Amberg. When a child he was brought by his parents to America, and to Mineral Point, Wisconsin, in 1852, where he attended the public schools, and later took a course at Sinsinawa Mound college. September 7, 1869, he married Sarah Agnes, daughter of the late James Ward, of Chicago, and three children have been born to them: John Ward, Mary Agnes and Genevieve, wife of Joseph W. Cremin. Mr. Amberg began his business career as clerk in a dry goods store at Mineral Point, Wisconsin, where he was employed from 1860 to 1864. He arrived in Chicago January 2, 1865, and became bookkeeper for the stationery firm of Culver, Page & Hoyne of this city.

He remained with that house from 1865 to 1870, then was one of the founders of the house of Cameron, Amberg & Company, stationers and printers. In 1868, he invented the self-indexing system of letter filing now in universal use and is the originator also of many other specialties in that line. He established a branch house in New York in 1872 and another in London in 1875. In 1887 he founded the town of Amberg, Wisconsin, where he opened granite quarries and works and later established the town of Athelstane in the same State. He retired from the stationery and printing business in 1890, but is still president of the Amberg File and Index Company, and president of the Loretto Iron Company. He is a trustee of Saint Mary's Training School at Des Plaines, and was unanimously chosen by the judges of Cook county in 1907 as a Jury Commissioner, of which body he is now president. His office is at 438-452 Fulton street and his residence at 449 North State street.

John Anderson was born in Norway on March 22, 1836, and when nine years old was brought to America by his parents, Andrew and Laura (Sampson) Anderson. At the time of their arrival in Chicago the city had less than 20,000 population. The father first engaged in sawing and carrying wood at $1.25 per day, although a carpenter by trade. He lived at 226 North Clark street and there erected a two-room shed in which his family lived until a better house could be built. The lot upon which this house stood was bought of William B. Ogden for which $210 was paid, $100 being cash. They lived in the shed about two years, when Mr. Anderson commenced to build a two-story house on the same lot, but while thus engaged was stricken with cholera and died on August 12, 1849, leaving a widow and two children, the youngest being a baby girl. Through the leniency and kindness of Mr. Ogden ample time was given the widow in which to pay for her home. Mr. Ogden frequently remarked that the younger generation would live to see Chicago a city of 2,000,000 inhabitants.

From the age of thirteen years John Anderson, the subject of this review, was obliged to assume much of the burden of caring for his father's family. He attended Wilder's School on Ohio street, between Wells and La Salle street, during the day, but after school hours bought apples and oranges and peddled them through the streets. He bought his stock mostly of Newhall, and was the first apple peddler of Chicago and often made as high as $1.50 per day, very large wages at that time even for a man. The amount thus made by the boy greatly aided the family to live and prosper. He continued thus engaged about two years and while thus employed visited the old Tribune office on Lake street, where he saw the compositors set type and greatly wondered at the achievement. He was so impressed and interested about this time that he secured a position as newsboy and was among the first in the city to traverse the streets selling the morning dailies.

After a year or two thus engaged he secured a position on the Commercial Advertiser, the proprietor of which was Alfred Dutch. He began to set type and thus continued for about a year and a half, when he accepted a position in Benjamin Seaton's job office, which was connected with Peck's Argus. This paper was later sold to John L. Scripps and William Bross, who soon afterward started the Democratic Press. The subject of this sketch went with them to the new paper and upon the consolidation of the Press with the Tribune under the name of Press and Tribune, he still continued with the establishment. He remained thus associated until 1866, when, having become independent, he established the Scandinavian, at first a seven-column weekly. Ever since that date Mr. Anderson has remained at the head of this journal. For the first two years it was a weekly, then a tri-weekly and a weekly and was thus issued when the great fire of 1871 destroyed the establishment. Two days after the fire Mr. Anderson went to Madison, Wisconsin, bought a quantity of type and on Saturday succeeding the night of the fire again issued the paper. Since the fire it has been issued as a daily, as a Sunday and a semi-weekly edition. It has been and is at present ably conducted, is devoted to the Scandinavian people and at all times is the organ of advance and progress.

Mr. Anderson is a Republican and in 1908 was one of the electors at large on the national ticket. He belongs to the Lutheran church and has been married twice, first to Marie C. Frank, of Racine, Wisconsin, in 1859. She died in 1873 leaving one child, Franklin Seward Anderson. In 1874 Mr. Anderson married Julia Sampson and by her has four children, viz.: Marie, Sarah, Oscar Louis Manierre and John Arthur. It should be mentioned greatly to the credit of Mr. Anderson that recently during the starvation periods in his native country, he has succeeded through his paper, in raising over $100,000 of relief funds for the people of Norway. So well was this act appreciated that Mr. Anderson was decorated by King Oscar with the Order of St. Olaf.

He was also presented with a tribute of esteem at a banquet given in his honor on May 2, 1899, at the Sherman house in this city. The tribute was a beautiful book monogram, hand painted and embossed (thirty-third birthday of the Skandinaven paper). At the time of the presentation Mr. Anderson was addressed, as follows: "As friends, neighbors and co-workers, we wish to congratulate you upon this happy occasion and to celebrate with you the thirty-third birthday of the Skandinaven. During your working life journalism has grown from an occupation to a profession. You have seen and improved every circumstance attending the growth and change of a third of a century. It is given to but few even to be permitted to see the results of their labor ripen into such abundant fruition, not only as a material reward of their efforts, but also in that broader sense that touches the moral side of our nature and the political welfare of our country. We who know you best and have followed your steps from day to day, recognize that the key of your life has been fidelity to duty, hard and untiring work, courage and perseverance in difficulties, modesty in success and staunch friendship. To these noble qualities your success is due and you are happy in being permitted to realize in your own life that faithful work is its own reward, and that labor exalteth the man as well as the nation. Your many friends present and absent, unite in the fervent wish that a kind Providence may vouchsafe to you many years of health, happiness and continued usefulness. In testimony whereof this testimonial is presented."

Captain John Anderson came from his native country, Norway, to America in the early '50s and to Chicago in the year 1857. He was born in 1837, and for many years was a sailor, incidentally visiting remote quarters of the globe, experiencing shipwrecks and privations incident to seafaring life of fifty years ago. In 1860 he became master of the ship "Hercules," plying on the great lakes, and from 1886 to 1888 was harbor master at Chicago.

In the latter year he embarked in the real estate and building business and eventually accumulated a moderate competency. He acquired an interesting fund of anecdotes during his travels about the world that rendered his companionship much sought after. His sterling honesty and trustworthiness led to his election from the old Fifteenth ward to the City Council, where he served with fidelity and credit. He married Maria Olson and their married life covered a period of fifty years. To their union eight children were born, as follows: Albert E., Martin J., Henry C., George W., Arthur L., Lester C., Jennie and Emma. The mother died November 15, 1908, and Captain Anderson passed away January 17, 1909.

Albert Edwin Anderson, the oldest son of Captain John Anderson, appropriate mention of whom immediately precedes this, was born in Chicago August 5, 1858, and until fourteen years of age attended the public schools. He began for himself as a tally boy in the old lumber market, and subsequently was engaged as a clerk in a clothing store at Denver, Colorado; traveling salesman for H. A. Kohn & Brothers, Chicago; traveling salesman for Millar, Cissna & Company and in a like position for Strauss, Yondorf & Company. Under the firm name of Pershing & Anderson he then embarked in the wholesale tailoring business at 211 Jackson boulevard, but the name of the firm was changed to A. E. Anderson & Company, Mr. Anderson being the sole owner, and moved to 45-47 Jackson boulevard, and from there was moved to the present location, 16 to 22 East Adams street, in 1902.

Aside from his business activities Mr. Anderson has found the time to identify himself with some of the fraternal and social organizations of the city. He is a member of Hesperia lodge, No. 411, A. F. and A. M.; Washington chapter, No. 43, R. A. M.; Montjoie commandery, No. 53, K. T.; and Medinah Temple A. A. O. N. M. S.; is also a member of the Chicago Athletic association, the Exmore Country club; the South Shore Country club and is chairman of the ways and means committee of Subdivision 15, wholesale tailors, of the Chicago Association of Commerce; is a member of the Illinois Manufacturers' association; is a Republican in politics and resides at 83 Alice Place.

Louis B. Anderson is deserving of credit for having achieved a more than average degree of success under adverse conditions. His father, Moses Anderson, was one of the comparatively few colored men who achieved distinction in the South. He was a locomotive engineer on the Seaboard Air Line, operating from Richmond, Virginia, to Raleigh, North Carolina, for many years. Later in life he secured the appointment of stationary engineer in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, at Washington, D. C., through the influence of Congressman Brady, and this position he held until his death in 1900. Louis B. Anderson was born April 17, 1870, in Virginia. When four years old his mother died and he was reared by an aunt. He attended the Peabody public schools when a boy, then became a student at the Virginia Normal Collegiate Institute, from which he was graduated in 1888.

Succeeding this he was employed at Washington, D. C., in the bureau of the New York World, first as a copy runner, then as a reporter until 1891, when he came to Chicago as an employe of the publicity and promotion department of the World's Fair. Upon the opening of the Exposition and during its continuance he was in charge of the press admissions. For about a year after the fair closed Mr. Anderson traveled with Col. W. F. Cody ("Buffalo Bill") as his private secretary, clerked in New York City for a short period, then came to Chicago and began reading law in the office of E. E. Prussing at the same time attending lectures in the Kent College of Law. He was graduated in 1897 and after serving in the office of his preceptor, took the civil service examination for assistant county attorney and in February, 1898, was appointed to this office and has since served in that capacity. Mr. Anderson is a Republican in politics, a member of the Masonic, Odd Fellows and Elks fraternities and the Appomattox club. In 1898 he married Miss Julia E. Barr, is the father of one daughter—Jessica—and resides at 2821 Wabash avenue.

Charles W. Andrews, who for many years has been prominently connected with Chicago and Cook county politics, was born at White Hall, Washington county, New York, March 18, 1851, and is one of three living children in a family of four born to Charles W. and Jane N. (Barnhart) Andrews. In 1854 the parents moved to Chicago, where for many years the father was an operator on the Board of Trade. He died in 1889, preceded by his wife in 1881.

The immediate subject of this sketch, Charles W. Andrews, has practically always made his home in Chicago. After attending the public schools he took a special course in higher mathematics and languages in a private school, learned telegraphy, but never followed that calling to any great extent. In 1869 and for three and one-half years he was a clerk in the Chicago postoffice, but in August, 1872, became the statistical bookkeeper in the office of the secretary of the Board of Trade, where he remained twelve years. During this time (1883) he had embarked in the livery business at 116-124 Lincoln avenue and continued it until the summer of 1907, when the business was merged into an automobile garage with which he is yet identified.

Even before attaining his majority Mr. Andrews took an active interest in politics. For one year, beginning in 1884, he served as deputy election commissioner. For two terms, ending in 1889, he was chief deputy in the office of the North Town collector, and in the latter year was the unsuccessful candidate for alderman from the old Twenty-first (now a part of the Twenty-third) ward. In 1896 he was elected supervisor of the North Town, served one year, was defeated for assessor of the North Town on the "Sears ticket" in 1897, and the same year was appointed superintendent of Lincoln park. This latter position he resigned December 1, 1898, to become assistant county treasurer under Samuel B. Raymond, serving four years, then was assistant State treasurer under Fred A. Busse from January, 1903, to January, 1905. He was appointed warehouse registrar in the State grain inspection department, September 1, 1905, but resigned this office to take effect April 30, 1907, in order to fill the position of oil inspector for the City of Chicago, to which he had been appointed by Mayor Busse. This position he is now filling.

For the past twelve years Mr. Andrews has been a member of the Republican county central committee from the Twenty-third ward, serving as vice-chairman a part of the time; and upon the death of the chairman, James Reddick, in 1907, he became and is present chairman of that body. Mr. Andrews is recognized as one of the big influential potentialities of Cook county politics. His aggressiveness, loyalty to his friends, discerning judgment of men and conditions make him an ideal leader where brains, decisiveness and quick action are necessary. His active political and business career has not prevented Mr. Andrews from cultivating some of the social features of life. He is a Past Worshipful Master of Oriental lodge, No. 33, A. F. and A. M., of which, for the past eleven years, he has been the treasurer, and is a member of Lincoln Park chapter, R. A. M. He has been twice married, his first wife, who was Miss Martha M. Campbell, dying in 1897, he wedded Miss Mayme F. White, in December, 1900.

Victor P. Arnold, one of the younger members of the Chicago bar, who has achieved distinction in his profession, was born in this city on November 17, 1873, a son of John and Eliza (Page) Arnold. Both parents were natives of England, but came to the United States in 1868. His father was a cut stone contractor and assisted in the construction of the old city hall. Victor P. Arnold has always made Chicago his home. He received his early education in the public and high schools of the city of Chicago, subsequently taking up the study of law and graduating in 1897. Being at once admitted to the bar he entered upon the practice of his profession, at which he has ever since continued. From his majority he has manifested an interest in political affairs and has been identified with the Republican ward organization of the Twenty-seventh ward, where he resides. December 7, 1908, he was appointed by State's attorney John E. W. Wayman as assistant State's attorney and was specially assigned to duties coming before the grand jury. Mr. Arnold is a member of the Chicago Bar association, the Illinois State Bar association, the Hamilton club and is a Mason. November 7, 1905, he was united in marriage with Miss Amy Eugenia, daughter of E. H. Winchell, a representative of one of the pioneer families of the State, their location here being in the year 1835.

Harry F. Atwood was born on a farm near Morgan Park, Cook county, Illinois, on January 1, 1870, and is the son of C. E. and Martha E. (Townsend) Atwood, natives of Vermont. For several generations back the family have been residents of Vermont. In 1865 the parents came to Illinois and settled near Morgan Park. Harry F. was educated in the public schools of that suburb and graduated from the Morgan Park academy. Later, in 1897, he graduated from the University of Chicago and in 1898 also graduated from the Chicago College of Law.

From early manhood he has distinguished himself as an orator and in various public debates has taken prizes for superiority in thought and delivery. He was president of the Oratorical association and Debaters' league and president of the Northern Oratorical league which comprises the large universities of the Central States. After his graduation in law he was admitted to the bar and began the practice. From 1901 to 1904, he was assistant State's attorney of Cook county. In 1908 he was appointed assistant United States district attorney. He is a member of the law firm of Atwood, Hurlbert & Lightfoot, and has been frequently mentioned in connection with the nomination for Congress for the Third district. His services have been utilized during the various Republican campaigns of recent years. As such he has campaigned in many States under the auspices of the National committee. He was one of the speakers who helped in 1904 to swing Missouri to the Republican column. In 1908 he was invited by the National Republican committee to speak in New York city and was assigned to address the great Madison Square and several other meetings with President-elect Taft and Governor Hughes. He is thus one of the most effective and gifted orators now before the Chicago bar. His orations, "Our Three Great Wars," "Washington, Lincoln and McKinley" and "God in American History," are considered as classics. Since arriving at early manhood he has taken a prominent part in city, county, State and national campaigns.

During the war with Spain he served as a volunteer in the First Illinois Cavalry and later became a sergeant of Troop M. He is a member of the Ridge Country and Hamilton clubs and of the Chicago Bar and Illinois Bar associations. As a member of the Hamilton club he has been active and prominent for about ten years. He belongs to Tracy Lodge No. 810, A. F. & A. M., and also to the Modern Woodmen and Royal Arcanum. He is also a member of the Central Y. M. C. A. and Morgan Park Baptist church. On August 23, 1905, at Fox Lake, Wisconsin, he married Miss Maude Smith, a niece of former Governor William Smith, of Wisconsin, and they have one little girl nearly three years old.

Benjamin F. Ayer, for many years general counsel for the Illinois Central Railroad company, was born in Kingston, Rockingham county, N. H., April 22, 1825, a son of Robert and Louisa

Harry F. Atwood

(Sanborn) Ayer. After due preparation at the Albany academy, Albany, N. Y., he entered Dartmouth college, where he was graduated in 1846. Choosing the law as a profession, he prepared himself for its practice by a course of study extending over a period of three years, including attendance upon the regular courses of lectures at the Dane Law School—the law department of Harvard college. In July, 1849, he took up his residence at Manchester, N. H., and was soon immersed in professional work. In 1853 he was elected to the State Legislature, and in 1854 was appointed prosecuting attorney for Hillsborough county, filling that office until his removal to Chicago in 1857. Mr. Ayer was admitted to practice in the courts of Illinois May 15, 1857, and in 1861 was appointed corporation counsel of the city of Chicago. Soon after the close of this term he became a member of the law firm of Beckwith, Ayer & Kales, which, in 1873, took the style of Ayer & Kales, the senior partner retiring from the firm. While not restricting his practice to any single department, Mr. Ayer, from an early period in his professional career, made a close study of corporation and railroad law. In 1876 he was appointed general solicitor of the Illinois Central Railroad company, of which, in the following year, he was elected a director. January 1, 1890, he became general counsel for the company, holding that highly responsible position until his death. For upwards of thirty years he was a distinguished figure at the Chicago bar, and during all that period has ranked as one of its ablest and most successful members. His reputation as a lawyer has been won at a bar famous for the learning, skill and distinguished successes of many of its members and in open competition with some of the most brilliant and accomplished advocates of the present generation. Mr. Ayer was a prominent member of the American Bar association and also of the Chicago Bar association, and filled the vice-presidency of the former for Illinois, and in 1875 was president of the latter. In 1878 he received from Dartmouth college the honorary degree of LL.D. For many years he was the president of the Western Railroad association. He was likewise a member of the Chicago Historical society, the Chicago Law Institute, the Chicago Literary club and the Chicago club. It may be said of him that his reputation as a lawyer was only rivaled by his standing as a gentleman, for in every relation of life he was a perfect exponent of enlightened citizenship and refined manhood. No lawyer in Chicago was more highly respected among the members of the bar and none stood higher in public esteem and general popularity. Mr. Ayer was married in 1868 to Miss Janet A., daughter of the Hon. James C. Hopkins of Madison, Wis., late United States district judge for the western district of that State. They were the parents of four children, Walter, Mary Louisa, Janet and Margaret Helen.

Frank Baackes, vice-president and general sales manager of the American Steel and Wire company, was born in Germany in March, 1863, and is a son of Godfrey and Franziska Baackes. He was early designated for the priesthood and his education was first arranged upon those lines. As he neared maturity, however, a change in plans was made to fit his mechanical bent and he entered the wire mills in Dusseldorf and began the training for what afterward became his life work.

The introduction of the wire nail in America was by a German Catholic priest, who obtained his machines from the Dusseldorf works, and set them up, first in Covington, Kentucky. Frank Baackes was employed in connection with those machines in this country and soon identified himself with the development of this new and rising industry in the United States in connection with his brother, Michael, who had preceded him. Later on this small beginning with four machines developed into greater magnitude and the American Wire Nail company was organized. In 1878 Michael Baackes, Stuart Chisholm and Frank Baackes continued the manufacture under a new company formed under the corporate name of the H. P. Nail company, of Cleveland. In 1884 Frank Baackes established himself in the manufacture at Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania. One year later a great strike shut off the manufacture of cut nails and this left the wire nail as the only available nail. With the extensive introduction it had then received the wire nail rapidly superseded the cut product and became the standard for general use. In 1885 Mr. Baackes became one of the organizers of the Salem Wire Nail company which, with its plants at Salem and Findlay, Ohio, were merged with the American Steel & Wire company, of which new company he became general superintendent, and is now director, vice-president and general sales agent, with local offices in the Commercial National Bank building.

His summer home is at "Baackes' Lodge," on Lake Content, Vilas county, Wisconsin. His club affiliations in Chicago are: Chicago Athletic association, Union League, Germania, and South Shore Country. Mr. Baackes has been twice married and has three sons, Godfrey D., Frank Jr., and Karl.

Charles Sumner Bacon, M. D., was born at Spring Prairie, Wisconsin, July 30, 1856. His parents were John, Jr., and Chloe Ann (Thompson) Bacon. He received a preparatory education in Wisconsin, in public schools and in a state normal school, and in 1878 was graduated from Beloit college with the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy. He won his Medical Doctor's degree in the medical department of the Northwestern university in 1884. In 1891 he took a post graduate course in Germany, and in 1894-95 took another in Germany and Austria. He has practiced his profession since 1884 and was formerly an interne at the Cook County Hospital and assistant surgeon at the Alexian Brothers' Hospital. He is now Professor of Obstetrics in the Chicago Polyclinic and in the medical department of the University of Illinois, Attending Obstetrician to the Polyclinic, Henrotin Memorial and University hospitals and St. Mary's Maternity Dispensary; and has read numerous papers on obstetrics before medical societies and contributed many others to journals.

He is a member of the Chicago Medical society, the Chicago Gynecological society, the Chicago Pathological society, the Chicago Academy of Medicine, the Chicago Physicians' club, the Illinois State Medical society, the American Medical association, the American Association for the Advancement of Science and the Society for Ethical Culture. He was appointed in 1908, by President Roosevelt, first lieutenant, United States Army Reserve, as a part of the plan to organize among the most famous doctors of America an army medical reserve corps among members of the medical profession which in case of need would be organized and ready to put the medical wing of the army in the highest possible condition for efficient service in the field. Dr. Bacon married Marie Von Rosthorn, at Vienna, Austria, August 17, 1895, and they have children named Karl Alfons, Ernest Lecher, Charles Sumner, Jr., and Helena Marie. His office and residence are at 756 Sedgwick street.

Edwin Rice Baker, auditor for the Board of Commissioners of Cook county, was born at Cleveland, Ohio, December 10, 1864. His father, Oliver Baker, is a descendant of Rev. Nicholas Baker, who settled at Scituate, Massachusetts, in 1635; and his mother, formerly Mary Ellen Rice, is descended from Edmund Rice, who located at Sudbury, Massachusetts, in 1638. His education was obtained in the public schools of Cincinnati and Toledo, Ohio, at Oberlin college, Oberlin, Ohio, and at the Ohio State and Minnesota State universities. He was employed in mechanical engineering lines until 1889, when he became a bookkeeper and has since adopted accounting and auditing as a profession. As secretary of the Great Western Electrical Supply company he came from Minnesota to Chicago in 1890, and from 1896 to 1899, was secretary of the Chicago Union Lime Works company. He served as auditor of the United Breweries company from 1901 to 1903, after which he commenced his career as a public accountant.

He was thus engaged but a short time when, having passed the civil service examination, he was appointed county auditor, which position he has since continuously occupied. He was the first accountant to receive the certificate of "Certified Public Accountant" under State law by examination. Mr. Baker is secretary and a charter member of Edgewater lodge, No. 901, A. F. and A. M.; a member of the Knights of Pythias; is president of the Illinois Institute of Accountants; is an ex-president of Merchants' Council No. 80, National Union; is treasurer of the Granville avenue branch of the Edgewater Presbyterian church, and is a member of the Hamilton club and of the society of the Sons of the American Revolution. Mr. Baker was married in 1892, to Miss Ada L. Lewis, and with his wife and daughter, Elsie L. R., aged eleven years, resides at 1003 Berwyn avenue.

William D. Barge, the dean of the office of Corporation Counsel, is a son of William Barge, whose father came from Germany at an early day and settled in Pennsylvania. William Barge came West to Illinois in 1853, and in 1855 made his home in Dixon, where he died July 21, 1908. He married Elizabeth Dixon, a daughter of James P. Dixon and granddaughter of John Dixon, after whom the city of Dixon was named. John Dixon settled there in 1830, and while serving in the Black Hawk war met and became the personal friend of Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis, which friendship for both distinguished men continued as long as he lived.

William D. Barge was born at Dixon, Illinois, April 1, 1859, and was there reared and educated in the public schools. He read law in the office of his father, passed his examination for admission to the bar in March, 1880, but was not permitted to practice until he had attained his legal age. He practiced his profession in Lee and the surrounding counties until 1891, when he came to Chicago, where he has since resided. In November, 1892, he was appointed assistant attorney for the Sanitary district, a position in which he served until his resignation in April, 1894, to engage in private practice in partnership with Judge Russell M. Wing.

Following the dissolution of this partnership in November, 1895, Mr. Barge was in private practice alone until May, 1902, when he was appointed assistant corporation counsel upon the recommendation of Judge Murray F. Tuley, and has since continuously served in that capacity. Aside from his legal practice Mr. Barge is much interested in literary matters and is an authority on the early history of Illinois. A contribution from his pen appears in this work.

Charles R. Barrett is a native of Plattville, Wisconsin, where he was born on June 29, 1858, his father being James W. Barrett, a native of Indiana. The mother was formerly Sarah Jane Ingalls, a native of Ohio. The father was a farmer by occupation, and in 1863 enlisted in the Eighth Wisconsin Infantry and after a period of faithful service for his country died in April, 1865, at Nashville, Tennessee. Charles R., at the age of seven years was brought by his mother to La Salle county, Illinois, where he attended first the public schools and later the high school at Tonica, Illinois. At the age of ten years he began working on a farm doing chores and making himself generally useful and there remained until he had attained the age of twenty years.

In 1878 he came to Chicago and accepted a position as an instructor in Souder's Business college and there remained for a period of four years. He then engaged with the Chicago Athenaeum, with which institution he remained twenty years, the last ten of which he officiated as superintendent. His long service with this institution eminently qualified him for a career as special instructor in business affairs. In 1904 upon severing his connection with the Athenaeum he founded Barrett Institute of which he has since been the proprietor and manager. Since his career as a teacher in Chicago began he has instructed upward of 35,000 students, fitting them for all the varied business affairs of life. He is recognized as the foremost business educator in the West, and is at present the head of a school having the best equipment and highest standard in stenographic work in the West. His insight into the requirements of business and his knowledge of the qualities which a business man should possess, have enabled him to place business education on an extremely high plane. It would be difficult to overestimate the benefits which an instructor like Mr. Barrett has rendered the youth of Chicago and the West. The Barrett Institute is located in the Majestic theater building, 75 Monroe street. Mr. Barrett resides at 5500 Cornell avenue. He is a member of the Illinois club. On June 23, 1887, he married Margaret F. Randolph.

John H. Batten was born at Paddington, London, England, July 16, 1850, and at the age of four years was brought to America by his parents who located in Chicago. He received his primary education in the Franklin and Newberry schools on the North Side, and while thus engaged in study was a pupil of Prof. A. G. Lane.

Soon after his arrival in Chicago the elder Mr. Batten became deputy clerk in the Cook County Court of Common Pleas and subsequently in the Superior court and served as such for a period of seventeen years.

As early as 1868 John H. Batten, the subject of this review, became connected with the courts of Cook county as a minute clerk. When his service as clerk had expired he began the study of law in the office of Dent & Black and in 1872 successfully passed the examination and was duly admitted to the bar, remaining with his legal instructors until September, 1877, after which he continued the practice alone, meeting with success at the local bar. In 1875 Judge Batten removed to Naperville, in Du Page county, where he resided twenty-eight years. From 1888 to 1896 he served as state's attorney for Du Page county and in June, 1897, was elected county judge to fill the unexpired term of George W. Brown, who had been elevated to the Circuit bench. Judge Batten acceptably filled this important office and was accordingly reelected to the same position in November, 1898, without opposition.

In the year 1900 Judge Batten came back to Chicago to live and has resided since that time in the Seventh ward at 5216 Madison avenue. While residing at Naperville he retained his place of business in Chicago at 145 La Salle street, where at present and for twenty-eight years his law office has been. After the appointment of Judge Kohlsaas at the Federal bench, Judge Batten became acting judge of the Probate court of Cook county. The importance of this office can scarcely be over-estimated. To such an official more than to any other person must rest the responsibility for hundreds of valuable estates left to orphans and other beneficiaries. Sometimes the sum of a million dollars in a single estate is placed under the absolute control of such an official. Through all the years of his management of Probate affairs for Cook county, no question as to the sterling honesty and strict fidelity of Judge Batten has ever been raised. On the contrary, words of praise and congratulation for his efforts, faithfulness and integrity have been tendered him by his professional associates and by all having business in his court.

As acting probate judge his administration of the important affairs of the office was so wise and so satisfactory that his continuance in the same position was popularly demanded. Among his professional brethren this demand assumed almost the character of an ovation. A petition requesting his nomination to the office was circulated among the legal fraternity and signed by over eight hundred of them, regardless of party or other affiliations. The heading of the petition was as follows: "We the undersigned members of the Chicago bar, believing that the office of probate judge is not and should not be considered a political office—that it is the court where the rights of the orphan and the widow should be jealously guarded and protected, and knowing that you have maintained the high standard in the Probate court established by Judges Knickerbocker and Kohlsaas, and believing you to be the right man for the place, do hereby request you to become a candidate for the office of Probate Judge of Cook county, hereby pledging you our support irrespective of party."

It should be borne in mind that this petition was prepared, circulated and signed by the men best fitted to weigh the rare qualifications and high character of Judge Batten. Not then being a resident of Cook county, it was not considered right to nominate him and so he was not nominated, much to the regret of many. The Judge has been a member of the Hamilton club since 1895. At this writing he is second vice-president and one of the five members of the Political Action committee of the club. He is a son of John H. and Mary (Hodnett) Batten, and in 1873 was united in marriage with Ida Haight of Naperville. Their children are Marion, wife of Albert H. Welten, Percy H. Batten and Ralph Ellsworth Batten.

Prof. William L. Baum, M. D., was born May 11, 1867, a son of Henry and Elizabeth (Zorrman) Baum. His parents, natives of Germany, settled at Morris, Illinois. His father served his adopted country in the Civil war as private in the Forty-fourth

Illinois Volunteers. Politically he was a Republican to the end of his days. William L. Baum was given such educational advantages as the common schools afforded and those were supplemented by terms under private tutors. He showed a decided preference for medical study and was sent to the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, where he gave particular attention to chemistry and was graduated with the pharmacutists' degree. He then undertook a full course in medicine in the Jefferson Medical college of Philadelphia, where he received the medical degree in 1888.

Returning to Morris, he was appointed to fill an unexpired term as coroner of Grundy county, meanwhile filling the office of county physician. He was not content, however, with his preparation for his profession, thorough as it was, and late in 1888 resigned his office and began a special study of diseases of the skin and of the genito-urinary organs at the University of Berlin, and during the succeeding three years divided his time between that institution, the University of Vienna and the School of Medicine at Paris. When he was only twenty-four he came back to America, one of the most promising specialists in his peculiar fields among the young post graduates of that time. He opened an office in the Chicago Opera House block and removed thence to 103 State street.

Meantime he was called to the chair of skin and venereal diseases in the Post Graduate Medical School of Chicago. In that position he evinced so much professional ability and so thorough a comprehension of the scope of the school that in 1894 he became one of its directors and during the past fourteen years has been its treasurer. Since 1894 he has been a member and is now president of the staff of the Cook County Hospital. Under his direction, the new Contagious Hospital was built and put in operation and he is its recognized head. In 1907-08 he was president of the Illinois State Medical society and treasurer of the American Urological society, and he is treasurer of the Chicago Medical society.

Articles from his pen on subjects connected with his specialties appear from time to time in the leading American medical and surgical journals. Among others that have attracted special attention are articles on "Leprosy and Vaccination," "Untoward Effects of Drugs," "Lupus Vulgaris" and "Edoscopy." In the realm of the subject last mentioned he has made some well-known improvements in appliances, notable among them the Baum-Kathan Electro-Endoscope. He has written the volume of the Practical Medicine Series every year on skin and venereal diseases, since 1903. Professor Baum is active in medical organizations and is a fellow of the Chicago Academy of Medicine, the Physicians' club, the Pathological society, etc. He is a member of the Chicago Athletic association, was commodore of the Chicago Yacht club 1905-07, and is a member of the South Shore Country club and of the Tolleston Gun Club of Indiana; also a member of the Chicago club, the Marquette club and the University club. He was appointed by Mayor Busse in 1908 as a member of the retiring board for the Police and Fire departments of the city of Chicago.

Louis J. Behan was born March 10, 1876, received a common and high school education and was admitted to the Illinois bar at Chicago in February, 1898. He was special master in chancery of the Circuit court of Cook county in 1902, and in September, 1906, was appointed assistant county attorney, in which capacity he is now serving. During the Spanish-American war he served as corporal of Troop H, First Illinois Cavalry. In March, 1901, he married May Louise Hull and resides at 5443 Prairie avenue.

Albert W. Beilfuss was born in North Germany, on September 14, 1854, and is a son of John G. and Caroline (Luedke) Beilfuss. In 1868 he was brought to America by his parents. The family located first at Oswego, New York, where they remained until 1876, when Mr. Beilfuss came to Chicago. He received almost his only schooling in Germany. In this country he has been a wide reader and has become well informed on public affairs, having educated himself under adverse circumstances. During the World's Fair in this city Mr. Beilfuss met his old teacher who taught him in Germany. While exchanging reminiscences the pupil confessed to his tutor to having surreptitiously borrowed books from his library and after reading them returning them to the shelves. The professor assured his one time pupil that he would have been glad to have loaned him all the books he wanted to read.

Mr. Beilfuss began his first work for wages in a knitting factory and a little later was given charge of a room. At the age of seventeen years, because he understood German and English, he was given a position by a local minister on a church paper. So well did he serve his employers and so rapidly did he familiarize himself with the details of management that he was placed in charge of the publication, continuing thus for about two years, when he began working on an English paper.

In 1876 he came to Chicago and worked in various printing offices, continuing until 1886, when he went into the printing and stationery business with his present partner, George Severinghaus. During the great Lutheran school fight over the Edwards law in Illinois in 1892 he received the Republican nomination for representative in the Legislature and according to the first returns he was elected by about 200 votes, but upon a re-count was defeated by 40 votes.

He was elected to the City Council in 1896 and has served continuously as alderman from the Fifteenth ward since that date. Perhaps in his case more than in any other the demand of the people of his ward placed and continued him in his present aldermanic position. He was never a mere seeker for the office, but did not refuse a nomination when requested to run. Alderman Beilfuss has become one of the most active and useful members of the city's legislative body. He is greatly interested in street improvement work and has done a great deal for public improvements in different parts of the city.

He has also become greatly interested in small parks and play grounds as member and chairman of the Special Park Commission, being at its head since 1905, during which time the Commission has made rapid strides toward establishing a model system of municipal small parks, play grounds and bathing beaches. Before Mr. Beilfuss became interested not more than $41,000 was appropriated by the Council for these purposes annually, but Mr. Beilfuss succeeded in having the amount largely increased, first to $80,000, then to $110,000 and in 1908 to $180,000. There was thus a constant expansion to meet the playground wants of a growing city and beautify the small parks.

All his various official duties have been conducted strictly on a business basis; all public funds and private donations secured by his efforts have been well and judiciously spent. For many years Mr. Beilfuss has been a member of the Council Finance committee and the State legislative committee. For about four years, during the time of the most extensive track elevation, he was a member of that important special committee. He was a member of the legislative committee on Special Assessment Laws, which framed and was instrumental in securing the passage of the new Special Assessment Law.

In 1881 he married Emilie Martens and has four daughters and one son living. They are members of the Lutheran church. Mr. Beilfuss is also President of the Concordia League and belongs to several clubs.

Cornelius A. Bickett was born at Cincinnati, Ohio, on November 15, 1864, and is the son of John and Mary (Deaghan) Bickett, the father being of English descent and the mother of Irish. For many years the father was successful as a dealer in real estate. His son, Cornelius A., was educated at St. Xavier college, Cincinnati, from which institution he graduated in 1881, having taken the commercial course. In 1882 he began work for himself with the Blymyer Manufacturing company of Cincinnati, and there remained for a period of nine years. He came to Chicago in 1891 and entered the employ of the Weaver Coal company, in the capacity of bookkeeper and in 1896 was admitted as a member of the partnership. In 1906 he was elected vice-president of the company.

In 1904 he organized the Bickett Coal and Coke company, with general offices at 415 Old Colony building, was elected president and as such has served ever since. He is at present a director of the Fort Dearborn National Bank, and from 1896 to 1902 was vice-president of the Bellington & Beaver Creek Railroad company of West Virginia. He is chairman of the ways and means committee of the subdivision on fuel and ice of the Association of Commerce. He has been active, successful and prosperous in business. He is independent in politics and supports the man from whom he hopes to get the best service. He is a member of the Royal League, Union League and Chicago Automobile clubs. In April, 1895, he married Frances I. Ball of New Haven, who is a direct descendant of the family of which George Washington was a member. Their children are: Helen M. and Frances C. The family reside at 5447 Ellis avenue.

Joseph E. Bidwill, Jr., was born on the west side of the city of Chicago, July 1, 1883, and is a son of Joseph E. and Mary (Sullivan) Bidwill, both living and old residents of the city and of Scotch-Irish ancestry. Appropriate mention of the father appears elsewhere in this work. Joseph E., Jr., was brought up in a similar manner to the average American lad, was graduated from the English high and manual training school, and later attended St. Ignatius college three years. He began his business career as messenger of the Chicago National bank and gradually worked his way up to bookkeeper when the bank went out of business, succeeding which, for eighteen months, he was employed as bookkeeper for N. W. Harris, banker and bond dealer. From early manhood he has been interested in politics, and as a Republican he became the nominee of his party for the office of clerk of the Circuit court in 1906, to which he was elected at the fall election of that year and which office he is now filling. Mr. Bidwill is the youngest of the county officials. He is a member of the Holy Family Roman Catholic church and resides with his parents on the West Side.

Frank Billings, M. S., M. D., was born in Iowa county, Wisconsin, on April 2, 1854. His ancestors came from England and settled at Stonington, Conn., in 1654. His ancestors fought in the Continental army in the War of the Revolution and also in the War of 1812. His father, Henry Mortimer Billings, was born in New York State, on the borders of Lake George, in 1806. He came to Wisconsin in 1833 and settled in Iowa county, where he carried on the business of mining and of farming. Henry Mortimer Billings was married to Ann Bray, a native of Maysville, Ky., at Plattville, Grant county, Wis., in 1837.

Frank Billings was the fourth son and one of seven children, of whom all are living. Frank Billings attended the public schools at his home and the normal school at Plattville, Wis. He taught in the public schools of Wisconsin from 1874 to 1877, when he began the study of medicine in the office of Dr. W. H. Van Dusen at Montfort, Wis. He entered the Chicago Medical college, the medical department of the Northwestern University, in 1878, and graduated therefrom with the degree of doctor of medicine in 1881. He passed a competitive examination and secured the position of interne in Cook County hospital, Chicago, in the spring of 1881, where he served until the fall of 1882. He was then elected demonstrator of anatomy in his alma mater and began general practice.

In 1885 he went abroad and spent eighteen months in clinical study in Vienna, Paris, London, and other European cities. In 1886 he was elected lecturer on physical diagnosis in the Northwestern University Medical school and was promoted to the professorship of the same branch in 1888 and continued to teach that subject until 1890, when he was elected a professor of principles and practice of medicine and clinical medicine in the same school. He continued to teach in this chair until 1898, when he resigned to accept the professorship of medicine in Rush Medical college, affiliated with the University of Chicago. He was elected dean of the faculty of Rush Medical college in 1900, and continues his duties in that institution at the present time. In 1905 he was elected professor of medicine in the University of Chicago.

Dr. Billings has been a member of the local societies of the city, county and the State since 1884. He was president of the Chicago Medical society in 1890. He has been a member of the American Medical society since 1884, and was elected its president and served for two terms from 1902 to 1904. He has been a member of the Association of American Physicians since 1896, and was its president in 1906. He was president of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis in 1907. Dr. Billings has been steadily engaged in the practice of internal medicine since he left Cook County hospital in 1882.

He has written many articles upon various medical subjects which have received favorable notice from his medical brethren in America and abroad. His chief activities have been along the line of hospital work and medical teaching, which has occupied a large part of his time. Dr. Billings has taken an active interest in the public charities of the city, the county and the State. For many years he was an attending physician to the Cook County hospital, and is at present the president of the consulting staff. He has been a member and the president of the Board of Commissioners of Public Charities of the State for the last three years and shares with that body the honor which has come from well directed, conscientious endeavor to improve the conditions of the State charitable institutions. In 1908 President Roosevelt appointed him First Lieutenant in the U. S. Army Medical Reserve Corps. The purpose of this appointment is to form with others a body of medical men who in times of peace will act as a reserve corps, the members of which may be drawn upon for advice or active service in case of war. Dr. Billings has been an attending physician to Mercy Hospital, to St. Luke's Hospital and at present gives his undivided attention in the direction of hospital work to the Presbyterian hospital of Chicago, although he retains the position of consulting physician to Michael Reese, St. Luke's, the County and other hospitals.

On May 26, 1887, Dr. Billings was married to Dane Ford Brawley at Washington, D. C. One daughter, Margaret, was born on August 8, 1888 and is living. Mrs. Billings died in October, 1896.

Charles L. Billings, lawyer and State Senator, was born October 27, 1858, in Iowa county, Wisconsin. His parents, Henry M. and Ann (Bray) Billings, were among the pioneers of Southwestern Wisconsin, and on their farm Charles L. Billings was reared to manhood. After attending the district schools when a boy he was a student at the State Normal school, at Plattville, then entered the State University at Madison, graduating from the scientific course of that institution in 1883. During the latter part of his university career he was employed as chief clerk in the office of the attorney general of Wisconsin and began the study of law.

In 1883 he was admitted to the bar and in the fall of that year came to Chicago, where he was employed as clerk by different law firms. Succeeding this he was assistant librarian in the Law Institute Library, contributing special articles to different law magazines and also assisting in annotating the United States Supreme court reports and the New York chancery reports. He then was employed in the legal and credit department of J. V. Farwell & Co., for one year, but in 1887 located in Kansas City, where he was engaged in the general practice of law until 1890. In this year he returned to Chicago, where he has since resided and where he is recognized as one of the capable lawyers composing the bar of this city.

In politics, as in all other matters, Mr. Billings has decided views, and for many years has exerted a potential influence in Second ward politics. In 1906, he was elected by the Republican party as State senator from the First Senatorial district and is recognized as one of the energetic and most valued members of that body. He was given the chairmanship of the committee on warehouses, and was a member of the committees on Banks and Banking, Chicago Charter, Cook County Affairs, Education, Insurance, Judiciary, Judicial Department and Practice, Railroads and State Charitable Institutions. He introduced and secured the passage of a number of bills affecting practice in the Supreme court; introduced and secured the passage of a bill appropriating $150,000 for an armory for the Seventh Infantry Illinois National Guard; prepared and introduced at the request of the Chicago Bar association, a bill providing for a salary of $6,000 to the clerk of the Supreme court, and requiring him to turn over all fees to the State treasury; also introduced and secured the passage of a law regulating storage warehouses and warehouse receipts prepared by the United States commissioners on uniform State laws; and secured an amendment to the law regulating the fees of the Probate court, and in the Senate introduced the bill prohibiting the sale of liquors within one and one-eighth mile of any military post or naval training school. Mr. Billings is a member of the Chicago club, University club, Law club, the Chicago Law Institute, Chicago Bar association, Illinois Bar association and the American Bar association.

Lewis D. Binyon was born April 13, 1871, at Cedar Lake, Indiana, and is a son of Christopher W. and Flora A. (Pierce) Binyon. He is the grandson of John Binyon who served throughout the Civil war with great credit as a member of an Indiana regiment. The father was a successful farmer and hotel keeper. Lewis D. received his education in the schools at Cedar Lake and at the Crown Point high school. At the age of 18 he taught school in Lake county for one year and then came to Chicago and entered the employ of Hibbard, Spencer & Bartlett as clerk. After a short time he accepted a position as clerk in the wholesale house of Marshall Field & Company and was there occupied for three years. He then became a salesman of the Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick company, continuing thus engaged for ten years. In February, 1902, with Spencer S. Kimbell as president and himself as secretary he organized the S. S. Kimbell Brick company and upon the death of Mr. Kimbell in 1907 became president of the concern. The business from the start has been successful and profitable.

Mr. Binyon is a member of the Chicago Association of Commerce, the Builder's and Trader's Exchange and on January 9, 1909, was elected president of the Builder's club, having previously been its second vice-president and its first vice-president. He is a Republican and is interested in politics and in county affairs. On November 22, 1893, at Chicago, he married Fanny, daughter of the late Spencer S. Kimbell, who served throughout the Civil war as a member of Battery A, Light Artillery, who was an ex-county commissioner and an ex-alderman of the Twenty-seventh ward. She is the granddaughter of Martin N. Kimbell, who came to Cook county on October 4, 1836, and after whom Kimbell avenue was named. Their children are Spencer Kimbell and Millard Pierce. The family reside at 1507 Kimbell avenue. Mr. Binyon's office is at 304 Chamber of Commerce building.

Dr. Alexander L. Blackwood has become prominent as a physician, as an author and as a citizen. He was born in Huntingdon county, Quebec, July 28, 1862, and after attending the Huntingdon Academy, entered McGill University, at Montreal, from which he was graduated in 1886. During the latter part of his career at the university he took up the study of medicine and upon his graduation came to Chicago and entered Hahnemann Medical college, completing the prescribed course in 1888.

He subsequently took a post graduate course at the New York Post Graduate Medical school and hospital, and at the Johns Hopkins Medical school. He began the practice of his profession at South Chicago in March, 1889, and for the past ten years has also maintained a down-town office in the Marshall Field Annex building, in order to meet the requirements of his large and steadily increasing practice. His superabundant energy led to his invasion of the field of Letters. In 1901 he published "Diseases of the Heart"; in 1902, "Diseases of the Lungs"; in 1906, "Manual of Materia Medica, Therapeutics and Pharmacy"; in 1907, "Liver, Pancreas and Ductless Glands," and in 1908, "Diseases of the Intestinal Tract." Dr. Blackwood is now the senior professor of materia medica and professor of clinical medicine at Hahnemann Medical college. In citizenship he is an aggressive advocate of the United States, its possibilities and its institutions.

In politics he was originally a Democrat with independent proclivities and was great admirer of Grover Cleveland. The sixteen-to-one fallacy was so contrary to his judgment that he voted for President McKinley and has ever since affiliated with the Republican party. In 1907 he was appointed by Mayor Busse a member of the Board of Education, and in 1908 was reappointed to this position. It is a known fact that Dr. Blackwood as a member of this important body recognizes no political or other creed, his endeavor being to give to all the people an educational system equal to the best anywhere.

In private life he is a member of the Congregational Church, a member of Triluminar lodge, No. 767, A. F. and A. M., Sinai Chapter, No. 185, R. A. M., and is the present senior warden of the Calumet commandery, No. 62, K. T. He has been twice married: First to Helen A. Winslow on August 16, 1891; she died February 11, 1903, leaving him two children, Leslie W. and Howard C. His second wife was Anna Evans, to whom he was married Nov. 2, 1904. Dr. Blackwood is the son of John and Ann (Steell) Blackwood, and is of notable ancestry. John Blackwood, the progenitor in America, was a British naval officer and had charge of the repair of vessels at Quebec during the war of 1812, and a son of his, the grandfather of Dr. Blackwood, was a lieutenant colonel of the Fiftieth Battalion Huntingdon Rangers, and assisted in the suppression of the Fenian rebellion. His maternal grandfather, William Steell, was a colonel of the Scotch Grays, was a participant in the battle of Waterloo, when Napoleon was overthrown, and was sent by the British Government to Canada to aid in the suppression of the French rebellion.

Charles G. Blake was born in Devonshire, England, October 3, 1866, a son of William M. and Jane A. (Prouse) Blake. The father was a native of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, and was a builder of monuments, which fact probably influenced his son's career. In 1868, the family crossed the ocean to America, locating at Westerly, Rhode Island, where Charles G. Blake was reared and educated in the public and high schools. This education he supplemented by a course of instruction at the Cowles Art school, at Boston.

Inspired with enthusiasm for art and ambition to make a name and fortune for himself, he came to Chicago in 1885, and took a further special course of study at the Chicago Art Institute after which, in 1890 he embarked with his brother, W. J. Blake, in the difficult business of designing and making monuments, mausoleums and sun dials under the firm name of Charles G. Blake & Company. Since then the business thus founded has grown and prospered to a point where it is recognized as one of the leading of its line in the country.

Mr. Blake has constructed many beautiful and noted monuments among which are the mausoleums for Potter Palmer and for Judge Elbridge H. Gary's family lot. The latter cost over $100,000 and both are not only very costly, but are genuinely and strikingly artistic. It is admitted, even among artists, that there is nothing in the United States to be compared with the Gary mausoleum, and the United States leads the world in this kind of work, especially as to durability, because in this country large roof-stones are used of a size which can not be obtained so readily abroad. The roof-stones of the Gary mausoleum weigh more than forty tons each and are the largest of their kind ever erected. The old Grecian temples, which are the highest expression of architectural art, were built of marble and the roofs of tile and small pieces; consequently their roofs were a source of weakness and the point where they began to disintegrate, instead of being a protection. The large stone roof construction used by Mr. Blake is a genuine protection and makes the mausoleums so built practically indestructible. Other noted and artistic specimens of work erected by Mr. Blake's firm are the W. W. Kimball monument, the McKinley monument at McKinley Park, the Swift mausoleum at Mount Hope and Lake Forest, the Carter H. Harrison monument, etc.

Their work, however, is not confined to this locality, for specimens of their art can be seen in the Tenney mausoleum at Methuen, Massachusetts, acknowledged to be the finest in that State; the Jackson mausoleum at Oakland, California; the public fountains at Dillon, Montana; at Port Huron and Battle Creek, Michigan; the Shelbyville, Illinois, Soldiers' monument; the monument to Oliver P. Morton, Indiana's war governor, at Indianapolis; the Posey county, Indiana, Soldiers' monument; the Ashtabula Disaster monument at Ashtabula, Ohio, and innumerable private monuments and mausoleums of surpassing beauty and perfection throughout the country; and also many sun dials, fountains, seats, pedestals and other garden furniture and class memorials. This firm received the highest award at the Jamestown Exposition for their work. Mr. Blake has made a special and elaborate study of mausoleum design and construction and believes that mausoleum burial is the most satisfactory and permanent method. He is the patentee of a mausoleum ventilator for admitting air without rain, an important point in constructing mausoleums and insuring durability, for water and frost are the great destroyers of materials. He has also made a thorough study of the ancient Celtic crosses by personal observation and study of them in Europe, and has probably the most complete library on Celtic crosses, public or private, in the United States.

Mr. Blake is a member of Covenant lodge, No. 526, A. F. and A. M.; Palestine council, No. 66, R. and S. M., Fairview chapter, No. 161, R. A. M.; Montjoie commandery, No. 53, K. T.; is a thirty-second degree member of Oriental consistory, and a member of Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., and is also an Encampment member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. May 10, 1899, he married Gertrude Ellwood, of Sycamore, Illinois, a niece of Colonel Isaac L. Ellwood, and two sons, Charles Ellwood and Donald Prouse have been born to their union. Mr. Blake is a member of the Architectural Club of Chicago, the Euterpean Glee club, is an ex-director of the Apollo Musical club, ex-director of the Ridge Country club, President of the Northeastern Illinois Fanciers' association, director of the Calumet Trust and Savings Bank, member of the Chicago Stock Exchange, vestryman of the Mediator at Morgan Park, member of the board of trustees of the village of Morgan Park and member of the reception committee of the Hamilton club. He also organized and was first president of the Chicago Tennis league, consisting of the University of Chicago, Kenwood, Aztec, Woodlawn, Wanderers and Edgewater clubs.

Frederick Bode, of the well-known millinery firm of Gage Brothers & Company, is a representative business man of Chicago and the Great West. From the humble duties of an errand boy he has steadily advanced upward until he occupies a commanding position in the busy industrial world of this wonderful city.

His father was Frederick Bode, born in 1820, and a member of the Hanoverian army in 1840. He left the military service with the rank of first lieutenant and became internal revenue collector for the Prussian Government. He was decorated by the Kaiser with the Order of the Red Eagle. After a useful and honorable life he died in 1906 at the age of 86 years, having served his country faithfully for forty-five years. The mother of subject, Sophia Kimman, was born in 1818 and died in 1904, aged 86 years. She came to the United States with her son Frederick, then 14 years old, and here remained for seven years before returning to Germany.

Frederick, the subject of this review, was born in Germany in 1856 and received his early education in the Royal School of Hanover. He attended night sessions at Bryant & Stratton college and in addition to German and English speaks French fluently. A year after his arrival in this country he accepted a position with D. B. Fisk & Company as errand boy, but so faithful was he to every interest of the firm that before three years had elapsed he was appointed city buyer. After that his advance from one position to a higher one was rapid and merited. He served various firms as buyer and manager; but in 1892 with a few associates bought the business of Gage Brothers and ever since has remained the executive head of the establishment. His untiring industry, fair dealing, keen insight into business conditions, exceptional ability to grasp complicated commercial affairs, genial good nature and kindly demeanor, all have contributed to his present business prominence and the high regard in which he is held.

Mr. Bode is a member of the Lutheran church, also of the Industrial club and the Chicago Association of Commerce. He has been president of the Millinery Jobbers' association for the last six years, and in recognition of his excellent service for the association he was presented by the members, at Dallas, Texas, with a handsome gold watch and diamond fob. At another annual meeting at Louisville, Kentucky, his services were so well appreciated by the association that a beautiful portrait of himself was prepared and a copy presented to each member. On the reverse side was tastefully inscribed a biographical sketch of Mr. Bode, bearing the title, "A Man of Victorious Effort."

On November 6, 1908, Mr. Bode was reëlected president of the Millinery Jobbers' association and was presented with a beautiful loving cup, upon one side of which is the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. Frederick Bode, president, by the members of the Western Millinery Jobbers' association, as a token of their appreciation of his successful, untiring and self-sacrificing efforts in the work of the association, and the high personal regard in which he is held by the membership." The presentation took place at Buffalo, New York. On the reverse side of the cup is inscribed the following verse written by a member of the association:

"Your monument shall be my gentle verse,
Which eyes not yet created shall o'er read,
And tongues to be your being shall rehearse
When all the breathers of this world are dead;
You still shall live—such virtue had my pen—
Where breath most breathes, even in the mouth of men."

Mr. Bode is president of the Millinery Herald, conceded to be the most beautiful publication in America. Its object is to educate and elevate the millinery retail trade and is sent gratis to about 35,000 millinery dealers in all parts of the world. The journal receives the unqualified support of the Millinery Dealers' association. He served as president of the Citizens' Non-Partisan Traction Settlement association, which was instrumental in bringing about the adoption of the street railway ordinances which proved so beneficial to the Chicago public. As is well known, the ordinances provided that a percentage of the traction earnings shall be paid into the city treasury. Too much cannot be said in praise of the public spirit of Mr. Bode. His example of industry in the cause of public improvement is well worth the imitation of every leader of public thought and action in this city. He is a Republican but not an active partisan, although he takes a great interest in the clean administration of public affairs. Mr. Bode has recently been elected to the presidency of the South Shore Country club and he is also a member of the Union League and the Chicago Athletic clubs. In 1880 he married Augusta Ebeling, who died in August, 1907. By her he has one daughter, Ida Frances Bode, who resides with her father at 5827 Washington avenue.

August C. Boeber. In the year 1838, when Cook county, Illinois, was practically a wilderness, Frederick Boeber, of Saxony, and wife, nee Elizabeth Hansen, of Prussia, Saxony, came to the United States. The frontier village of Chicago presaged nothing of its future greatness at this time, and believing the more elevated land at Blue Island possessed greater advantages, Mr. Boeber located there and began farming. He passed the remainder of his life in that vicinity, and the usual thrift of the German emigrant enabled him to accumulate several farms. He was a Republican in politics, a member of the Lutheran church and the father of four children: Julia (Mrs. Fred Blatt), August C., Lizzie E. (Mrs. Herman Heinecke) and Annie (Mrs. George Heim).

On December 17, 1857, August C. Boeber was born at Blue Island, and was there reared and educated. Although he learned the carriagemaker's trade, his principal occupation has been that of dealing in coal and ice. He owns 170 acres of land adjoining Blue Island in Worth township, but, in addition to looking after this property, is engaged in wholesaling ice. Since attaining his majority he has always taken an active interest in politics. He was elected collector of the town of Worth in 1889, serving as such five years, also two terms as town supervisor. For years he has been a member of the Board of Education of Blue Island, serving as village trustee, and when Blue Island became an incorporated city he was elected the first treasurer. For about half a decade he has been serving as school trustee of the town of Worth. For six years he served as deputy sheriff under Messrs. Pease and Magerstadt, but is now serving his fourth term and seventh year as a member of the Board of County Commissioners.

Mr. Boeber is a Republican, a Royal Arch Mason and a member of the Royal Arcanum. February 28, 1885, he married Miss Barbara Fiedler, daughter of Joseph Fiedler, of Blue Island, by whom he is the father of four children: Clara, Helen, Irene and Gilbert.

William Boldenweck, assistant United States treasurer, was born August 9, 1851, in Bavaria, Germany, and is one of seven children, four now living, born to the marriage of Carl Ludwig and Charlotte (Yent) Boldenweck. In June, 1854, the family immigrated to American and came direct to Chicago, where both parents died in July of that year, of cholera.

Strangers in a strange land, orphans and practically penniless, the older children found employment in such occupation as could be secured, and thus provided for the support of those too young to work. William Boldenweck was reared in the family of his sister Charlotte, who married Fred Hartman, a tinsmith, and under him served an apprenticeship at that trade. During his early years he attended the old Dearborn school on Madison, between State and Dearborn, and for one year was a student in Dyrenforth's Business college. At the age of thirteen his school days ended and his business career began.

After working for a time with Mr. Hartman, he clerked in a store and later kept books for a firm on Lake street. In March, 1871, he was employed by his brother, Louis H. Boldenweck, a cut stone contractor, to keep books, collect money and as timekeeper, and four years later bought his brother's business, giving his notes in settlement therefor. In three years' time, with economy, he was able to pay off these notes in full. He was in this business at first in partnership with Philip Henne, but after 1883 was associated in business with Earnest Heldmeir until 1887, when he sold out to his partner. In partnership with Henry Strassheim he embarked in the real estate business in 1893, but three years later became interested in the Brooklyn Manufacturing company and so continued until 1906, when he disposed of his holdings.

Active and energetic in whatever he undertook, Mr. Boldenweck early identified himself with the Republican party and was first generally known through his assistance in electing Seth Hanchett county sheriff. In 1887 he was elected supervisor for the town of Lake View, but as it was decided at this election to merge Lake View into a city organization, he was thus singularly elected in and out of office at the same election. A special election was called to elect city officers, and Mr. Boldenweck was selected as the first mayor of Lake View. In 1889 he was reelected to the office, but served only three months, when the city of Lake View was annexed to the city of Chicago.

The spring of 1890 he was appointed by Mayor Hempstead Washburne to a three-year term on the Board of Education, but after serving two years resigned to fill an unexpired term, caused by resignation, as a member of the Drainage Board. Reelected to this position in 1895, he served as president of that body in 1897, 1898 and 1899. Mr. Boldenweck was a strong candidate for the nomination of mayor of Chicago in the convention that nominated Judge Elbridge Haney for that office. June 29, 1906, President Roosevelt appointed him assistant treasurer of the United States, which office he is now holding.

Thoroughout his official career Mr. Boldenweck has exercised the same energy, intelligence and thoroughness characteristic of the man, and his official career is unmarred. He is a member of Golden Rule lodge, A. F. and A. M.; York chapter, R. A. M.; St. Bernard commandery, K. T.; Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., and Welcome lodge, No. 1, Knights of Pythias. In March, 1873, he wedded Miss Adelheid Samme, daughter of Fred Samme, an early vessel owner of Chicago, who has borne him three children, all of whom died in infancy. Together with his wife, Mr. Boldenweck has traveled extensively, making one trip to Europe and one to Old Mexico and the Pacific coast.

Dr. Levi Daniel Boone was one of the many physicians who came to reside in Chicago in 1836, and who attained to special prominence not only as a practitioner, but by reason of business and civic relations as well. He was born in Kentucky in 1808, and was named for his uncle, Daniel Boone, the famous Kentucky pioneer. He was a graduate of Pennsylvania university and saw service as a captain in the Black Hawk war in 1832. He served as city physician and for three years was one of the city aldermen. In 1855 he was elected mayor of Chicago, the only physician who has attained to that position. When the Cook County Medical society was organized October 3, 1836, he was elected secretary, and when, in 1850, it was reorganized and took the name of Chicago Medical society, he was its first president. During this period Dr. Boone was also a trustee of Garden City institute and was also, in 1853, one of the publishers of the Christian Times. He was a decided pro-slavery man and delivered a series of lectures to prove the scriptural warrant for human slavery. He was a kindly mannered man, gentle and courteous to all, of perfect integrity, hospitable as became his Southern origin, and much beloved by all who knew him. When Chicago university was first organized Dr. Boone was one of its incorporators. As early as 1837 he was the secretary of the Chicago Fire and Marine Insurance company, and in 1852 was the president of the Merchants and Mechanics Bank of Chicago. At the age of 60 years Dr. Boone became extensively engaged in real estate and insurance business, in which he was largely successful. His benefactions were many and unostentatious. He is said to have contributed $100,000 to one religious organization. He died in 1884, aged 74 years.

Lloyd Wheaton Bowers was born March 9, 1859, in the state of Massachusetts, and is a son of Samuel Dwight and Martha Wheaton (Doud) Bowers. The father was a merchant by occupation and served as lieutenant-colonel of the Twelfth Massachusetts infantry during the Rebellion. Lloyd W. was reared principally in New York City. He received his primary education at home and at Elizabeth, New Jersey. Having determined to thoroughly educate himself, he entered Yale college and in 1879 graduated with credit from the Academic department of that institution with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Having also concluded to make the practice of law his profession through life, he entered the Columbia College of Law and in 1882 was graduated therefrom with the degree of Bachelor of Laws. The same year he was duly admitted to the bar in New York and began the practice in the offices of Chamberlain, Carter & Hornblower.

There he remained until June, 1893, when he came to Cook county and Chicago and continued the practice of his profession. His schooling and ability were recognized by his appointment in a comparatively short time as general counsel of the C. & N. W. Railway company, with offices in the building of that company. Here he is located and at work at the present time. He is a member of several clubs, among which are the University, Chicago, Chicago Athletic association, Chicago Law, Onwentsia, Skokie, and Chicago Yacht. He is a Congregationalist and resides at 20 Ritchie place. He has served as president of the Chicago Law club and of the Yale Alumni association. On September 7, 1887, he married Louise Bennett Wilson, who died in 1897. On October 4, 1906, he married Charlotte Josephine Lewis, and they have the following children: Thomas Wilson and Martha Wheaton.

Horace L. Brand is secretary and treasurer of the Illinois Publishing company, publishers of the Illinois Staats Zeitung (morning edition), Chicago Freie Presse (evening edition) and Western and Daheim (Sunday edition). He was born in Chicago, October 6, 1868, a son of Michael and Phillipine Brand, obtained his primary education in public schools and in the University school in Chicago, and was graduated from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with the class of 1891. He was secretary to his father in the latter's real estate and loan business, 1891-95; was a manufacturer of furniture, 1895-96; treasurer of the Brand, Bullen & Gund company, malsters, 1896-97; manager of a fruit farm in Missouri, 1897-1900; and since 1900 has been manager, director, president and treasurer of the Brand Brothers company, with vineyards at Brandsville, Missouri, vice-president and director of the Brand Brewing company, secretary and director of the Brandsville Fruit Farm company, and a director of the Vril company. He is independent in politics. In religion he is a German Lutheran. He is a member of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Alumni association, the Phi Beta Epsilon fraternity, the Germania Maennerchor, the Exmoor Country club, the Illinois Athletic club, the Chicago Automobile club, the German Relief and Aid society, the German Press Club and the Chicago Press club. He married Miss Louise Keller, in Chicago, July 27, 1897, and they have one surviving child, named Erna Louise Brand. His offices are at 94-100 Fifth avenue; his residence is at 32 Cedar street.

Rudolph L. Brown, president of the Chicago Brake Shoe company, with offices in the Fisher building, was born in Chicago, December 2, 1874, a son of William L. and Annie (Lusk) Brown. His father, of German birth, came to Chicago in the early "sixties."

By profession he was a physician and surgeon, educated at the best schools in Berlin, but he possessed marked business ability and a desire to engage in large and noteworthy enterprises. Soon after his arrival in Chicago he became a partner with Carl Hoffman, his brother-in-law, in a wholesale confectionery business, on Lake street, near the old Potter Palmer dry goods store. In 1874 their plant was destroyed by fire and for some years thereafter he was successful in a teaming business. Meantime he organized the barbers of Chicago and virtually controlled them until he relinquished the responsibility to go into the manufacture of window screens. In that enterprise he continued until forced to retire because of failing health, and in 1901 he died.

Rudolph L. was educated in public and private schools in Chicago. When in his fifteenth year he secured employment as office boy with the Condon Brake Shoe company, then located on the present site of the Western Union building. A year later, illness kept him in enforced idleness for about eight months. From 1890 to 1892 he was in the employ of William C. Pullman, dealer in railway supplies. Then Robert E. Libby, selling agent for the Condon Brake Shoe company, became Southern manager for the New York Air Brake company, with headquarters at Atlanta, and employed Mr. Brown as his clerk. Two years later, when only 21 years old, the latter became assistant Southern manager for the company mentioned, covering Southern and Southwestern territory as salesman and general representative. In 1896, changes and development of business made him Southern manager. He resigned in 1898, however, to become a ranchman and cattleman in Texas, having acquired 200 head of stock, which he kept at Rancho de la Cachino, ten miles from Cotulla. Drouth and cattle diseases made the venture so unpromising that he disposed of it and returned to Chicago, where for a year he was St. Louis agent for Hires' root beer. Later he was a traveler for the Cudahy Soap company.

On January 1, 1900, he secured the general management of the Drexel Railway Supply company, with offices in the Fisher building. The company sold out its Chicago interests, with others, in 1901, and Mr. Brown was employed by S. W. McMunn in the sale of a draft gear. This work was not to his taste and soon he became a salesman for the Universal Car Bearing company. Some of the methods under which the business was conducted did not command his approval, and he resigned and organized the United States Brake Shoe company. His next advance was the invention of the Brown brake shoe. Business dissensions arose and he sold the brake shoe and went on the road for the American Valve and Meter company of Cincinnati.

He again took up his residence in Chicago September 1, 1902, and organized the Chicago Brake Shoe company, of which he is president and general manager, widely known as one of the oldest brake shoe men in the West. He takes much interest in athletics and is a member of the Illinois Athletic club, Windsor Golf club, and the Boat club of New Buffalo. Since 1906 he has been president of the Chicago Kennel club, which he reorganized, putting it on a sound basis. He is a member of the Western Railway club and of the St. Louis Railway club, has long been actively and helpfully identified with the Chicago Art institute, and is widely known as a thirty-second degree Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine. Mr. Brown married Miss Ethel Dryburgh, daughter of Alexander Bogie Dryburgh, owner of the Southern hotel, September, 1901. His home is at 247 E. Sixty-sixth street, his summer residence at New Buffalo, Michigan.

Col. Taylor E. Brown, the son of Henry S. and Emma Jane (Taylor) Brown, was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on January 22, 1860, where he lived until he removed to Chicago, Illinois, with his father's family in February, 1880. His father was a native of Niagara county, New York, born in 1836, and his mother of Cincinnati, Ohio, born in 1842. The father was for many years a commission merchant in St. Louis; was a member of the National Guard of Missouri and Illinois, and is yet alive and vigorous; his mother died in London, England, in 1892. The stock is Scotch-English, with New England Yankee training. The paternal grandparents of Colonel Brown, Joseph and Polly, as well as his paternal great-grandparents, were natives of New York. The maternal grandfather, Ezra B. Taylor, was a native of Vermont; his wife, Millicent (Weston) Taylor, was born in England. The grandfather and great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch served the Colonies in the Revolution and later in the war of 1812; participated in the battles of Lundy's Lane and Queenstown Heights.

Col. Taylor E. Brown is the oldest of the family of six who grew to maturity, the others dying in childhood. He was educated at the public schools of St. Louis. He had determined to become a lawyer and to make a specialty of patent law, largely through the influence of Hon. Jefferson Franklin Jones, of the Supreme court of Missouri, a friend of the family. He, therefore, abandoned high school in his third school year and entered the employ of Girard B. Allen & Co., proprietors of the Vulcan Iron works, as an apprentice to learn the patternmaker's trade. This he accomplished and in addition took a course in mechanical drawing and acquired much experience in practical mechanics in the shop. On coming to Chicago he secured a position as patternmaker with R. T. Crane & Co., and later a situation as draftsman with Munday, Evarts & Adcock, patent lawyers, designing machinery and making patent office drawings, for four years. During this period he studied law at night and in 1882-83 attended lectures at the Union College of Law. He was called to the bar in Illinois, March 25, 1884, was admitted to practice in the Supreme court of the United States on the 7th day of March, 1893, and since then has been admitted to practice in nearly all the Federal Circuit courts and Circuit Courts of Appeals. He soon developed a lucrative practice in his office in the old Honore block. In 1887 he became junior member of the firm of Dayton, Poole & Brown, and in 1897 the interest of M. E. Dayton was purchased and the new firm then became, as it has since remained, Poole & Brown, patent lawyers, practicing in both State and Federal courts, as well as before the patent offices of the United States and many foreign countries.

Colonel Brown is an Episcopalian—a pewholder in St. Paul's church, Fiftieth street and Madison avenue. On January 30, 1888, he married Fannie Garrison Dayton, and to them were born these children: Melville Stuart, a graduate of Racine college, and in 1908 a midshipman in the United States Naval academy at Annapolis; Taylor Garrison, who died in 1901; Charles Everett and Jessie Imogen, both attending Hyde Park high school; Dayton R. E., in Kenwood grade school; and Fannie Susan, 7 years old. The mother of these children died December 28, 1901. On November 3, 1904, Colonel Brown was married to his second wife, Mrs. Jessie May Catlin, at her home in Ripon, Wisconsin. Her daughter, Florence May, by a former marriage, is a sophomore at the University of Chicago.

Colonel Brown attained the rank of color sergeant in 1879 in the National Guard of Missouri, where he served for three years. After removing to Chicago he enlisted September 3, 1881, as a private in Company A, First infantry Illinois National Guard; was promoted second lieutenant June 2, 1883; first lieutenant June 28, 1884; captain October 6, 1884; reelected captain October 6, 1887; major First infantry May 24, 1890; resigned January 13, 1894; organized new company and was commissioned captain of Company A, First infantry, March 5, 1897; again promoted major of First infantry December 19, 1898; was placed on the retired list on his own application, S. O. 223, A. G. O., Springfield, November 23, 1899; appointed lieutenant-colonel Inspector General's department, Illinois National Guard, February 24, 1908; and now holds position of inspector general, the division, Illinois National Guard.

He enlisted in the war with Spain as captain of Company A, First Illinois Volunteer infantry, April 25, 1898; mustered May 13, 1898, at Springfield, Illinois; at Chickamauga, Georgia, May 17 to June 1; Pt. Tampa, Florida, June 2; July 10, sailed for Santiago, Cuba; July 19, Guantanamo, Cuba; landed at Guanica, Porto Rico, July 27 to December 8; Chicago, September 16 to November 23, 1898. On June 19, 1898, he was detached from the First Illinois Volunteer infantry and was assigned to Company A, Provisional Battalion Engineers, operating directly under Col. W. M. Black, United States army, chief engineer, serving on the staff of Maj.-Gen. Nelson A. Miles. He was the first officer of the United States army to land at Guanica, Porto Rico, where he was in action July 25 and 26, 1898, was recommended by Maj.-Gen. Nelson A. Miles for brevet major United States volunteers "for gallantry in action," and was mustered out at Chicago, November 23, 1898.

Colonel Brown is a member of the following clubs and associations: The Church club of Chicago (Episcopal), Law club of Chicago, Patent Law association of Chicago, American Bar association, Illinois Bar association, Chicago Bar association, Illinois State Rifle association, Union League club of Chicago, South Shore Country club of Chicago, Chicago Athletic association, Missouri Athletic association of St. Louis, Army and Navy club of New York, Military Order of Foreign Wars of the United States, Naval and Military Order of the Spanish-American War, Society of the Porto Rican Expedition, Columbia Camp United Spanish War Veterans, and the Veteran Corps First Regiment infantry, Illinois National Guard.

He has been president of the Men's Club, Christ church, Woodlawn (1899-1904), secretary of the Church club of Chicago (1895-1902), secretary National Conference Church Clubs of the United States (1897-1904), president of the same (1904-05), secretary International Convention Brotherhood of St. Andrew, Buffalo (1887); secretary Board of Trustees, Church Home for Aged Persons (1903-05); president of the Patent Law association of Chicago (1898-99); commander Illinois Commandery Naval and Military Order of the Spanish-American War (1901-04 and 1906-07); commander in chief National Commandery Naval and Military Order Spanish-American War (1907-08); executive officer Illinois State Rifle association (1906-07-08); member National Council the Society of the Porto Rican Expedition; delegate to national encampments, United States War Veterans (1906-07-08). In politics Colonel Brown was a Democrat until the 16 to 1 Bryan campaign, when he voted for the Palmer and Buckner Gold Democrat ticket. Since then he has voted the Republican ticket. He has never taken a very active part in local or ward politics and has not been an office seeker or holder.

William M. Brown was born in the city of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, on October 28, 1860, and is the son of William M. and Mary (Alter) Brown. This particular branch of the extensive Brown family is descended from two girls who were natives of Scotland, and at the time of the religious uprising escaped through the lines owing to their ability to speak the Irish dialect. They came to America and their descendants are now scattered throughout the United States. The father of our subject was a native of Butler county and the mother of Allegheny county, Pennsylvania. The former was a carpenter contractor and erected many public buildings and monuments of high merit in the Keystone state. During the Civil war he served as captain of a company of home guards and as a recruiting officer. He died in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, many years ago after a useful and honorable life. William M. Brown, Jr., was reared in his native city and there resided until 1880. He was educated at the public schools and at the age of twelve years, upon his father's death, he was compelled to go to work in order to assist the family.

He first began as a roller in a shovel manufactory, but later secured a position as clerk, and still later he became city salesman for the Schimmel Preserving company of Philadelphia, and while serving as such came to Chicago as the Western representative of that house. Here he has been ever since connected with this firm. For the last ten years he has devoted his time and energy to the purchasing and selling of the goods of this house as a whole-sale jobber. He is a Republican in politics and has always been interested in local questions of interest. In 1902 in the Twenty-sixth ward he was defeated by one delegate vote for city councilman, although he received a majority of the popular vote. In 1904 he was elected senator from the Sixth Senatorial district. At the first session he was chairman of the committee on parks and boulevards, chairman of the committee on Cook county affairs, and chairman of a committee to visit state charitable institutions, and a member of the following committees: Chicago charter, corporations, insurance, municipalities, parks and boulevards, railroads, and revenues. On November 3, 1908, Mr. Brown was again elected by the people of the Sixth district to represent them in the Senate. He was one of twenty-six who stood by the Republican governor when it was thought a combination was trying to unseat him.

Mr. Brown is a Royal Arch Mason, Knight of Pythias, member of the Columbian Knights and Illinois Commercial Men's association. He married Elizabeth Hastings and has five sons and one daughter by this marriage. He belongs to the Presbyterian church of Ravenswood, and has been chairman of the Board of Trustees for two terms, and one of five who organized the church, which, after a period of five years, has a membership of 450.

William T. Bruckner was born in Monroe, Mich., on August 4, 1869. He is the son of George W. and Eliza Spalding Bruckner, both of whom were among the early settlers in that vicinity and whose families, for over seventy years, have regarded Monroe as their home.

William T. Bruckner was educated in the public schools of Monroe, and after being graduated from the high school in 1889 he came to Chicago.

His first business venture was with a wholesale hardware house, with which he remained for one and one-half years. In January, 1891, he entered the employ of the Commercial National bank as a clearing house clerk. This was the beginning of a successful career marked by gradual and merited promotions, the first official appointment being that of assistant cashier in 1905, followed in January, 1909, by advancement to the office of assistant to the vice-presidents.

Mr. Bruckner is well known to Chicago's representative business men, by whom he is regarded as a man of marked ability. He is a member of the Hinsdale Golf, Bankers and Hamilton clubs and is a director of the Lake View Trust & Savings Bank, president of the Cicero State bank and treasurer of the Hamilton club.

Edward J. Brundage is deserving of more than a passing notice because of his prominence as a lawyer, public official and citizen. He was born May 13, 1869, at Campbell, N. Y., a son of Victor and Maria L. (Armstrong) Brundage, who removed to Detroit, Mich., in 1880. He received his early education in the schools of his native town and at Detroit, and in 1883 began his business career as a clerk in a railroad office. He began the study of law in Chicago and was admitted to the bar in 1892, graduating from the Chicago College of Law the following year. Since that time he has here been engaged in the practice of his profession. He has always been a consistent Republican in politics and served by election as a Representative in the Forty-first and Forty-third General Assemblies of Illinois.

In 1894 Mr. Brundage was elected president of the Board of County Commissioners. His administration was noteworthy by reason of the fact that the old county building was demolished and the present beautiful and substantial edifice was erected. All this was accomplished in a strictly business way, without a hint of graft and within such a comparatively brief space of time that it was the wonder of politicians, building contractors and the public generally. Upon the election of Fred A. Busse as mayor, Mr. Brundage was appointed to the position of corporation counsel, and has since served in that position. He is a Knight Templar Mason and a member of Medinah Temple of the Mystic Shrine. He also belongs to the Columbian Knights, the Royal League and the Chicago Athletic, University, Hamilton and Industrial clubs. This all too brief sketch of the life of Mr. Brundage has omitted many of the side lights of a highly creditable nature, but the following, copied from the Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), is comprehensive of the man:

"Edward J. Brundage, president of the Cook County Board of Commissioners that built Cook county's five-million-dollar courthouse, began life selling papers. A Detroit railroad man, who was one of his patrons, noticed that he 'was business' and offered him a job as messenger boy. He made good and was given a clerkship. There he kept up the habit, and was jumped to a chief clerkship and transferred to Chicago. Then he determined to get out of the office-rut and do things for himself. The law looked good to him, and he began to burn the midnight oil over Blackstone. When he was admitted to the bar he resigned his railroad job and began active practice. The boss of the district in which he lived took notice of him and decided he was good legislative timber. He was nominated and elected. Again he made good and was given two more terms. He talked little and worked much—and kept his hands clean. The Republicans needed a strong man to head the county ticket, and young Brundage was chosen on the ground that he would ‘make good.’ But Mr. Brundage has done other things besides making a record in building the courthouse. One of the first ‘results’ which he scored upon assuming the management of Cook county’s affairs was the passage, by the Illinois Legislature, of the ‘Doctors’ Civil Service Act.’ It placed the leading physicians of the West, who served the public as an attending staff, under the merit system. Examinations resulting attracted wide attention. They covered the highest character of service ever placed under civil service rule. The plan was in the nature of an experiment. It proved a success.”

Fred A. Busse, mayor of Chicago, was born in this city, March 3, 1866. His father, Gustave Busse, was for many years a hardware merchant, and won the title of captain in the Civil war, and died in January, 1909. The boyhood of Fred A. Busse was passed in attending school and assisting his father. He early manifested much interest in politics and his hearty, inspiring personality made him a natural leader of men. Mr. Busse embarked in the teaming business, afterwards engaging in the coal business. He was secretary and treasurer of the Northwestern Coal company, later president of the Busse-Reynolds Coal company and is now president of the Busse Coal company.

Mr. Busse’s first experience as an office holder was acquired in 1891, when he was elected clerk of the town of North Chicago. After serving one term he became a bailiff in Judge Brentano’s court, where he remained a year or two, and was deputy under Sheriff Gilbert two years. This was followed by a term of service as chief clerk in the North Town collector’s office, and by his election in 1894 and 1896 to the lower house of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth general assemblies. Two years later he was sent to the State Senate.

He was elected State treasurer in 1902, and was appointed postmaster of Chicago in December, 1905. In order to get the best results from his subordinates he found it advisable to make their surroundings healthful and as pleasant as practicable. He removed the money-order division, with its 160 employes from noisy and ill-ventilated rooms over the driveway on the first floor, to sunny, airy quarters on an upper floor. Through his initiative light and air were brought into the postoffice basement, where the mail bags are handled, performed the same service for the employes of the registry division and worked other practical reforms which added to the comfort and, therefore, the efficiency of the postal service. He also increased the working force and inaugurated the system of forwarding mail from the six railroad depots of the city without hauling it down town and back. He established the system of delivering outgoing mail to the railroad depots through the Illinois Tunnel company's conduits, thus increasing the facilities and reducing the time of hauling mail. The spring of 1907 he was elected mayor of Chicago for a period of four years. His administration thus far is noted for practical business methods regardless of politics. Effectiveness in city work has been required of all office holders rather than prominence in ward politics. He has appointed strong, reliable and practical men as his legal advisers and members of the municipal cabinet, and from the first to last his administration has been carried out on broad, up-to-date business methods. He is a member of the Republican State Central committee representing the Ninth district, and also a member of the Cook County Central Republican committee. Socially and fraternally he is identified with the Germania Männerchor, the Hamilton, Marquette and Chicago Athletic clubs, and is a thirty-second degree Mason.

William T. Burgess, of the Chicago bar, died October 31, 1895. He was born in Upper Canada, November 5, 1816. He was admitted to the Illinois bar October 6, 1840, and after teaching school in Madison county for $12 a month, located in Belvidere, where he was elected recorder of the county in 1843. He removed to Chicago in the forties, and conducted an active practice here up to within three weeks of his death. He ranked high among the ablest lawyers. He had, probably, in the fifty-five years he was at the bar, tried as many, if not more, chancery cases than any other lawyer now living in Chicago. He was for several years engaged in the practice of law with Gen. John F. Farnsworth, and for a time with Hon. James P. Root, but the greatest portion of his time was spent in practicing law alone. The bench and bar had great respect for Mr. Burgess's legal ability.

William Busse, president of the Board of Cook County Commissioners, was born in Elk Grove township, Cook county, Illinois, on January 27, 1864. His parents, Louis and Christina (Kirschhoff) Busse, and his grandparents, Frederick and Fredericka Busse, were natives of Hanover, Germany.

The family came to America about the middle of the last century and were among the early pioneer farmers of Elk Grove township, in this county. William Busse passed his early years on the home place, assisting his father in caring for the farm, manufacturing butter and cheese, merchandising, and attending the district schools. Upon attaining his majority he began farming for himself, but in 1890, by appointment of Sheriff Gilbert, became a deputy county sheriff, serving as such ten years. The capable and conscientious fulfillment of the duties to which he was assigned attracted the attention of the political leaders and the public and in 1900 he was nominated and elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners. The same painstaking care attended his efforts as a member of the legislative body of Cook county and he has ever since been retained in this office by reelection.

So efficient had been his services that he was elected president of the Board to succeed Edward J. Brundage, and in 1908 he was reelected to this position by one of the greatest majorities ever given a candidate for this office. In the years to come the administration of President Busse will be recognized as one of the best ever given to Cook county. He is a Republican of the stalwart kind and one who has the entire confidence of the public. He has been twice married, and has seven children now living, William, Martha (now Mrs. Albert Froemling), Mathilde, Albert and Sophia by Sophia (Bartels) Busse, and Helen and Frederick by Dina Busse. Mr. Busse has become identified with a number of private and semi-public institutions, all of which have been benefited by his keen discernment and practical business ability.

William T. Bussey was born on December 5, 1854, and is a son of Esek and Cornelia (Cruikshank) Bussey, both of whom were born and reared in the city of Troy, New York. William T., the subject of this review, was educated in the public schools and academy of Troy, but at the age of 18 entered the foundry of Bussey, McLeod & Co. in that city and there continued until 1876, when he came to Cook county and entered the employ of the Chicago Stove works at Blue Island avenue and Twenty-second street, as bookkeeper. There he has been occupied down to the present time. He was advanced steadily, through merit, from post to post until at the present time he is president of the concern. He is a member of the Presbyterian church and is president of the Illinois club. He is well and favorably known to the business men of Chicago. On October 12, 1876, he married Ella M. Lusk, and to this marriage two daughters were born—Irene and Cornelia.

Capt. John M. Butler has a record during the Civil war well worth preserving. He was born July 12, 1835, at Cottage City, Island of Martha's Vineyard, Massachusetts. In May, 1861, he enlisted in the United States navy, at Chicago, Illinois, and shortly thereafter was assigned to duty on the U. S. S. "Michigan," then lying at Erie, Pennsylvania. For a time he was employed in a clerical capacity, but after special instruction by Commander Carter, was sworn into service and ordered to the receiving ship, "North Carolina," under Commander Richard W. Meade. For some weeks he served in the "office of detail," then was one of the six youngest seamen from several hundred selected as gunner students and sent to the Washington navy yard for instruction. For several months he underwent a severe drilling in the use of great guns, howitzers, small arms, filling shells, and performing experimental work in testing guns. Passing his examination successfully, he was appointed master's mate by Commodore Dahlgren, and reported for duty on board the U.S. frigate "Roanoke," then lying at Hampton Roads, Virginia, and was thus attached during the famous engagement of the "Monitor" and the "Merrimac."

In the spring of 1862 he was transferred to duty on the "North Carolina" and "Savannah," where he was drilled in the use of great guns and broad-swords. Succeeding this, he passed his examination as acting master and after receiving his appointment as such was selected from twenty-four volunteer masters for duty on board the U. S. ironclad "New Ironsides," Commodore Thomas Turner commanding, and given command of the Fourth division of great guns. As a part of the North Atlantic squadron, under command of Rear Admiral Dupont, he participated in the battle of Fort Sumter, April 7, 1863. Shortly thereafter he was made executive officer of the gunboat "Settin," which captured the prize "Diamond" steamer off St. Simon's Island, Georgia, as it was endeavoring to run the blockade. Of this vessel he was made prize master. He continued on board the "Settin" until she went out of commission at Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1864, during which time he assisted in the blockading of St. Helena Sound, North Edisto, St. Simon's Sound, and became so familiar with the coast that without lights or bouys he could enter any port between Charlestown, South Carolina, and Fernandina, Florida. Being assigned to the command of the "Memphis," he was on special service in assisting the removal of the Naval Academy from Newport to Annapolis, and late in 1864 was ordered to the monitor "Waxsaw" as executive officer. This vessel going out of commission, he was on board the "South Carolina," where he continued until peace was declared.

Only courage and executive ability of a high order enabled Captain Butler to attain the ranks given him during the perilous years of the great American conflict. In the spring of 1866 he received orders from the Navy department to take charge of a draft of fifty seamen at New York and report to Capt. A. Bryson, commanding the U. S. S. "Michigan," then lying at Black Rock, near Buffalo, New York, during the Fenian raid. He was assigned command of a tug carrying howitzers and an armed crew to patrol the Niagara river. He was honorably discharged with the thanks of the department, April 1, 1868.

Captain Butler is one of the well-known figures in army and navy circles, and is a member of Mulligan post No. 306, G. A. R. He was United States gauger from 1885 to 1901, served as collector for the World's Columbian exposition in 1892-93-94, and during the Forty-fourth Congress was secretary of two special committees. He married Catherine Bock July 6, 1866, who died May 20, 1891, leaving two daughters, Lena and Beatrice.

It is not generally known here that paper making in the West had its origin at St. Charles, on Fox river, and was begun by Oliver Morris Butler, the progenitor of the present gentlemen of that name now members of the J. W. Butler Paper company, of this city. The establishment of this industry in the then remote West was an enterprise requiring great patience, fortitude and self-denial. Early in the nineteenth century Zebediah Butler, Sr., and Zebediah Butler, Jr., were interested in a paper mill at Hubbell's Falls, Vermont. There Oliver Morris Butler learned the art of paper making and there J. W. Butler was born. At this mill paper now known as straw wrapping was made. At a later date Oliver Morris Butler went to Lee, Massachusetts, to perfect his knowledge of paper-making at a large paper plant then recently erected at that place. In 1840 he returned to Hubbell's Falls and in effecting a settlement of debt due him took as part payment a quantity of finished paper, which he brought to Chicago in 1841. This was the real beginning of the J. W. Butler Paper company.

He located at St. Charles, Kane county, Illinois, distant about thirty miles from Chicago, and there at once built a wrapping-paper mill, and later upon the opposite bank of the Fox river built a print-paper plant—the first west of Pittsburg. It should also be noted in this connection, and of historical interest, that Simeon and Asa Butler, members of another branch of the family, made the first letter paper of an American mill to be used in the Senate of the United States. In 1844 Oliver Morris Butler opened a jobbing house in Chicago for the sale of the paper made at his St. Charles mill. A few years later his brother, J. W. Butler, present head of the J. W. Butler Paper company, was given sole charge of the Chicago house. For sixty-five years (1909) this house has been continuously in active operation in Chicago. It has grown with the city itself, and has steadily increased in prosperity. It has passed through the various financial panics without its credit being questioned or impaired, and is today a typical old-time business establishment with present-time business methods. While Oliver Morris Butler can be credited with being its founder, its career has been dominated by Julius Wales Butler, and to him is due the credit of its sound status among the large business concerns of the city.

The Butlers of this memoir belong to a branch hailing from New England, where they settled early in the seventeenth century, and are descended from Lieut. William Butler of Ipswich, Massachusetts, who married, in 1675, Sarah, daughter of Robert Cross.

Oliver Morris Butler was born at Rochester, Vermont, April 3, 1819. At the age of 7 or 8 years his family moved to Essex, Vermont, where stood the paper mill of Zebediah Butler, and he there learned the paper-making industry. After the property passed to Mr. Butler he continued to work for the latter. He went to St. Charles, Kane county, Illinois, and about the year 1850 built there a large mill for the manufacture of print paper. About 1860 he built another and larger mill for the same kind of paper. This mill was destroyed by fire during the war, but the ruins are still (1909) standing. In October, 1847, he married Reform Willard at her brother's home near Janesville, Wisconsin. To their marriage six children were born, as follows: Louise, born August 22, 1848, died at St. Charles, November 6, 1850; Emma, born March 13, 1850, died at St. Charles, October 18, 1850; Clara, born February 2, 1857, died at St. Charles March 10, 1862; Eva, born July 16, 1852, married James W. Ellsworth of Chicago, died at Chicago; Chester, born January 31, 1855, married Jennie Butler (no kin) of Little Rock, Arkansas; and Nellie, born May 22, 1859, married William R. Linn of Chicago. Oliver Morris Butler died of paralysis on December 19, 1888, and was buried at Oak Hill cemetery, near Geneva. His wife also lies buried in same cemetery.

Julius Wales Butler was born in Essex, Vermont, May 7, 1828, at a place called Hubbell's Falls. The house in which he was born is still standing and is located just above the dam, a few rods from the river's edge. At the age of 13 he was taken to Hinesburg, Vermont, where he lived with the family of Thomas W. Gibb, a maker of saddles, harness, trunks, etc. In October, 1848, he came West to St. Charles, Illinois, and entered the employ of Oliver M. Butler and B. T. Hunt, and soon after took charge of their Chicago paper warehouse. Later the Chicago branch merged into the J. W. Butler Paper company, of which Julius Wales Butler is today president, and with his two sons, Frank Osgood and Julius Fred, are the sole owners. In 1857 Julius Wales Butler married, at St. Charles, Julia Anna Osgood. She was born at Cambridgeport, Vermont, on August 29, 1827, and was the daughter of Jedediah and Mary (Bellows) Osgood. Their four children are as follows: Florence Elizabeth, born at St. Charles, August 11, 1859, died at Paris, France, November 9, 1877; Frank Osgood, born at Chicago, April 22, 1861, married Fannie Maud Bremaker on January 10, 1885; Jennie Butler, born at Chicago, May 8, 1863, died June 3, 1864; Julius Fred, born at Chicago, July 20, 1866, married Lilly Jane Taggart, April 17, 1890. The children of Frank Osgood Butler are: A daughter, born at Chicago, January 26, 1890, died at birth, unnamed; Paul, born at Chicago, June 23, 1892; Julius Wales, born at Chicago, June 19, 1895. The children of Julius Fred are: Julius Wales, born at Oak Park, 1891, died same year; Russel Taggart, born at Oak Park in 1891, died same year; Florence Elizabeth, born at Oak Park, July 12, 1892.

Justin Butterfield, with whom Mr. Collins was associated as a partner about ten years, was born in Keene, New Hampshire, in 1790. He graduated from Williams college in 1807; studied law with Judge Egbert Ten Eyck, in Watertown, New York, and was admitted to the bar in 1812. After his admission to the bar he opened an office in Adams, Jefferson county, New York, but soon removed to Sackett's Harbor, where he remained until the close of the war with Great Britain, when he removed to New Orleans. He there studied the civil code of that State, and obtained a high rank in his profession and a lucrative practice. He remained in New Orleans about ten years, and then, because of the effect of the Southern climate on the health of his family and himself, he returned to Watertown. He there resumed the practice of law, but in 1834 he made a journey to Chicago, and in 1835 he removed his family there, and soon after he and Mr. Collins became partners. In his intellectual grasp and the breadth and copiousness of his learning Mr. Butterfield was, without question, the ablest and most amply prepared lawyer that Chicago had during his time.

He was, like Mr. Collins, a hard worker, and I think did his work more easily, and all his cases showed careful and conscientious investigation. He not only knew and was prepared on all points of his own side of the case, but, as far as it was possible to do, he understood the position of his opponents, and had a ready reply to their arguments. He was witty and quick at repartee, but his wit was rather of the caustic and severe type; and his manner, too, was rather crusty and repellent toward those he did not know or did not like; but in his intercourse with those whom he knew and respected no man could be more genial or attractive; and his deportment toward the courts and his brother lawyers was always dignified and gentlemanly. His copious knowledge of the law in all its phases made him a sort of encyclopedia or reference book for the indolent practitioners, who preferred asking him what the law was in a given state of facts, rather than to look the matter up for themselves. This habit became so much of a bore to him that he posted a notice in his study room, "No law questions answered except to clients who expect to pay for the answer." When he was a young man he was a Federalist, and opposed the war with England in 1812. But the war became popular and his party lost and never regained its position; and he, individually, lost all hope of political preferment in New York State, where he then lived. This was to him a severe disappointment, for he loved politics. Therefore, when war was declared by our Government against Mexico, some one asked him if he was in favor of it, to which he replied: "In favor of it? Of course I am in favor of it; I am in favor of war, pestilence and famine. I lost enough by opposing one war to teach me not to oppose another."

In 1842 he was employed as attorney for Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet, to obtain by a writ of habeas corpus his release from arrest on a warrant which had been issued by the governor of this State for his (Smith's) extradition to Missouri, on a charge of being accessory to an attempted assassination of Governor Boggs of Missouri. The writ was issued by Judge Pope, then United States district judge of this State, and the prophet brought before the judge. Mr. Butterfield opened his argument in the case by saying, "I rise before the Pope, in the presence of angels" (gracefully waving his hand toward a group of ladies in the room), "to defend a prophet of the Lord." He then proceeded to discuss the law of extradition, as between States of our Union, in probably the most clear and masterly manner that it has ever been presented either before or since.

On the accession of General Harrison to the presidency Mr. Butterfield was appointed United States district attorney for the Illinois district, which then included the entire State, and filled the place ably during the entire term of Harrison and Tyler's administration; and when General Taylor became President, in 1849, Mr. Butterfield was appointed commissioner of the general land office, which office he filled to the end of the Taylor-Fillmore administration. He proved himself fully equal to the duties of this responsible and, at that time, difficult position; but his health broke down under his labors, and he never returned to the bar, although he lived until 1855. Taken all in all, without disparagement to the many able lawyers here at that time, Mr. Butterfield was at the head of the State bar during the entire time he lived and practiced in it. He may be said to have been the legal oracle so far as the opinions or utterances of a mere unofficial lawyer can be said to be oracular.

Dr. William H. Byford was a native of Easton, Ohio, where he was born May 21, 1817. When he reached the age of 9 years his father died, whereupon he became an apprentice to a tailor in Palestine, but completed his apprenticeship at Vincennes, Indiana. Almost from his start in life he designed to study medicine, and upon reaching a suitable age, knowing the importance of a liberal education, he not only perfected himself in the English language but also in the Greek and Latin classics.

He began the study of medicine under Dr. Joseph Matteson of Vincennes, and so rapid was his progress he passed the necessary examination and at the end of eighteen months was granted a certificate by the examining board. He hung out his shingle at Vincennes, Indiana, and there remained for two years, when he became a partner of Dr. Hezekiah Hammond of Mount Vernon, Indiana. In 1844 Dr. Byford still further increased his medical knowledge and usefulness by special lectures at the Ohio Medical college, from which he received his medical degree. In 1850 he accepted the chair of anatomy in the Evansville college, and a year later was promoted to that of theory and practice of medicine. In 1857 he became one of the vice-presidents of the American Medical association, and the same year accepted the chair of obstetrics and diseases of children in Rush Medical college.

In 1859 he became connected with the medical department of Lind university. Dr. Byford was the originator of many reforms in practice. He was the founder of gynecology as a specialty in Chicago. He first projected a woman's hospital in 1865, to which he afterward devoted much time and means. In 1876 he assisted in organizing the American Gynecological association and was one of its first vice-presidents, becoming later its president. He distinguished himself as writer on medical subjects. In 1875 he became editor-in-chief of the Chicago Medical Journal and Examiner, which he conducted for a number of years. He published many works on private diseases, several of which passed through a series of editions. His writings were based wholly upon his own wide and observant experiences. At the zenith of his career, he passed away.

John C. Cannon has been commended by all parties for his admirable administration as president of the Board of Election Commissioners. A native of the city of Chicago, Mr. Cannon was born at the corner of State and Michigan streets, September 11, 1863, and is one of a family of four sons, all living, born to Cornelius and Ellen (Dooner) Cannon. The parents were natives of County Leitrim, Ireland, the father immigrating to America when 16 years old, having been preceded by an uncle and a sister. John C. Cannon attended the Franklin and Jones schools and after graduating from the Jones school in 1877, started out in life for himself as an errand boy for the Western Electric company. He continued in the employ of this firm until 1903, being gradually advanced to more responsible positions as his qualifications warranted until he was head of the city sales department. He then became manager of the Chicago office of the Consolidated Fire Alarm company, continuing as such until it became the Automatic Fire Protection company by consolidation and purchase.

He is a resident of the Twenty-sixth ward, where he has been an active factor in politics for many years. In 1897 he was elected alderman from his ward, and in July, 1905, was appointed a member of the Board of Election Commissioners to succeed Judge John W. Houston, who had been appointed to the County court bench. He has since served continuously as a member of this body. Immediately after his appointment he was elected president of the Board, an honor he has since worthily worn. Mr. Cannon is a member of the Knights of Columbus, the National Union, the Catholic Order of Foresters and the Irish Fellowship club. On November 19, 1889, he married Miss Anna Redell, and they are the parents of two daughters, Irene and Clara.

Joseph Carolan, Republican county commissioner, was born in Oswego, New York, February 25, 1852, of Irish parentage. His father was George Henry Carolan and his mother Katherine (Hoey) Carolan. At the age of 9 years he was left an orphan. He lived with a relative, attending public schools, until he was 16 years of age. He first came to Chicago in 1868, remained a short time and returned to the East. Learning the printer's trade, he came to Chicago, where he worked on the Inter Ocean from 1872 to 1880; was appointed deputy sheriff of Cook county in 1880, serving six years under Sheriffs Mann and Hanchett. He was then appointed chief deputy of the Criminal department, sheriff's office, serving twelve years under Sheriffs Matson, Gilbert and Pease. He was elected county commissioner in 1898 and reelected five consecutive terms. Mr. Carolan was married first October 9, 1883, to Fannie M. Drake of Chicago. He was again married June 5, 1894, to Lida J. Robinson, at Kenosha, Wisconsin. He resides with his wife and five children, Josephine L., Ethel F., Penn N., George F. and Florence M., at 277 Park avenue, River Forest. He is a member of Oak Park lodge, A. F. and A. M., Royal League and Royal Arcanum.

Edward W. Casey, one of the first settlers in Chicago, came here as early as 1832, and the year following became interested in legal matters as deputy Circuit court clerk. Late in 1833 he began practicing law, having previously read for the bar in the East, was made corporation counsel to succeed John Dean Caton in 1834 and was regularly admitted to the bar of the State in January, 1835. In that year he was elected a justice of the peace, and in 1836 he took an active part in petitioning for a city charter. He was a man of superior education, and, being an industrious student, became well qualified to practice law. In the year 1838 he returned to the East to recuperate his failing health, and never returned to the city of Chicago for the purpose of making it a home.

John R. Caverly, city attorney, whose name is familiarly recalled as a police magistrate prior to the inauguration of the present Municipal court system, was born December 6, 1861, in London, England, a son of James and Mary (Bolter) Caverly, who were natives of Ireland and England respectively. The father was a machinist by trade. In 1868 he immigrated to America with his family, and after a short stay in New York came to Chicago, where he worked at his trade until his death in 1902. John R. Caverly has passed his entire life in the city of Chicago with the exception of the first seven years. Like the majority of the boys of this great metropolis whose parents were compelled to work hard for a livelihood, he passed his youthful days in attending school and working at such odd jobs as he could find to do.

After graduating from St. Patrick's academy in 1880, he worked four years as a clerk in the coal office of T. Ryan & Co., then for several years thereafter was a railway mail clerk between Chicago and Cincinnati, and subsequently was employed in the meter department of the city of Chicago. He then began the study of law in the office of Asay Redfield & Clare, and at night attended the Chicago Kent College of Law, from which he was graduated in 1897. Immediately after graduation he entered upon the practice of his chosen profession as an assistant in the office of the city attorney, continuing as such until 1903, when he became a justice of the peace and police magistrate at the Harrison street station. In December, 1906, the justice courts in the city of Chicago were abolished by legislative enactment, and in 1907 Mr. Caverly was appointed city attorney by Mayor Dunne and has since officiated in that capacity. Mr. Caverly is a member of the Roman Catholic church, is a member of the Iroquois and the New Illinois Athletic clubs, the Chicago Bar and the Illinois State Bar associations, and belongs to the Knights of Columbus and the Royal Arcanum. In 1898 he was united in marriage with Miss Charlotte J. Cochran. He resides at McCoy's hotel in the First ward.

Jerome Bonaparte Chambers was born March 14, 1819, in Sharon, Litchfield county, Connecticut, where his father, George Chambers, had settled upon his arrival from England. He received his early education in his native state, and for a time read law at the Poughkeepsie (New York) academy. When 18 years old he began teaching country schools and singing schools in Connecticut and New York state, and in 1843 married Alice Frances Reynolds, at McLean, Tompkins county, New York. He subsequently located at Ithaca, that state, where he practiced law for a time and became very much interested in politics, and where his children, Beverly R. and Ava W., now Mrs. John A. Farwell, were born.

Mr. Chambers was an ardent anti-slavery man and in 1856, when John C. Fremont, "the Pathfinder," was the first nominee of the Republican party for the presidency, he delivered one hundred stump speeches, which were noted for logic, eloquence and wit. During a portion of his early life he also traveled and sold goods, but finally, in 1857, located in Chicago. Having acquired sufficient capital, he established the jewelry firm of J. B. Chambers & Co., which was a success from the beginning and which has been continued to the present time—latterly under the name of Charles E. Graves & Co. Mr. Chambers was a large man, of striking appearance, and strong and attractive personality. He was warm-hearted, humorous, genial, had an excellent bass voice, was a great storyteller, and was a warm companion and a trusted friend. He possessed excellent business capacity and for many years was favorably known to all the leading men of this city. His word was his bond. He died on January 15, 1886, at his residence, 692 Washington boulevard. His son, Beverly Romulus, was born at Ithaca, New York on March 30, 1845, and was educated in the public schools of Chicago. His first business experience was with the wholesale drug house of Fuller & Fuller, and later he kept books for the wholesale grocery company of Gilman, Grannis & Farwell, but in 1865 joined his father in the jewelry business at Clark and Madison streets, where he remained until his death, in April, 1886. He was unmarried. He inherited many of the characteristics of his father, noticeably his aptitude for making and retaining friends and his keen business ability.

Samuel Blanchard Chase, of English ancestry, was born at Hopkinton, N. H., October 1, 1823, and died in Chicago.

He was graduated from Dartmouth college in 1844, studied law and was admitted to the bar in New Hampshire and was in the general practice of his profession there until 1850, when he came to Chicago. He had expected to devote himself to the law in his new field of endeavor, but foresaw some of the possibilities of the abstract business and, with James H. Rees as a partner, opened a pioneer abstract office, they having been the earliest in the city in that line of business. Their partnership existed twenty-one years, and Mr. Chase was later associated as an abstractor with John B. King and later still with his brother, Horace G. Chase. The fire of 1871 left no complete set of abstracts of Chicago titles in existence. From partial sets saved by different firms Mr. Chase and his associates reconstructed a set. Not long afterward they leased it to Handy, Simmons & Co., and Mr. Chase retired from the abstract business, knowing that he had been a prime factor in perfecting an invaluable work which has grown to proportions and importance far beyond any early conception of it. He took no active part in political strife except in Lake View, where in the early days of this town he worked for many years hard and conscientiously in the betterment of the local government as supervisor because of his intimate knowledge of local real estate values and conditions he was called to membership of the State Board of Equalization, on which he served four years with ability and distinction. He married Miss Emma E. Thompson, of Amherst, Mass., June 1, 1863, and she bore him six children.

Samuel T. Chase, son of Samuel Blanchard and Emma E. (Thompson) Chase, was born September 24, 1867, at his father's residence on Belmont avenue (then Chase street). He gained his primary education in grammar schools and in the Lake View high school and was prepared by tutors for Cambridge University, which he entered in 1888, studying there three years. For a year after leaving college he was a clerk in a wholesale grocery store at Duluth, Minn. Returning to Chicago he was treasurer of the Kilmer Wire Manufacturing company three years. Then he was employed two years and a half as special agent for the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance company. His next employment was as president and manager of the Royal Gas Light company for about two years and a half, until in 1905 he was appointed general agent for the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance company, a position which he has successfully filled ever since. In his politics he is independent.

He affiliates with the University club, Chicago club, the Onwentsia Golf club, the Chicago Athletic club and the Winter club of Lake Forest. He married Miss Mary Ayer, daughter of B. F. Ayer, a leading lawyer of Chicago, in 1866, and has three children. His home is at Lake Forest, Ill.

Ellis S. Chesbrough was one of Chicago's greatest engineers. He was born in Baltimore, Maryland, a son of Isaac M. Chesbrough, who was an engineer of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad company. His early opportunities for securing an education were meager, but his lack in this respect was remedied in later years, to a considerable extent, by study and practical experience. He early identified himself with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad company and thus continued until 1830, when he was employed on special railroad work by the state of Pennsylvania. He was subsequently engaged in engineering work for various corporations in the East until December, 1855, when he came to Chicago as chief engineer of the Board of Sewerage Commissioners to devise plans for a sewerage system of the city. His plans were adopted and established his reputation as one of the greatest experts anywhere. He became city engineer and so continued to 1882, and his deeds for good are innumerable and the records he left in the city archives will remain for generations to come. Mr. Chesbrough has long since passed away, and his name forgotten except by a few, but Chicago will forever owe him a debt of gratitude.

Carl Richard Chindblom, lawyer and a member of the Board of County Commissioners, was born December 21, 1870, in the city of Chicago, and is one in a family of eleven children, seven now living, born to Carl P. and Christine (Engel) Chindblom. The parents were both natives of Sweden, where they were married. They immigrated to America early in the year 1870, locating in Chicago, where they have since resided and where the father is engaged in the tailoring business.

Carl R. Chindblom received his early education in the public schools, but in the fall of 1884 he entered Augustana college at Rock Island, Illinois, completing both the academic and collegiate courses of that institution, graduating in 1890 from the classical course. He was chiefly engaged in teaching school until the fall of 1896, when he entered the Kent College of Law, from which he was graduated in 1898. Shortly thereafter he embarked in the practice of law, which he has since continued.

In 1894 he was called upon to assist in the campaign of that year, as a speaker, by the Republican Central committee of Michigan, and in the years of 1896 and 1900 held similar positions with the Republican National committee, his efforts being confined principally to Illinois. In 1906 he became the nominee of his party for the office of county commissioner, and the ensuing fall was elected to this position, and reelected in 1908. By appointment he was attorney for the State Board of Health in 1906, but resigned this office the same year. Mr. Chindblom is affiliated with various benevolent and social organizations. He is a member of the Lutheran church, is a Republican in politics, a Knight Templar, and a member of the Mystic Shrine. On April 27, 1907, he was united in marriage with Miss Christine Nilsson of Minneapolis, Minn.

Dr. B. J. Cigrand has been prominent in dental, educational and literary circles for many years. In 1891 he pursued a course at the University of Chicago, taking a non-resident course in the latter institution in industrial, educational and political economy. He was born at Fredonia, Wis., October 1, 1866, and after his graduation from the grammar and high school of that town he took normal and science courses in the Valparaiso University, Indiana, receiving the degree of Bachelor of Science in 1886, and Master of Science in 1898. He was graduated from the dental department of Lake Forest University in 1888, being valedictorian of his class.

Since his graduation from Lake Forest University he has been engaged in the practice of his profession in this city. In connection therewith he has been professor of prosthetic dentistry and for several years president of the American College of Dental Surgery, which institution merged into Northwestern University Dental school, when he held professorship of dental prosthesis. In 1900 he was professor of dental prosthesis and history, Illinois School of Dentistry; this school is now the dental department of the University of Illinois, where he continued as professor of dental prosthesis, technics and history up to 1907; and was the dean of the dental department of the University of Illinois for four years. In 1900 Dr. Cigrand was specially honored by being chosen as the Illinois delegate to the International Congress in Paris, and in this capacity he served with distinction. In the same year he was delegate to the International Congress of Educators, held in Paris. He has been a director in the Public Library Board during the administration of Harrison, Dunne and Busse, so that he is perfectly conversant with the work and the needs of the public in this particular field. He was the only member recently reappointed by Mayor Busse, and at present serving his second term as president of the Library Board.

Some idea of his versatility and literary attainments may be gathered from the statement that he is the author of many historical and professional works and lectures on themes relating to the colonial history of America, besides contributing to many dental and literary periodicals. Among the more notable of his works are: "Compendium of Dentistry," "History of Dentistry," the "Lower Third of the Face," the "Story of the Great Seal of the United States," (three editions, fourth in press), "Historical Queries and Answers." He is joint author with Professor Edward S.

Ellis of the "Life of Alexander Hamilton," has been a valued contributor to the Encyclopedia Americana, author of the "Huguenot Family of Crispe," also "History of Medicine." And is of the literary staff of the Chicago Inter Ocean, where his interesting and original articles on early American history are valued. Dr. Cigrand has not only extended his wide circle of acquaintances, but has rendered service of the most commendable character in accepting and for seven years filling the position of lecturer in the Chicago Daily News public lecture course. In this work he has been eminently successful, and he has won the highest esteem of thousands of people, old and young, as an educational factor and a public spirited citizen. He is the author of the successful drama of the American Revolution entitled "Stronger Than King," now in the third season.

At present lecturer on "Medical History," Medical College of University of Illinois, he is an influential member of many dental, scientific, literary and fraternal societies. He designed the new great seal of the United States; designed the new seal of Chicago and is the designer of the new Cook county seal entablatured on the Clark street side of our new courthouse building. Dr. Cigrand enjoys the respect and esteem of all who know him, and the name of his friends is legion. His associates on the Public Library Board have shown fine judgment in placing him at its head. It is safe to say that no former occupant of the office has been more admirably qualified for the discharge of its duties. In his personality one finds illustrated those traits which make for the best in American citizenship. In 1889 he was married to Miss Alice N. Crispe, and they are the parents of three boys and three girls. Dr. and Mrs. Cigrand's beautiful home at Logan Square is considered as possessing the most complete library on Americana in that section of the city. The wife has been a great aid in his strenuous career. In the Lincoln Centennial celebration, Mayor Busse appointed him one of the committee of one hundred, which body elected him chairman of the Municipal Libraries celebration, and member of the executive committee.

Albert C. Clark has won distinction as a progressive and successful business man of the city of Chicago and as a member of the Upper House of the State Legislature. He was born February 7, 1868, at Stilesville, Indiana, but when a child was taken by his parents, Elijah and Nancy Jane (Matlock) Clark, to Mattoon, Illinois, where he was reared and received his early schooling, completing his education at Loxa's Teacher's Institute at Loxa, Illinois. He then came to Chicago and was first employed sorting scrap iron in the North Chicago Rolling Mill at $1.15 per day, then for three years was in the insurance business in La Salle street.

At this period of his career he became a salesman for dental supplies, and, having mastered the requirements in this line of endeavor, embarked in the manufacture of dental supplies in 1895 under the firm name of A. C. Clark & Co. From a small beginning, manufacturing under contract, with headquarters down town, the volume of his business increased to such an extent that in 1907 all departments were moved to the present location at Seventy-fifth and Greenwood streets. From its inception to the present time, a period of thirteen years, it has grown to be one of the large establishments of the city, transacting an annual business approximating $500,000 and with branches in London, Paris and Berlin.

In politics, Mr. Clark is an uncompromising Republican, and as such, in 1902, was elected state senator from the Thirteenth Senatorial district, and reelected to this position at the conclusion of his term four years later. His career as a senator was one of activity and commendation, and during both terms he served as chairman of the Senate caucus. His vote and influence on the Direct Primary bill, on the Chicago Charter bill, and on all other measures of a beneficial character to the state, county and city, were such as to elicit commendation from all, regardless of party affiliation. He was particularly active in securing the needed legislation creating additional parks for Chicago, eight of them being added to the Thirteenth district, the Field Museum act being especially noteworthy. His ability was recognized in the appointment of committees by his appointment to the chairmanship of waterways and drainage and to membership on the committees on canals and rivers, parks and boulevards, corporations, insurance, penal and reformatory institutions, railroads, revenue, labor and manufactures, license and miscellany, and others. Among other important legislation with which he was particularly identified was the forcing of action regulating gas and electric light rates in Chicago; the abolishment of the so-called educational institutions issuing diplomas for merely a monetary consideration, and the act annexing Evanston and South Chicago territories to the Sanitary district.

Senator Clark is a Knight Templar Mason, a member of the Mystic Shrine, and belongs to the Chicago Athletic, the Illinois Athletic, the South Shore Country, the Hamilton, the Woodlawn and other clubs. He has been particularly active in all local matters pertaining to the good of the Calumet district, and has always been a consistent supporter with time and money of all enterprises of a laudable character. He is married and resides at 7137 Euclid avenue.

Edward Clifford was born in Virginia, Cass county, Illinois, December 21, 1873, and is the son of James H. Clifford, also a native of Illinois, who served with credit throughout the Civil war in Company K, Thirty-third Illinois volunteer infantry.

Edward, subject, attended the public and high schools of his native city, and Whipple academy and Illinois college at Jacksonville, Illinois, graduating from the latter institution in 1896. He then served for two years as principal of the high school for boys at the Illinois Institution for the Education of the Blind at Jacksonville, Illinois, resigning in order to take up the study of law. He was a student in the law department of Washington university, St. Louis, Missouri, and graduated in the class of 1900 with the degree of Bachelor of Laws; was admitted to the Illinois bar in 1900, and began the practice of law in Virginia, Illinois, as the junior partner of the firm of Mills & Clifford. There he remained in active general practice until February 1, 1903, when he moved to Chicago and opened an office in the New York Life building.

Mr. Clifford continued practicing his profession in Chicago for four years, paying special attention to corporation law. This brought him in close touch with capitalists and bankers, and January 1, 1907, he was persuaded to drop the law and enter the financial field; so he became the representative in Chicago of the well-known banking firm of Hornblower & Weeks, members of the New York and Boston stock exchanges, with offices in the principal cities of the United States. He opened an office for this firm on the third floor of the Central Trust Company of Illinois building, 152 Monroe street, which is now recognized as one of the leading financial institutions of Chicago.

Mr. Clifford is a member of the Chicago Stock Exchange and a director of the Monroe National bank, and although he has but recently entered the banking circles he is now one of the best known young men in this line in Chicago. He is a member of the Union League, University, and Bankers' clubs of Chicago, the Country club of Evanston, and the Glen View Golf club. In the university he was a member of the legal fraternity, Phi Delta Phi. He is a communicant of St. Mark's Episcopal church, Evanston; he also belongs to the Modern Woodmen, the Men's club of St. Mark's church, and the Evanston Historical society; he is a member of the ways and means committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce and is one of the most active workers of the association. He is a Republican in politics and was a delegate to the Republican state conventions of 1904 and 1908. On January 1, 1901, Mr. Clifford was married to Miss Anne W. Lambert of Jacksonville, Illinois, and they have two children, Edward Lambert and Helen Elizabeth. The family resides at 1306 Oak avenue, Evanston, Illinois.

William F. Cluett has been a valuable aid to John Kjellander in the reorganization of the office of city sealer and in establishing it on a thoroughly efficient business basis. He was born July 15, 1872, in the city of Chicago, and is one in a family of three children, two now living, born to William W. and Annie A. (Nolan) Cluett, who were natives of the Island of Aldernay and America respectively.

The career of William W. Cluett is especially noteworthy. He was brought to America by his parents when a child and was reared and educated in this country. When civil war was declared in 1861 he enlisted, at the age of 14 years, for the preservation of the Union in Company E, Fifty-seventh Illinois volunteer infantry. When 16 years and 2 days of age he received his commission as drum major, and it is said he was the youngest soldier in the service to receive such commission. He served all through the war and was honorably mustered out at its close in 1865. For twenty-six years he was a member of the Chicago police department, the last sixteen years of his service occupying the office of police sergeant. He died July 17, 1899.

William F. Cluett attended the Hayes grammar school, and when yet in his teens became a clerk for Sprague, Warner & Co. In 1891 he became deputy city sealer under Dr. T. N. Jamieson, and after serving as such for thirteen years was appointed chief deputy city sealer, an office he has since filled. In point of service Mr. Cluett is the oldest employe in this department, and his practical knowledge has contributed, in a great measure, to bring about the reforms that have been inaugurated. He is a Republican in politics and resides at 11 North California avenue. He was married to Miss Bertha J. Starr, daughter of John Starr, of Dubuque, Iowa.

Warren E. Colburn is one of the well-known business men in that part of Chicago generally known as South Chicago, and has always been public spirited and prominently active in bringing about the wonderful advancement and commercial prosperity of that section of the city during the past decade. He was born at Preston, Minnesota, July 26, 1856, a son of Nathan P. and Mary (Eames) Colburn, who were natives of New Hampshire and Massachusetts respectively.

Nathan P. Colburn was a cabinetmaker by trade, but after his removal to Minnesota in 1853 he studied law, was admitted to the bar and achieved distinction as a lawyer. He was a member of the territorial convention, and after Minnesota had become a state served in the Legislature and was otherwise prominent in local politics.

Warren E. Colburn was educated in the public schools and in the University of Minnesota. He later entered the law department of the University of Wisconsin, from which he was graduated in 1883. For six years he was associated with his father in the practice of law, but in 1889 came to Chicago and, recognizing the wonderful possibilities of the southern section of the city, located at South Chicago and embarked in the real estate business.

In 1894 he purchased from Swan & Wilder the Merchants' Exchange bank, which he has since conducted under the firm name of W. E. Colburn & Company. In connection with a regular banking business, a real estate department has been added which is conducted by Colburn, Gehring & Company. Mr. Colburn is the dominating factor in both concerns. He is a Republican and has served as president of the Eighth Ward Republican club. In 1904 he was elected a member of the State Board of Equalization for the term of four years and at the August, 1908, primaries was nominated as a Republican candidate for County Commissioner of Cook county and elected to that position in November following. He is a member of Harbor lodge, No. 731, A. F. and A. M., Sinai chapter, No. 185, R. A. M., Calumet commandery, No. 62, K. T. and Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He also belongs to the Illinois Athletic club and the Hamilton club. In 1878 he married Miss Mertice C. Smith and resides at 7306 Bond avenue.

Ireland has given to Chicago a no more worthy and desirable family than that of William M. Connery, who lived in this city from 1863 to 1883, dying at the latter date, and leaving a large and interesting family. His wife deserves no less honor and grateful remembrance, for she became the mother of fourteen children, with not one black sheep in the flock. Her sons have honored her and their father and distinguished themselves in the paths of industry and good conduct. They are of the "bone and sinew" of the city, loyal to it and to their country, and are progressive, ambitious and deserving.

William M. Connery was a native of County Tipperary, Ireland, his birth occurring in 1833. He was reared to manhood in his native country, receiving a common school education. In the year 1852 he immigrated to America. Until 1863 he resided in Rhode Island, engaged in farming. He there married Mary Tobin and in 1863 removed to Chicago, which was the home of himself and wife until their respective deaths, August 27, 1883, and December 14, 1896. While a resident of Chicago, Mr. Connery was engaged in railroading, bridge building, the grocery business and as a retail coal merchant. He superintended the building of the old North Pier for Fox & Howard. While ordinarily he was a Democrat, yet as a matter of fact he was an independent and original thinker along political lines. Both he and his wife were members of the Catholic church and died in that faith. They were the parents of a family of fourteen children, twelve of whom grew to years of maturity and live in Chicago: William M., John T., Michael M., James P., Francis D., Ellen M. (Mrs. James Rioridan), Joseph F., Henry T., Helena B., Vincent A., Catherine A., and Elizabeth M.

William M. Connery, the eldest of the family, was born at Bristol, Rhode Island, January 29, 1855, and was educated in the public and parochial schools of Chicago. When about twelve years of age he was employed by S. H. McCrea & Co., Board of Trade operators as collector, continuing with that firm two years, when he was employed by his father in the grocery store and later in the coal business. Since the death of his father he has confined his occupation exclusively to the coal business and is the present treasurer of the Miami Coal company. This corporation was organized in 1901 with a capitalization of $50,000. John T. Connery was the only member of the family at that time a member of the corporation and at its organization was elected its secretary. The object of the corporation was to own and operate coal mines and buy and sell coal. The three mines belonging to the corporation are located in Clay and Vigo counties, Indiana. In 1904, under the reorganization, John T. Connery was elected president and William M. Connery, who became a stockholder, was elected treasurer. These two brothers have since held these respective positions. At the time of the reorganization, the capital stock was increased to $250,000 and in 1905 was increased to $350,000, all fully paid up. In 1906 Michael M. Connery and James P. Connery became stockholders in the corporation, the latter being elected secretary and the former superintendent of yards and teams. H. V. Sherburne is the superintendent of mines with headquarters at Brazil, Indiana. The present output of the corporation is about 3,000 tons daily and the average annual business transacted is approximately $2,000,000. William M. Connery is, as are also all his brothers, a member of the Catholic church and the Democratic party. He was married April 2, 1907, to Miss Emma Duggan, by whom he is the father of one daughter, Charlotte Bernadette. He lives at 1186 Sheridan Road.

John T. Connery was born in Bristol, Rhode Island, January 10, 1861, receiving his education in the Chicago public and parochial schools and the Chicago Athenaeum. He was associated with his father in the grocery and coal business until 1879, then was employed as yard clerk for E. L. Hedstrom, coal merchant, until 1881, when he became cashier and bookkeeper for the Silver Creek and Morris Coal company, of which he later became a stockholder and in 1883 secretary. He continued with this concern until 1895, when the business was sold and merged into another corporation. He then became the resident manager and established the business of the Youghioghenny & Lehigh Coal company, continuing his association with this concern until he resigned to accept the presidency of the Miami Coal company, in which capacity he is now serving. He was married June 9, 1886, to Miss Mary E. Daly, by whom he is the father of six children, Mary E., Marguerite M., Esther L., John D. (deceased), Edwin F., and Bernadette (deceased). He resides at 2159 Sheridan Road, Edgewater, and is a member of the Edgewater Golf club, Edgewater Country club, South Shore Country club, Germania Country club, Chicago Athletic club, Illinois Athletic club, Chicago Automobile club and Midday club.

Michael M. Connery was the last of the children of William M. and Mary (Tobin) Connery, to be born at Bristol, Rhode Island. His birth occurred October 5, 1863, and when he was one month old he was brought by his parents to Chicago, where his early days were passed in attending school and assisting in such work as he was asked to perform. From the age of 18 to 24 he was employed on the farm in Iowa, and since then, with the exception of six months while working as a carpenter timbering up mines and as weigh-boss for W. P. Rend & Co., in Pennsylvania, has always resided in Chicago. In this city he served as superintendent of a shipping dock and as manager in charge of the teams of the Silver Creek & Morris Coal company until it was absorbed by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron company, continuing with the latter concern until January 15, 1896, since when he has been superintendent of yards and teams for the Miami Coal company. Since 1901, in company with his brother, Vincent A., he has also conducted a coal teaming business under the firm name of Connery Brothers. Mr. Connery belongs to the Columbian Knights and the Royal Arcanum. June 10, 1892, he wedded Miss Mary Murnane and to them these children have been born: William M., Mary Frances, Josephine, Edmund (deceased), Adaline (deceased), John M., Joseph, Henry and Elizabeth.

James P. Connery was born in the city of Chicago, May 17, 1865, receiving his education in the public and parochial schools of the city. When 16 years old he went to Hamilton county, Iowa, and was there four years working on a farm owned by his father. He then returned to Chicago and was employed as office clerk and later as salesman by the Silver Creek & Morris Coal company, remaining with this concern until it was taken over by the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron company. He was employed by the latter corporation as collector and sales agent until 1906, when he became a stockholder and secretary of the Miami Coal company, and is at present employed in that capacity. He was married June 5, 1885, to Miss Maria T. O'Donnell, by whom he is the father of four children: William J., Loretta, Helen and Gertrude. He resides at 1248 Washington boulevard.

Francis D. Connery is the only member of the family that has turned much of his attention to politics. He is a product of Chicago, his birth occurring April 12, 1867. He was educated in the public and parochial schools and at St. Patrick's Academy, and a few terms at the district schools in Iowa when there on his father's farm. His career as a man may be said to have begun as a clerk in the office of King & Bogle, coal merchants in 1883. In 1884 he was employed as a clerk for the Silver Creek & Morris Coal company and was later advanced to the position of cashier, continuing with this firm about five years, when he went to Omaha as book-keeper and salesman for the J. W. Thatcher Coal company. About one year later he returned to the employ of the Silver Creek & Morris Coal company as superintendent of the dock at West Superior, Wisconsin. He returned to Chicago for this firm in 1891, was with its successor, the Philadelphia & Reading Coal and Iron company, until August, 1892, and then became traveling salesman, then superintendent of yards and docks, and finally purchasing agent for the Peabody Coal company. Since April, 1907, he has been identified with the Miami Coal company. His political career began about the time he was Judge of Elections, in 1896. Later he was elected Captain of his precinct, and in April, 1901, was the first alderman elected from the present Twenty-eighth ward, running 900 votes ahead of his party's nominee for Mayor. Private business matters caused him to refuse to be a candidate at the expiration of his term, but in 1907, he was the nominee of his party again, and notwithstanding the fact that the Republican candidate for Mayor carried the ward by a majority of 820 votes, Mr. Connery was elected by a majority of eighty-three and now represents his ward in the City Council. In addition to his connection with other benevolent and public institutions, he is a member of the New Illinois Athletic club. He was married November 26, 1891, to Ellen Gertrude Osborne, by whom he is the father of six children, Ellen M., Marie J., Francis D., Vivian, Dorothy and John J. His home is at 1523 North Washtenaw avenue.

Joseph F. Connery's natal day occurred March 2, 1872, at what is now 44 West Grand avenue, Chicago. After graduating from the Brown grammar school he took a two years special business course at night school, applying himself to the perfection of a knowledge of bookkeeping, mathematics and a general business training. After spending three years on the farm in Iowa he returned to Chicago and was employed in various capacities by the Silver Creek & Morris Coal company. October 7, 1892, he became assistant secretary of the Blue Island Land & Building company, and when George C. Walker succeeded this corporation in March, 1898, Mr. Connery became the manager for Mr. Walker and so continued until the latter's death. Since then he has served as manager of the Walker estate. On December 3, 1900, he was elected a trustee, the secretary and also assistant treasurer of the Trustees of the Graceland Cemetery Improvement Fund, a corporation having a perpetual charter granted by the State of Illinois organized in the interest of the lot owners of the cemetery for the sole purpose of caring for Graceland Cemetery and not for individual profit.

Henry T. Connery was born September 24, 1874, in Chicago, and with the exception of three years spent on the farm in Iowa had lived in the city of his nativity. He attended the public and parochial schools, and when 21 years old became dock clerk for the Youghiougheny & Lehigh Coal company, serving as such and as salesman until the succession of the Pittsburg Coal company, since which time he has been dock superintendent for the latter corporation.

Vincent A. Connery was born in Chicago, January 22, 1879, lived on a farm in Iowa three years, was educated in the public and parochial schools of Chicago, attended the West Division High school and that conducted by the Brothers of the Holy Cross. In 1895 he started out as a bookkeeper for the Youghiougheny & Lehigh Coal company, and after its absorption by the Pittsburg Coal company, continued with the latter concern, which operates in Illinois under the name of the Pittsburg Coal company of Illinois. He was promoted to cashier, then to assistant treasurer, in which capacity he is now employed. He is a member of the South Shore Country club and resides with the unmarried members of the family at 695 Washington boulevard.

William M. Copeland, lawyer, was born at Kent, Jefferson County, Indiana, August 16, 1859, a son of Dr. William H. Copeland and Ladema H. (Chambers) Copeland. He received his education at Independence academy, Kentucky, Hanover college and at the United States Military academy at West Point, from which last named institution he resigned to study law. In 1880 he was admitted to the bar at Madison, Indiana, where he practiced his profession until 1894, when he removed to Chicago.

At the age of 22 he was nominated and elected on the Republican ticket from his native county to the House of Representatives of the Indiana Legislature, where he served two terms (1882 to 1886), being the youngest man ever elected to the Indiana Legislature. He there made one of the most brilliant political records for a young man that has ever been made in the history of the State in the halls of the Legislature, and was, from his entrance into that body, one of its leaders, being a member of the ways and means and other prominent committees. He was also chairman of the Joint House and Senate committee, appointed at the session of 1883 to visit the cities, towns and districts of Southern Indiana which were overflowed during the great flood of that year in the Ohio valley, and it was due to his energy, he being the only member of the original House and Senate committee that weathered the hardships of the midwinter trip through to the end, that the cities of Jeffersonville, New Albany, Madison, Aurora and Lawrenceburg were all visited and that the carefully itemized report of the actual condition of the overflowed cities, towns and farms along the Ohio river was made, including the recommendation that $100,000 be appropriated for the suffering caused by the flood, all of which was prepared by Mr. Copeland from a personal inspection of the flooded district, whose report the Legislature did him the honor to adopt by appropriating $100,000 for the flood sufferers, in preference to the report of the Senate committee, made from hearsay reports, which was against any appropriation whatever.

He was one of the pioneers in the Indiana Legislature in the movement for the appointment of a State commission to select a uniform system of schoolbooks to be used throughout the State in the common schools. The books were to be provided by the State and furnished to pupils at cost of publication and distribution, and to poor children of the State free of cost. Afterward this step resulted in such a law being enacted in Indiana, which law for many years has annually saved the people of Indiana thousands of dollars. He is the father of cheap railroad fare agitation and legislation in Indiana, having secured while a member of the Indiana Legislature the passage of his bill through the House reducing railroad fares in that State only to have it strangled in the Senate a few years prior to the enactment into a law of a similar measure by the Indiana Legislature and also by the Legislatures of a large number of other States including Illinois. His political encounter during the session of 1883 with Col. Horace Heffren, the Democratic leader of the House, including the exciting scenes in the House connected therewith arising out of the discussion of the Metropolitan Police Bill in which certain Democratic leaders in the House denounced the Republican lieutenant governor, an ex-Union soldier, the presiding officer of the Senate, on account of certain of his rulings, as "A brainless coward, a revolutionist and a dictator," to which Mr. Copeland replied by branding Heffren, the Democratic leader, who had been accused by the Republican press of Indiana as having been one of the leaders in the treasonable organizations known as "Sons of Liberty" and "Knights of the Golden Circle" in Indiana during the Civil war, as "A rampant, unrepentant and unhung ex-Son of Liberty and Knight of the Golden Circle," which won for Mr. Copeland the appellation of "The Plumed Knight of the Ohio," was graphically described at the time by "Strebor," correspondent of the New York World, and published in the leading papers of the country.

Probably no act of the session of 1885 met with more universal approval on the part of the people of the State regardless of party, than Mr. Copeland's resolution driving from the floor of the House the convicted and disgraced John M. Goar, Trustee of the Knights-town Soldiers' Orphans' Home, whom the Legislature had failed to remove from office up to that time, although its committees had found him guilty of the most outrageous and criminal relations with the inmates. This action precipitated Goar's removal from office and it was said at the time to be the only case in the history of the State where a resolution was ever passed by either branch of the General Assembly excluding from its halls an officer of one of the State institutions.

At the session of 1885, in the election of a United States Senator, on the part of the House of Representatives, the honor of placing in nomination the Republican candidate for governor, Albert G. Porter, and making the principal speech in his behalf, was conferred on Mr. Copeland. Since 1894 Mr. Copeland has been located in the practice of his profession at Chicago, his practice being largely in the Federal courts, not only in Illinois, but also in New York, and many other States of the Union, his clients being located in nearly every country of Europe as well as in North and South America. His record in the legal profession has been quite as marked as was his early career in politics, for he has not only been unusually successful in his practice, but has won cases that had previously been lost by some of the most distinguished lawyers in the United States and in England. He is a Knight Templar, a Shriner and a thirty-second degree Mason. Mr. Copeland married in 1885 Miss Clara Bruning, of Madison, Indiana. Both Mr. and Mrs. Copeland are lovers of art and have traveled together extensively abroad. Residence: 1028 Sheridan Road, Law offices in the Marquette building, Chicago.

Will T. Davies. Comparatively few realize the responsibility placed on the shoulders of the jailor of a county of such importance and population as Cook county, and fewer, still, comprehend the numberless details necessary for the discipline of a population, largely criminal, of approximately 800, and the care of a building sufficiently large and well equipped to care for such inhabitants. Will T. Davies was appointed county jailor by Sheriff Strassheim in February, 1908, having merited such appointment by years of meritorious service in minor positions connected with the office of county sheriff. He is a native of Rhode Island, born January 14, 1862, at Bristol, a son of Thomas and Hannah (Kinder) Davies.

The family came to Chicago in 1872 where the father, an expert gas engineer and builder of gas plants, was employed in the erection of the Hyde Park gas works, of which he had charge until its absorption by The People's Gas Light & Coke company. Will T. Davies was educated in the schools of Hyde Park and at the Metropolitan Business college. Having learned the steamfitter's trade he followed that occupation several years, but from 1887 to 1893 was a railway mail clerk, his route being between Chicago and Quincy on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad. In the latter year he was appointed a guard at the county jail by Sheriff Gilbert, and with the exception of the time of Mr. Barrett's incumbency of the office of sheriff when he was deputy county court clerk, he has continuously served as an attache of the sheriff's office in the capacity of deputy assistant clerk, chief clerk, assistant jailor and his present position. He is a member of the National Association of Sheriffs and the Illinois State Sheriffs' association. Mr. Davies is a past Worshipful Master of Landmark lodge, No. 422, A. F. and A. M., is a thirty-second degree member of Oriental consistory and belongs to Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He is also Past Regent of Kenwood council, Royal Arcanum, and in politics is a Republican. May 13, 1885, he married Miss Georgiana Compson of Seneca Falls, New York, and Howard and Thomas are the names of the two sons living born to their union.

Dr. Nathan S. Davis. Perhaps no other man of the medical profession has been more widely known or more highly honored than was Dr. Davis. Probably no one exerted a like influence in bringing into intimate relation and fraternal fellowship the leading members of the medical profession in this country. The powerful organization known as the American Medical association has done more to secure this result than all other influences combined, and to him as to no other it is indebted for its organization and successful development. It would require a volume to give adequate expression to the work which he accomplished. Our limits only permit a brief outline of his life and labors.

He was born in Chenango county, New York, in 1817. Until he was 16 years old he labored on his father's farm and had the educational advantages of the common district school. Although the youngest of seven children, such was his love of books that he was permitted to attend the Cazenovia Academy, then in the zenith of its prosperity, and from which so many eminent men entered public life. He commenced the study of medicine at the early age of seventeen years, under the supervision of Dr. Daniel Clark, one of the most prominent physicians in his native county. He attended his first course of lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City during the winter of 1834-35. In the spring of '35 he registered with Dr. Thomas Jackson, one of the leading physicians in Binghamton, New York, and graduated at Fairfield in 1837, when he was not yet twenty-one years old. The same year he opened an office in Binghamton and in 1838 was happily married to Miss Anna Maria, daughter of Hon. John Parker of Vienna, New York. He was soon elected a member of Brown County Medical society, and was an officer continuously in that organization until he removed from the county. In 1842 he was appointed to represent the county in the New York State Medical society and took his seat in that body in Albany in February, 1844. At this first meeting with the state society he offered a series of resolutions having for their object the securing of a higher standard of medical education, and so ably did he advocate that at the next annual meeting, in 1845, the following resolution presented by him was adopted, to-wit: "Resolved, That the New York Medical society earnestly recommend a national convention of delegates from medical societies and colleges in the whole Union to convene in the city of New York on the first Tuesday in May, 1846, for the purpose of adopting some concerted action on the subject set forth in the preamble." The resolution was adopted, and a committee appointed to carry out the purpose of the resolution, of which Dr. Davis was made chairman. As the result of extended correspondence, a large and influential meeting was held in New York City in 1846 representing nearly every State in the Union. At this meeting committees were appointed to perfect a permanent organization. The meeting adjourned to meet in Philadelphia the following year. At that meeting the committees reported, plans were duly perfected, and the American Medical Association was organized. By reason of the arduous labors in organization and later development, by common consent Dr. Davis has been recognized as the "father" of the association. In 1847 he removed from Binghanton to New York City and became connected with the College of Physicians and Surgeons. While thus connected and also engaged in private practice, he still found time to edit the medical journal called The Analyst. In 1849 he accepted a call to the chair of physiology and general pathology in Rush Medical college, and came to reside in Chicago in the fall of that year.

At the close of his first course of lectures in Rush Medical college he was transferred to the chair of principles and practice of medicine and of clinical medicine. He occupied this position for ten years. When the medical department of Lind university was organized in 1859 he resigned to accept a like position in that institution.

Though not present at the organization of the Illinois State Medical society, he was elected a member and rarely through all the successive years until the time of his death was he absent from its annual meetings. He was elected its president in 1855, and for twelve consecutive years served as its secretary. Whether in local, State or national society, his labors were alike conspicuous and helpful. He wielded the pen of a ready writer, and his productions were able, terse and convincing. In 1855 he had become the leading editor of the Chicago Medical Journal, and held that position until 1859. In 1860 he began the publication of a new journal named the Medical Examiner, and continued the same until 1873, when it became the property of the Medical Publication Society and was merged with the Chicago Medical Journal with the two names united.

When in 1853 it was determined by the American Medical association to journalize its transactions and issue them weekly, Dr. Davis was by common consent chosen editor of the journal. He gave to it a vast amount of personal attention until it was successfully and permanently established. At the eighth International Medical Congress held in Copenhagen in 1884, it was voted to hold its next session in Washington, District of Columbia, in 1887. In the preparation for the meeting the arduous work of the general secretary rested upon Dr. Davis. While in the midst of the labors incident to this responsible position, Prof. Austin Flint, Sr., the president-elect of the coming congress, suddenly died, and Dr. Davis was at once called to that position. In the furtherance of its interests he visited England and held extended correspondence with most of the principal men in Europe who were specially interested in the congress. The congress at Washington was an eminent success. Dr. Davis presided over its deliberations with conspicuous ability.

It is hardly needful to say that he was closely identified with the educational, moral and philanthropic institutions of the city whenever in civic relations his influence could be felt. He was one of the founders of the Northwestern university and one of its most influential trustees until his death. In the Union Law school of Chicago he held the chair of medical jurisprudence. He gave years of time to the management of the Washingtonian Home for the reclamation of inebriates. He was also one of the founders of the Chicago Historical society, the Academy of Sciences and of the Chicago Microscopical society. During his years of collegiate instruction he found time to publish his extended work on the "Principles and Practice of Medicine," in which his teachings are concisely embodied. Early in life he set himself to the accomplishment of three important purposes. The first was the organization of an American Medical association which should unify the medical profession of the entire Union. The second was the foundation of a medical college in which a graded course of instruction should be inaugurated. The third was the publication of a text book upon the "Principles and Practice of Medicine." Each of these in due time he lived to see realized.

Personally Dr. Davis, though slight in form, was a man of almost unparalleled endurance, which, with intense adherence to his convictions, coupled with untiring industry, made him eminently successful in the accomplishment of his purposes. He was a man of strong religious convictions and an active member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and one of its most constant attendants. His home relations were ideal. Until almost the last he continued his daily visits to his office. When at last he fell asleep his loving family was at his side. He died June 16, 1904, aged 87 years.

Dr. Haim I. Davis was born July 21, 1865, in Kauuno, then a province of Germany, but which has since become a possession of Prussia. Peter and Catherine (Niemeyer) Davis, his parents, were natives of Prussia, where they were reared, educated and married and passed the greater part of their lives. Early in the '70s they immigrated to America, and coming direct to Chicago the father embarked in mercantile pursuits which he continued with success until his death in 1902. He and wife were the parents of nine children, all of whom are living, and two of whom have achieved prominence in the affairs of Cook county. Dr. Haim I. Davis was liberally educated in the schools of his native country and after completing his literary education took up the study of medicine and in 1891 was graduated from the University of Karloff. He subsequently took a post graduate course in the University of Berlin, and came to America and embarked in the practice of his profession in Chicago. Dr. Davis has achieved distinction in his profession and has become a recognized authority on mental and nervous diseases. He is assistant professor of clinical psychiatry in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and since 1904, when he was appointed by President Brundage of the Board of County Commissioners, and reappointed by President Busse in 1907, he has been physician for Cook county and superintendent of the Detention hospital. Dr. Davis is a Master Mason, a member of the B'nai Brith and holds membership in the American Medical association, the Illinois State Medical society and the Chicago Medical society. In politics he is a Republican; is married, is the father of two children and resides at 5811 Calumet avenue.

Abel Davis is a son of Peter Davis and a brother of Dr. H. I. Davis, appropriate mention of whom preceeds this. He was born in the city of Chicago December 26, 1874, and during boyhood attended the public schools of the city. He subsequently took up the study of law and entering the law department of the Northwestern university was graduated therefrom and admitted to the bar in 1901. He practiced law as a member of the firm of Gardner, Stern, Anderson & Davis until the fall of 1904, when he was elected county recorder. Prior to this he had been elected and had served one term as a member of the Forty-third General Assembly of the State Legislature from the Twenty-third Senatorial district. At the August, 1908, primary election Mr. Davis was renominated recorder for Cook county and reelected in November following. He is a Republican in politics, a Royal Arch Mason, and a member of the Hamilton club. During the Spanish-American war he served as a member of Company E, First Infantry of Illinois United States Volunteers and was a participant in the Santiago campaign. He is now a member and a vice-president of the Illinois Branch of the Army of Santiago.

William H. Dellenback is a native of De Kalb county, Illinois, born on a farm near Hinckley, May 10, 1864, and is one of four children, two of whom are now living, born to the marriage of Charles and Catherine (Roth) Dellenback. His parents were natives of Alsace when it was a part of France and of Hesse Darmstadt, Germany, respectively. The father came to the United States when a young man and the mother when she was nine years old and they were married in this country. The father followed the occupation of farming and settled in De Kalb county about 1860, continuing there actively at work for about twenty-five years. He died in 1903, but his widow yet resides with the subject of this memoir.

The latter was reared on his father's farm and after attending the local schools he took a course at Jennings seminary, Aurora, continuing three years. He then taught school two years and with the money thus obtained entered the University of Michigan, from which institution he was graduated in 1892 with the degree of Bachelor of Letters. During this time he took up the study of law and upon the completion of his literary course, entered the Department of Law of Michigan university and was graduated therefrom in 1903 with the degree of Bachelor of Laws. During his university career he distinguished himself in oratory and was elected the orator of his class of 154 members. He was also for one year secretary of the College Republican club.

Upon his graduation in law he came to Chicago and under the firm name of Newcomer (John R.) & Dellenback he practiced his profession with success and credit until 1899. Since that date he has been engaged in individual practice. He is a strong Republican and at the primaries of 1908 received the nomination for State senator and in November was duly elected as such. He takes great interest in politics and in the success of his party and is wide awake on all important public questions. He is an Odd Fellow and a Knight of Pythias; also a thirty-second degree and K. T. Mason and Shriner. He is the present Generalissimo of St. Bernard commandery. He belongs to the Chicago Bar association and is a member of the order of Columbian Knights.

Joseph M. Dennis, a member of the Board of County Commissioners, is a native of Sussex county, New Jersey. He was born February 24, 1856. He is one of seven living children in a family of nine born to Joseph and Eliza (Comstock) Dennis. The family came to America over 250 years ago. Joseph Dennis, the father, was a New Jersey farmer, and the son, Joseph M. Dennis, was reared on the farm. He was educated in the district schools. Though farming was his occupation he found time to interest himself in politics and was once elected Town Supervisor.

In 1888 he came west, located in Chicago and embarked in the coal trade. Since coming to Chicago he has continuously lived in the same neighborhood, in what was formerly the Thirty-fourth but is now the Seventh ward where he is well known in business and political circles. In 1906 he was the successful nominee of his party for the office of County Commissioner, and in 1908 was re-nominated and re-elected for a second term. Mr. Dennis is a stanch Republican, a member of Woodlawn Park lodge, F. and A. M.; Jackson Park chapter, R. A. M.; Woodlawn Park council R. & S. M.; Oriental consistory and of Medinah Temple A. A. O. N. M. S. He is also an Odd Fellow and a member of the National Union. On December 31, 1892, he married Miss Cornelia Dusenberry and to them three children have been born: Clarence R., Joseph M. and Ruth. The family affiliates with the Presbyterian church in Woodlawn.

Colonel Chauncey Dewey, a substantial business man of Chicago and a potential factor in local politics, is a native of Austin, Texas, his birth occurring May 19, 1877. In the Cumberland mountains of Tennessee, at Sewanee, he finished his schooling in the University of the South, and subsequently, until 1904, operated a cattle ranch in Kansas. During the past few years Mr. Dewey has figured prominently in the public affairs of Chicago. He was a delegate to the National Republican convention of 1908 and was a warm supporter of William H. Taft for the Presidential nomination. He is a member of the Board of Local Improvements; appointed inspector-general Illinois National Guard and Illinois Naval Reserves by Gov. Charles S. Deneen Nov. 13, 1908; is a county central committeeman from the Second ward; a member of the Board of Directors of the Republican party of Cook county and the representative of the First Congressional district on the State Central committee. He is a vestryman of Trinity Episcopal church and is a member of the Calumet, Union League, Chicago Athletic, South Shore Country and Hamilton clubs, a life member of the Chicago Press club and is treasurer of the National League of Republican clubs.

John F. Devine, the present public administrator, is one of the progressive and aggressive young officials of Cook county who have achieved deserved distinction. On March 24, 1864, his birth occurred in the County of Tipperary, Ireland, and when an infant in arms, he was brought by his parents, John and Mary (Ryan) Devine, to America. Upon arriving in this country the family came to Chicago where the father worked at his trade of tanner. Both parents are now dead. John F. Devine has never known any home other than Chicago, and being cast upon his own resources when yet a lad, was enabled to secure but a common education from the public and parochial schools. When yet in his teens he was employed by Walker, Oakley & Company, which later was succeeded by the American Hide & Leather company. When 20 years old he began working in the North Chicago Rolling Mills, continuing with this firm in different capacities for a period of nine years.

His official career then began as a mailing clerk in the office of the county clerk, in the meantime becoming active and influential in ward politics. In 1897 he was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners, serving as such one term, then accepted the appointment of chief clerk to the then Probate Court clerk, James Reddick, since deceased. After the fall election of 1904 he was appointed chief clerk in the office of the county recorder, a position he continued to fill until 1907, when he was named by Governor Deneen, as public administrator, in which capacity he has since officiated. Mr. Devine is a Republican, and a member of the Illinois Athletic and Hamilton clubs. To his marriage with Miss Margaret Kinsella, which was solemnized in 1889, one son, John F. Jr., was born. Mrs. Devine died December 20, 1901.

Miles J. Devine, a successful lawyer of Chicago, was born November 11, 1866, and is the son of Patrick and Elizabeth (Conway) Devine, the mother being a sister of Rev. P. J. Conway, now deceased, the former vicar general, head of Holy Name cathedral. The father when a boy came to the United States in 1852 and succeeded in working his way through school in New York City and later through St. Mary's college, Emmetsburg, Maryland. In 1860 he came to Chicago and was employed by the Illinois Central Railroad company as foreman, continuing thus engaged for several years. Later he was employed by the City Railway company and helped lay the first rails placed by the city car line on State street. He had charge of the horses and barns and was also required to look after the employees. He remained in the employ of the City railway for twenty-one years and then removed to Libertyville, Illinois, and engaged in farming, continuing thus until his death, November 28, 1899. He was a warm personal friend of Long John Wentworth. He was particularly gifted in his power of observation, and his knowledge of men and his recognition of faces.

These traits are inherited by his son Miles J., the subject of this review. The latter was educated in the public and parochial schools of Chicago and at St. Patrick's academy at the corner of Des Plaines and Adams streets. From 1878-80 he attended St. Francis seminary at St. Francis, Wisconsin, and from 1880-84 he attended Niagara university, Niagara Falls, New York. His elaborate education was due to the fact that he designed to become a member of the priesthood. Had he continued three years later he would have been duly ordained. From 1884-86 he attended Lake Forest university, but in the latter year gave up his studies and accepted a position as assistant to his brother who was a bookkeeper for a commission house in Chicago. There he remained for two years, or up to the time he attended the Chicago College of Law, completing the course in June, 1890, at which time he was admitted to the bar and began practicing at 87 Washington street. In 1892 he formed a partnership with J. B. O'Connell, under the firm name of Devine & O'Connell. He soon attained prominence in his profession. In April, 1897, he was elected city attorney by the largest majority ever given to a candidate for that office. His administration of the office was characterized by the fact that he did not retain any outside legal counsel other than that of his assistants. The highest judgment secured against the city during his term was for $8,000. As a defensive trial lawyer he probably had no superior at the Chicago bar. In April, 1899, he began a general practice with offices in the Reaper block, and has continued with satisfactory results since that time. During the administrations of Mayors Harrison, Sr., Hopkins and Swift he served as prosecuting attorney. He successfully prosecuted the cases of the shipment of lumpy-jawed cattle from Texas to Chicago.

He has taken an active and prominent part in politics. In 1896 he was nominated for Congress, but declined that honor. In 1893 he was nominated for state senator, but declined. His ability as an orator led to a strong demand for his services on the stump.

His reason for declining the various honors tendered was his need of continuing the practice of his profession. From 1900 to 1904 he was a member of the Democratic State Central committee. Later he was marshal of the County Democracy and attorney for the same, and was also chairman of the executive committee of the County Democracy. He takes great delight in politics and is an easy and natural orator. He has made speeches in nearly every Southern and many Western states during the various political campaigns. His power of oratory has rendered him remarkably successful for the defense in murder trials. His addresses are extremely persuasive and brilliant and his ability in this regard is recognized by his selection in other cities to conduct the defense in cases of great notoriety. In 1884, before he finished school, he married Emma Gamash of Waukegan, and they have the following children: Miles J., Jr., Paul P., Raymond J. and Carter Harrison. The latter died, aged 2 years. They have two daughters, Mabel R. and Mildred G.

Livingston T. Dickason, a distinguished citizen of Chicago, was born in Marion county, Ohio, November 25, 1843, and is the son of Joseph M. and Catharine (Adair) Dickason, who were of English, Irish and Scotch ancestry, respectively. The father was also a native of Ohio, was a farmer and stock dealer by occupation, and a useful citizen of the community where he resided. Livingston T., the subject of this review, was reared on a farm and was educated in the district schools. When the Civil war broke out he promptly enlisted in April, 1861, in Company H, Fourth Ohio volunteer infantry. This was a regiment for the one hundred days' service. At the end of the term Mr. Dickason reenlisted in Company D, Sixty-fourth Ohio volunteer infantry, which command soon afterwards was assigned to the Army of the Cumberland. This regiment, although present at the battle of Shiloh, was not under fire. Later Mr. Dickason returned with his regiment from the South and participated in the battle of Murfreesboro and still later in the battle of Chickamauga, where he was wounded in the left arm by a minnie ball, which incapacitated him from service and resulted in his eventual discharge from the army in July, 1864. At that time he was second sergeant of his company.

After the war he returned to Ohio and in 1870 went to Danville, where he engaged in grain buying and in contracting. Entering politics, he was in 1874 elected mayor of that city, and so well did he suit his constituents that he was reelected and served continuously by reelection for ten years. During this period he became the owner and operator of coal mines and of late years has devoted his entire time and attention to that business. In 1887 he moved to Chicago, and here he has since resided. He is a Republican and a member of the G. A. R., of which he has been department commander of the Department of Illinois. He is also trustee of the Memorial association, a Knight Templar and thirty-second degree Mason, and a member of the Mystic Shrine and a member of the Union League, Chicago Athletic, South Shore Country and the Midlothian clubs. In 1885 he was appointed a member of the Illinois Sailors' and Soldiers' Home at Quincy, of which body he was chosen president. He is married and is the father of two children, one son named in his honor.

Hugh T. Dickey, in 1838, then a young lawyer, located in Chicago. He was born and educated in New York city, having graduated from Columbia college and law school, and read law with Benjamin F. Butler, then a distinguished lawyer and statesman of New York. He was a fine student and an accomplished lawyer. With an ample fortune at his command, he was not compelled to push his way at the bar for a livelihood; but what cases came to him unsought were carefully prepared by close study and research. He soon obtained the confidence of his fellow-lawyers and was frequently sought as associate counsel at their request or recommendation in important cases. In the winter of 1844-45 the Legislature established the "Cook county court" and the "Jo Daviess county court," with jurisdiction concurrent with the Circuit courts of the State, and Mr. Dickey was appointed judge of both these courts. In this position he made an excellent reputation as a learned, able and patient jurist, and held the place until November, 1848, when he was elected judge of the Circuit court under the constitution of 1848, and held the place until 1853, when he resigned and retired to private life and the care of his large estate.

Dr. Charles Orpha Du Plessis was born at Syracuse, New York, September 17, 1853, a son of Odilon and M. Rosalie Du Plessis. In both lines he traced his ancestry to France, but it had for several generations been confined to Canada, where his parents were born. Odilon Du Plessis was a contractor and builder. Dr. Du Plessis attended grammar school and high school in Syracuse till, at 15, he began to serve an apprenticeship under his father.

He developed a taste for athletics and attained to much proficiency as an athlete, and in 1870, when he came, aged 17, to Chicago with his father's family, he became a night instructor in athletics at the Chicago Athenæum, then at 50 Dearborn street, while employed by day in his father's contracting and building business. In 1876 he devoted himself exclusively to athletics and until 1881 was professor of physical culture at the Athenæum, then resigned to accept a like position at the Northwestern university, Evanston. In 1883 he went to Minneapolis and erected gymnasiums there and at St. Paul.

In 1884 he began the study of medicine at the Minnesota Hospital college, Minneapolis, and was graduated with the Medical Doctor's degree in March, 1888. In 1888-89 he was assistant city physician of Minneapolis and in 1890 he returned to Chicago, and during the ensuing year was connected with the A. G. Spalding sporting goods establishment. After a part of a year spent as superintendent of the Detroit Athletic club he was recalled to work for Spalding. But he soon made a tour of the East for the inspection of the best gymnasiums, and when he came back superintended the erection of the gymnasium of the Chicago Athletic association. At the solicitation of many prominent physicians of Chicago, who had come to recognize the value of massage and physical culture in the treatments of certain ailments, Dr. Du Plessis in 1893 established himself in Chicago on the South Side as an expert masseur and physical culturist. His clientele, sent to him by influential practitioners, was drawn from among the wealthy. While engaged in this work he carefully kept up his connection with athletics and general field sports.

In 1898 he was elected handicapper for the Amateur Athletic association. He was in constant demand by the principal colleges of the Northwest as starter and field judge, in which capacities he acted at every important athletic meet for athletic societies and miscellaneous athletic organizations in Chicago, and was employed by the A. G. Spalding Company to write up the histories and records for their yearly Sporting Almanac, also by the Daily News to write up their annual records, published in their paper and Almanac.

In 1902 he passed a civil service examination and was made superintendent of playgrounds at all the small parks in the city, but other demands upon him were so imperative that he soon gladly relinquished the position. He passed another civil service examination in 1907 with a view to accepting the same position, but died suddenly of heart disease April 11, that year, at 3104 South Park avenue, and was buried at Rosehill. Dr. Du Plessis married Mrs. Addie Taylor, of Chicago, May 10, 1879. His life was a remarkably clean one, devoid of excesses or dangerous indulgencies of any kind, and his lovable character won the high regard of all who knew him.

Wladislaus Dyniewicz, publisher of the Gazeta Polska, the oldest Polish paper in America, located at 522 to 532 Noble street, is a native of Prussian Poland and is of Lithuanian stock, born at Chwalkowo, near Gnesen, on June 13, 1843, being a son of Karol and Julianna (Szutczynski) Dyniewicz. The paternal grandfather, Adam Dyniewicz, left Lithuania in 1815 on account of a revolution in which he was a participant, and fled to Prussian Poland, and while there added the middle syllable to his name, and the same has ever since been retained by his descendants. Wladislaus Dyniewicz was reared in his native country and educated in the principal schools of Wrzesnia, and there learned the trade of a machinist. In February, 1866, he crossed the ocean to the United States and was three months in making the passage in a sailing vessel. He located first in Chatsworth, Livingston county, Illinois, and there secured employment as a machinist in a sugar beet factory. He continued for some time, but in 1867 located in Chicago and entered the employ of the McCormick Harvester company. After a time he was employed in the lumber yards and still later secured a position with the Northwestern Railway company, and was with the latter concern for a period of about six years. During the last three years of that period he was gang boss on locomotive work. The first safety valve used on locomotives was the invention of Wladislaus Dyniewicz, but unfortunately was never patented by him.

In 1873 he established the Gazeta Polska in this city, a weekly publication, and this he has ever since conducted. It was probably the first Polish paper to be issued in America. It has a circulation of about 12,000 and is in a flourishing condition. On January 17, 1863, Mr. Dyniewicz married Alebertina, daughter of John Nepumocen Krygier, of Roznowo, province of Posen, Prussian Poland, and by her has eight children, as follows: Casimir; Angela, wife of Paul A. Leischner; Wanda, wife of Joseph Kwasieswski; Edwin M., editor of Gazeta Polska; Leon W., manager of Gazeta Polska; Mary P., wife of Stanislaus Kuflewski; Yadviga, wife of Leon J. Nowak; and Matthew J. Mr. Dyniewicz has nineteen grandchildren, of whom he is justly proud. He is a member of the Holy Trinity Polish Roman Catholic church, the Polish National Alliance and the Art Institute of Chicago. He is a Republican in politics, but his paper Independent Republican. The first present Mr. Dyniewicz gave his wife before their marriage was the reproduction of a pin the emblem of Poland, with the name of Boze Zbaw Polska thereon.

Col. Francis A. Eastman is one of the well-known men of Cook county, and is especially remembered as an active participant in public affairs of a generation ago. Of New England nativity, he was born in New Hampshire and educated in the common schools, at Haverhill academy and at the Newberry (Vermont) seminary. The greater part of his life has been passed in newspaper work. He was first employed in editorial work on the New Hampshire Patriot, at Concord, then in a like capacity on the Vermont Patriot, at Montpelier. He came West in 1858 and became an editorial writer on the Chicago Times when it was managed by Mr. Sheahan. Associated with Andre Matteson and James W. Sheahan, he assisted in establishing the Chicago Morning Post in 1860 and continued with that paper until it passed into the hands of Charles A. Dana, who transformed it into the Chicago Republican, which later became the Chicago Inter Ocean.

At the time of the sale of the Post Colonel Eastman retired from newspaper work and became a partner in the wholesale grocery firm of Barrett, Cossett & Co. His political career began when he was elected to the lower House of the state Legislature in 1863. In 1865 he was elected to the state senate and was appointed by Governor Yates one of the commissioners to build the state penitentiary at Joliet. Under Governors Yates and Oglesby he held confidential commissions to the South during the Civil war and at the date of its termination. He was appointed as postmaster at Chicago in 1869 by President Grant, a position he held four years. Since that time Colonel Eastman has been employed as an editorial writer on the newspapers of Chicago. In 1908 he was appointed by Mayor Busse chief of the Bureau of Statistics and municipal librarian of the city of Chicago, a position he now occupies.

In 1861 he married Gertrude Barrett, a daughter of S. L. Barrett, a prominent merchant of Chicago, and of the four children born to them two are now living—Barrett Eastman, prominently identified with journalism in Chicago, and Margaret, now Mrs. Barry. Colonel Eastman is an Episcopalian and a Republican.

Joseph J. Elias, yet a young man, has had such an unusual and in many respects such a remarkable career thus far as to merit more than passing notice. He was born in the village of Alexandry, Lithuanian Russia, April 15, 1876, and is one of five children, all yet living, born to John and Agnes (Jesulis) Elias. He was educated in the public and high schools of Rossieny, completing his schooling by graduating from the latter at the age of 15 years.

The autocratic conduct of public affairs in Russia impelled him to cross the ocean to America in 1893. Upon landing at Ellis Island he was absolutely penniless, as every dollar he possessed had been stolen while he was on board ship. The authorities found him a place with a farmer in Connecticut, for whom he worked two months for $5 and a pair of shoes. Succeeding this he worked for three months as a section hand on a gravel train with Italians for $1.35 per day. He then secured a position in the tannery of Arrey, Maddock & Locke at St. Regis Falls, New York, where he remained for seven years and two months. In 1889 he entered Notre Dame university, studying diligently for two years, working during vacations for Lederer & Oppenheimer, Forty-seventh street and Ashland avenue, as general salesman, and, continuing with them three years longer, became, by industry and merit, assistant manager.

From this time forward his course has been almost phenomenally upward and rapid. At the organization of the Union Stock Yards State bank he was elected its manager. He is president of the Prinos Vitanto Building and Loan association, a member of several others, and of the Hamilton club, Knights of Columbus, and chief ranger of S. D. court, No. 1577, C. O. F., and the Roman Catholic church. In 1903 he secured the appointment of honorary probation officer of the Juvenile court by Judge Tuthill, and was selected in June, 1906, for deputy sheriff. In August of the latter year, having become prominent in politics, he was nominated by the Republicans for county commissioner and was duly elected, and is now honorably and creditably serving his second term. He speaks Lithuanian, Russian, Polish, Bohemian, Slavonian and English. He is at present chairman of the executive committee of the State Lithuanian Republican Alliance. Thus in the space of about ten years he has mastered business and politics, American customs and institutions, has occupied numerous positions of great trust with signal distinction and credit, and has become one of the most active and valuable members of Chicago and American citizenship. May 21, 1906, he wedded Miss Martha Paszkewicz, by whom he is the father of one son—Leonard.

John W. Ellis was born on a farm in Kenton county, Kentucky, and is a son of James D. and Annie Ellis. The family originally moved from Virginia into Kentucky before the railroad era. The grandfather, John Ellis, became prominent in his locality, and at the time of the Civil war served as a member of the state Legislature. John W., the subject of this review, was taken to Kansas by his father when 6 years old and attended the public schools of Clay Center and studied law under the preceptorship of A. A. Godard, who later became attorney general of that state. About this time James D. Ellis went West to Oregon and in 1890 John W., the subject, joined him there and for two years was engaged in the United States land office at La Grande. He then went to Washington, D. C., as clerk for an Oregon congressman, and while there attended Columbian university, graduating therefrom with credit as Bachelor of Law, in June, 1894.

He had previously studied law and been admitted to the bar in Oregon in 1893. In September, succeeding his graduation in law, he came to Chicago and entered into partnership with the late John W. Smith, under the firm name of Smith & Ellis. This connection was continued agreeably and profitably for five years, when Mr. Ellis began an individual practice, continuing until 1906, when he formed his present partnership with County Attorney Harry A. Lewis, under the firm name of Ellis & Lewis. In March, 1907, he was appointed master in chancery by Judge Pinckney.

Mr. Ellis is a member of the Thirty-second Ward Republican club and from early manhood has taken a deep interest in politics and public affairs. He is a member of the Beverly Country and the Hamilton clubs. He is a Mason and a member of the Auburn Park chapter, No. 201, R. A. M. On November 17, 1900, he married Maude Barnes, daughter of John A. Barnes, who died while serving as American consul at Cologne, being succeeded by his son Charles E. Barnes, who also died while occupying the same position at Cologne, in 1906.

Howard Elting was born in New York City February 15, 1870, a son of Phillip and Harriet (Has Broock) Elting, who were of Holland and Huguenot ancestry. He received his primary education in the schools of New York, prepared for college at Rutgers Preparatory school, and in 1886 entered Rutgers college, New Brunswick, New Jersey, graduating as a civil engineer from that institution with the class of 1890. The year following this event he came West and entered the local freight office at Chicago of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad company, where, after holding various positions, he was promoted to the claim department of that railroad at St. Louis and eventually became chief clerk to the general freight agent, Howard Elliott, now president of the Northern Pacific Railroad company. Mr. Elting later became traveling freight agent, general agent and division freight agent of the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, from St. Louis to Kansas City and St. Joseph.

After this traffic experience he was made local freight agent of the Missouri lines of the Burlington System at St. Louis, this position carrying with it the title of assistant superintendent of terminals. In 1903 Mr. Elting married Miss Florence West, of St. Louis, and the year following resigned from the Burlington road and embarked in business in Chicago for himself as a member of the Adams & Elting company, of which he was secretary. This corporation is the manufacturer of paints, paint specialties and wood finishing materials, their best brands being the Adelite paint and varnish remover and hygienic kalsomine; but they are best known to the trade as authorities on wood finishing materials for the furniture and piano industries.

Since coming to Chicago Mr. Elting has taken a deep interest in the Chicago Association of Commerce, and for the past two years has been chairman of his subdivision on the ways and means committee. He is also a member of the trade extension committee. In his own industry he is treasurer of the Chicago Paint, Oil and Varnish club, and is chairman of the tariff committee of the National Paint, Oil and Varnish Association of the United States. He is a member of the Chicago, Onwentsia, Saddle and Cycle, Chicago Athletic and City clubs, and resides at 39 Bellevue place. Mr. and Mrs. Elting are the parents of one daughter, Carroll, 5 years old, and a son, Howard, Jr., 1 year and a half old.

Harry L. Emerson, county surveyor, has for the past twenty years been prominently identified with engineering and construction work in Chicago and vicinity. He is a native of Doon county, Wisconsin, born on December 4, 1866, in a pioneer's log house built by his father, and is a son of Wright M. and Lucy (Lewis) Emerson. Zuriel Lewis, his mother's grandfather, was one of the last Revolutionary soldiers to die.

With his parents, Mr. Emerson, when a child, moved to Illinois, and here he received his early education in the district schools. At the age of 14 he started out in life for himself, but prior to this time had assisted his uncle on various surveying expeditions. With a natural aptitude and liking for this kind of work, he has in subsequent years supplemented his schooling by privately taking several courses in all the branches of mathematics and engineering, with the idea of reinforcing his fitness for a subsequent career as an engineer and surveyor. In 1882 he came to Chicago and for six years was employed by Col. J. T. Foster, at that time county surveyor. During the latter part of this period he assisted in some important work, principally bridge building. In May, 1907, at the special election of this year, he was chosen county surveyor, and completed that term of office.

He has contributed materially in some important construction work in Cook county, particularly bridge work, one of the first being the bridges over the Des Plaines river and on Higgins road. The concrete bridges over the Des Plaines river at Wheeling and Lemont are monuments of his engineering skill. He has built eight bridges over the Des Plaines river, two of them being of reinforced concrete construction, and they are the first concrete bridges ever built over that stream. The first reinforced concrete bridge constructed in Cook county, a thirty-foot span over the Northwest branch of the Chicago river at Techny, Illinois, is also of Mr. Emerson's design and construction. Space does not permit of the detailed description of the different engineering feats of which Mr. Emerson is the author, but it can be said that his work is regarded as of the highest order by engineers throughout the country.

For many years he carried on engineering construction work, with offices in Chicago, and at the present time is employed to do the engineering work for Arlington Heights, Berwyn, Franklin Park and Schermerville. He makes a specialty of general reinforced concrete construction for factories, storehouses, etc. Mr. Emerson is a Republican, Knight of Pythias and attendant at the Episcopal church. He resides at 6412 Ingleside avenue.

Alfred O. Erickson, assistant city attorney, is a native of Waupaca county, Wisconsin, and is one in a family of twelve children, six now living, born to Ingebret and Ingborg (Solverud) Erickson. His parents were natives of Norway, but were married in this country, and were engaged in farming in Wisconsin, where they had settled in the early '40s, until their respective deaths. Alfred O. Erickson passed his boyhood days on his father's farm and in attending the district schools. At the age of 19 he went to the Dakotas, where he spent two years on his older brother's ranches.

Upon reaching his majority he entered the commercial and stenographic department of the Northern Indiana Normal school, and the same year of his graduation, in 1893, came to Chicago and represented his native state as an officer of the World's Columbian exposition. He then returned to Waupaca, Wisconsin, where he read law until the spring of 1895, when he again returned to Chicago. In 1896 he entered the law department of Lake Forest university, and immediately following his graduation in 1899 passed the state bar examination at Springfield and was admitted to the bar. Until 1905, when he was appointed assistant city attorney by John F. Smulski, he was engaged in private practice and had succeeded in building up a creditable clientele. He has, since 1905, been connected with the office of city attorney.

By appointment of Edward J. Brundage, corporation counsel, he was made trial attorney of the "Actions Over" department, in May, 1907; and the establishment of this particular line of legal work in connection with the office of city attorney, and the appointment of Mr. Erickson as the trial attorney in charge, have resulted in much good to the city and have proven the excellent judgment of Mr. Brundage in both instances. Mr. Erickson is a Republican. In 1905-06 he was chairman of the political action committee of the Marquette club, and for the past five years has been a member of the executive committee of the Twenty-fifth Ward Republican club. On August 8, 1908, he was elected a member of the county central committee under the provisions of the new Primary law. Not content with the education he had already acquired, Mr. Erickson attended evening school, taking up the study of voice culture and oratory at the Soper School of Oratory in 1905-06, and in 1906-07 was a student of voice culture and speaking at the Chicago Conservatory of Music and Dramatic Art.

As a member of the Masonic fraternity he affiliates with the Thomas J. Turner lodge, No. 409, A. F. and A. M.; Corinthian chapter, No. 69, R. A. M., Oriental consistory; and Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He also belongs to the Illinois Athletic, Hamilton and Marquette clubs, the Chicago bar association and the Chicago Equestrian association. To his marriage with Louise H. Gentz, which was solemnized June 10, 1899, one son, Herbert Olney, has been born.

John E. Ericson was born near Stockholm, Sweden, October 21, 1858, and is the son of Andrew and Sophia (Lind) Ericson, both of whom also were natives of Sweden, where the father died and the mother is still living. John E., subject, was reared in Sweden and received his education at the public and high schools. At a suitable age he entered the Royal Polytechnique institute at Stockholm, from which he was graduated as civil engineer in 1880. The succeeding year he immigrated to the United States and first located at Cowden, Illinois, where he obtained a position as resident engineer of the "Clover Leaf" (then the T. C. & St. L. R. R.), having in charge the construction of forty-seven miles of the road.

In the fall of 1882, after some designing in the bridge office of Hopkins & Co., St. Louis, he came to Chicago and accepted a position with the United States Government on the Illinois and Michigan canal surveys and the Hennepin canal surveys, continuing thus occupied until 1884. In April, 1884, Mr. Ericson secured employment with the city as draftsman, continuing for one year, when he became assistant engineer of the city. This position he occupied until 1889, when he was called to act as assistant chief engineer in the examination and design of a new waterworks system for the city of Seattle, Washington.

After the completion of this work he was employed as assistant engineer of the Sanitary district of Chicago, having charge of a considerable portion of the surveys and location of the drainage canal. In January, 1892, he again entered the service of the city of Chicago as an assistant engineer in charge of tunnel work and pumping stations, in which position he continued until June 1, 1893, when he became first assistant city engineer of the city. He was thus employed until July, 1897, when he became city engineer, in which position he has served with credit and fidelity ever since. In his various labors for Chicago Mr. Ericson's first association was under the appointment of the mayor, but later he passed the civil service examination, a singular circumstance in view of the fact that he was the only one of fourteen applicants to succeed.

He is a member of the Chicago Athletic and the Swedish Glee clubs, the American Society of Civil Engineers, the Western Society of Engineers and the American Water Works association. He belongs to King Oscar lodge, A. F. and A. M.; Washington chapter, R. A. M.; Chicago commandery, K. T.; and Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. Mr. Ericson is somewhat independent in his political creed, usually casting his vote for the man instead of the party.

He was married on July 11, 1888, to Inez Malmgren, who bore him one daughter, Mildred, born May 10, 1889. The mother died February 3, 1893, and on June 30, 1896, Mr. Ericson married Esther Malmgren, a sister of his first wife. They reside at 1934 Kenmore avenue.

Samuel A. Ettelson, a member of the law firm of Schuyler, Jamieson & Ettelson, and prominent among the younger politicians of Chicago, is a native of the city in which he now resides, his birth occurring November 19, 1874. His parents are Benjamin J. and Flora (Phillipson) Ettelson, natives of Russia and Germany, respectively, his father residing in Chicago and his mother is now deceased. Samuel A. Ettelson was graduated from the West Division high school in 1892, following which he attended Harvard college for one year.

Beginning in January, 1894, he was employed for three years during the day time in the city public library and at night time taught school and studied law. He was graduated from the Chicago College of Law in 1897 and has achieved a fair measure of success in his chosen calling. Prominent among the noteworthy litigation with which he has been connected are the John Alexander Dowie and anti-cigarette cases. Mr. Ettelson is a Republican and cast his first vote for William McKinley as president. He resides at 3315 Calumet avenue, in the Third ward, where he became precinct captain in 1904.

In the Republican nominating convention in 1906 he became the nominee of his party for the office of State senator from the Third Senatorial district and was elected to this position at the fall election of that year. In the Forty-fifth General Assembly he was made chairman of the committee on parks and boulevards, and was made a member of the committees on banks and banking, Chicago charter, Cook county affairs, corporations, education, insurance, judiciary, live stock and dairying, municipalities, municipal courts, revenue and sanitary district affairs. Shortly after his nomination he became a member of the county central committee from his ward. Mr. Ettelson is a member of the Hamilton, New Illinois, Athletic and Metropolitan clubs, and is a director of the Chicago Home for Jewish Orphans.

John Meiggs Ewen was born at Newtown, New York, on September 3, 1859, his parents being Warren and Sarah (Faulkner) Ewen. The father was by occupation an engineer and for many years was connected with the United States navy. The parents were of Scottish descent. John M. was educated in Russell's Military academy, New Haven, Connecticut; Stevens Institute of Technology, Hoboken, New Jersey; and Ecole de Beaux Arts, Paris. Upon starting in life for himself he became assistant engineer and draftsman for the J. B. & J. M. Cornell Iron Works of New York City, but upon coming West became chief engineer for W. L. B. Jenney, architect, and of Burnham & Root, architects. A little later he became vice-president and general manager of the George A. Fuller Construction company, vice-president of the Thompson-Starrett company, and is now president of the John M. Ewen company, engineers and builders. He served as consulting engineer in the construction of the new courthouse and is the present consulting engineer on the new Chicago city hall. He is also consulting engineer on the new Cook County Infirmary and is chairman of the Chicago Harbor Commission. At present he is engineer for the disposing of stone along the banks of the drainage canal for the Sanitary district.

On more than forty of the largest buildings in Chicago he has served either as contracting or consulting engineer or builder. Among these structures are the following: Columbus Memorial, Continental National bank, Great Northern, Monadnock, Marquette, Marshall Field Annex, Carson, Pirie, Scott, Chicago Opera House, Ashland, New York Life, Old Colony, Rookery, Northern Trust Company, New Illinois Athletic Club, Presbyterian Hospital, Steinway Hall, Tacoma, Tribune, and many others. He has also served upon the construction of many out of town buildings in the leading cities of the West. Many of the most elegant private residences of this city and elsewhere have received his approval.

He is a member of more than twenty local clubs. He is the inventor of Luxfer prisms, cantilever foundations for buildings, inventor of method of constructing sub-basements in high buildings, etc. He was associated with Burnham & Root, architects, in the construction of the first skyscrapers in the world. He was a delegate on behalf of Chicago to Gulf-to-Lakes Deep Waterway convention held in Memphis in 1907 and in Chicago in 1908. For five years he was chairman of the Central Committee of the Young Men's Christian association in Chicago. He is a member of the Presbyterian church and on March 29, 1889, married Grace, daughter of Robert W. Patterson, D. D., LL. D., and they have the following children: John Meiggs, Jr., and Marjorie Patterson.

John Albro Farwell was born September 3, 1833, at Fitchburg, Massachusetts, and is a son of John T. and Mersilvia (Todd) Farwell, natives of Massachusetts and New Hampshire respectively. The family have resided in America since early Colonial times. The father was at one time town clerk and served several terms in the Massachusetts legislature. In business he was a manufacturer.

His son, John A., was educated at the public and high schools of Fitchburg and worked for two years in a hardware store at Worcester, Massachusetts, but on November 3, 1855, arrived in Chicago and accepted a position as bookkeeper in the hardware store of A. G. Garfield at 98 Lake street. In 1859 he went into the private banking house of James M. Adsit and there continued until January, 1870, when he entered the city comptroller's office as chief clerk. Later Mr. Farwell was appointed comptroller of the city and held the office with credit until 1879, when he became a member of the jewelry firm of J. B. Chambers & Company. When the firm was incorporated Mr. Farwell became treasurer and general manager and continued to hold these responsible positions until his practical retirement from business in 1899. At that date the business passed by purchase into the hands of Charles E. Graves. Nominally, Mr. Farwell continued a member of the company until 1905.

On October 28, 1869, he married Ava W. Chambers, daughter of J. B. and Alice F. Chambers, and has one son, John Arthur Farwell. During his early years Mr. Farwell was an organist and for a number of years played the organ in the First Unitarian church, and later in the Wabash Avenue Methodist church.

Christian Fenger was born in Copenhagen, Denmark, in 1840 and in that city graduated in medicine in 1867. Succeeding his graduation he served as assistant in Meyer's Ear Clinic and later as an interne for two years in the Royal Fredericks hospital. He then began a private practice in Copenhagen and thus continued until the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, in which struggle he served as surgeon in the International Ambulance association. At the end of the war he returned to Copenhagen and for three years was prosector of the City Hospital, in which there were about one thousand beds. His thesis on "Cancer of the Stomach" prepared for the purpose of securing a lectureship in the University was successful and he received the appointment as lecturer on pathological anatomy. It should be said in this connection that as a medical and surgical specialist on cancer he attained the highest rank in the United States.

In 1875 he went to Egypt and there continued to practice his profession with the highest success. He became a member of the Sanitary Council of Alexandria, but in 1860 he removed to Cairo, where he served by special appointment under the khedive. Ill health obliged him to leave Egypt and in 1877 he located in Chicago. Here his reputation was still further enhanced. In clinical surgery particularly he attained the highest distinction. He was connected with the Northwestern Medical school and occupied the chair of surgery in Chicago's Polyclinic. He was also surgeon-in-chief of the German hospital for many years and was attending surgeon at the Passavant Memorial hospital and consulting surgeon at some half dozen other hospitals of this city. He was an active member and at one time was vice-president of the American Surgical association and was identified prominently and conspicuously with many other medical societies and organizations. During his practice in Chicago he was consulted as a specialist by hundreds of physicians and surgeons throughout the country who desired the benefit of his marvelous examinations and splendid medical judgment.

Dr. Alexander Hugh Ferguson is a native of Canada, born in 1853, a son of Alexander and Annie (McFadyen) Ferguson, natives of Argyllshire, Scotland. He was educated at Rockwood Academy and Manitoba college, and subsequently taught school and served as an instructor in his alma mater. He began his medical studies under Dr. John H. O'Donnell at Winnipeg, in 1877, then took a course in the Medical college of Trinity university, at Toronto, becoming honor graduate, M. B., in 1881, in both Trinity and Toronto universities, and later in the same year, honor graduate, M. D., C. M., of Trinity university. Soon after his graduation he visited various American hospitals and took a special course at Dr. Koch's laboratory, Berlin.

He began the practice of his profession at Buffalo, New York, in 1881, but soon returned to Winnipeg, where he practiced until 1894, and was largely instrumental in founding the Manitoba Medical college, of which he was professor of physiology and histology for three years and professor of surgery from 1886 to 1894. During that period he was staff surgeon in various hospitals and was chosen first president of the Manitoba branch of the British Medical association.

Dr. Ferguson was induced to come to Chicago in 1894 as professor of surgery in the Post Graduate Medical school, and in 1900 was elected professor of clinical surgery in the College of Physicians and Surgeons (the medical department of the Illinois State University), a position he now holds. He was for a time surgeon to various Chicago and Cook County hospitals. He is president and chief surgeon of the Chicago Hospital. His professional achievements are known to the profession, as he has successfully performed many major and original operations and is the author of a work on hernia and of valuable papers on difficult operations. He is an influential member of various surgical and medical societies, local, national and international in character, and a past president of the Chicago Medical society and of the Western Surgical and Gynecological society. In Chicago, where every man is rated on his merits, Dr. Ferguson has been well rewarded for his scientific zeal and for his efficiency as a teacher and surgeon. In post-graduate instruction he has few equals and his clinical demonstrations have been widely commended.

The American Journal of Surgery recently spoke of him as "the cleanest and cleverest operator on the Western continent." In his public clinics and private hospitals are patients from all parts of America and Europe and he is frequently called to distant points to perform difficult operations. He has been awarded a commandership in the Order of Christ, of Portugal, the highest decoration that the late King Carlos was able to bestow on anyone outside of royalty, and was notified of the award through the Portuguese Consul in Chicago, in a letter extending congratulations because Portugal had rendered justice to the Doctor's "great talent in surgery." He also received the congratulations of many of his professional associates.

Edward Churchill Fitch, for the past four years assistant attorney for the city of Chicago, and a member of the Forty-fifth General Assembly, is a native of Illinois, born May 11, 1862, at Vandalia. His father, George R. Fitch, was a well-known lawyer of Vandalia when he died in 1866. His mother, Emily (Churchill) Fitch, moved with her family to her old home, at Albion, after the death of her husband, and here Edward C. Fitch was reared and was educated in the public schools. He attended high school at Evansville, Indiana, and immediately after graduating therefrom in 1881, entered the Indiana State university at Bloomington, from which he was graduated in 1885 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts and with the honor of being orator of his class.

Returning to his home at Albion, Illinois, he began the study of law, and in 1886, by direct primary plurality vote, was nominated for the office of superintendent of schools of Edwards county by the Republican party. He was elected to this office, served as such for four years and declined a renomination in order to devote his time to the practice of law, the study of which he had assiduously followed while filling the office of county superintendent. In 1888 he was admitted to the bar after having passed the examination before the Appellate court of Mount Vernon with the highest average of the class. By appointment of Governor Tanner in 1889, he became a trustee of the State Normal school at Carbondale, serving as such until the election of John P. Altgeld as governor. In 1891 he came to Chicago and entered actively in the practice of law, at which he has since continued.

Upon the election of John F. Smulski as city attorney Mr. Fitch was appointed assistant city attorney and has since occupied this position as the appellate attorney of that office in charge of its cases in the Supreme and Appellate courts. His election from the Thirteenth Senatorial district to the Lower House of the State Legislature occurred in 1906. Mr. Fitch is a member of the Phi Kappa Si fraternity, the Woodlawn Park and Hamilton clubs, the Cook County Bar association, is a past High Priest of the Chapter of Royal Arch Masons at Albion, and is at present a member of Jackson Park chapter, No. 222, R. A. M., at Chicago, and Gorin commandery, No. 14, at Olney. His services as an orator have been called for, either by the National or State Republican committees, in every political campaign, since the nomination of James G. Blaine, for whom he cast his first presidential ballot. In 1887, Miss Alice Springer, a graduate of the Indiana State university of the class of 1885, and who died in 1895, became his wife. One daughter, Helen Churchill, a graduate of St. Mary's School at Knoxville, and now a student of the Indiana State university, was born to this union. For twelve years Mr. Fitch has resided at the Colonial Hotel in the Seventh ward.

William C. Foley was born on June 2, 1854, and is a son of Thomas and Bridget (McGraw) Foley, both of whom were natives of Ireland. The family first settled in Canada in 1852, locating at Freelon, Ontario, where the father, Thomas, followed the occupation of carpenter and builder until his death on October 15, 1880. William C., the subject of this review, was educated in the public schools of Freelon and at the age of sixteen years came to Chicago. He went to work for the H. B. Goodrich Sewing Machine Supply company at 82 Dearborn street, making his home with Mr. Goodrich.

In October, 1871, at the time of the great fire, he had gone to Braceville, Illinois, to visit a sister over Sunday. Upon going to the station, preparatory to buying a ticket for his return to Chicago, he was informed by the agent that there was no Chicago—that it had been destroyed by fire. He was unable to secure a train until three o'clock in the afternoon, owing to the fact that all the fast trains carrying fire engines to Chicago were given the right-of-way. As it was it required fourteen hours before he could reach the sixty miles from Chicago to the switching yards where the train stopped. Temporarily after the fire, Mr. Goodrich conducted his business at his residence, 715 W. Tyler (now Congress) street, but in the spring of 1872 located at 192 West Madison street. Mr. Foley continued in his employ, being steadily promoted for meritorious conduct until 1880 he became business manager of the establishment. In the fall of 1880 he took a partnership interest in the business and went to Cincinnati and there established a branch house.

In 1882 Mr. Foley bought Mr. Goodrich's interest in the Cincinnati house and established the firm of Foley & Williams. In 1883, also, he bought out the interest of Mr. Goodrich in the Chicago house. Soon afterward the business here was incorporated under the name of Foley & Williams Manufacturing company with a capital of $30,000, increased afterward to $250,000. They now have a factory at Kankakee and employ three hundred men in making sewing machines. In 1886 Mr. Foley moved to his present address at 46 Jackson boulevard. The company are jobbers in supplies of all kinds for sewing machines and they also handle pianos and organs. They have an export office at 59 Pearl street, New York, and send their goods to all parts of the world. Mr. Foley is the owner of several residences, store and flat buildings on the South Side. He resides at 4635 Grand Boulevard. He is a member of the Catholic church and of the Colonial club. On October 15, 1878, he married Mary J. McNamara and to this union twelve children were born, all living but one. The eldest, Charles C., is secretary of the company and superintendent of the factory at Kankakee; the eldest daughter, Gene M., married Mr. D. M. Goodwillie, of the D. M. Goodwillie Company, this city; the other children are: Bird, Jessie, Florence, Minnie, William C., Jr., Marion, Hazel, Paul, and Donald.

Mark Alpha Foote was born in North Fairfield, Huron county, Ohio, on April 10, 1858. His parents were Marcus and Lora Kinney (Gere) Foote. The father was a descendant of Nathaniel Foote, who was born in England in 1593 and immigrated to Watertown, Connecticut, in 1635. Marcus Foote, who was an able lawyer, was United States Deputy Marshal during the Civil war. He died on April 13, 1889. The immediate subject of this sketch was educated in the public schools of North Fairfield, Ohio, Hillsdale, Michigan, and Richmond, Illinois. When he was fourteen years old he learned telegraphy and found employment as a telegraph operator. Six years later he came to Chicago and entered the employ of Philip A. Hoyne, United States Commissioner, as a clerk. This relationship was severed by Mr. Hoyne's death in 1894, when Mr. Foote was appointed United States Commissioner, which position he has filled with much credit and success to the present time. Mr. Foote married Kate E. St. Clair at Crystal Lake, Illinois, on January 1, 1881, and their residence is at 2355 North Forty-second avenue. He is a member of the Congregational church and is a Mason, a Knight of Pythias, a member of the National Union and of the Court of Honor.

L. C. P. Freer was one of the noted early pioneer lawyers of Chicago. He was born September 18, 1813, in New York State, and was unusually well educated, being largely self-acquired. He taught school in his native State, was there married, and in 1836 came West and settled in Chicago and engaged in trading, which he later abandoned. He then read law under James H. Collins, and began practicing that profession, in which he attained high rank.

Aside from his law practice, he was very successful in business; his high character for probity and honorable dealing, his personal honesty and excellent judgment led him along into the path of a successful business career and prominent recognition by the leading business men of the city. Of a generous, helpful disposition, he did much for the cause of humanity and the upbuilding of Chicago. The world is better for L. C. P. Freer having lived in it. He died April 14, 1892.

Henry J. Frercks is deserving of no little credit for the measure of success he has achieved, in a comparatively short time, and under adverse circumstances.

A son of Peter and Wilhelmina (Meierdierks) Frercks, he was born October 16, 1863, at Hamburg, Germany, where after graduating from the grammar and high schools, he took a collegiate course of study to qualify himself as an instructor in high school and college work. His health, however, rendered such a career inadvisable and until 1888 he was engaged in mercantile pursuits. At this time, after mature reflection, he came to America with the determination of making it his future home. Coming direct to Chicago he found employment in various minor occupations for a time, was city salesman for James H. Walker & Co., and for eight years was connected with the wholesale establishment of Marshall Field & Co.

Upon coming to America Mr. Frerck's knowledge of the English language and American history and customs was limited. He lost no opportunity in perfecting himself in everything that would qualify him to become a citizen of the United States in fact as well as in name. For this reason he took up the study of law, though otherwise employed, and for two years was thus engaged without any instructor, continuing with Henry P. Sinden as preceptor for one year, with whom he later formed a partnership under the name of Sinden & Frercks. He graduated from the Chicago Kent College of Law with the degree of LL.B. The study of law, which he had taken up only as a means of widening his knowledge and to better qualify himself for citizenship, had acquired such an influence upon him that he decided to make it his permanent occupation. In 1899 he took the State Bar examination at Springfield, Ill., was admitted to practice and in October of that year his career as a lawyer began, although he still continued in the employ of Marshall Field & Co. nearly four years following this date.

The spring of 1903 he was appointed assistant city attorney by John F. Smulski and served as such for four years. In 1907 he was appointed by Corporation Counsel Edward J. Brundage, a trial lawyer in the office of city attorney and has continued as such to the present time.

Mr. Frercks is a member of the Hamilton and Illinois clubs and the Chicago Bar association. In November 8, 1903, Miss Josephine O'Keefe became his wife and to their union has been born two sons, Henry and Herbert.

Alexander N. Fullerton was one of the four first lawyers of Chicago, all of whom located here in 1833. He did not practice long, as he drifted into politics and mercantile pursuits. He was, for a time, associated with Grant Goodrich as the senior member, was a member of the first Board of Public Health and was also clerk of the Board of Town (Chicago) Trustees. A native of the Green Mountain State, he early secured a fair education and in due time was admitted to the bar. He prospered in his mercantile ventures, and at the time of his death, in September, 1880, was possessed of considerable wealth.

Benjamin Ela Gallup, for over forty years a member of the Chicago bar, and one of the pioneers among Chicago real estate men in the movement which first induced Eastern and English capital to seek investment on a large scale in this city, died at 2:15 o'clock Sunday afternoon, December 1, 1895, at his home, 1710 Indiana avenue. Mr. Gallup was devoted to the city of his adoption, and did much during his long residence here toward building it up. By his genial qualities and fair dealing he made a host of friends, became an able lawyer, a successful capitalist and a popular real estate mortgage and loan broker. Mr. Gallup was born July 12, 1826, at Lebanon, New Hampshire. His father was a physician, and came from an old Connecticut family. Benjamin was the eldest of five children. His earlier education was secured at Kimball Union academy, Meriden, New Hampshire, and afterward he entered Dartmouth college, graduating in the class of 1847. He was thrown largely on his own resources, and learned the lessons of self-reliance that clung to him in later years. He taught school during his college vacations and after graduation. Afterward he did civil engineering work for the Vermont Central Railroad.

He studied law at Bangor, Maine, and was admitted to the bar in 1850. In 1850 he came West and located in Wisconsin, coming to Chicago in 1853, and was admitted to the Illinois bar December 14, 1853. For seven or eight years he practiced law here, the firm name being Gallup & Hitchcock. Then Mr. Gallup formed a partnership with the well-known Francis B. Peabody, and for many years the firm of Gallup & Peabody was one of the leading firms in Chicago in real estate and financial circles. During this time Mr. Gallup handled all of Hetty Green's money and property here. In fact, it was he who first induced her to invest in this city. The partnership with Mr. Peabody continued until 1875, when Mr. Gallup went to Europe and remained fifteen months. In 1878 he was appointed by President Hayes as a commissioner to the Paris Exposition. In 1871 he built the La Salle building, at the northwest corner of Madison and La Salle streets, which has remained in his family to the present time. He took an active interest in politics, and during the war was an alderman from the old Fourth ward. For the last seven or eight years of Mr. Gallup's life his health had so failed that he was not able to actively attend to business. Hon. Charles Hitchcock, Mr. Gallup's law partner, was president of the Constitutional convention of 1870, and ranked among the ablest lawyers of the State. Mr. Peabody, his partner for many years, is today one of our most active and extensive real estate mortgage and loan brokers.

Mr. Gallup was one of the first members of the Union League and Calumet clubs. He was a good man, and the city is better for his having lived in it. He was an attendant at the First Presbyterian church.

Homer K. Galpin, clerk of the Municipal court of the city of Chicago, is a representative of the younger, progressive element that is typical of the Chicago of today. He was born December 11, 1871, at 729 Monroe street, where he now resides. His father, Homer B. Galpin, is well remembered by the older residents of the county and for forty years was a deputy sheriff. He was a native of Vermont, as was also his wife, Wealtha J. Plimpton, and both were of English ancestry. Homer B. Galpin came to Illinois in 1848 and for some time worked on the farm of the father of Judge James B. Bradwell, recently deceased, near Palatine in Cook county. In 1854 he was appointed deputy sheriff and his long continuance in that office rendered his name an almost household word in the county. He held this office continuously with the exception of two years, when he was gas inspector under appointment of Mayor Hempstead Washburn, until his death, July 4, 1900.

Homer K. Galpin graduated from the First Division High School in 1890 and for one year attended the Metropolitan Business college, an institution famed as the business training school of so many of the prominent men of Chicago. He read law in the office of Lyman & Jackson, during which time he attended night sessions of the Chicago College of Law, which graduated him in 1893. He practiced his profession with his preceptors until 1895, when he became the junior partner of the law firm of Kenney & Galpin. This association continued until its dissolution in 1903. In 1899 Mr. Galpin was appointed chief deputy clerk, of the Board of Review and the year following was appointed clerk of that body.

In 1904 he became the nominee of his party for State senator from the Second district, was elected the ensuing fall and participated in much important legislation transacted during his term of office, not the least of which was the application for a new charter for Chicago. He was chairman of the important committee on revenue and otherwise was prominent in legislative affairs. He resigned from the board of review in 1906 to enter the contest for the office of clerk of the Municipal court, to which office he was duly elected and in which capacity he is now serving. Mr. Galpin is a Republican of the aggressive type, for years served as committeeman of what is now the Twentieth ward Republican club, and is a member of the Illinois and the Eagle River Fishing and Shooting clubs. He is a member of the B. P. O. E. On April 4, 1893, he married Miss Jessie T. Thomas.

Myers A. Garrett is a native of Pennsylvania, his birth occurring at Myerstown on April 20, 1851. Andrew Garrett, his father, was a manufacturer of threshing machines and a pioneer reaper manufacturer. In later life he moved to Shelby, Richland county, Ohio, where he died in 1888. The Garrett family for several generations have been residents of America and are an admixture of Scotch, Irish and English blood principally. The mother of Myers A. Garrett (whose maiden name was Margaret Myers) was descended from Palatinate ancestry, the progenitor coming to America early in the eighteenth century and first settling at Newburg, New York. Subsequently they located in the Schoharie Valley of New York and from there crossed the Blue Ridge mountains into the Lebanon Valley of Pennsylvania, where they founded the town of Myerstown. Mrs. Garrett died in 1901.

Myers A. Garrett moved with his parents to Shelby, Ohio, in 1865, and there received his early education. When nineteen years old he went to the oil region of Pennsylvania, but after a few months located in Buffalo, N. Y., where he was employed, for a time, at various occupations in connection with railroad work, then as clerk in a freight office and later as agent of the Erie and North Shore Dispatch fast freight line. In 1880 he was sent by this company on special work on the Erie Line and its New England connections to overcome delays occurring on the fast freight line, and the successful accomplishment of this mission led to his appointment as freight agent at Binghamton, New York. This position he resigned in 1883, to accept the appointment as agent at Denver for the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad Company, serving as such one year, and the year following was traveling Freight Agent for the West Shore Fast Freight Line. Succeeding this he was engaged in raising live stock and ranching in Nance county, Nebraska, until 1887, when he sold out and came to Chicago as the Superintendent of the Anglo-American Refrigerator Car Line. Two years later he became the Western Manager of F. W. Bird & Son, manufacturers of car roofing and insulating paper, with whom he continued thirteen years.

Having become a stockholder of the Farlow Draft Gear company, he was elected vice-president of that corporation in 1904, and has since acted as its Western representative. Mr. Garrett is best known to the public as a member of the Republican County Central committee in 1895, of which he was a member of the Executive Committee, and as a member of the board of county commissioners by his election in 1896. He was chairman of the building committee of the board during his membership and under his direct supervision the newer buildings at Dunning and the receiving ward at the County hospital were erected. Mr. Garrett is a Knight Templar Mason and a member of the Royal League. He is also a member of the Union League club, and the Presbyterian church. On August 12, 1875, he was united in marriage with Eleanor Percival Marshall of Buffalo, N. Y., and they are the parents of one living child, a son, Carlton Marshall Garrett.

Edward J. Glackin has a record as a member of the law-making body of Illinois that is well worthy of commendation, regardless of political environment or sentiment. His acts have invariably been in harmony with measures for the good of the State as a whole and of Cook county and Chicago in particular. His public career began as a clerk under County Treasurer Charles Kern, later as a clerk for Mr. McElligott, the Appellate court clerk. He was appointed condemnation clerk on the board of local improvements by Mayor Harrison and has ever since been employed by the city in this line of work. In 1894 he was elected a representative to the State Legislature, and in 1906 was elected State senator from the Seventeenth Senatorial district. While representative and senator his work was of a high order on the committees on education, labor, manufacturing, sanitation and others. He introduced the bill authorizing courts of record to suspend sentence of certain criminal offenses, which bill having passed, was vetoed by the governor; also the bill, which passed, regulating the admission of minors to public dance halls; the bill providing for the reporting of accidents to employes; the bill that became a law, regulating the sale of tickets to public places of amusement. Through his efforts an appropriation of $25,000 was secured for the establishment of a sanitarium for the care of tuberculosis patients, and he caused to be passed a bill enabling cities and villages to establish and maintain public tuberculosis sanitariums. He was also the author of the joint resolution which passed, calling upon members of the National Legislature to increase the United States navy by building twenty additional battleships, and was elected chairman of the Forest Reserve district and Outer Belt Park Commission of Illinois. From a vote of the Legislative Voters' League he was said to have been "industrious and aggressive and the best representative from his district." Mr. Glackin is a Democrat.

He was born at Montreal, Canada, May 9, 1867, a son of James and Mary (Deegan) Glackin, both natives of Ireland. The family came to Chicago in 1868, where the father worked at his trade of moulder until his death. Edward J. Glackin was educated in the public schools of Chicago and at St. Patrick's academy. He learned and followed the tinning trade, which industry he represented in the trade and labor assembly, until he began his public career. He also read law and for a considerable time was engaged in the real estate business and in the manufacture of ventilators. He belongs to the Catholic Order of Foresters, the Royal League, Knights of Columbus, Knights of Pythias, Ancient Order of Hibernians, Fraternal Order of Eagles and the Tammany society of Chicago and the Cook County Democratic club. August 30, 1905, he married Miss Anna F. Cull and their residence is at 265 South Morgan street.

Fritz Glogauer, son of Samuel and Pauline (Forell) Glogauer, was born in Germany, July 15, 1857, and was educated there in public schools and in the gymnasium. In 1877, when he was about twenty years old, he came to the United States and found employment on German newspapers in Cincinnati, Cleveland and St. Louis. He located in Chicago September 2, 1889, and began issuing the Abendpost, of which he has been the editor ever since. Almost from the day of its initial appearance the paper was a popular success and the loyalty of its constituency has never wavered. It is considered one of the best of the influential German newspapers of America. Personally, as editorially, Mr. Glogauer is independent in politics, supporting such men and measures as he deems most promising to the general good. He is a member of the Germania Maennerchor. He married Caroline Seibel April 30, 1885, and has four children named respectively Paula, Stella, Caroline and Martha. His residence is at 2532 Kenmore avenue.

James Grant was a pioneer lawyer of note who located in Chicago. He came here in the spring of 1834 from North Carolina, where he was born and educated. That he was at that time a man of considerable force of character is shown by the fact that he secured the appointment of State's attorney for the Chicago circuit against a considerable competition, in January, 1835. The circuit then included all the counties in the State north of La Salle, Rock Island and McLean, and east of Rock river, and he held the office until 1837, and proved himself a vigorous and capable prosecutor. During the time he was State's attorney he also acquired his fair share of the civil practice in Chicago and other parts of the circuit. He also became involved in real estate dealings, by which, like many others, he made a great deal of money on paper, but the financial panic of 1837 so shrunk the value of that kind of property that he found himself "just about able to pay his debts," as he expressed it, and in 1839 he removed to Davenport, Iowa. In Iowa he was, for a time, judge of one of the Circuit courts, and was also chairman of the committee appointed by the Legislature, soon after it was admitted to the Union, to prepare a code of laws for the State, and the code reported by this committee forms the basis of the statute laws of the State of Iowa at the present time. He accumulated a large estate by his law practice and later in life invested in California and Colorado mining ventures.

Charles E. Graves. The jewelry business conducted by this gentleman was established in 1857 by J. B. Chambers. Ever since its commencement it has maintained a high place among the retail establishments of this city. For many years it has been if not the leading house of its line, at least one of the leading houses.

The first store stood on Clark, between Washington and Madison streets and later at the southwest corner of Clark and Madison. In 1905 when Charles E. Graves & Company, successors of the old firm, moved to the southwest corner of Wabash and Madison streets, the store had stood at its old location on Clark and Madison for only two years less than half a century. In the great fire of 1871 almost the entire stock was destroyed with the store, but in less than two weeks the firm had resumed business on the north side of West Madison, between Canal and Clinton, and a little later they moved back to the old quarters.

Soon after the business was first established Beverly R. Chambers, son of J. B. Chambers, was admitted to the partnership, the firm becoming J. B. Chambers & Company. In January, 1886, the elder Chambers died and soon afterward during the same year the firm was incorporated with Beverly R. Chambers as president; Charles E. Graves secretary and John A. Farwell, treasurer and general manager. Twelve weeks after the death of his father Beverly R. Chambers, who had been in bad health for some years, also died and after awhile Mrs. J. B. Chambers became president, the old officers still continuing to serve. In 1899 Mr. Farwell retired and Mr. Graves bought control of the business and on March 31, 1900, the name was changed to Charles E. Graves & Company, with Mr. Graves as president, Col. W. B. Keeler vice-president and Thomas Radd, treasurer; all of whom are now holding these respective offices. The firm is exceedingly prosperous, the business having nearly doubled since their removal to the new quarters in 1905.

Frank Pliny Graves, son of John B. and Frances E. (Greene) Graves, was born at Grand Rapids, Michigan, June 27, 1871. His father, who was a lumberman, served the union cause in the Civil war as a non-commissioned officer. The younger Graves was educated in the public schools of Grand Rapids and in 1893 received the degree of Bachelor of Arts at the University of Michigan, from the law department of which institution he was graduated in 1895. From that time until 1900 he practiced law at Benton Harbor, Michigan, and from 1900 has continued the practice of law in Chicago. In 1898 he enlisted in the Thirty-third Michigan Volunteers and served gallantly with the rank of captain in the Santiago campaign and at the end of the war was mustered out of the service. He married Lucy Crawford, daughter of Andrew Crawford of Chicago, and they have a daughter named Virginia. The winter residence of the family is 41 Bitter Sweet place, Chicago, its summer residence is "Craigie," St. Joseph, Michigan. Mr. Graves is a Republican, a member of most of the Masonic orders, and is a member of the Union League, University, Glenview, South Shore, Middy and Chicago Yacht clubs of Chicago and of the Alpha Delta Phi Club of New York.

Guy Guernsey is a native of Vigo county, Indiana, his birth occurring January 11, 1872. He is a son of William Donaldson and Ellen B. (Flint) Guernsey. The Guernseys have been residents of America since the year 1635, and the Guernseys, Flints, Donaldsons and Westons, the direct four ancestral branches of Guy, have resided in America since prior to the year 1700. William Donaldson Guernsey followed railroading during his life and died at Terre Haute, Indiana, in 1879. His widow married Sidney Wanzer, and since his death in 1905 made her home with our subject until her death.

Shortly after the death of Mr. Guernsey the family moved to Osage, Iowa, where Guy Guernsey was reared to manhood and where he received his early education. In 1887 he entered the academy at Grinnell, Iowa, and two years later entered the scientific course of Iowa College at Grinnell, graduating in 1892; for the succeeding four years he was employed as machinist and the following eight years he was a traveling salesman. In 1901 he moved to Chicago and has ever since made his home in the Second ward. He read law and was graduated, in 1904, from the Chicago Kent College of Law, succeeding which he became a partner of Charles W. Lamborn under the firm name of Lamborn & Guernsey, which has since actively continued in the practice of law.

Guy Guernsey in a very great degree is the embodiment of the progressive, wide-awake, young American. Immediately on locating in Chicago he made the city his home in every sense of the word. His energy and vitality found vent in all the avenues of the county's growth and progress. Taking an active interest in politics he soon became, and is now, the president of his precinct and is the president of the West Central Improvement association—an organization to promote civic improvement. In 1907 he was president of the alumni association of the Chicago Kent College of Law, of which college he is now secretary, and in 1906 was president of the alumni association of the Phi Delta Phi fraternity. Mr. Guernsey is a life member of the Hamilton club, and is a member of the Waupanseh and Press clubs, Chicago Bar association and the Illinois Bar association. He is also a member of the Benevolent and Progressive Order of Elks, is a Knight Templar Mason, being a member of Montjoie commandery, a Noble of the Mystic Shrine and a member of the North American Union, and Royal Arcanum.

On March 13, 1893, Mr. Guernsey wedded Miss Genevieve B. Wright of Orchard, Iowa, who died January 17, 1902, leaving one son, William Donaldson, born January 11, 1902. January 4, 1906, he married Miss Jennie L., daughter of Sidney Wanzer. Always a Republican in politics, Mr. Guernsey has ever been active and ready to advance the best interests of his party. In 1896 he was nominated and elected Clerk of the Probate Court of Cook county, which office he is now filling. He has been secretary of Chicago Kent College of Law since 1905.

Severt T. Gunderson. This old and prominent citizen of Chicago, whose light of life went out March 7, 1908, was a stalwart and fine representative of the land of the midnight sun. He had been an important factor in the public affairs of the city for almost half a century. Its material prosperity had been promoted through his activity in business circles; educational and moral interests received his generous support, and the historic progress of the city, as evidenced by such grand forces as the World's Columbian Exposition, had been materially advanced by him. As a typical Norseman, he was a man not only of rugged intellectual strength, but of warm impulses and great heart. He was a man of broad usefulness, and also a deeply religious member of the community, giving freely of his means, time and strength to forward effective movements of charity and philanthropy.

S. T. Gunderson was born in Norway in the year 1839, and in 1848, at the age of nine years, he accompanied his parents on their immigration to the new world. The family at once located in Chicago, then a rapidly growing city of twenty thousand people. The journey westward was made by way of the Hudson river, the Erie canal and the Great Lakes, as railroad facilities were things of the future. The boy at once entered the public schools of Chicago, but at the age of fifteen, on account of limited family circumstances, left his books behind him and commenced to learn the carpenter's trade. At the age of eighteen he established a business of his own in this field, and was thus engaged when the panic of 1857 swept over the country.

In view of the cessation of building operations caused by the financial depression of this period, Mr. Gunderson removed to Fort Leavenworth, Kan., in 1858, but, finding conditions there no better, returned to Chicago. In 1862 he purchased a lake vessel, the "Hercules," and within the next five years became owner of six vessels, most of them engaged in the grain trade. He carefully watched his business interests, and his diligence, frugality and capable management brought him a good income. As his financial resources increased, he also became connected with the lumber trade, and in 1871 purchased large interests in sawmills. This business was in a thriving condition when, in 1875, his plant was destroyed by fire, and, being but lightly insured, he lost nearly everything he had, and was financially ruined. But at this gloomy period, as ever through life, disaster seemed but to spur him on to more determined effort and harder labor. This brave trait, with his honorable dealings and remarkable business foresight, completely rebuilt his fortunes. From 1885 to 1899 Mr. Gunderson was the owner of extensive milling interests, and was the senior member of the firm of S. T. Gunderson & Son, manufacturers of moldings, casings, etc., and for a number of years was connected with John A. Gauger & Co., shipping large quantities of doors and sash of their own manufacture throughout the United States.

It was during this period of his career that Mr. Gunderson made such an enduring record in connection with the World's Fair. When the subject of celebrating the fourth centennial of the discovery of America was agitated in 1892, he became deeply interested in the project, and was an untiring and invaluable worker in his efforts to secure Chicago as the site of the exposition. The history of the opposition is well known, and the triumph of this city, both in securing the site and organizing the fair along cosmopolitan lines, is in no small part due to Mr. Gunderson. From first to last he gave his support to the exposition and worked for its broad success, and the Viking ship is one of the striking features which owed its origin to his enterprise and sense of historic justice. He was president of the company which purchased the little vessel, which is a reproduction of the bold craft which is supposed to have landed a Norse colony on New England shores in 1000 A. D., and which is still on exhibition at the Field Columbian Museum.

In 1892 Mr. Gunderson organized the firm of S. T. Gunderson & Sons, the well-known home builders of the West Side and Oak Park, and with the destruction by fire of his sash, door and molding factory (in 1898), concentrated his abilities upon the development of this enterprise. The firm owned Gunderson & Gauger's addition to Chicago, Gunderson & Gauger's addition to Oak Park, Gunderson's addition to Chicago, S. T. Gunderson & Son's addition to Oak Park, and other city property, including a beautiful home of Mr. Gunderson at No. 1463 Washington boulevard. He foresaw the future development and growth of the city, and with keen sagacity realized the advancement which would be made in the value of real estate. He not only largely invested in realty, but did not wait for others to improve it, but entered energetically into the work himself. The firm, of which he was the senior member, built on an average for the past decade, from sixty to eighty homes annually, which have been sold for cash and on terms. As true home builders it stands related to the community as a public benefactor.

In politics Mr. Gunderson was a firm Republican, but was never a politician in the insidious sense. In 1874 he was elected to a seat in the common council; in June, 1891, he was appointed member of the Library Board; in 1894 a member of the Board of Education, and on May 28, 1907, was reappointed a member of the Board of Education, his term expiring in 1908. When Mr. Gunderson was on the Board of Education in 1894, he became deeply concerned in the welfare of truant children. He, therefore, introduced a resolution, which was adopted, asking that the Legislature enact a law that should provide a parental school to the children of the city, by which truants could be taken from evil associates on the street and kept under proper control. Several years afterward the law was enacted by which was founded the Parental School of Chicago.

Mr. Gunderson also became much interested in the Reformatory school at Pontiac, Ill., to which children of fourteen and over were sent by the city magistrates, when convicted of misdemeanor. Discovering that the only work provided for the juvenile inmates was the making of brick and shoes, he introduced into the board a resolution asking that the Legislature enact a law providing for a regular system of manual training therein. Within three months such a law was passed, and before his death Mr. Gunderson had the satisfaction of knowing that only 25 per cent. of the former inmates returned to the school (instead of 75 per cent., as before), the remainder having become thoroughly grounded in some useful trade and been transformed into useful and moral members of the community.

In 1863 was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Gunderson and Miss Emily C. Olson. Two sons and a daughter were born to their union. George O., the elder, was not only associated with the deceased in his real estate and manufacturing enterprises, but is the founder of large interests himself. He was married June 15, 1887, to Miss Julia A., daughter of O. B. Jacobs, a well-known lumber dealer. Seward M. Gunderson, the second son, has been most actively connected with real estate and building operations as a member of the firm of S. T. Gunderson & Sons. He was married October 10, 1894, to Abigail C., daughter of Murdoch Campbell. The daughter, Ida Mabel Gunderson, is a highly educated and accomplished young lady, being a graduate of the Misses Grant Seminary and the Chicago Musical College (from which she received a teachers' diploma). Besides being a brilliant musician, she possesses considerable artistic talent as a painter in oils and water colors, and is accomplished along other lines. In 1896 she was married to Charles A. Danz, a commission merchant.

During the later years of his life Mr. Gunderson traveled extensively, both in his adopted country and abroad, thereby collecting useful and interesting information and imbibing those liberal ideas that come with contact with the world. Several times he journeyed from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the lakes to the gulf, and thence to Mexico. In 1888 and 1902 he went to Europe, visiting England, Norway, Sweden, Germany, Denmark and France, studying the people and visiting points of beauty and historic interest. In May, 1902, when he and his wife took their last trip through Europe, he was very anxious to see the midnight sun at its highest, and he arrived at the summit of North Cape on the 26th of June of that year. He returned along the northwestern coast of Norway, through all the fjords, and traveled overland from Ode to Christiana, thence to Stockholm, and returned from Stockholm on the Gota canal to Gotenberg. In 1900 Mr. Gunderson went to Cuba, and in January, 1905, he took a Mediterranean trip. Leaving New York on February 2, 1905, he visited the following places: Funchal, Smyrna, Villefranch, Queenstown, Cadiz, Caifa, Gibraltar, Jaffa, Algiers, Alexandria, Valette, Naples, Athens, Rome, Pompeii, Jerusalem, Nice and Monte Carlo. He returned via Liverpool. In February, 1906, Mr. and Mrs. Gunderson visited Old Mexico and the Pacific coast.

In his fraternal relations Mr. Gunderson was best known as a Mason of long and honorable standing. In 1868 he was initiated into the order as a member of Kilwinning Lodge No. 311, A. F. & A. M.; Chicago Commandery No. 19, K. T.; Oriental Consistory, and Medinah Temple of the Mystic Shrine. He was also one of the founders of the Masonic Orphans' Home, and served as its trustee for three years. As to social organizations, he was identified with the Menoken, Lincoln and Skandinavian Literary clubs. He was a life-long member of the Lutheran church, and, despite the extent of his business and public duties, he found time to devote to the cause of Christianity and its upbuilding. He was not only a reformer in the cause of public morality, but he was charitable and benevolent toward the young and dependent. Although he supported many public charities with his means and counsel, he perhaps gave more in a quiet and unostentatious manner, seeking never the praise of men.

Richard Cartwright Hall was born at Boston, Mass., October 9, 1858, and is the son of Henry Augustus and Susan (Beddoes) Hall. The father, who was a successful wool merchant, died November 18, 1893, but the mother is still alive. Richard C., the subject of this review, was educated in the Boston public and high schools and in 1876 at the age of eighteen years he began work for the Boston Belting company, with which concern he remained for two years. He then accepted a position with the Eastern Rubber company as traveling salesman, continuing until 1888, when he came to Chicago and engaged in the rubber goods business under the firm name of Elson, Hall & Co., with offices at 71 Randolph street. Two years later the concern was moved to 144-46 East Lake street. After another two years the firm name was changed to the Duck Brand company, with Dunlap, Lawton & Hall, proprietors. At the time this change was effected the company moved to 199-201 East Madison street. Two years later they moved to the corner of Market and Jackson streets, and about this time Mr. Dunlap withdrew from the firm and the name was changed to the Duck Brand company, with Lawton and Hall sole proprietors. A little later the firm moved to Jackson and Franklin streets and in 1903 came to the present location at 319 to 327 Franklin street.

Mr. Hall has been a member of the vestry of St. Marks of Evanston for the last ten years; he is also a member of the Union League and the Skokie country clubs. He is president of the Chicago Association of Commerce and a member of the Industrial club, trustee of the Chicago Home for Boys, vice president of the Evanston Y. M. C. A. and was the first president of the Chicago Credit Men's association, which position he occupied for two years. On June 10, 1891, he married Grace (Ellis) of Framingham, Mass. They have had the following children: Richard Ellis, Dorothy, Grace and Edward (deceased). The family resides at 1138 Judson avenue, Evanston.

Frank Hamlin was born at Bangor, Maine, September 26, 1862, a son of Hannibal and Ellen Vesta (Emery) Hamlin. Hannibal Hamlin (1809-91) was the vice-president of the United States 1861-65. Mr. Hamlin was educated in public schools at Bangor, at Phillip's Exeter academy, Exeter, New Hampshire, at Harvard university, where he received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1884, and at the Boston University of Law, which conferred on him the degree of Bachelor of Laws in 1888. He was admitted to the bar in 1888 and in November, that year, came to Chicago and began the practice of his profession with Flower, Remy & Holstein. In 1890 he organized the firm of Hamlin & Holland, with offices at 119 La Salle street. In 1892 its style was changed to Hamlin, Holland & Boyden and it removed to 107 Dearborn street and is now known as Hamlin & Boyden. Mr. Hamlin was offered and declined the attorneyship for the Chicago Sanitary district, was attorney for the Lincoln Park commissioners 1900-1906, for the Civil Service commission 1907 and was chosen attorney for the Chicago board of education in 1907. He is a Republican and a member of the Chicago, University and Marquette clubs. His residence is at 10 Tower court.

John J. Hanberg is probably as well and favorably known as any man in Cook county by reason of his active connection with public affairs. Born January 29, 1858, in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, he was one of six children, two now living, born to the marriage of H. H. Heuser Hanberg and Edel C. Neilsen, who were of German and Danish ancestry, respectively. In Mecklingburg from which place the family originally came, the name was spelled Heinberg, but after the removal to Schleswig-Holstein, it has remained as it is now.

John J. Hanberg served an apprenticeship as an accountant in mercantile lines in his native country with the firm of P. P. Schmidt, leading merchants of Flensburg. Largely owing to the favorable representations of his father who was serving in the Danish navy, and as such had visited this country, he immigrated to America in 1877 and the same year landed in Chicago with practically not a dollar to his name and with his future success to establish. At the first favorable opportunity he applied for and secured his naturalization papers and has ever since borne his part in all that pertains to good American citizenship. For five years he was employed as a clerk and from what he saved of his earnings was enabled to establish himself in the crockery and glassware business in South Chicago, which business, eventually, was merged into general mercantile pursuits. His belief that a protective tariff was for the best interests of the country led him to join the Republican party, and in politics he has ever since been an ardent supporter of the policies of that organization.

To better equip himself for citizenship he attended evening schools to perfect himself in the English language in which he already was fairly proficient. In 1887 he became a member of the School Board of District No. 1, of South Chicago, was elected secretary of the same, was chairman of the Buildings and Grounds committee and as such was instrumental in the erection of the old Phil Sheridan school and the South Chicago High school buildings. He served four full terms (1894 to 1898) by election as collector of the town of Hyde Park, and in 1900 was elected president of the board of county commissioners.

It was during his incumbency of this office that noteworthy stormy sessions were held, much important legislation was transacted and much honor came to Mr. Hanberg through his wise and efficient administration. In 1902 he was elected treasurer of Cook county, serving one full term of four years. Occupying this position Mr. Hanberg introduced certain reforms and methods that for years to come will redound to the benefit of the county. Voluntarily he returned to the county the interest accruing from public money deposited in the banks, and was the first county treasurer to inaugurate the plan of at once disbursing funds to the different bodies to which it belonged. The simplified method of tax collection and accounting now in vogue, and since adopted by Chicago and other municipalities and corporations, together with a very much simplified system of auditing, was inaugurated during his official career as county treasurer.

While Mr. Hanberg was personally capable of filling any department of his office, he was no less capable as an executive, his selections for the heads of departments stamping him as an executive of high order. In January, 1907, he was appointed by Governor Deen a member of the Board of Pardons, an office he resigned to accept the position of Commissioner of Public Works to which he was appointed by Mayor Busse and which office he is now filling. For many years Mr. Hanberg has been a member of the Masonic fraternity. He is a Knight Templar of Calumet commandery, belongs to Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., and is a Knight of Pythias. In 1882 he was married to Miss Ida Carr, the daughter of a pioneer hardware merchant of the North Side of Chicago, by whom he is the father of four children: Christian H., a teller in the Fort Dearborn National Bank, John V., employed with A. C. Clark & Company, Thomas Carr and Ida L.

Francis Alonzo Hardy was born in Seaforth, England, on January 28, 1851, and is a son of Anson and Francis Maria (How) Hardy, both of whom were natives of Massachusetts, where they resided for many years. The father was a successful and prominent manufacturer of the Old Bay State. Francis Alonzo, the subject of this sketch, was educated in the Boston public and Latin schools. In 1868 he began for himself as clerk in a wholesale jewelry house in Boston. He remained thus occupied for a period of seven years. He then moved to New York but after a short time came to Chicago and in 1878 began an independent business selling wholesale optical goods at 34 Washington street. He remained in that store for a period of four years and then moved to 79 Madison street, but in 1897 came to his present location at 113 Wabash avenue.

At the present day the firm is doing a large and profitable business. The members of the company are F. A. Hardy, subject, who is the president; J. H. Hardin, vice-president and manger; Edward A. Swadener, secretary, and Edwin Morse, treasurer. Mr. Hardy takes much interest in politics and in the moral advancement of the community in which he lives. He is independent in politics and is not aspiring for political preferment. He is a member of the Episcopal Church, and of the Union League, Chicago Athletic and Glenview clubs; also of the Chicago association and Commercial Men's association. On February 4, 1880, he married at Perth Amboy, New Jersey, Mary Parry Kaesbey and they have the following children: Edward Kaesbey, Frances How, Editha Wallbridge. The family resides in Evanston.

Chicago. He came from Vermont, where his birth occurred in 1782. During his life here he was justly styled "The Father of Medicine in Chicago." He studied medicine in Manchester and first began practicing at Burlington. During the war of 1812 he offered his services as surgeon to the use of the army. At the battle of Plattsburg he served as surgeon on board the "Saratoga," which was commanded by Captain McDonough. At the close of the war he resumed his practice at Burlington but in 1829 determined to come West. He located first at Jacksonville, Ill., but in 1830 came to Chicago and here mainly continued to practice during the remainder of his life. He practiced at Old Fort Dearborn and was called upon during the Black Hawk war to attend the soldiers. During the rage of cholera among the troops under General Scott in 1832, Dr. Harmon did excellent service. At the same time he devoted considerable time to medical attendance upon the settlers being unwilling to devote all his time to the soldiers. He had some sharp words with General Scott and finally refused longer to attend the soldiers.

After the excitement of 1832 had subsided he opened an office in the old Kinzie house and there for a number of years waited upon all requiring his services. It is said that he was the first to perform a capital surgical operation in this city. He successfully amputated the frozen feet of a settler. He had unbounded faith in the future of Chicago and was often heard to predict that the city would soon have more than a million inhabitants. At one time he owned a large tract of land in the center of the North Side, but like many others sold out too soon. In his honor Harmon court was named. At the corner of that court and Michigan avenue, the Harmon mansion stood for many years. At an early date he became interested in land in Texas and while inspecting the same died in 1869.

Abram J. Harris is a product of the West Side of Chicago, his birth occurring September 16, 1869. His father, Tubow Harris, a native of Prussia, came to America in 1867, and located in Chicago the same year where for many years he was engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was twice married, his first wife, formerly Alice Lanko, being the mother of the subject of this sketch. Abram J. Harris received his early education in the public school and upon attaining his majority embarked in the wholesale cigar trade and later in the real estate and insurance business. When of age he was elected the Republican captain of his precinct, then in the Seventh but now a part of the Ninth ward, and in this capacity has served continuously to the present. In 1897, by appointment of Governor Tanner, he became assistant chief factory inspector, continuing as such through a part of Governor Yates' administration.

In 1904 he was elected alderman from his ward, and in 1906 became candidate of his party for the office of Criminal court clerk, a position he is now filling. Mr. Harris is a Royal Arch Mason, a Knight of Pythias, a member of the B. P. O. E., the National Union, B'nai Brith, and the Hamilton and Illinois Athletic clubs. He is also a director of the Jewish Old People's Home, Jewish Orphan Asylum, Jewish Shelter House, Jewish Free Burying Ground at Waldheim, and is connected with various other benevolent institutions. He was married December 22, 1900, to Miss Sara Benson, of Indianapolis, by whom he is the father of three children, Arnold B., Eleanor M. and Lillian F.

Madison R. Harris has been actively engaged in the practice of law in the city of Chicago for the past thirty-four years, during which time he has been connected with many noteworthy cases. Demas L. Harris, his father, was a farmer in Ohio and when the discovery of gold on the Pacific coast became known, was one of the first to cross the plains from St. Joseph, Missouri, by mule team. For two years he was in the mines of California and while there was the "miners" candidate for the State Legislature at the time the territory was organized. He returned to the "States" in 1852 and in 1856 moved to Lee county, Illinois, where he engaged in farming. In 1860 he was elected to the State Legislature. For many years he was a member of the board of supervisors and was a leading spirit in raising bounties during the Civil war so that a draft was never levied in Lee county. In 1876 he removed to Mendota where, two years later, he was elected to the board of aldermen. It was due to his persistence that a water works system was installed at Mendota and to this day it is referred to as the Harris Water Works System. Mr. Harris married Ann Louise Eyles and by her became the father of five children, but two of whom are now living. He died in 1899 followed by his widow in 1907.

Madison R. Harris was born in Summit county, Ohio, September 29, 1849, came with his parents to Illinois where he assisted in the work of the farm during the summers and attended the district school during the winters. He entered Lombard university at Galesburg, and was graduated in the classical course of that institution in 1871. For one year he studied law at home and for two years was under the tutelage of James K. Edsall, at Dixon, who afterwards became the attorney general of Illinois. He took his examination before the Supreme court at Springfield in January, 1874, was admitted to the bar and the same year began practicing in Chicago, which he has since continued uninterruptedly. In 1880 he was elected to the State Legislature from the (then) First Senatorial district composed of the First, Ninth and Tenth wards, which territory is now included in the First, Seventeenth and Eighteenth wards. In 1887 he was elected from the old Ninth (now the Eighteenth) ward to the City Council and was reelected serving two terms. For four years he was a member of the Republican State Central committee of which John R. Tanner was then chairman, and was a Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket that nominated Gen. Benjamin Harrison a second time for President. In June, 1907, he was appointed assistant city attorney and has since continued as such, on trial work. Mr. Harris is a member of the Baptist church, Hesperia lodge, No. 411, A. F. and A. M., the Knights of Pythias, the Royal Arcanum and the Illinois club. September 16, 1886, he married Catharine F. Duffield and they reside at 968 Jackson boulevard.

Paul A. Hazard was born, reared and educated in Chicago and has always made it his home. His parents, Julian J. and Mary (O'Bryne) Hazard, were both born in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., of French and Irish ancestry respectively and came to Chicago a short time prior to the great fire of 1871. Julian J. Hazard was for years a member of the ship chandlery firm of Baldwin & Hazard, which did an extensive business in supplying ships making the port of Chicago. He died August 9, 1907. Paul A. Hazard was born on Christmas, 1873, and after attending the public schools took a special course in Bryant & Stratton's Business college. For three years he held a clerical position with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway company, and then embarked in the real estate business.

While engaged in this occupation he took up the study of law and during the night sessions attended the Chicago College of Law from which he was graduated in June, 1896. Shortly after the completion of his legal studies he became attorney for the credit department of the Nelson Morris Company, and later, as branch house credit man for this company, traveled extensively, visiting the various branch establishments. His marriage with Miss Helen G. Rappal having occurred November 17, 1898, he resigned his position of traveling credit man and became head credit man for the McNeil-Higgins company, wholesale grocers, serving as such two and one-half years, and then became the general attorney for the company.

In 1905 he resigned to embark in the general practice of law as a member of the firm of Hazard & Prince, but owing to special inducements from his former clients, McNeil-Higgins Company, he again became general attorney on May 1, 1908, and is thus employed at the present time. Mr. Hazard has, since his majority, been an active worker in the ranks of the Republican party. At the August, 1908, primaries he received the Republican nomination for membership on the board of trustees for the Sanitary district of Chicago. Mr. Hazard is a member of the Hamilton club, Marquette club, Englewood club, the Illinois Athletic club, the Royal League and the Modern Woodmen of America, and resides at 971 East Fiftieth street.

Oscar Hebel, lawyer and a member of the board of assessors of Cook county, is a son of Louis and Anne (Stender) Hebel, who were natives of Germany. Louis Hebel came to America when a boy of about sixteen years and first located in Cincinnati, later moving to St. Louis and finally, in 1875, coming to Chicago, where he resided until his death, September 11, 1907. He was engaged in merchandising at Cincinnati on first coming to this country and while there enlisted August 1, 1862, for the preservation of the Union of his adopted country and twenty days later was mustered into the service as a member of Company A, One Hundred Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. October 28, 1862, he was elected second lieutenant of his company, and January 18, 1863, was promoted to first lieutenant. On July 31, 1863, he was promoted to captain of Company E of the same regiment and as such served until his resignation, March 13, 1864.

Captain Hebel was a participant in the battles of Hartsville, Tennessee, and Resaca, Kenesaw Mountain and Dalton, Georgia. He was a member of George H. Thomas post and his military career was marred by no spot or blemish. He followed mercantile pursuits in Chicago and was, during 1886-87, North Town Collector. His widow is yet living in Chicago. They were the parents of two sons and one daughter, all living.

Oscar Hebel was born in St. Louis, Missouri, January 6, 1868, and since the age of seven years has resided in Chicago. He was graduated from the North Division High School, read law, attended the Chicago College of Law, completing the course in 1891, was admitted to the bar the same year, and in 1892, after completing a special course of instruction in that institution received the degree of LL. B. He was engaged alone in the practice of his profession until 1904, since which time he has been a member of the law firm of Hebel & Haft. Mr. Hebel has always been a consistent Republican.

By appointment of Mayor George B. Swift he served as assistant city prosecuting attorney, and in 1901 was appointed a member of the board of election commissioners by Judge O. N. Carter. In this year he was the defeated candidate of his party for city attorney. In 1904, he was elected a member of the board of county assessors, reelected in 1908, and is now serving in that official position. Mr. Hebel is a member of Kilwinning lodge, No. 311, A. F. and A. M.; Lawn chapter, No. 205, R. A. M.; Lincoln Park commandery, No. 64, K. T., and Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He also belongs to the Knights of Pythias, Royal Arcanum, Columbian Knights and the Chicago Bar association. In 1889 Miss Mae C. Steffen became his wife and to them have been born two children: Mildred A. and Fred A.

Wallace Heckman, lawyer, is a native of Morgan county, Ohio, a son of Philip and Sarah A. (Farley) Heckman, who were farmers. His earliest recollections are of a pleasant life in the midst of the then unbroken flower covered prairies of DeKalb county, Illinois, where the family had moved at an early date. He was born May 22, 1851, and gained his primary education in the public schools of DeKalb county. In due time he was graduated from Hillsdale college. He read law in the office of Mattocks & Mason, in Chicago, and was admitted in 1876 to practice in the courts of Illinois.

After having practiced his profession three years at Mount Vernon, Illinois, he came to Chicago in 1879. In 1885 he formed a co-partnership with James G. Elsdon, under the firm name of Heckman & Elsdon. In 1890, by the admission to the firm of Mr. Shaw, its style was changed to Heckman, Elsdon & Shaw and it was so known until recently, when it assumed the form of Heckman & Shaw. Its offices are at 92 La Salle street. In 1903 Mr. Heckman was appointed counsel for and business manager of the University of Chicago. When he took charge of its affairs he consolidated all its real estate and other interests, and its entire business is now transacted in offices at 1204 Corn Exchange National Bank building. In the purchase for the University of land south of the Midway, consisting of a mile of frontage, including three entire blocks and involving an outlay of $1,500,000, he conducted all negotiations with such prudence that his purpose was not publicly known until the deal was closed. He is a director in the corporation controlling the South Side elevated railroad system; vice-president of the board of directors of the Chicago Railway company, and devoted considerable attention to the reorganization of the surface roads; a director in the Chicago Canal and Dock company; vice-president of the National Storage company, a trustee of Hillsdale college and was for three years president of the Illinois Civil Service association, in the work of which he has been active since 1897. He has long been closely identified with the Chicago Art Institute and has, during the past ten years, been a governing member. He has appeared before the Legislature in the interest of that institution and helped to secure the enactment of a law under which the Institute received for its support a mill tax levied on the South Park district of Chicago.

Mr. Heckman was one of the constituent members of the Municipal Voters' League, which was instituted by the election of a representative from each ward of Chicago, by those interested in the wise and honest administration of municipal affairs, with respect particularly to the efficiency and integrity of aspirants for election to the city council. He was elected from the Sixth ward to participate in the work of the league. For two years he was a member of its executive committee of eight, whose duty it is to gather, tabulate and preserve information as to the personal character and business and political records of aldermanic candidates, and when necessary in the interest of good government, to give such information to the press. In the early history of the league some of its members were several times menaced with suits for libel.

In his professional practice he has argued numerous well-known cases before high courts. One of the most important of them was that of Roy Gelatly in the Supreme court of Illinois, involving a matter of $100,000 in which he secured a second rehearing and eventually a decision favorable to his client. Another was that of the Singer Manufacturing company in the United States Supreme court, in which, at the request of the court itself, he was asked to make a second oral argument. That case is famous as having established some new precedents. It is a matter of history of more than local significance that Mr. Heckman was a member of a commission created to arbitrate the dispute between the Chicago Union Traction company, the Consolidated Traction company and the Metropolitan Elevated company on the one side and all of their respective employees on the other. The investigation covered all the ground as to the cost of living for the ten years previous, including rents, provisions, clothing and sundry expenses and the relative sums of them, and the finding of the commission, based on actual facts and conditions, secured full satisfaction to the employees and measurable satisfaction to the other parties to the controversy. Editorially, the Chicago Tribune described the report of the commission as "the most scientific treatment of the labor problem" up to that time. Mr. Heckman is a member of the Free Baptist Church; a Mason; a member of the Union League club, the City club, the Law club, the Quadrangle club, the Hamilton club and the Cliff Dwellers. Politically he acts with the Republican party. He married Tilly C. Howe, of Cherry Valley, Illinois, November 16, 1881, and they have a daughter named Jessie. His city residence is at 4505 Ellis avenue and he maintains a summer residence at Oregon, Illinois.

Dr. William Hessert, a successful surgeon of Chicago, was born in this city on March 11, 1871, and is the son of Dr. Gustav and Mary (Geys) Hessert. He was educated in the public schools of this city, after which he entered the medical department of North Western university and was graduated therefrom in 1892 with a degree of Doctor of Medicine. After his graduation he secured by competitive examination an appointment to the house staff of the Cook County hospital from 1892 to 1893. From October, 1893 to June, 1895 he took a course of post graduate studies in German universities. In 1896 he was appointed by the civil service commission an Inspector in the health department. He has taught for several years in the medical department of the Northwestern university. He is professor of surgery in the Chicago Polyclinic and late surgeon to the Cook County, German and St. Francis hospitals. He is now surgeon to the Uhlich Orphan Asylum, the Alexian Brothers and St. Joseph's hospitals. He is a member of the American Medical association, Illinois State Medical society, Chicago Medical society, the Chicago Pathological society, late secretary Chicago Surgical society, Physicians' club and Western Surgical and Gynecological society. He is the author of numerous monographs on surgical subjects.

Angus S. Hibbard was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, February 9, 1860, a son of William B. and Adeline Hibbard. He was educated at the Milwaukee academy and at Racine college. He was superintendent of the Wisconsin Telephone company 1881-86, and became the first general superintendent of the American Telephone and Telegraph company in New York, holding office, 1886-93, during which period he installed that company's long distance line from New York to Chicago. He has been general manager of the Chicago Telephone company since 1893 and is its second vice-president. Mr. Hibbard has invented and patented numerous improved devices for use in connection with the telephone. He is a member of the Union League, the University, the Industrial and the Glenview clubs. December 4, 1884, he married Miss Lucile Ray and they have one daughter, Janet. His residence is at 441 Elm street, his office at 203 Washington street.

James Henry Hildreth, prominently identified with city politics a number of years ago, was a splendid example of sturdy American manhood. He was born at Winchester, Mass, July 8, 1840, and there lived until he was sixteen years old, securing his education in the public schools. In 1856 he came to Illinois with his parents and for four years resided at Crete. He then came to Chicago, which was his home the remainder of his life. His educational advantages were limited, but being a close observer of men and events and an omnivorous reader, he supplemented his early schooling to such an extent that he was recognized as a man of more than ordinary information.

He began his career in Chicago as a street car conductor, but upon the breaking out of the Civil war enlisted in the famous Board of Trade Battery of Chicago and participated in all the movements of his command until peace was declared and was then honorably discharged from the service. Upon his return to Chicago he secured the position of grain inspector for the Board of Trade.

One of his marked characteristics was his ability to make and retain friends, and as he was ever ready to extend a helping hand to all who appealed to him, his popularity was limited only to those who knew and had heard of him. As a Democrat he was elected Alderman in the City Council in 1867 and for twenty years continued to occupy this position by reëlection. When it is remembered that the great fire of 1871, and the reconstruction period that followed occurred during his career as one of the law makers of the city, it is readily seen that Mr. Hildreth's life was a part of the great life, growth and development of modern Chicago. During the last fifteen years of his business career he was identified with the South Chicago Brewing company.

While exceedingly active in public and private, he found time to cultivate many of those social amenities of life. He was a member of Grant Post No. 28, G. A. R., a Knight Templar and a thirty-second degree Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine and other benevolent and philanthropic organizations. He was married to Armenia W. Clifford and to their union a son and daughter were born: Harry, the present assistant city treasurer, and Meda A., now Mrs. Frank Lederer. Mr. Hildreth died at Hot Springs, Arkansas, March 22, 1908, and was buried at Rosehill cemetery, Chicago, March 26, 1908. Perhaps the most eventful period of his career, one fraught with so much historic importance, was his connection with the great fire. So important is this that a report made by Mr. Hildreth to the Fire Fighters' association, at their request, is here quoted in full:

"As a citizen and spectator, I was present at the fire, and met Fire Marshal Robert A. Williams on Canal street, near Mather street, about nine o'clock p. m. I had a conversation with him about stopping the fire by means of blowing up the buildings. He said if he had the authority and the power he would do the work very quickly. I then tendered him my services, which he accepted, and went directly to the city hall to see Mayor Roswell D. Mason, but I failed to find him. Then I drove to State and South Water streets and broke into a powder box or magazine, which was kept upon the street, and loaded up a two wheel cart and returned to the City Hall. Not finding the Mayor, I had the powder unloaded and carried into the police headquarters, and waited for the Mayor to return. When he arrived, I presented the situation to him as previously arranged with Fire Marshal Robert A. Williams, and requested him to destroy the buildings necessary to stop the fire. He then wrote a proclamation, calling upon the people to assist the fire marshal in the demolition of buildings to stop the spread of the fire. I took the proclamation and started out to find the marshal.

"By this time, the fire had crossed the river, and was making rapid progress, toward the center of the city. I found the marshal on the west side of La Salle street, between Madison and Washington. I handed him the proclamation of the mayor, and told him I had a load of powder stored in the city hall. We discussed blowing up the Coolbaugh Bank building on the southwest corner of La Salle and Washington streets, at which time he was called into the alley, and when he left me he said, "Go ahead." I immediately went to the city hall and with the assistance of Sergeant Lull and other officers, carried several kegs of powder and placed them under the Bank in the office of the Western Union Telegraph company. Sergeant Lull kept watch at the door to assist me in my escape after I lighted the fuse. We next went into the building at the corner of Clark and Washington streets, and placed powder in the basement of, I think, the Smith & Nixon building. From there we placed powder under two buildings on Washington street between Clark and State. Next we placed powder under the building occupied by Lord & Smith, wholesale druggists, 82 Wabash avenue.

"At this point, I received information that the fire was turning south, and I directed the wagons loaded with powder to make their way to Harrison and State streets, where we commenced blowing up the O'Neil block on the north side of Harrison street to the alley east of State street; then two stone front buildings east of the alley, next to the Wabash Avenue M. E. church. Here I desire to recite a peculiar circumstance. When going into one of the stone front houses, the people were trying to get their piano out. They had a wagon in front of the house to load it upon. When I told them to get out quick, that I had a load of powder and was going to blow up the buildings, they remonstrated with me, but to no avail. The fire was in full blast in the back part of the house, and there was no time to spare; the people left and sooner than it takes to tell it, the building was leveled and the fire at this point was cut off. Some years later, while in conversation with a party of gentlemen, one of them told me the experience his folks had at the time of the big fire, and related the story of how some one blew up his folks' house, and how they had the piano at the door when a brute of a man told them he was going to blow up the building, and for them to get out at once. He said they were all scared to death, and did get out, and all they ever found of the piano after was one of the legs. I told the young man that I was the brute who told them to leave the premises.

"After this we placed the powder in the buildings north of the church on the west side of Wabash avenue, owned by R. B. Brown; then in Ike Sassman's, then D. R. Smith's. We next blew the buildings on the north side of Congress street, east of Wabash avenue to and with the buildings of J. K. C. Forrest and John Beers, to the alley west of Terrace Row. Through the courtesy of Frank W. Smith, author of the early history of Chicago, I am indebted for the names and ownership of many of the buildings mentioned herein. At this time the fire had crossed Congress street and caught in the cornice of the brick row on the southeast corner of Wabash avenue and Congress street, known as the Turner building. Then we put the powder in the third building. This was the only building on Harrison street, Wabash avenue, or Congress street that the first charge did not entirely demolish. In this case, the center brick walls remained standing. This supported the roof, which was burning quite rapidly, when I took a keg of powder up over the debris to the second story and placed it so as to break the wall, which was still standing. This brought the entire roof down.

"I wish to state at this time that a body of men, one hundred or more strong, were organized and began tearing down Col. C. L. Hought's two-story frame house at the northeast corner of Wabash avenue and Harrison street, when I went up to Colonel Hought and requested him to stop the destruction and give the rope to me, as the fire was stopped at the Taylor block. The Colonel gave me the rope, and I took it to the Turner building and pulled the burning parts into the street. This was the last building on fire or blown up on the South Side. After this, we left for the North Side, crossing Twelfth street bridge to the West Side, going north to North avenue, and looking over the situation, I determined to commence blowing the buildings at that point, and made an effort to stop men who were fleeing in a northwesterly direction for safety, to assist in the work, and as I would stop one and tell him what I was going to do, then turning my attention to another, the first one would leave. The man with me, as well as myself, had become somewhat exhausted, when I made a surrender and drove through Lincoln park with the wagon and two-wheel cart, which Chief Williams had detailed to me when the fire was on the West Side.

"I wish to say the powder which I got on State and Water streets did not do the work as I have described. I pressed into service one of Marshall Field's large double wagons and drove out to Brighton to the powder magazine, where I procured a full load of powder, covering over the same with a canvas. I deem it but just at this time to repeat that after the fire it was reported through the Associated Press that Major-General Sheridan had blown up buildings and had stopped the fire. To correct this statement, I desire to say that every keg of powder placed, every fuse fixed, and lighted was by myself, with the assistance of citizens who were in my employ, and a young man by the name of Burley, with Mr. White, who at present is chief of police, and superintendent of the destructives at the White City. With these persons only was the work of demolition of buildings by the use of powder at Chicago's big fire accomplished.—Respectfully, J. H. Hildreth."

Lysander Hill is a native of Maine and was born in the old town of Union, Lincoln county, on Independence Day, 1834. His ancestors were Puritans of the straightest sect and among the earliest settlers of Massachusetts. His parents were Isaac and Eliza M. (Hall) Hill. He was prepared for college at Warren Academy and in 1854 he entered Bowdoin college and was graduated from that institution with credit four years later. In pursuance of a settled determination to adopt the law as a profession, he entered the law office of A. P. Gould at Thomaston, Me., and after a due course of study was admitted to the bar in 1860. As a member of the firm of Cilley & Hill, he entered upon the practice of his profession at Thomaston and continued it with success until 1862, when, deeming that his country needed and was entitled to his services, he entered the Union army as captain of the Twentieth Maine Infantry. A year or so later he was compelled to accept a discharge from the service on account of disability, and, locating in Alexandria, Va., he there resumed the practice of his profession as senior member of the firm of Hill & Tucker, subsequently opening an office in Washington, D. C. In 1867 Mr. Hill was made register in bankruptcy for the Eighth Judicial District of Virginia, a position which he resigned in 1869, upon his appointment as judge of the same district to fill an unexpired term. In 1874 he relinquished his practice at Alexandria, his more important interests at the National Capital demanding his undivided attention, and, removing to that city, formed the law firm of Hill & Ellsworth, which existed during the succeeding four years. By this time patent litigation had begun to supersede his general practice, and during his after practice at Washington, which terminated in 1881, he became known as one of the leading patent lawyers of that city. It was in the year last mentioned that he took up his residence in Chicago, forming a connection with T. S. E. Dixon, which continued through nine successive years. His practice has steadily increased, as one success has followed another, until at this time he ranks with the ablest patent attorneys of America. A Republican in politics Judge Hill has not, since 1869, taken much active interest in practical politics. Before that time the measure of his influence had been at least practically indicated by his choice to the chairmanship of the Republican State Central Committee of Virginia, which place he held for two years, and by his being sent, in 1868, as a delegate to the National Convention which nominated General Grant for the presidency, when the confidence with which he was regarded was emphasized by his choice as a member of the committee on platform. His success in life is attributable to his own force of character, having for its actuating influence an admirable fixedness of purpose and an integrity which has never been called in question. Judge Hill was married in February, 1864, to Adelaide R. Cole, of Roxbury, Mass., and has three children.

John W. Hill was born in Ottawa, Illinois, on May 9, 1857, and is the son of Isaac and Sarah A. (Wilson) Hill. In his early life the father secured a good education and became a teacher and later for many years was a successful contractor and builder. He moved to Iroquois county in 1867 and thence to Benzie county, Michigan, in 1873, where he and his wife finally died. John W. is one of a considerable family including Lysander Hill, one of the best known patent lawyers of the country. Mr. Hill was educated in the different towns where his parents resided. He supplemented his studies in the common schools by a year spent industriously in the State Normal School at Ypsilanti, Michigan.

Soon after completing his education as above he engaged in the lumber business with which he was identified for a period of seventeen years. He became familiar with every department of the business, from the tree in the forest to the manufactured lumber and served in every office both in and out of doors. In 1888 he opened an insurance, loan and real estate office at Frankfort, Michigan, and about this time feeling himself qualified by nature, he began the study of law with his office associate a prominent attorney in the county. In the fall of 1890 he successfully passed the examination and was duly admitted to the bar. He at once began practicing in Frankfort; but in March, 1891, upon the solicitation of his brother, Judge Lysander Hill, he came to Chicago and for seven years was associated with the latter in the law practice. The partnership was then dissolved, and until recently the subject of this sketch has continued alone.

He has paid special attention to patent, trademark and copyright law, of which important branch he is a master, and in addition has figured prominently in real estate and corporate litigation. In order to properly represent his large clientele he has found it necessary to make protracted research and study as to the practice under the common law of England and in so doing has discovered laws, long dormant but effective, having a direct bearing upon certain phases of titles to realty in the city of Chicago.

He has devoted much attention to politics, as every good citizen should, and was an active member of the charter convention appointed to formulate a new charter for the city of Chicago. In 1904 he was elected representative from the Sixth Senatorial district and was reelected in 1906. During his first term he was appointed on the following committees: Claims, Chicago charter, judicial department and practice, statutory revision, corporations, judiciary, revenue, and to visit educational institutions. In the Forty-fifth General Assembly he was chairman of the committee on revenue, and in addition to the committees of his previous term, those of municipal courts and primary elections were added. He was made chairman of the Special non-partisan committee, consisting of three Republicans and three Democrats appointed to investigate the Illinois state institutions, and the unanimous report of this committee was so adverse to the management given them that it became an issue in Illinois during the political campaign of 1908. Mr. Hill was a candidate for the nomination of State Senator, but was defeated in a close contest at the primaries.

He belongs to the Episcopal church and is a member of the Hamilton, City, Illinois Athletic, Chicago Athletic, Exmoor Country and Episcopal clubs. Mr. Hill is one of the best known Masons of Illinois and is considered in the fraternity an authority on Masonic usages. He is a charter member and from its organization has been the treasurer of St. Cecelia lodge, No. 865, A. F. and A. M.; is a past high priest of Corinthian chapter, No. 69, R. A. M., and is a charter member and from its organization has been treasurer of St. Cecilia chapter, No. 220, R. A. M.; is a past thrice illustrious master of Chicago council, No. 4, R. and S. M.; is a Sir Knight of St. Bernard commandery, No. 35, K. T.; is also a thirty-second degree Mason and an officer of Oriental consistory, A. A. S. R., and is a member of St. John's conclave, No. 1, Knights of the Red Cross of Constantine, and Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He is also an Odd Fellow, of which organization he is past noble grand. In 1878 he married Ida E. Watson, of Frankfort, Michigan, and by this union has one son, Roy Wilson Hill, at present associated as a partner of his father in the law practice.

Oscar R. Hillstrom is a representative of that type of foreign-born citizens who have achieved distinction and a fair measure of success in this country. He was born in Smaland, Sweden, December 16, 1862, and is one of eleven living children in a family of fourteen born to Carl and Helene (Sjoberg) Hillstrom, the former yet living in Sweden, a millwright by trade, the latter dying in 1903. Oscar R. Hillstrom attended the public and high schools in his native country and there learned the cabinetmaker's trade.

In early manhood he learned telegraphy and as such was employed by the Swedish Government; but there appearing no attractive future there for him, he determined to make his home in America, where he had heard that opportunities for advancement were much better. In 1883 he came to America and for several years was employed in the organ factory of a cousin, at Chester-ton, Indiana, where he eventually became a foreman. In 1887 he began working for the Pullman company at Pullman, Illinois, but after a few months at ordinary labor his technical knowledge was recognized by his promotion to the foremanship of the entire trimming department. Subsequently he was advanced to general foreman of the repair department, having under his direction from 1,100 to 1,200 employes.

Prior to this, as opportunity afforded, he had attended evening school two seasons, and had gradually drifted into the real estate business, devoting his evening hours to this occupation. Upon the election of Hempstead Washburne as mayor of Chicago, in 1891, he resigned his position with the Pullman company to become a police court bailiff, continuing as such until the election of Mayor Hopkins, when he resigned. Succeeding this he served as a clerk in the office of the county treasurer, then four years as deputy county sheriff, then as receiving teller under County Treasurer John J. Hanberg, and for a time under John R. Thompson. This position he resigned on May 1, 1907, in order to devote more time to his increasing real estate business; but in the primary election of 1908 he was nominated as a member of the Board of County Commissioners and elected as such at the ensuing election. Mr. Hillstrom is a Republican in politics, is a thirty-second degree Mason, and a member of Medina Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. He is also a Knight of Pythias and a member of the Royal League and the North American Union. On August 22, 1888, he was married to Miss Christina Hoff, a native of Norway, and to them one daughter, Edna Florence, has been born.

Peter M. Hoffman was born in Maine township, Cook county, Illinois, March 23, 1863, a son of Michael and Annette (Ninsgern) Hoffman, the former a native of Alsace-Lorraine and the latter of France. Michael Hoffman was one of the early pioneers of Cook county, having settled here in the early forties. He was one of the very first to cross the plains to California in 1849 at the time of the excitement over gold discoveries.

Until 12 years of age Peter Hoffman attended the district school and assisted his father on the farm. In 1875 the family moved to the village of Des Plaines, where for two years Peter attended high school. He then took a course in Bryant & Stratton's Business college at Chicago, then for three years clerked in a grocery store at Des Plaines. His proficiency in the German language procured him the position of clerk in the foreign money order department at the Chicago postoffice, which he retained until President Cleveland's administration, when he was dismissed for alleged "offensive partisanship." For the following seventeen years he was employed by the Northwestern Railroad company, beginning first as bill clerk and successively promoted to receiving clerk, assistant cashier, and finally to chief clerk of the freight department.

While serving in the latter capacity his name was brought forward as an eligible candidate for one of the county commissioners. Securing a two weeks' vacation, he made a canvass, was nominated by the Republican convention and was duly elected. In the meantime he had resigned his position with the railroad and at once began filling his elective office. He was twice successively elected county commissioner, in all serving as such six years. During this period much important legislation was transacted and "graft" charges and innuendos were constantly charged. At no time have Mr. Hoffman's official acts ever been questioned. At the close of his third term he was nominated and elected county coroner, which position he now occupies. He was reelected coroner of Cook county in November, 1908, receiving the largest majority of any candidate, his plurality in the county being 6,109 over President elect William H. Taft. Aside from the official positions here enumerated, Mr. Hoffman has served four years as a member of the Board of Trustees of Des Plaines, two years of which as chairman of the Board, and for fourteen years was chairman of the Board of Education of Des Plaines. August 15, 1889, he married Emma May Peet, by whom he is the father of one son and five daughters.

Zach Hofheimer, assistant State's attorney, is a native of the Old Dominion, his birth occurring in April, 1852, at Williamsburg, at one time capital of Virginia, and then recognized as the seat of fashion and culture of the South. His parents, Isaac and Rachel (Radensees) Hofheimer, were natives of Germany and married in America. A short time prior to the breaking out of the Civil War they moved from Williamsburg to historic Norfolk, in that State, where the father was engaged in mercantile pursuits and where he and wife afterward died. Zach Hofheimer lived in his native State until 1868, during which time he was educated in the public schools and by private tutors. In the year above mentioned he came to Chicago to visit relations and for one year remained here as a student at Dyrenforth's Business college. Returning then to Virginia he entered William and Mary college and was graduated from the classical course of that institution in 1871.

Succeeding this he again came to Chicago and took up the study of law in the office of Ward, Stanford & Riddle, and subsequently continued his legal studies and served as law clerk with the firm of Wilson & Perry. In open court, 1875, before the Supreme court, he passed his examination and was admitted to the bar, and for the past thirty-three years has been engaged in the practice of his profession in Chicago with a more than average degree of success. He was first a member of the firm of Hofheimer & Rosenberg, then Hofheimer & Zeisler, Hofheimer, Zeisler & Mack, Hofheimer & Pflaum, Hofheimer & Levinson, and then alone until December, 1908, since which time he has been acting as assistant State's attorney by appointment of John E. W. Wayman. Mr. Hofheimer was a Democrat in politics, until the first nomination of William J. Bryan for the Presidency. Like many other Democrats he could not consistently support the party advocating the coinage of silver at a sixteen to one ratio, and since that time has affiliated with the Republican party. Mr. Hofheimer was married in 1887 to Miss Emma Ellinger and to them have been born two children—Irene and Edwin.

William Holabird was born in Amenia Union, New York, on September 11, 1854, and is a son of Gen. S. B. Holabird of the United States army, who was born at Canaan, Connecticut, on June 16, 1826, a son of H. N. Holabird. The father of William graduated from West Point in 1849, was promoted to first lieutenant in 1885 and served as adjutant at West Point from 1859 to 1861. During the Civil war he served in the army of Northern Virginia and Maryland. He participated in all of the trying campaigns during 1861 and 1862, and from December, 1862, to July, 1865, he was quartermaster general of the Department of the Gulf. After the war he was promoted regularly step by step until July 1, 1883, when he was breveted brigadier-general and quartermaster-general in the United States army. He was the translator of General Jomini's Treatise on the Grand Military Operations of Frederick the Great. General Holabird died in February, 1907.

His son William was educated in the common and high schools of St. Paul, Minnesota, graduating from the latter in 1871. Two years later he entered West Point Military academy, but resigned therefrom in October, 1875. On December 27, 1875, at New Orleans, he married Maria Ford, daughter of Gen. C. C. Augur, deceased, of the United States army. Immediately succeeding his marriage he came to Chicago and began the study of architecture in various offices, continuing from 1875 to 1880. He then assisted in organizing the firm of which he at present is the senior partner—Holabird & Roche. The firm of Holabird & Roche was established in 1880 under the name of Holabird, Simonds & Roche. Three years later, upon the retirement of Mr. Simonds, the name was changed. The firm is one of the most distinguished in its line in the United States.

Mr. Holabird belongs to the following clubs and societies: Union League, Midday, Chicago Athletic, Hamilton, City clubs of Chicago and New York city, Engineers of Chicago, Onwentsia Golf, Glen View Golf, Evanston, Country club of Evanston, Knight Templar of Evanston commandery, and a member of the Loyal Legion by inheritance. He is a member of St. Mark's Episcopal church of Evanston and resides at 1500 Oak Park, that city. His children are Cornelia Baird, wife of Capt. William M. Cruikshank of the United States army; Jane Augur, wife of J. D. C. Towne, grandson of Judge Caton; Richard Grant, an architect; and John Augur, a lieutenant in the United States Engineering corps.

Millican Hunt, a pioneer whose life is inseparably interwoven with the early history of Northern Illinois, was born in Sullivan county, Indiana, July 29, 1821, a son of Absalom and Mary (Elliott) Hunt and a descendant of Nathan Hunt, who came to America about the year 1725. He was reared in Vigo county, Indiana, where his parents had moved in 1829, and there experienced the hardships incident to boys' life in pioneer times. November 19, 1845, he married Nancy Ann Reed, and early in the following year moved in a covered wagon to Ogle county, Illinois. For forty years he and his wife resided on a farm there, this farm now being the residence of a son, T. W. Hunt. In 1886 they moved to Franklin Grove, Lee county, Illinois, where on November 19, 1905, they celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of their marriage. They were the parents of five children, John E. Hunt, master in chancery, being the only one living in Chicago. Mr. Hunt died August 9, 1906.

He was one of the men whose life and character formed the foundation of the present structure of social, material and political development of Illinois. His name and memory will be revered long after the present generation has passed away. Living at a time when Illinois was yet in its infancy, he was an active participant in many events of historic importance. He first came to Illinois on horseback in 1843 and visited the Rock river region, now famous for its citizenship, rich lands and general prosperity. Together with John Worthington he shipped the first freight that went by railroad to Chicago. In November or December, 1848, they had started with two sled loads of dressed hogs for Chicago, but by the time they had arrived at Oak Ridge, now Oak Park, the snow had disappeared. The Galena & Chicago Union railroad had their tracks laid as far as Oak Park at this time, and in order to get their hogs to market it was necessary to find other means than sleds for transportation. They interviewed the conductor of a construction train standing on the track and asked that he haul their hogs to town. This he agreed to do providing the transfer was made in fifteen minutes, which task was accomplished. "Captain" (meaning the conductor), said Mr. Hunt, "we will pay you well for this when we get to Chicago." "Boys," the conductor replied, "do you know you are going to be the first shippers by railroad into Chicago? Such is the case, and you shall pay no freight. You will find your hogs on the cars about a quarter of a mile this side of the river. If we are not there, you just unload them and take them where you please."

The cars reached the designated place, the hogs were unloaded and taken to a vacant lot between Lake and Randolph streets, just east of the river, and were then sold. The foregoing incident is here given to permanently establish this historic fact relative to Chicago. Many events of a similar character relative to Mr. Hunt could be given, as his was an active life and a useful one.

John E. Hunt, master in chancery, and son of the pioneer, Millican Hunt, recently deceased, appropriate mention of whom immediately precedes this, was born on a farm in Ogle county, Illinois, September 28, 1865. During boyhood he attended the district schools and aided his father in the work on the home place. When 16 years old he entered Northwestern academy, at Evanston, where he remained two years, then became a student of the Northwestern university, from which he graduated in 1888, and was a member of the Beta Theta Pi fraternity. Having read law, he took a course in the Union College of Law, and was admitted to the bar and began the practice of his profession with the law firm of Stiles & Lewis, of which the late Gen. I. N. Stiles was senior member. In 1892 he established himself in individual practice, at which he has ever since continued with more than a fair measure of success. In December, 1905, he was appointed a master in chancery by Superior Court Judge Hon. Farlin Q. Ball, and in December, 1907, was reappointed to this position.

Mr. Hunt, aside from his legal work, has manifested an interest in literary work and is a contributor of special legal and historical subjects to the field of letters. He resides at Oak Park, where he is a member of the Colonial club, the Second Congregational church, and the Masonic fraternity, in which he has attained the Royal Arch degree. In 1890 Miss Minnie B. Bissell, of Oregon, Illinois, became his wife, and to their marriage have been born two daughters—Helen Lucile and Florence Ann.

Thomas M. Hunter, bailiff of the Municipal court of Chicago, has been a resident of this city for the past thirty years, and, while in no sense a politician, he has, as a business man and citizen, been identified prominently in local politics. Mr. Hunter was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, February 26, 1852, and was educated at the Royal Circus institution. He came to Chicago in 1879, and since 1882 has been correspondent of the Albert Dickinson Seed company and a member of the Chicago Board of Trade. His reputation as a careful, conservative business man was built up during his connection with those two concerns, and for three years he was chairman of the seed committee of the Board. He was a director of the Cicero Light, Heat & Power company prior to the annexation of Cicero to Chicago, and also served as chairman of the house committee of the Oaks club, of which he was a director.

When the Thirty-fifth ward was added to the sisterhood of wards of Chicago Mr. Hunter was the first alderman elected therefrom, and was thus continued until November, 1906, when he was elected bailiff of the Municipal court. As a member of the City Council his acts were characterized by the sound judgment which he exhibited. As a business man, he was for four years chairman of the license committee, for two years chairman of the committee on streets and alleys west, and was a member of the committee on transportation and other committees equally important. His ability as an organizer, however, showed to best advantage when he assumed the office he now occupies. He was compelled to begin operation in a bare room with two dry goods boxes for desks and with sixty deputies as assistants. From a nominal number of writs served at the beginning it has increased until the approximate number of writs served daily now amounts to nearly four hundred, while the number of deputies has been increased to about one hundred and ten. A system of record keeping has been installed so that now a modern business method is in vogue and complaints are of the rarest kind. Mr. Hunter is identified with various clubs and social organizations and in all respects is a citizen of high repute, a successful business man and enjoys the friendship and esteem of all classes.

Alonzo Huntington, who came to Chicago in 1835, was born in Shaftsbury, Vermont, in 1805. Without a collegiate or academic education, but with a good preparation by a course of general reading in history and otherwise, he studied law in the State of New York and practiced for a time in that State, and from which he removed from Chicago. In January, 1837, he was appointed State's attorney for his circuit, to succeed James Grant, and held the office until 1841, when he declined a reappointment and resumed general practice. He was an efficient public prosecutor, but after his return to general practice he confined himself chiefly to his office, as this quiet and unexciting occupation suited his temperament better than the conflicts of the court room. But he was esteemed as a safe and reliable counselor and commanded the respect and confidence of the public as a lawyer and citizen.

Cyril R. Jandus, lawyer and State senator, is a representative of that type of Chicago man who, by their own unaided efforts, have brought success to themselves and credit to the city. He was born in Bohemia, July 22, 1865, a son of Joseph and Anna (Skruczny) Jandus. The family immigrated to America in 1867, and, locating in Chicago, the father followed his trade of cabinetmaker until his death. Cyril R. Jandus was educated in the Walsh and Foster public schools, and when 12 years old started to learn the printer's trade.

He was working at the case at the age of 16 years when a threatened attack of tuberculosis compelled him to seek a dryer climate and a more rarefied atmosphere. For two years he resided in Colorado and New Mexico, engaged in various outdoor employments. His health being then restored, he returned to Chicago and for a number of years was employed in printing labels for William E. Fisher & Co., box manufacturers. In 1890 he became a clerk in the office of the County Probate court clerk, succeeding which he was a Police court clerk under the old Police court system, and then clerk for Justice of the Peace A. J. Sabath. In the meantime he had read law and attended the Chicago College of Law, and, having passed his examination before the Appellate court, was admitted to the bar in November, 1896. Two years later he was appointed assistant city prosecuting attorney and assigned to the Maxwell street police station. In 1900 he became assistant corporation counsel of the city, serving under Charles S. Thornton and Charles M. Walker.

In politics Mr. Jandus is a Democrat. In 1900 he was elected a member of the lower House of the State Legislature, and upon the expiration of his term two years later was elected State senator from the Fifteenth Senatorial district, and reelected to that position in 1906. Being a member of the minority party, Senator Jandus was given no chairmanships. His acts have been for the best interests of Cook county and Chicago, and he has, during his legislative career, exemplified the fact that a legislator can accomplish more good in committee work than by introducing a great number of bills that rarely pass to the second reading. As a lawyer, Senator Jandus has won success, which fact is demonstrated by a large clientele. In social affairs he is a member of Masonic and Knights of Pythias fraternities and numerous other social and benevolent organizations. Upon the election of Edward F. Dunne as mayor of Chicago, Mr. Jandus was appointed a member of the Board of Local Improvements, serving as such until the succession of Fred A. Busse as chief executive officer of the city. On May 28, 1887, he married Miss Anna Trepes, and, with his wife, three daughters and one son, resides at 746 West Twenty-sixth street.

Charles J. Jones, lawyer and assistant county attorney, was born August 27, 1859, at Rye, New York, and is one in a family of twelve children, seven now living, born to the marriage of Thomas and Catharine (Clark) Jones, who were natives of Massachusetts and Ireland respectively. When yet a small lad he removed with his parents to Connecticut and was there reared on his father's tobacco farm and incidentally learned the cigarmaker's trade.

In 1881 he started West for the purpose of selecting a permanent place of residence. Chicago seemed to him to be the most desirable situation, and, locating here, he began working at his trade of cigarmaker. He took an active interest as a Republican in Second ward politics and in 1887 became a clerk in the office of the South Town collector. Since that time he has served as clerk in the city water department during Mayor Roche's administration and deputy sheriff under Sheriffs Gilbert and Pease.

It was during his official career that he took up the study of law, was later a student at the Chicago College of Law, passed his examination, was admitted to the bar, and in 1896 began practicing his profession. In 1898 he took the civil service examination for assistant county attorney and immediately after passing was appointed to that office, a position he has ever since filled. His ability as a lawyer, his long connection with the legal department of the county and his familiarity with the multiplicity of details connected with the office of county attorney have rendered his services of the utmost value. Mr. Jones is a Knight Templar Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine. He also belongs to the Royal League, the Independent Order of Foresters, the Royal Arcanum, the North American Union and the National Union. In June, 1883, he was united in marriage with Miss Anna Zipprich, a native of Baden, Germany, and with his wife and daughter, Dorothy, resides at 977 East Seventy-second street.

John H. Jones, contractor by occupation and the present alderman in the City Council from the Eighth ward, is a native of Waukesha, Wisconsin, his birth occurring October 15, 1857. His father John H. Jones, after whom he was named, was a native of Wales and immigrated to America in 1847 when 15 years old. He learned and worked at his trade of mason-contractor at Rome, New York, but later moved to Milwaukee, Wisconsin. While there he married Jane Thomas, a resident of Waukesha, who was also a native of Wales, and shortly thereafter moved to Minnesota.

From there, in 1872, the family removed to Chicago, where Mr. Jones continued his trade for many years. In 1880 he began working for the North Chicago Rolling mills, since merged into the Illinois Steel company, as superintendent of construction, and in October, 1880, was killed by the falling of a stockhouse wall. His widow survived him until August 13, 1903, when she was accidentally killed by an Illinois Central railroad train. Two of their sons, John H. Jones and David R. Jones, have achieved prominence in Chicago, particularly in the locality known as South Chicago.

The former received his early education in the public schools of Winona, Minnesota, and upon coming to Chicago attended the Skinner school and Drew's Business college. When 14 years old he began learning the mason and bricklayer's trade, but after his father's death succeeded him as superintendent of construction for the North Chicago Rolling mills and its successor, the Illinois Steel company. For twenty-four years he occupied this position and since then has been engaged in the general contracting business. As a Republican in politics he was elected alderman to the City Council from the old Thirty-third ward in 1900, and upon the redistricting of Chicago was reelected to this office from the Eighth ward in 1902 and 1904. During the latter term his vote in the Council supplied the necessary thirty-six votes in favor of the $1,000 saloon license to make it a law (a measure that added $3,500,000 annual revenue to the city), and for this reason he was defeated for reelection in 1906. In 1908, however, he was again elected to the City Council, defeating his successful opponent of 1906. Mr. Jones is justly regarded as one of the able members of the law-making body of Chicago, and his influence and support have been extended to all measures for the public good. He has been chairman of some of the most important committees, perhaps the most important, in view of the building of the new city hall, being that, at the present time, of chairman of the building committee. A significant recognition of his worth was made by the Democratic mayor, Carter H. Harrison, who appointed him chairman of the committee to look after all fire violations, the redrafting of the building ordinance and particularly to investigate the cause of the great Iroquois theater fire disaster and the reconstruction of all theater buildings. Mr. Jones belongs to the Illinois Athletic club, the South Shore country club, the Woodlawn and the Windsor Golf clubs. He is a member of Harbor lodge, No. 731, A. F. and A. M.; Sinai chapter, No. 185, R. A. M.; Calumet commandery, No. 62, K. T.; Oriental consistory, A. A. S. R.; and Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. June 23, 1880, he married Miss Nellie Williams, of Bangor, Wisconsin, who died August 10, 1901. On February 14, 1906, Miss Emma Wolfe, of Savannah, Georgia, became his wife, and their home is at 7636 Bond avenue.

David R. Jones, chief deputy county coroner since December 6, 1904, is a son of John H. Jones and a brother of Alderman John H. Jones, appropriate mention of whom immediately precedes this. He was born at Winona, Minnesota, June 12, 1863, and since the removal of his parents to Chicago has always resided in this city. He attended the public schools in youth and when 14 years old began learning the trade of music compositor. He thus continued until after the death of his father, when he obtained a clerical position in the employ of the North Chicago Rolling Mills company. From 1893 to 1894 he was engaged in merchandising at Windsor Park and for a time was Superior court bailiff under Judges Sears and Ball. He then served two years as a deputy sheriff, and the succeeding two years was receiving teller in the office of the county treasurer. Since then he has officiated in the present position. Mr. Jones is a Republican in politics, a Master Mason of Windsor Park lodge, A. F. and A. M., No. 836, and is a member of the Royal League. On May 1, 1892, he was united in marriage with Miss Margaret Ann Williams, of Oshkosh, Wisconsin, who died December 6, 1907, leaving one son, John H. Jones.

Walter Clyde Jones has won honor and distinction, both as a layyer and a legislator, through sheer force of effort and ability. He was born at Pilot Grove, Iowa, December 27, 1870, and is thus still a young man with an attractive and inviting future before him. He is a son of Jonathan Jones and Sarah (Buffington) Jones, both of Quaker descent and both among the pioneers of that section of Iowa. Indeed, the father laid out and founded the village of Pilot Grove many years ago. He moved from Harrison county, Ohio, to Lee county, Iowa, in 1833, before the territory of Iowa was created, and before the land was thrown into market—in fact, while what is now Lee county was a part of Michigan territory. He preëmpted his land and was a pioneer in every sense of the word, and lived a life of activity and usefulness.

Walter C. attended the public and high schools of Keokuk, and upon reaching early manhood entered the Iowa State college at Ames and was graduated from the mechanical engineering department in 1891. He then entered the Chicago College of Law, completed the prescribed course in 1894, and in 1895 received the degree of LL.B. from Lake Forest university and the same year was admitted to the bar. He received an honorary degree from Iowa State college in 1902.

He first came to Chicago in 1889 and was employed at electrical and mechanical engineering. Soon after his admission to the bar he formed a partnership with Keene H. Addington for the practice of law, and is associated at the present time in the law firm of Jones, Addington & Ames. Conjointly, Jones & Addington are authors and editors of Jones & Addington's Annotated Statutes of Illinois and Jones & Addington's Appellate Court Reports of Illinois. Mr. Jones was an organizer and president of the Chicago Electrical association and is a member of Franklin institute of Philadelphia and the Engineers' society of New York. He has been connected as officer and director with the Benjamin Electric Manufacturing company, the Perry Time Stamp company, and the Stromberg Electric Manufacturing company. In 1895 he was one of the organizers and speaker of the Young Men's congress.

He has taken an active and prominent part in politics. He began by campaigning for McKinley and Fairbanks in 1896. He became one of the organizers and vice-president of the First Voters' league, organized that year. He supported the candidacy of Judge Carter in the Carter-Hanecy gubernatorial contest of 1900. He likewise campaigned the city for John M. Harlan in the Harlan-Stewart primary contest for the mayoralty nomination in 1903. He was chairman of the Deneen finance committee of the Seventh ward during the Deneen-Lowden campaign of 1904 and was a delegate to the deadlock convention that finally nominated Deneen. In 1899 and again in 1900 he was appointed chief aide to President McKinley, whose personal friend he became. He served as one of the committee of thirty that organized the Legislative Voters' league and was one of the first advisory committee. He has participated in the active work of the Civic Federation and was chairman of the legislative committee originally organized to perform the work finally undertaken by the Legislative Voters' league. In 1906 he was elected State senator from the Fifth (Hyde Park) Senatorial district and served on the committee on judiciary, Chicago charter, civil service, primary election, railroads, insurance, corporations, sanitary districts, municipal courts, etc. He introduced and organized the movement which secured the passage of the Illinois Direct Primary law of 1908, one of the most far-reaching laws ever passed in Illinois, for the regeneration of political parties and the dethronement of the power of political bosses. He owns his home at 5540 Monroe avenue, and is a member of the following clubs: Union League, Hamilton, Quadrangle, Kenwood, City, Illinois Athletic, Midlothian Country, Calumet Golf of Chicago, and the Lawyers' club of New York. In 1896 he married Miss Emma Boyd and has three children: Walter Clyde, Jr., Helen Gwendolyn and Clarence Boyd.

Thomas F. Judge, a native of Toronto, Canada, where he was born July 18, 1842, has been a resident of Chicago since the early sixties, and for thirty years was connected with the firm of Hibbard & Spencer and its successor, Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co. He was educated in the public schools of his native city, where he grew to manhood. For a time he was in the employ of the Western Transportation company and was connected with their Chicago house. During his connection with Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co. he eventually became a stockholder of the firm and had much to do with its prosperity. In 1896 he became clerk of the Sanitary district, and three years later was appointed one of the Board of Election Commissioners by Judge O. N. Carter, a position he has since occupied. Mr. Judge has the confidence of his fellow-men because of a just and upright life, and for twenty-eight years he has been a resident of the Twentieth ward. In 1876 he married Mrs. Mary A. (White) Duffy, by whom he is the father of one son and two daughters.

Niels Juul, lawyer and State senator, is a native of Denmark and a son of Niels and Anna (Kergaard) Juul. He was reared to manhood in his native country and was there liberally educated, acquiring a comprehensive knowledge of a number of modern languages. When yet in his teens he immigrated to America and for the past twenty-eight years has been a resident of the city of Chicago. For many years he was successfully engaged in the publishing business, and for a time served as cashier in the office of the county clerk.

He took up the study of law and after a course in the Chicago College of Law was admitted to the bar in October, 1899. On May 31, 1907, he was appointed by President Robert R. McCormick assistant attorney of the Board of Trustees of the Sanitary district of Chicago and has since served in that capacity. In politics Mr. Juul is a Republican and as such was elected State senator from the Twenty-third Senatorial district in 1898, reëlected in 1902, and again reëlected in 1906. Senator Juul's record as a legislator was of so high a character that the Civic Federation of Chicago, in special session, voted him a set of very flattering resolutions for his services in connection with the passing of the bill which abolished the town governments in Chicago. For eight years he has been chairman of the Senate committee on judicial department and practice, and has also served on almost all the important committees of the Senate.

Among the more important bills introduced by him which have become laws are those known as the Anti-Children's Crimes, the Woman's Guardianship laws, and the Tax Limit law known as the Juul law, and during the session of 1908 the so-called White Slave law and others. In social affairs Senator Juul is a member of the Masonic fraternity, the Press club of Chicago, the Royal League, the Royal Arcanum and the National Union. For an act of bravery in saving the life of one of his Danish majesty's subjects Mr. Juul was decorated by King Christian IX. of Denmark with the "Danish medal for noble deeds," the decoration being conveyed to him here in Chicago through the diplomatic service in 1887. He is married and resides at 433 Potomac avenue.

William Kaspar, at this date president of the Kaspar State bank, 623 Blue Island avenue, was born in Hollitz, Bohemia, on September 1, 1835, and is a son of Joseph and Anna (Michalek) Kaspar. William, their son, was reared in his native city, receiving at the common schools a good education and continuing therein until he had attained the age of 18 years. Having determined to come to America, where he believed better opportunities were open for advancement, he crossed the ocean and on November 3, 1853, landed in New York city. There he learned the baker's trade and was thus occupied for two years. In 1855 he located at Kingston, Massachusetts, where he worked as a journeyman baker until September, 1862.

He then enlisted in the Union army as a private in Company I, Fourth Massachusetts infantry, and was mustered into the service on September 18, 1862. On September 23, 1862, he was promoted to sergeant. During his military career he saw much hard service. On one occasion he showed conspicuous gallantry by volunteering as an artilleryman in June, 1863, at the time of the rebel raid upon Berwick, Louisiana. At the battle of Hudson, Louisiana, June 14, 1863, he was wounded in the leg while acting as sergeant. On August 28, 1863, he was honorably mustered out of the service with his regiment at Lakeville, Massachusetts, but in the fall of 1864 came West and settled in Chicago and embarked here in the grocery and bakery trade, continuing thus successfully occupied until October, 1871, when he sold out. He then for a time returned to Bohemia and visited the scenes and home of his childhood.

In the summer of 1872, after his return to Chicago, he engaged in the real estate and insurance business, continuing until 1888, when he established a private bank under the firm name of Kaspar & Karel, which partnership existed until 1893, at which time it was dissolved. Mr. Kaspar continued the business alone until 1902, when he organized the Kaspar State bank at 623 Blue Island avenue, with a capital of $200,000, and of this institution he has been the active head ever since. The institution is in an exceedingly flourishing condition and has the confidence of the entire community. He is a member of the U. S. Grant post of the G. A. R.; A. F. and A. M., Royal Arch Mason and Shriner, and also of the Odd Fellows. He served two terms with the Board of Directors of the public library, and in politics is a Republican. He has been married twice, first in 1866 to Julia, daughter of John Wondrejka, of Chicago, by whom he had six children; May F., wife of Adolph G. Wiese; Belle, wife of Joseph Peshell; Otto, vice-president of Kaspar State bank; William, Jr.; Helen, deceased; and George W. His first wife died in November, 1887, and in 1889 he married Paula, daughter of Abram Mandl, of Bohemia, by whom he has one son, Eugene.

Harry G. Keats is a native of England, his birth occurring at Lyme Regis, Dorset county. He is the son of James and Charlotte (Gould) Keats, both of whom were also natives of England. George Gould, an uncle of the subject of this review, was a soldier in the Crimean war and was awarded a medal of honor, which is yet an heirloom in the family. James Keats was a contractor and came to America in 1869. He located in Chicago, where he carried on his business and where he finally died November 17, 1904. He was well known, intelligent and prominent. Upon his arrival in this country he affiliated with the Republican party, and during his residence in Chicago served three terms as such in the City Council, from what was then known as the Fourteenth but is now the Fifteenth ward. In England he had served as corporal in a volunteer regiment. While yet in his youth he became identified with what is known as the penny weekly theatrical entertainments, the proceeds of which were distributed to the poor. He was prominent in Masonry and for eight years was master of DeWitt C. Cregier lodge, No. 643, was past high priest of Washington chapter, a member of Siloam council and Chicago commandery, No. 19, and Oriental Consistory. His widow is yet living in this city.

Harry G., the subject of this review, was brought to America when a small boy. He was educated in the public schools of this city and for four years attended the Young Men's Christian association evening school, where among other things he learned to speak German. At the age of 10½ years he began working for himself. He learned shoe-cutting, at which trade he worked for a number of years, and later engaged in the business of shoe manufacturing, located at 106 Franklin street, under the firm name of H. G. Keats & Co. He then for ten years served as minute clerk for Judge O. N. Carter of the County court, continuing until January 1, 1907, when he was appointed chief clerk of the Probate clerk's office, where he is occupied at the present time. During his service under Judge Carter he took up the study of law, attended what is now the Chicago Kent College of Law at nights, and in March, 1899, was graduated with honor from that institution and is a charter member of the Blackstone chapter of the law fraternity of that college. He is a Republican and resides at 88 Potomac avenue, in the Fifteenth ward. He is at present secretary of the Fifteenth Ward Republican club. He is a Master Mason of the D. C. Cregier lodge. He is a member of Prairie State Council, No. 912, Royal Arcanum, and is greatly interested in that fraternity and is a member of the Grand Council, R. A.

In 1895 he married Hattie Fiedeke, daughter of Frederick Fiedeke, an early settler and old resident of this city, and has one son, Harry James Keats. He and his family are members of the Episcopal church.

William Vallandingham Kelley was born at Gratis, Preble county, Ohio, February 13, 1861, a son of William J. and Susan E. (Taylor) Kelley, who were of Irish and Scotch descent, respectively. He was educated at the high school at Greenville, Ohio, and in a commercial college at Cincinnati. When twenty-two years old he began his business career as bookkeeper in a hardware store at Springfield, Ohio, and later became sales agent for the Springfield Malleable Iron company, and then sales agent for the Charles Scott Spring company, manufacturers of car and locomotive springs. In 1897 he organized the Simplex Railway Appliance company, of which he became president and treasurer. The stock of this corporation was sold in January, 1905, to the American Steel Foundries, and in August of that year he was made president of the American Steel Foundries, retaining the presidency of the Simplex Railway Appliance company. He also organized the Simplex Railway Appliance Company of Canada, and later the Dominion Steel Car Company of Canada. These two companies were consolidated and this enterprise is now known as the Dominion Car & Foundry company, limited, of which Mr. Kelley is president. He is a director of the Commercial National bank of Chicago, the South Side Elevated Railway company, the Phoenix Horseshoe company and the Allis-Chalmers company, and is a member of the Chicago, Union League, Mid-Day, Onwentsia, Glenview, Exmoor, Chicago Golf and South Shore Country clubs and the Chicago Athletic association. He married Lillian Phelps November 14, 1894, and they have four sons: William V., Jr., Russell Phelps, Phelps and Gordon Phelps. His office is at 115 Adams street and residence at 4849 Ellis avenue.

John S. Keefe, first vice-president of the American Steel & Wire company of New Jersey, Chicago office twelfth floor Commercial National Bank building, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on January 24, 1864, a son of David F. and Sarah J. Keefe. He was educated in the Boston public schools and when 16 years old began his active business career as an employe of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway company, with which he continued eight years. Later he was traffic manager of the Illinois Steel company and secretary and general freight agent of the Chicago, Lake Shore & Eastern Railway company; was general traffic manager of the American Steel & Wire company from 1899 to 1901, since which time has been first vice-president and a director of the same corporation.

He has also filled the position of general traffic manager of the Northern Liberties Railway company and of the Pittsburg & Ohio Valley Railway company. He is president and director of the Columbia Wire company and of the Waukegan & Mississippi Railway company, and a director of the Newburg & South Shore Railway company and the Pittsburg & Ohio Valley Railway company. He is a member of the Union League club of Chicago, the Lawyers' club of New York city, the Union club of Cleveland, Ohio, and the Union club of Pittsburg, Pa. In 1890 Mr. Keefe married Mattie A. Lee at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and they are the parents of the following named children: Ethel, Ruth and Jeanette. Residence, 411 Clinton avenue, Oak Park, Ill.

Horatio Nelson Kelsey was born at St. Mary's, Ohio, on June 14, 1865, and is a son of Benjamin Kelsey, the father being a native of Higgaman, Connecticut. The mother was formerly Mary A. Gray, a native of Yarmouth, Maine. Both were exemplary people of English descent and both are still living at Indianapolis, Indiana. Horatio N. received his primary education in the common schools and finished by taking a special course at Butler university. Soon thereafter he entered the insurance business as clerk in a local agency, but in 1888 was appointed special agent for the London Assurance Corporation for the States of Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri and Kansas, and from 1890 to 1901 was the State agent of the Norwich Union Fire Insurance society for Indiana and Illinois.

In the latter year he was appointed assistant manager of the western department of the Sun Insurance Office and in January, 1904, became manager of the same position, which he holds at the present time. On October 8, 1908, he was elected president of the Fire Underwriters' Association of the Northwest. He is ex-president of the Illinois State Board of Fire Underwriters and a member of the Board of Education of Evanston, where he resides. He is a member of the Presbyterian church and of the Republican party, a Knight Templar Mason and a member of the following clubs: Union League, Chicago Athletic, Chicago Association of Commerce, and Glenview and Evanston. On June 21, 1892, he married Brunette Lawson Bloomer and by her has five children—Esther, Brunette, Mary Alice, Virginia, and Millicent Ford.

Edward C. Kimbell was born September 27, 1856, and is a son of Martin Nelson and Sarah Ann (Smalley) Kimbell. The father was a prosperous and successful farmer from 1836 to 1870, when he became associated with the Union Hide and Leather company and later with the National Bank of Illinois. Having acquired an honorable name and a competency, he retired from active business in 1883. On January 12, 1895, he passed away.

Edward C. Kimbell is a resident of Jefferson, now a part of Chicago. He was educated in the public schools of his locality and in the old Jefferson high school, finishing with a business education at Bryant & Stratton's Business college. In 1875 he accepted a position as yard clerk with the Excelsior Stone company, with which he remained for a considerable period. From 1880 to 1890 he was connected with the Purington-Kimbell Brick company, and while connected with this organization acquired much of his property and his reputation as a business man. From 1893 to 1895 he served as secretary of the executive board of the Southern California Fruit Exchanges, with headquarters at Los Angeles. Since 1895 he had been connected with the Hydraulic Press Brick company of Chicago, in the capacity of manager.

He is a member of the Builders' club, the Chicago Architectural club, Builders' and Traders' Exchange, the Patriotic Ancient and Honorables, and the Columbia post. He was chairman of Sub-division No. 52 of the Chicago Association of Commerce for 1908. He is one of the most active and successful business men of this great city. His connection with such varied institutions proves his ability for handling affairs of large concerns. His office is at 323 Chamber of Commerce building, which he has occupied since the remodeling of the old Board of Trade structure. He was the first tenant in the new building. He resides at 1386 Smalley court. On October 22, 1881, he married Hattie E. Cook, of Chicago, and they have two daughters—Mrs. Pauline Kimbell Hornsby, of New York, and Grace C. Kimbell, of Los Angeles, California.

Simeon W. King was born at Kings Section, Morgan county, Ohio, on August 18, 1845, son of Hiram and Debora (Woodrow) King. The father was a native of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, and the mother a native of Cecil county, Maryland. They were Quakers and were exemplary people, and lived honorable and useful lives. Simeon W., their son, was educated at the public schools near his father's residence and at Rising Sun, Cecil county, Maryland. He finished his schooling at Wilmington, Del., and at the T. Clarkson Taylor Academy, a Quaker school, from which he was graduated with credit, standing second in a class of forty-nine.

In 1854 he came to Chicago, but soon afterward returned East and entered the Baltimore Medical college, pursuing the course there until within six months of graduation. Having determined later to change his profession from medicine to that of law, he returned to Chicago in 1856, and attended the Union College of Law, from which he was graduated on April 3, 1863. A short time previous to and after his graduation he received the appointment as commissioner of deeds from the Governors of all the States and Territories and foreign countries, and by the President to the important position of commissioner for the Alabama Claims, and also commissioner of deeds for the District of Columbia. Mr. King has been reappointed every five years since by each President of the United States, and was appointed under President Lincoln's administration United States commissioner for the Northern District of Illinois when 21 years of age, on October 7, 1864, the youngest man ever appointed to that office and has held it longest, over forty-four years, and still holds it. While pursuing his legal studies he also served as law clerk in the office of Goodrich, Farwell & Smith, probably the leading law firm of that day. Mr. Lincoln, who had just been defeated for the United States Senatorship by Stephen A. Douglas, was practicing at that time before the Federal court, Judge Thomas Drummond, then located in the Larman block, where now stands the Reaper block. While in Chicago he made his headquarters in the office of Goodrich, Farwell & Smith, where Mr. King was then their hired boy and student at law. Mr.

King often met Mr. Lincoln at that time. One day he was asked by Mr. Lincoln what his ambition in life was. He replied, "he hoped to be a lawyer some day." From that day forward to the end of his life Mr. Lincoln continued to be the warm personal friend of Mr. King, and at the time the body of Mr. Lincoln was brought here from Washington, Mr. King acted as one of the pallbearers from the railroad station to the courthouse. He was one of the guards to remain near the coffin over night, with a few members of Ellsworth's Zouaves.

Originally the office of United States commissioner was for life, but the law of June 30, 1896, limited the period of appointment to four years. Mr. King has been continuously appointed to this position down to the present time and has held it now over forty-four years. When his last term expired he was reappointed by judges Bethea and Landis, who said that, "As his original appointment was for life and as he was a careful, able and good man, he should be continued in that position for life." He is the only commissioner of deeds in Chicago who has held commissions from all the States and Territories, and for foreign countries. After his graduation in law he was elected ward supervisor, but when that office was abolished in 1868 he was chosen supervisor of the South Town for several terms, and was president of the Town Board of Audits, and later for town clerk. He it was who presented to the Board of Supervisors of Cook county the resolutions for establishing the Cook County Normal School, and after two years' hard fighting in the board, finally succeeded in establishing the school where it is now located. Mr. King is generally known as the father of that institution of learning and occasionally goes there to address the students. He was elected to the Board of Supervisors in 1866, served as such five years, and from 1869 to 1872 he served as county attorney.

He takes much interest in politics and is an unswerving Republican. In all the national campaigns since that great one of Abraham Lincoln his services were and are demanded regularly by the Republican National committee. During the campaign of 1896 he spoke throughout Michigan in company with then Col. Theodore Roosevelt, since President of the United States. President William McKinley and Mr. King were "Buckeye" boys in Ohio together, and the martyred and dearly beloved President very kindly offered Mr. King an ambassadorship to Turkey, but owing to the war then going on between Turkey and Armenia, and the great personal expense to be borne, Mr. King could not accept this unsought high honor from his personal and warm friend, though greatly thankful for it. Mr. King was nominated twice by the Republican party for Representative to the General Assembly, but declined both times with grateful thanks; he was also nominated for county commissioner and likewise declined on account of general business engagements. During the great Civil War he was appointed by the great War Governor, Richard Yates, on his staff, and went with the Governor to look after and care for the comfort of the wounded soldiers at the battle of Shiloh on the 6th and 7th of April, 1862.

John Kjellander has demonstrated that Mayor Busse made no mistake when, in accomplishing his avowed purpose of giving to Chicago a business administration, he was appointed city sealer. Mr. Kjellander was born at Kristianstad, Sweden, July 9, 1863, a son of Sven Kjellander. He attended the common schools in youth, took a preparatory course for a higher education and for one year was a student at the University of Lund. He then began the study of pharmacy, but when 19 years old came to America and for a time was employed in a drug store at Paxton, Illinois. Having passed his examination before the State Board of Pharmacy, he came to Chicago in 1889 and embarked in the drug business at the corner of Clark street and Belmont avenue, in Lake View. Having sold his business in 1893, he was druggist for the insane asylum at Dunning for the succeeding two years.

Since then he has occupied the positions of clerk in the inheritance tax department, chief clerk in the office of the State grain inspector, and since May, 1907, has been city sealer of the department of weights and measures. In 1902 this office was changed from a fee to a salaried office. Previous to 1905, when the municipal code was revised, it was rarely that short weight offenders could be successfully prosecuted; but since then Mr. Kjellander has been so vigorous in bringing offenders to justice that violations of weights and measures have been reduced to a minimum. Mr. Kjellander is a Republican in politics and is now serving his third term as secretary of the Swedish-American Republican League of Illinois. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Modern Woodmen of America. On August 15, 1888, he was married to Miss Esther I. Johnson, who was at that time assistant principal of the high school at Paxton, Illinois.

Rev. Charles Kornapfel, assistant rector of All Saints' parish, Chicago, was born in Austria, Hungary, on September 24, 1881, and was there reared to manhood and given a liberal education in the Central seminary of Budapest, where he received his classical education and pursued the study of theology for one year. In 1900 he came to the United States and in order still further to perfect himself in religious information and in the knowledge of the English language, he attended St. Mary's Theological seminary for six months and finally completed his studies at Seton Hall college in the Seminary of the Immaculate Conception at South Orange, New Jersey. Succeeding this important event in his life, he was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Kozlowski at Cleveland, Ohio, on December 20, 1903. He was then appointed assistant rector of St.

John's Bohemian Catholic church of Cleveland, where he remained for one year, succeeding which he was rector of Saints Peter and Paul Polish Catholic church at Passaic, New Jersey, for one year. In 1906 he became assistant rector of All Saints' parish, Chicago, a position he still retains.

Very Rev. John J. Kosinski, president of St. Stanislaus college, 140 West Division street, was born in the province of Posen, Prussian Poland, on July 5, 1870, and is a son of James and Veronica (Kolpacki) Kosinski. He was brought to Chicago in 1871 and there the father still resides. For several years James Kosinski was foreman of a factory in the city and at present occupies a political office under the Busse administration.

The Kosinski family are of noble birth and were driven from Russia on account of their participation in an insurrection against the government. The great-grandfather of Rev. John J. Kosinski had all his property confiscated on that account and was compelled to cross the frontier in a hurry in order to save his life. James Kosinski was left upon his own resources at the age of 15 years. He enlisted in the Prussian army and took part in the Franco-Prussian war, and held minor command in the Prussian Black Hussar cavalry. The subject of this sketch, John J., is the only survivor born to the first marriage of his father, James; the second wife of the latter was Victoria Kaczmarek, to whom he was married in 1876 and by whom he had nine children, of whom are yet living—Felix, a veteran of the United States navy and late of the Asiatic squadron; Stanislaus, in business in Chicago; Frances, an organist and school teacher; Martha, wife of John Kowalski, a prominent real estate dealer of Chicago; Clara, a stenographer; and Eugenia, a student. Very Rev. John J. Kosinski was reared in Chicago and was graduated with distinction from St. Stanislaus parochial school in 1882. He took a classical course at St. Jerome's college, Berlin, Ontario, Canada, graduating therefrom in 1887.

In the fall of the same year he went to Rome, Italy, to join the Congregation of the Resurrectionist Fathers and attended the school of oratory at the Propaganda De Fide and in due time received his degrees of Philosophy at the Gregorian university in Rome. On account of poor health he was thereafter transferred to Lemberg, Austria-Poland, to continue his theological studies. By this time he had exhibited such exceptional talent and aptitude for his life's duties that he was summoned to literature and classics to occupy the chair at St. Jerome's college, Ontario, Canada. There by a special dispensation of the Holy Father he was ordained to the Holy Priesthood before reaching the age of 23 by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Dowling, D. D., of Hamilton, Canada. After having taught two years he was transferred by the authorities to St. Mary's college, St. Mary's, Kentucky, and held the office of disciplinarian there for two years. He then served as vice-president of the college for the succeeding two years and in 1899 was summoned to his home city to take charge of the newly erected Polish college of Chicago, and here he has since served as president of this important educational institution.

He has devoted his talent, energy and heart to the cause of the people of his parish and can look with pride and gratification on the good that has been accomplished. The college was first started as a high school in 1890, but its importance and usefulness have been immensely extended by Father Kosinski, who is recognized as one of the foremost educators in the United States. He is particularly distinguished for his rare powers of oratory and persuasive speech. He is a talented linguist and in addition to his native tongue speaks English, German, French and Italian. His present ambition is still further to enlarge the scope and usefulness of his college. With this object in view he acquired the property at Avondale, where will be located in the near future the new college building with all important improvements, fitted to accommodate from 400 to 500 Polish students from all parts of the world. On January 6, 1909, orders have come from headquarters of the Resurrectionist Fathers at Rome, Italy, appointing him superior and at the same time placing him in charge of St. John Cantius parish, on Carpenter and Front streets, Chicago, Ill. Notwithstanding this change, he still is connected with the project of erecting new college buildings at Avondale for the education of the Polish-American youth, he being secretary and treasurer of the new corporate body, the "Polish-American Educational Institute."

Rev. Matthew Krawczunas, rector of St. George's Roman Catholic church, Chicago, was born in Szumsk, Lithuania-Russia, on September 12, 1865. He was educated in the elementary and classical schools of Maryampol, succeeding which he pursued a thorough course of study in theology at Seiny and in due time was ordained to the priesthood on June 15, 1889. About thirteen months later, so highly was he regarded, he was appointed assistant pastor of a church in Raigrod, Russia. After laboring there acceptably for some time he was transferred to Barglowo and there faithfully served his church as assistant pastor, continuing about three years.

In 1893, hoping to widen his usefulness to his church and to humanity, he came to the United States and located in Chicago. Here he engaged at once in active religious work and soon became founder of St. George's church. He erected the beautiful building at a cost of $150,000, also the rectory at a cost of $15,000, and the parochial school at a cost of $60,000, the entire property covering seventeen lots and being valued at $500,000. The character of this phenomenal work, its immense value to the Catholic church and to the interest of Chicago, can scarcely be overestimated. For all time it will stand as a monument to the untiring patience, exceptional ability and sincere piety of Father Krawczunas. The membership of the church has reached the very great number of 7,000 souls. The pupils of the school number 700 and altogether constitute one of the most earnest and important religious communities in Cook county. The church is the pioneer Lithuanian edifice in Chicago, and the parish is one of the most prosperous and happy of this great city.

Ignatius J. Krzeminski, physician and surgeon, residing at 2547 Monticello avenue and with office at 810 Milwaukee avenue, is a native of the province of Posen (Germany), Poland, and was born February 18, 1873, a son of Lorenze and Catherine (Kalinowski) Krzeminski. The father came to the United States in 1881, locating in Chicago, where his family joined him in 1884. He was a useful citizen and accumulated considerable property. He died on December 17, 1905, at the age of 61 years. The family consisted of four sons who grew to maturity, all living in Chicago—John, a son by his first wife; Ignatius J., Anton and Joseph.

The subject of this sketch has resided in Chicago since the age of 11 years. His primary education was received in Germany and later at the parochial school, St. Stanislaus Kostki, of Chicago. His classical education was obtained at St. Jerome's college, Berlin, Canada, and at the Ada Normal university of Ohio, where he took a pharmaceutical course, graduating in 1898, with the degree of Ph. G. The same year he entered the Harvey Medical college of Chicago and finally finished his medical education at the Illinois Medical college, from which institution he was graduated with credit in 1901. In 1889 he embarked in the drug business on Milwaukee avenue, which was conducted under the firm name of the Philo pharmacy for about one year. He then sold his interest and began a drug store for himself. Finally, after receiving his license to practice medicine, he sold his drug store and began the practice of his profession, and has since continued the same with steadily increasing patronage and profit. He has an excellent office, well equipped with all the latest medical appliances, including the X-rays. On February 13, 1900, he married Eliza, daughter of Louis and Agnes (Goldin) Ronowski, of Chicago, but formerly of (Germany) Poland. To this marriage three children were born, as follows: George, Beatrice and Sylvester. The doctor is a member of the Holy Trinity Catholic church, Polish National Alliance, Polish Roman Catholic Union, Catholic Order of Foresters, Protective Home Circle, National Union, Modern Woodmen of America, Catholic Slavonian Union, St. George Cadets and the Polish Association of America.

Antonio Lagorio, M. D., was born in Chicago March 6, 1857, a son of Francisco and Petrina (Gianelli) Lagorio, of Italian nativity. His father and mother have been residents of Chicago since 1845 and 1856, respectively. Francisco Lagorio, who is rightly classed among Chicago's pioneers, was for some years an importer of foreign products. Antonio Lagorio was taken, when he was 6 years old, to Genoa, Italy, where he acquired his literary education. Returning to Chicago soon after the great fire, he was graduated in medicine from Rush Medical college in 1879. He perfected his knowledge of certain branches of his profession by study at Rome, Berlin and Paris. At the French capital he studied the Pasteur treatment for hydrophobia and in 1890 established in Chicago the first Pasteur institute in the West and has since managed it, making a record in the treatment of more than 3,600 cases.

He is a member of several medical societies. For valuable service to medical science, he was, in 1897, decorated by the late King Humbert of Italy with the cross of Chevalier. He was appointed inspector of Chicago's House of Correction by Mayor Swift, and a member of the Chicago Public Library Board by Mayor Dunne, and is chairman of the library's administration committee. Dr. Lagorio married Carlotta Puccio, August 18, 1880, and they have three children, named, respectively, Marie, Frank and Louis Lagorio. His office is in the Pasteur Institute building, 228 Dearborn avenue, and residence at 84 South Homan avenue.

Alfred G. Lanio was born in New York City, February 5, 1858, son of Jacob and Anna (Thoma) Lanio, who were natives of Frankfort, Germany. The father was a pocketbook and jewelry case manufacturer in his native country, was there married, and in 1854 immigrated to America, and until 1858 lived in New York City. In that year he moved to Chicago and located in the vicinity of Sherman and Harrison streets, later moving to near Harrison and Halsted streets, where he lived until his death, June 5, 1876. He followed the trade and occupation in which he was engaged in the old country in New York City. He was a Republican in politics, but never aspired to political office. His wife died January 2, 1903. They were the parents of five children, four of whom are now living. Alfred G. Lanio is the second oldest of this family. He has always made Chicago his home. He was educated in the public schools, and shortly after attaining his majority began for himself as a harnessmaker, having previously learned that trade. Since January 1, 1880, he has ever been in that business and is the present proprietor of the Chicago Harness company, located at 327 West Randolph street.

While a Republican in politics, Mr. Lanio has not sought political preferment, rather devoting his entire time and attention to his private business interests. Unsolicited on his part, however, he received the nomination for member of the Board of County Commissioners in 1906, and was elected to that office. He served two years in that office and was conceded to have been one of the most capable members of the board. Since the expiration of his term he has devoted his attention to his harness business. While a member of the Board of County Commissioners Mr. Lanio had the rare distinction of having had presented to him a loving cup by attachés of the Dunning Hospital for his courteous services as the chairman of the Dunning Hospital committee. Mr. Lanio is a member of the Thomas J. Turner Lodge No. 409 A. F. & A. M., Wiley M. Eagan Chapter No. 126 R. A. M., Chicago Commandery No. 19 K. T., and Medinah Temple A. A. O. N. M. S. Silas J. Llewellyn was born in Wales in the year 1860, and is a son of Henry and Elizabeth (Gower) Llewellyn. The father came to America in 1864 and was an iron worker and later a merchant. He died in Milwaukee in 1897 after a useful and well spent life. Silas J., the subject of this memoir, was educated in the public and high schools of Milwaukee and at the age of 18 years began to teach school and later accepted a position with the North Chicago Rolling Mill company, which company was succeeded by the Illinois Steel company, and in time he was made assistant manager of their Milwaukee works. In 1895, the company having removed their offices to Chicago, he came to this city, remaining with them until 1897, when he was elected vice-president of the Inland Iron & Forge company.

In 1899 he became secretary of the Republic Iron & Steel company and in 1900 vice-president of the Plano Manufacturing company and vice-president of the Chicago Malleable Castings company. In 1904 he was an organizer of the Interstate Iron & Steel company, of which concern he has been the president since its establishment. He is also president of the Chicago Malleable Castings company. In 1884, at Milwaukee, he married Mary E. Parkes, and their children are Paul Parkes, Gertrude and Elizabeth.

Harry A. Lewis, for the past twelve years actively engaged in the practice of law in Chicago, is a native of Illinois, his birth occurring at Berwick on August 20, 1869, a son of John V. and Esther A. (Humiston) Lewis. In youth he attended the public schools of his native village, subsequently entering the high school at Abingdon and completing his literary education with a course in Elliott's college at Burlington, from which he was graduated.

Having decided to make the legal profession his life's occupation, he entered the law department of Northwestern university in 1894, and immediately following his graduation two years later embarked in the practice of that profession and has since been continuously thus engaged. He is at present a member of the law firm of Ellis & Lewis, general practitioners. He served as assistant state attorney from 1901 to 1904, and in the latter year was appointed to his present position of county attorney. Mr. Lewis is a Republican in politics and a Knight Templar Mason of Englewood commandery, No. 59, and a member of Medinah Temple Ancient Arabic Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. He is also a member of the Union League and Beverly Country clubs, and is the president of the Englewood club. On June 18, 1895, he married Miss Nellie Fenn, and to them have been born two daughters—Ethel and Esther.

Carl Lundberg is an excellent example of what can be accomplished by a foreigner who comes to America and by sheer force and good character surmounts obstacles that do not confront those who are of native American birth. Born May 20, 1868, in Kalmar, Sweden, he is one in a family of seven children, five now living, born to the marriage of Olaf Johnson and Anna Gustafson. His mother is dead, but his father is yet living in Sweden.

Receiving his early education in the public schools of his native country, he learned the carpenter trade, which was his father's occupation. The favorable reports of the opportunities offered in America for the progressive young man, sent back by his brother, Gust, who had emigrated hither some time previously, induced him to seek a home in this country. At the age of 19 years he came to Chicago, and as his brother had changed his name to Lundberg, in honor of a man by whom he was employed, Carl Johnson changed his surname to Lundberg, by which he has always, in this country, been known. For two years he worked at his trade, then, with his brother, embarked in the real estate business. Gust Lundberg became prominently identified with public affairs and served as a member of the Board of County Commissioners. After his death, in 1895, Carl continued the real estate business alone, in which he is now engaged, making a specialty of South Side property.

On coming to America he at once began a systematic study of governmental affairs, which led him to scrutinize closely political conditions. Believing the principles of the Republican party to be the best for the country, he identified himself with that organization. In 1896 he was elected supervisor of the town of Lake, serving as such one year. In 1902 he was elected State senator from the Eleventh Senatorial district and reelected in 1906. During his first term he was chairman of the committee on parks and boulevards and introduced the bill that created the smaller parks under control of the South Park Commissioners. This act provided a fund of $3,000,000, one-third of which was used for the creation and beautifying of Hamilton, Ogden, Sherman and Marquette parks. During his second term he was chairman of the committee on insurance, and over two score bills were passed benefiting insurance conditions in the State.

Aside from his public duties, Mr. Lundberg has found time to identify himself with social affairs. He is a member of King Oscar lodge, No. 885, A. F. and A. M., Oriental consistory and Medinah Temple, John Ericsson lodge, No. 361, I. O. O. F., and other social and benevolent institutions. He belongs to the Baptist church, is a director of the Englewood Building association, and is treasurer of the Englewood hospital at Sixtieth and Green streets. On June 24, 1905, he married Ingeborg Carlsen, and resides at 5727 Sangamon street.

Joseph F. MacDonald was born at Orange, New Jersey, October 1, 1869, a son of Michael and Mary (Coyle) MacDonald. Michael MacDonald was Scotch, Mary Coyle Irish. Michael MacDonald, who was identified with the wholesale dress goods trade, won distinction as a wrestler in Scotland. Joseph F. MacDonald was educated in public schools in New York, and at 16 began his business career as a clerk in a lawyer's office. At 17 he became chief stock clerk for James G. Johnson & Co., wholesale dealers in millinery, and held this position three years. Then he resigned to become assistant bookkeeper for B. L. Solomon's Sons, wholesalers of upholstery, by whom he was employed six years. Like his father, he was from boyhood interested in athletics and took up boxing as a pastime. He organized the Crescent Boxing club of New York city and the Hoboken (New Jersey) Athletic club. Of the latter he was boxing instructor two years. He was four years a private in the Twenty-second regiment, New York National Guard, and was boxing instructor of Company I of that regiment. From time to time, under the colors of the old Manhattan Athletic club, he participated in many amateur tournaments.

Early in 1903 he came to Chicago and in May of that year became night manager for the Chicago Telephone company. After service as day manager in different exchanges and as assistant traffic manager, he was appointed special subscribers' agent and has filled the position uninterruptedly to the present time. In Chicago and other large cities some years ago it was the general practice of druggists to pay for telephones and allow free use of them to the public. The free telephone service became so popular that all who sought to avail themselves of it could not be accommodated and the druggists were unfairly blamed. Under the guidance of Angus S. Hibbard, vice-president and general manager of the Chicago Telephone company, Mr. MacDonald made a study of that phase of the telephone business, and pay stations were established, and now not only in drug stores and other public places, but in homes also the public has 'phone service paid for when rendered. Thus, the service was legitimately extended, druggists were relieved of unpleasant relations and the entire business community was benefited, as connection was afforded with a greater number of telephones, not only on local lines, but on toll and long distance lines. He has developed the pay-station system in many other cities, among them St. Louis, Kansas City, New Orleans, Columbus, Toledo, Dayton, Akron, Atlanta, Richmond, St. Paul, Minneapolis and other cities.

In business circles it is generally conceded that Mr. MacDonald is more widely known than any other telephone man and has done more than any other for the accommodation of the public. He organized and is treasurer of the Social Drug club of Chicago, in which the retail drug trade and allied interests are represented and which is the largest social trade club in the United States. Mr. MacDonald has attended all national and state conventions of retail druggists held in the United States during the last eight years. He was the recipient of a testimonial of thanks, couched in most endearing terms, from the Firemen's association of Chicago, for personal activity which resulted in raising $2,100 to pay off a mortgage on the home of the widow of the late Henry Basset, once president of that association. As a Republican he was nominated in 1906 for alderman of the Twelfth ward, but declined the honor. He is a member of the Royal League and of the Illinois Athletic association. In April, 1903, he married Miss Anna M. Kurn, who, in recognition of his services to the druggists of the country, was elected an (honorary) member of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Retail Druggists' association, the first lady to be so distinguished. His residence is at 682 South Sawyer avenue.

Martin Barnaby Madden, congressman, was born at Darlington, England, on March 20, 1855, and is a son of John and Elizabeth (O'Neill) Madden. He was educated in the public schools and the night schools of Chicago and finished by taking a thorough business course in this city. At the age of 10 years he was obliged to commence work for himself starting as an employe for a stone company. His early life was uneventful and he did not exhibit his strongest qualities until he entered politics after becoming a man. However, as a business operator he has been unusually successful and his reputation in that regard is sustained and merited. He is president of the Western Stone Company and a director of the Metropolitan Trust and Savings Bank. As everybody in Cook county knows, he is a Republican.

For six years he served as chairman of the Chicago Republican committee and has been a member of the Cook County Republican committee for fourteen years. In 1896 he was temporary chairman of the Republican State convention. In 1896 and 1900 he served as a delegate to the National Republican conventions. In the latter convention he served on the Committee on Resolutions and himself wrote the Isthmian plank of the party platform. In 1904 he was chairman of the Third ward delegation of the State convention. From 1889 to 1897 he served as member of the city council and during that period was one of the leaders of that body. For seven years he was a member of the Finance committee and for six years was chairman of the same. He presided over the City Council for two years.

In a business way he has been president of the Quarry Owners' association of the United States for four years and has been a delegate to the National Builders' convention five times. He was vice-president of the Builders' and Traders' Exchange of Chicago and was a director of the same for three years. He served one year as president of the Illinois Manufacturers' association. In 1904 he was elected a member of Congress from the First Illinois district and was reelected in 1908. Unquestionably he has a promising future before him. His office is at 320 Chamber of Commerce building and his residence 3829 Michigan avenue. He is a member of the Hamilton, Illinois and Athletic clubs; also of the Knights of Pythias, Royal Arcanum, Ancient Order of Workman, National Union, North American Union, Modern Woodmen, etc. On May 16, 1878, at Downer's Grove, he married Josephine Smart and they have one child, Mabelle B., a graduate of Vassar college.

Thomas Marshall, who died June 15, 1906, was a man not generally known to the public, but by those who knew him and enjoyed his friendship, was highly regarded for his sterling worth and high character. He was a native of Cornwall, England, his birth occurring August 10, 1844. His opportunities for an education were confined to the public schools, and early in life he was apprenticed to learn the carpenters' trade. Owing to the death of his employer he began learning the blacksmiths' trade, at which he was engaged until 25 years old. In 1869, at Margate, Cornwall, England, he married Rosanna Johnson, and the same year, thinking to better his circumstances, he came to America, and after a number of months spent in Pennsylvania, came to Chicago, in 1870, and opened a shop on Twelfth street, near Jefferson street. After the great fire of 1871, he was employed at his trade by the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway company, with which he continued for a period of twenty-one years. He resigned this position to become general foreman of the west car shops of Swift & Company and was thus employed eleven years. Through real estate investments he had accumulated a competency and from 1903 until his death had lived a retired life.

Although a man of meager schooling he was an omniverous reader over a wide range of subjects, and possessing a mind above the average was unusually well informed. He aspired to no political or social prominence, his greatest delight being in the quietude of his home surrounded by his loved ones and in social intercourse with his immediate friends. Upon coming to Chicago he affiliated with the Methodist Episcopal church, serving as president of the Board of Trustees many years. His home was in the locality early known as the "car-shop community," at Fifty-second and State streets, and he became identified with the growth, development and improvement of that locality until the village of Hyde Park had become a part of the city of Chicago by annexation. Mr. Marshall was of that class of men which stand for good citizenship with aspirations for personal advancement and the progress of humanity in general. To him and wife were born eight children, four of whom are now living.

Thomas Marshall, named in honor of his father, appropriate mention of whom immediately precedes this, has been a practicing lawyer of the Chicago bar for the past nine years. He achieved distinction as attorney of record in the case of Rouse vs. Thompson, 228 Illinois Supreme court reports, 522-575. This case was on the constitutionality of the Primary act passed at the special session of the State Legislature which cost the tax payers of the State $65,000, this act having been the second one adopted by Illinois. The decision by the Supreme court filed October 2, 1907, while the Legislature was adjourned, was immediately followed by the enactment of the Direct Primary Law and the law subsequently enacted was based on the language of the Court in this decision. Upon the inauguration of John E. W. Wayman as states attorney for Cook county, Mr. Marshall, in December, 1908, was appointed assistant states attorney, in which position he is now officiating.

Hon. William Ernest Mason was born in Franklinville, Cattaraugus county, New York, July 7, 1850. Lewis J. Mason, his father, was a merchant of the town, a man of high character, and an active abolitionist, who early identified himself with the Republican party, and was, in 1856, an ardent supporter of John C. Fremont for the presidency. In 1858 the family removed to Bentonsport, Iowa, where they remained until 1865. William E. Mason was thrown upon his own resources at fifteen years of age, receiving such educational advantages as public schools near his home afforded, besides two years' study at Birmingham college. To make his own way in the world naturally developed marked characteristics and strength of purpose which have been elemental factors in his career since. He taught school from 1866 to 1870, the last two years at Des Moines, Iowa, to supply means to prosecute his studies, then entered upon the study of law with Thomas J. Withrow, an eminent corporation lawyer, who was soon after made general solicitor of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad company, with headquarters in Chicago. He accompanied Mr. Withrow to this city, remained one year in his office, and then continued his legal studies in the office of John N. Jewett, where he remained several years, and was admitted to the Illinois bar in 1872.

In 1877 he formed a law partnership with M. R. M. Wallace, and soon attracted general attention by his abilities. He afterward became the senior member of the firm of Mason, Ennis and Bates.

He is now senior member of the law firm of Mason & Mason, the junior of the firm being his son, Lewis F. Mason. Mr. Mason is a Republican in politics, and for many years has been prominent in the councils of his party. He was elected a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1879, and the State Senate in 1881, and as such displayed the same conspicuous ability there as elsewhere. In 1888 he was elected to Congress from the Third Congressional district of Illinois, serving by reelection as such two terms, and was noted as one of the most serviceable members of that body. He was always ready in debate, sparkling in wit, logical in argument, and eloquent in speech, proving himself equal to any emergency, as was shown in several important and notable debates, among which was that on the location of the World's Columbian Exposition. In 1897 he was honored by the State Legislature by being elected to the United States Senate where his aggressiveness, fearlessness and ability gave him high rank among the noted men of that august body. Mr. Mason has taken part in several hotly contested political campaigns, where his accomplishments have been used to good effect. In 1873 he married Miss Edith Julia White, the daughter of George White, of Des Moines, Iowa, and during the years that have followed the couple have gathered around them an interesting family of children, which it is equally their delight to rear in all the graces which adorn their parents.

W. K. McAllister was an incorruptible jurist, a first-class lawyer and a citizen of the highest standing. He was born in the State of New York in the year 1818, and was brought up on a farm. He received a collegiate education, read law and practiced that profession ten years in Albion, New York. In 1854 he removed to Chicago and was but a short time in securing a large clientele. In 1868 he was elected judge of the Recorder's court of the city, in which capacity he displayed such ability that he was elected a judge of the State Supreme court in 1870—a position of honor more than one of pecuniary reward. He resigned to accept the office of Circuit court judge of Cook county, which he continued to occupy, by repeated reelections, until his death, October 29, 1888.

In 1879 he was appointed by the Supreme court as one of the circuit judges to hold the Appellate court for the First district, a position he filled during the remainder of his life. As a lawyer he possessed a logical, common-sense eloquence which, in his practice before juries, proved more successful than all the tricks of the insincere and more pretentious orator. Such, in brief, is a sketch of one of the greatest lawyers of Chicago.

George Joseph McBride is a son of John J. and Ellen (Cartwright) McBride and was born in Somerville, Massachusetts, on August 23, 1869. Both parents were of Irish descent. The father for many years was connected with a brass foundry in Massachusetts.

George J. was educated at the public schools of Charlestown, Massachusetts, and at the age of fifteen years entered the employ of Lamkin & Foster, shoe manufacturers and jobbers, and there remained for a period of five years, the last two years of that time serving as traveling salesman. He then accepted a position with the Hayden-Gardnier Company, with which concern he remained for six months. He then entered the employ of Cumner, Jones & Company, of Boston, manufacturers of tailors' trimmings, and with this concern he has remained ever since. Prior to 1898, he served as their traveling salesman in the West, but at that time the firm opened up a branch house at 175 Fifth avenue and Mr. McBride was placed in charge of the same as their general manager in the West. Under his oversight and management the business grew rapidly until he was forced to seek larger quarters, which he did at 199-201 Fifth avenue. There the branch was located for several years prior to January 1, 1909.

At the latter date, needing more space, he removed to the second floor of the Hirsh-Wickwire building, at the corner of Van Buren and Franklin streets. It is proper to state at this point that Mr. McBride by his rapid advancement and by the confidence reposed in him by his house, has shown unusual aptitude by successful and conservative business operations. He has had to encounter many obstacles but his energy and executive ability have overcome all and built up a splendid business for the large house he represents. He is a member of the Chicago Athletic association, Exmore Country club, Highland Park City club and is chairman of the ways and means committee of Subdivision 9, Tailors Trimmings and Woolens, of the Association of Commerce. He is one of the active workers for the welfare of the latter association. He is a Republican and resides at Highland Park. On May 16, 1902, he married Julia Elizabeth Hammond and they have one son, John Hammond McBride.

Matthew H. McCarthy, son of Thomas and Isabelle (Irwin) McCarthy, was born in Syracuse, New York, February 25, 1853, and died at his summer home, Northville, Michigan, November 12, 1908. Thomas McCarthy was of English nativity and became an officer in the British army and was proud of the fact that he deserted, at Halifax, Nova Scotia, to enlist in the United States army for service in the Mexican war. Later when he enlisted for the Civil war, his training as a soldier well fitted him for responsibilities as an officer and he was made a corporal in one of the companies of the Twelfth Michigan Volunteer Infantry. He survived many battles to die peacefully at a ripe old age. By trade he was a tailor. In 1857 he settled at Lapeer, Michigan, and in his shop there his son gained his first knowledge of tailoring. When he went to the front he left Matthew H., his eldest son, at the head of the family, charged to contribute as liberally as possible to its support.

Matthew attended public schools until he was about nine years old, then became a newsboy, running on trains between Albany and Utica, New York. Eventually he finished his apprenticeship to the tailors' trade, and for a time was associated with A. Trip, a merchant tailor in Detroit. He came to Chicago in 1881 and was employed by Greisheimer & Company. Ten years later he established himself at 120 Dearborn street, whence, in 1902, he removed his business to larger and better quarters at 48 Monroe street. Broad and always fair in his views, he was unselfishly devoted to tailoring in its wider sense and naturally became one of the leaders in his craft in America. He was helpfully connected with all merchant tailors' trade organizations and organized and was an early president of the Merchant Tailors' Protective association. He was also president of the Merchant Tailors' Exchange at a time when that body was represented in Chicago by a local exchange, and was president of the Chicago Custom Cutters' association and was repeatedly elected president of national organizations connected with tailoring. But he labored as devotedly out of office as he did in it, and in his later years gave much time and thought to the settlement of differences between employers and employes in the tailoring trade.

He was a thirty-third degree Mason, an Elk, and a member of the Chicago Athletic association, of the Automobile club and of the Hamilton club. The work that he accomplished is recognized by his fellow-craftsmen and the general public. In every relation he did his best, and his integrity, his faithfulness and his generosity won him many friends. Mr. McCarthy married Miss Belle C. Hart, of Lapeer, Michigan, November 14, 1878. She was a daughter of Rodney G. and Mary C. Hart and a granddaughter of Alvin Hart, a pioneer in Michigan, early active in railway promotion and later a judge in Lansing. Mrs. McCarthy bore her husband a son, Clarence Alvin McCarthy, who married Annis Pool, August 20, 1897, and has succeeded to the management of his late father's business.

Arthur B. McCoid was born at Fairfield, Iowa, on July 18, 1869. His father, M. A. McCoid became prominent in that section of Iowa and was a representative in Congress for six years. The subject of this review, Arthur B., was educated in the public schools and having studied law was duly admitted to the bar in 1893, opened an office in Iowa and there continued to practice with increasing success for the period of three years. He then concluded to widen his horizon by coming to Chicago, which he did in 1896.

Soon after establishing his office here he started a crusade against the gamblers of the city, particularly against the bucket-shop crowd. What he accomplished during this period of unusual activity and reform was duly appreciated and noticed at the time by the local press. By this time he had become prominent in public affairs and was recognized as an able and fearless leader of progress and reform. In 1906 he was nominated for the City Council from the Sixth ward and was duly elected. He was one of the most active, progressive and prominent members of the City Council in measures of advancement. In all measures of local importance he became both an advocate and a leader.

He was appointed by Mayor Dunne a member of the Bartzengraft investigating committee and was later appointed by Mayor Busse to represent officially the city of Chicago on a committee of citizens and associations for the purpose of obtaining the National Republican Convention for Chicago in 1908. Through his efforts in the City Council the Public Lands Committee was established and in recognition of his activity along this line he was made its chairman. The work of this committee is not duly appreciated. For years corporations and other private interests had made numerous encroachments upon the streets and alleys of the city. To counter-check such movements and compel the return of tracts already unjustly taken was the work of this committee. Many thousand dollars worth of property was recovered and a complete check was put upon further stealings of city land. So well were the services of Mr. McCoid appreciated by his fellow citizens that he was nominated for reelection in 1908 and duly elected. He is a member of the Colonial, Waupanseh, City and Hamilton clubs. On July 29, 1896, he married Miss Ama Lawrence of Polo, Illinois.

Joseph Medill McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune since July 1, 1903, was born in Chicago in 1877, a son of Hon. Robert Sanderson and Katharine Van Etta (Medill) McCormick, and received the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Yale in 1900. Before assuming his present responsibilities he served as Tribune war correspondent in the Philippines and as an assistant to Raymond Patterson, the Tribune correspondent at Washington, D. C. He is president of the City Press association and of the Lake Marine News association and vice-president of the American Newspaper Publishers' association; is a member of the Chicago club, the Commercial club, the Onwentsia and Chicago Golf clubs, the New Illinois Athletic club, the Saddle and Cycle club, the Midlothian Country club, the Alpha Delta Phi society, the Racquet and Yale clubs of New York, the Union and Tavern clubs of Cleveland, Ohio, and the Metropolitan club of Washington, D. C. It would be superfluous to say he is a Republican. He married Ruth, daughter of the late Hon. Marcus A. Hanna, of Cleveland, June 10, 1903. Mr. McCormick has distinguished himself as the directing head of one of Chicago's great newspapers, and as a citizen he has been no less efficient in advancing the public interest.

William J. McCourt was born, reared and all his life has resided in Chicago. He was born September 19, 1872, attended the public schools, in youth and later has supplemented his education by special courses of instruction. When 14 years old he began working for wages for his father, a master plumber in Chicago, and for about fourteen years was engaged in that occupation. Subsequently he was employed by the Central Union Telephone company and the Chicago Telephone company, beginning in minor stations and being advanced by merit until he occupied the position of special right-of-way agent. This he resigned to accept the position of Superintendent of the Bureau of Water, Department of Public Works, City of Chicago, a station for which he is peculiarly fitted by reason of his previous employment and to which he was appointed January 2, 1908. Mr. McCourt holds his official position by virtue of having passed the examination of the Civil Service Commission with a percentage of 93. His experience has been that of a business man and he has never taken a part in political campaigns other than to exercise his right of suffrage at the polls. He was married January 24, 1902, to Miss Fannie Buckel and resides at 3536 Prairie avenue.

John McGillen was born November 13, 1861, on South Water street, Chicago, a locality which, at that date, was, perhaps, the busiest of the whole city. He is a son of Edward and Catharine (Doyle) McGillen, both of whom were natives of Ireland. Edward McGillen, the father, came to Chicago in the early '30s when he was only eight years old. He was brought here by a grand-uncle, James Carney, who was a merchant and traded with the Indians in Fort Dearborn days of Chicago history.

A complete genealogical record of the family was destroyed by the great fire. It extended back many generations. John McGillen was educated in the public schools of this city and at the age of 14 years left school and entered the abstract office of Handy & Company, whose successor is the present Chicago Title & Trust Company. He occupied a post of responsibility in that concern for fourteen years, during the last four of which he was in charge of the Court Records department. In 1889 he engaged in general construction business with John P. Agnew and a little later Francis Agnew returned to Chicago and joined the firm. The firm under the name of Agnew & Company soon became known as one of the most substantial in this part of the country. As an instance, they had charge of the construction of the Liberal Arts and Manufactures building at the World's Columbian Exposition, which structure was the largest under a single roof ever erected in the United States. It covered about twenty-seven acres and at one time there were employed in its construction over 1,700 skilled workmen. They also had largely to do with the initiation and construction of the Ogden Gas Company plant.

Upon the death of Francis Agnew, in 1898, the immense business affairs of this concern were wound up and in 1901 their large collateral operations under the Bermudez Asphalt Paving company were also disposed of. Mr. McGillen was always one of the active workers of the Cook County Democracy and has twice been its chairman. For six years he served as a member of the City Council and upon the retirement of Mr. Cullerton was chosen chairman of the Finance committee. During the World's fair he was one of the six representatives of the council appointed to receive the naval representatives of the Great Powers, his special duty being to entertain the German contingent. Mr. McGillen is a Catholic and resides at 535 Cleveland avenue. In 1894 he married Eliza P. Devine, daughter of M. A. Devine, and by her has one daughter, Rosalie, a student at Sacred Heart academy.

It should be further stated that from 1901 to 1904 he was a member of the minority of board of trustees of the Illinois Institution for the Blind, and in 1904 was a delegate at large to the St. Louis Convention that nominated Alton B. Parker for President. He is secretary of the Central committee of the Democratic party of Cook county and a member of the Democratic State committee for the Ninth Congressional district, being chosen by popular vote of Democrats at the first direct primary ever held in the State of Illinois. In 1908 he was chief manager of the Cook county campaign. He is president of the Lyceum Club House of St. Vincent parish. Since 1907 he has been resident vice-president of the United Surety Company of Baltimore with offices in the Borland Building, La Salle and Monroe streets, Chicago. Mrs. Catharine McGillen, mother of our subject, still resides in Chicago in quiet comfort at Ravenswood and will soon celebrate the sixtieth anniversary of her arrival in Chicago.

John P. McGoorty was born at Conneaut, Ashtabula county, Ohio, on August 25, 1866, his parents being Peter and Mary McGoorty, both of whom were natives of Ireland. Upon coming to America the family first settled in Ohio but later came West and located at Berlin, Wisconsin, and there the subject of this review received his early education and experiences. Upon reaching manhood he went west and for a year resided in Colorado, when he returned to Wisconsin and for five years was employed as a traveling salesman for a flouring mill concern.

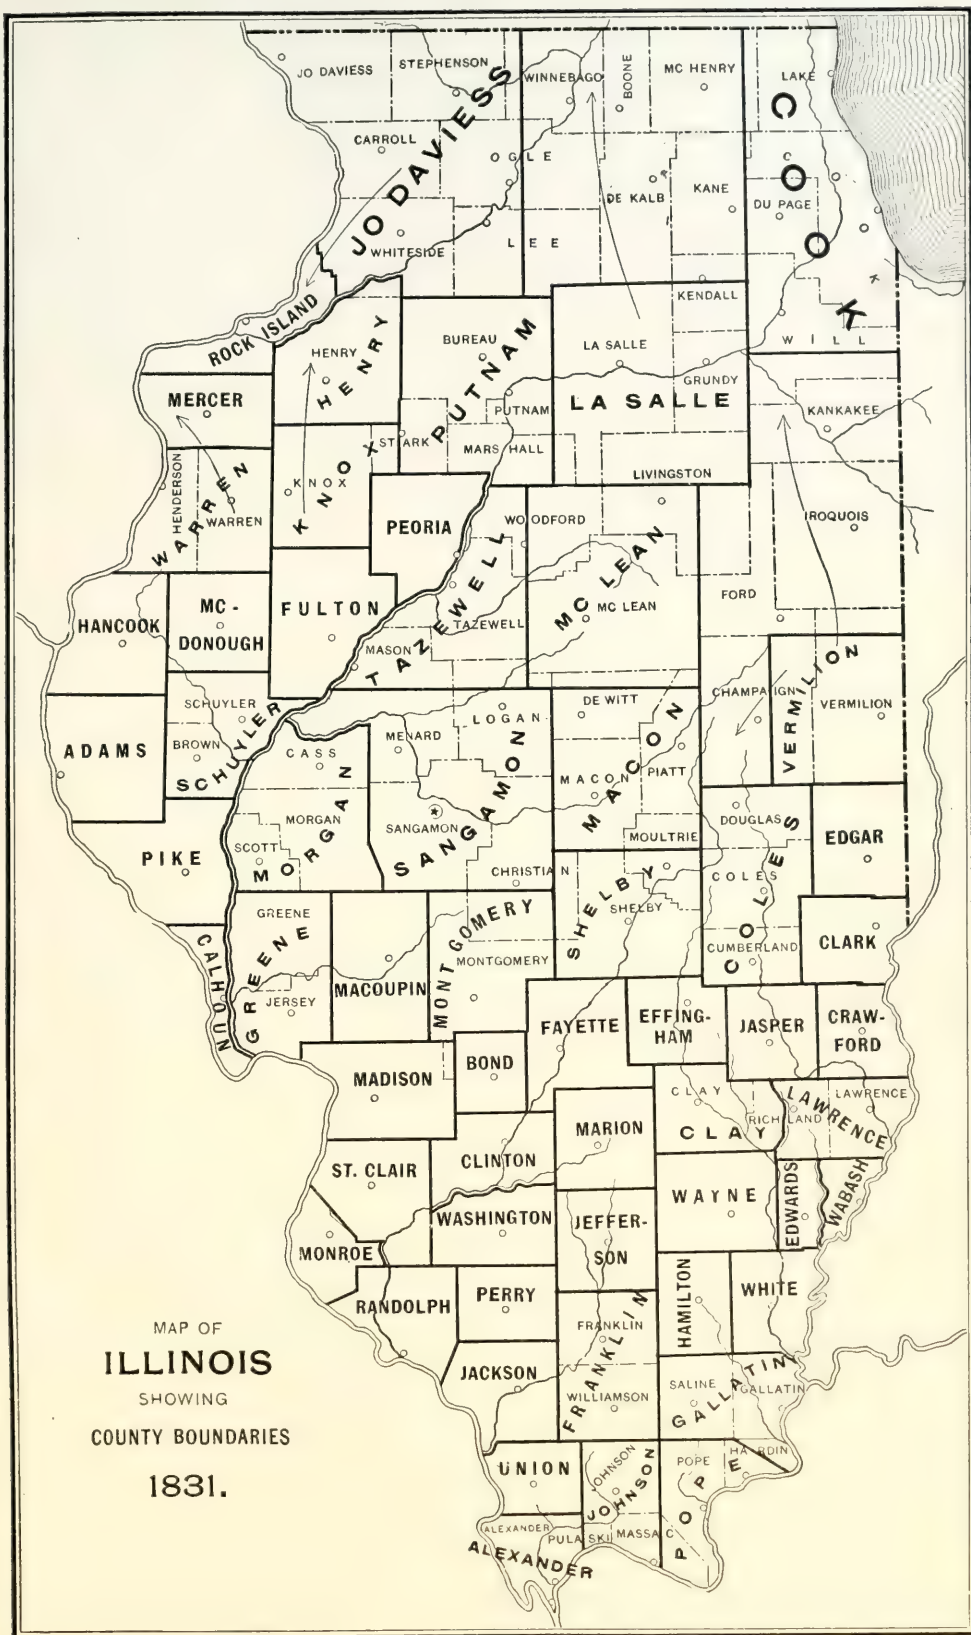

About this time he determined to make the practice of law his business through life and accordingly entered the law department of Lake Forest University in 1890, from which institution he graduated with honor in 1892. He commenced the practice of his profession in Chicago, and here he has continued with steadily expanding business until the present time. He ranks among the first of the city in the management of intricate and difficult cases and has the entire confidence of the bar and the public.

From boyhood down to the present time he has been a Democrat and as such has given his ablest service to the advancement of his party's interest. In 1895 he was the unsuccessful candidate for alderman of the Thirty-fourth ward and although he ran more than 1,000 votes ahead of his ticket he was defeated by a narrow margin. In 1896 he was elected to the lower house of the State Legislature from the Third Senatorial district and took an active part in the deliberations of that body, particularly on subjects of vital interest to Chicago and Cook county. The Legislative Voters' League credited him with having been one of the most valuable members of the Legislature. At the special session in May, 1908, Mr. McGoorty introduced an amendment to the bond bill providing for a referendum vote of every issue of bonds for specific purposes which amendment was adopted. So well were his services appreciated in the Legislature that he has been re-elected to that honorable position ever since. Several of the most important laws of recent years were either introduced by Mr. McGoorty or were advanced through the Legislature by his advocacy and efforts, notably the law giving the Chicago City Council the right to regulate the price of gas and electric light, and the direct primary law. He was the caucus nominee of his party for speaker, but being in the minority he was forced to be contented with the minority leadership in the House. It was largely due to his efforts that the Allen law, which permitted the City Council to give over the streets to the traction companies for fifty years was repealed. Not the least of his many important services as a legislator was his influence in defeating what became known as the Berry Bill, which would have made Illinois a breeding ground for trusts, and the recognition of the constitutional rights of the minority by the majority. Mr. McGoorty is a Catholic and a member of the Knights of Columbus, Catholic Order of Foresters, Royal Arcanum, Royal League, A. O. H., Iroquois, City, Jefferson and Chicago Athletic clubs. He was a candidate before the primaries of August, 1908, for the Democratic nomination for governor, and was accepted as the successful nominee of his party, until the entry of the Hon. Adlai E. Stevenson into the contest, whose nomination followed.

He was married to Mary E. Wiggins of Wichita, Kansas, November 30, 1893, and has one son, John Patrick, and three daughters, Mary, Margaret and Elizabeth.

James A. McLane, real estate dealer and one of the influential members of the Chicago Real Estate Board, was born at Newark, New Jersey, March 22, 1857, a son of Henry H. and Ida E. (Scharff) McLane. He early came West and was graduated from the high school at Waukegan, Illinois. He then entered the University of Illinois from which he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Science in 1878, when he was about twenty-one years old. He came to Chicago and was employed in the local offices of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway until 1881, shortly after which he began operating in real estate. For the ensuing eight years he was connected with Mead & Coe, of Chicago, as manager of their offices.

Since the expiration of that period he has been at the head of the real estate business of James A. McLane & Company, in which Henry H. McLane is a partner, which gives its attention to real estate, loans and rentals. In 1903 he was elected secretary of the Chicago Real Estate Board and appointed to fill a vacancy on the Board of Jury Commissioners of Cook county. Two years later he was elected a jury commissioner and upon the reorganization of the board became its president. Politically he is a staunch Republican. He is a life member of the Hamilton club and is a member also of the University club, the Midlothian club and the Delta Tau Delta fraternity of the University of Illinois.

Carroll Sherburne McMillen was born in Wooster, Ohio, on May 25, 1864, and is a son of Wilson S. and Sarah C. (Cameron) McMillen. The father was state manager for Nichols, Shepperd & Company, Battle Creek, Michigan. Carroll Sherburne was educated in the public schools of Battle Creek, Michigan, and at Indianapolis, Indiana. At the age of 18 years he began work as bookkeeper for Nichols, Shepperd & Company and there remained for three years, when he came to Chicago, arriving in 1886. He entered the employ of Marshall Field & Company and was assigned a place in their wholesale carpet department. There he remained for four years, when he secured a position with H. C. Curtis & Company of Troy, New York, as traveling salesman and was thus engaged for two years.

He then entered the employ of Rosenwald & Weil, clothiers, and remained connected with them for two years. For six months thereafter he worked with Strauss, Glazer & Company, resigning from the latter position to engage in the merchant tailoring business at 167 Dearborn street, under the firm name of the Colby, McMillen Company. After two and a half years the partnership was dissolved and a new company was formed with Charles F. Gardner under the firm name of Gardner & McMillen, at No. 6 Monroe street. Upon completion of the Boyce building at 112 Dearborn street, quarters were there engaged. After about a year they removed to 116 Dearborn street, on the ground floor, and three years later moved to 33 Adams street. While there Mr. Gardner died, whereupon Mr. McMillen continued the business alone.

When the Railway Exchange building was completed he became its first tenant and there has been located on the ground floor ever since at 7 Jackson street. Mr. McMillen deserves great credit for his untiring industry, clean business methods and high character. He has advanced step by step until at the present time he is prosperous and has the air of success. He has had to depend entirely upon his own exertions to reach his present enviable standing among the better class of Chicago business men. His establishment caters to the highest class of patronage. Mr. McMillen is chairman of the ways and means committee of the Merchant Tailors' Subdivision of the Association of Commerce, and is also a member of the committee on the promotion of membership and one of the active workers for the welfare of the Association. He is a Mason, a Knight of Pythias, a Republican and a member of the Christian Science church and is a director of the Birchwood Country club and also a member of ways and means committee of the Rotary club. On November 28, 1890, he married Mary E. Norton of Elkhart, Indiana, and they have had the following children: Gertrude and Carroll S., the latter dying at the age of five and a half years. The family reside at 4131 Bosworth avenue, Chicago.

Florus D. Meacham has been a resident of Chicago for over half a century and has attained distinction as a soldier and a citizen. He was born at White Hall, Washington county, New York, April 26, 1843, and is a son of Florus D. and Lucinda (Church) Meacham. He was a clerk in the employ of the Illinois Central Railroad company when Civil war was declared and he was among the first to enlist for the suppression of the rebellion. The entreaties of his parents for him to remain at home a little longer because of his youth led him not to take active service until a year later, when he became a member of the Chicago Mercantile battery. He served in the Mississippi River campaign, which culminated in the fall of Vicksburg, then participated in the Red River campaign under General Banks. Succeeding this he was with his battery at New Orleans and subsequently, under General Davidson, took part in the land operations against the city of Mobile.

When peace was declared Mr. Meacham returned to Chicago and until 1874 was engaged in mercantile pursuits. With F. S. Wright the firm of Meacham & Wright, dealers in Portland and Utica cement, was then organized and has conducted a profitable business until the present. Although a firm believer in the policies of the Republican party, Mr. Meacham is in no sense a politician. He became the nominee of his party in 1898 for membership on the Board of Review and the ensuing fall was elected to that office, a position in which, by reflection, he has since continuously served. Mr. Meacham is one of the substantial business men of Chicago.

Walther Richard Michaelis, general manager of the Illinois Publishing company, publishers of the Illinois Staats-Zeitung (morning edition), the Chicago Freie Presse (evening edition), and the Westen & Daheim (Sunday edition), was born September 7, 1869, a son of Richard and Clara Michaelis. After leaving the public schools he entered the service of the Freie Presse and, May 24, 1901, became secretary and treasurer of the Illinois Publishing company. He is a member of the Chicago Industrial club, the German Relief and Aid society, the Swiss Benevolent society, the LaGrange Country club, the LaGrange Suburban club, the Chicago Turngemeinde, the Schwaben verein, the North Avenue Business Men's association and the German Press club, a member of the political action committee of the United Societies for Local Self Government and one of its vice-presidents; and was a member of the Chicago Charter convention. He is a Republican in politics, Lutheran in religion. April 24, 1901, he married Miss Mathilda Roth, of Chicago, and they have a daughter named Clara Elizabeth. His office is at 94-100 Fifth avenue, his residence at 94 Seventh avenue, LaGrange, Illinois.

August William Miller, member of the Board of Assessors of Cook county, and vice-president of the Phenix Foundry company, was born in Chicago, June 8, 1861, a son of Captain George M. Miller (for many years connected with the Chicago police) and Barbara (Blettner) Miller. His primary education was obtained at St. Ignatius College and at high school, and soon after leaving school he entered the employ of the wholesale millinery firm of Ascher, Barnard & Company, with which firm he remained twenty-one years, beginning as entry clerk and rising to general manager of the concern. He left this firm in January, 1898, to establish the wholesale millinery firm of Miller & Probst, and soon afterward became interested in the Phenix Foundry Company, with which he is at the present time associated.

In politics Mr. Miller is a Republican. In 1896 he was elected alderman from the Tenth ward and reelected to that office in 1898. This position he resigned because of his election as a member of the newly created Cook county Board of Assessors, of which body he is, at the present time, a member, and upon the conclusion of his present term will have served for fourteen years. Mr. Miller is a thirty-second degree Mason, and a member of the Royal Arcanum, Royal League, Foresters and Columbian Knights. He is also affiliated with the Illinois and Illinois Athletic clubs. Mr. Miller was married at Chicago in 1884 to Pauline Steinhagen, by whom he has three children, Louise E., George W. and Arthur S. He resides with his family at 34 Carlisle place.

Luther Laflin Mills was born at North Adams, Mass., September 3, 1848, the son of Walter N. and Caroline (Smith) Mills. In 1849 his father removed to Chicago and established the pioneer wholesale dry goods house of the city. Here Luther was educated in the public schools, and at the Michigan State university. In 1868 he began the study of law in the office of Homer N. Hibbard and three years later entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1876 he was elected State's attorney of Cook county, and in 1880 was reelected for a further term of four years. On the 15th of November, 1876, he married Ella J. Boies of Saugerties, N. Y., by whom he is the father of five children—Matthew, Electa, Mari, Caroline and Agnes. Mr. Mills early acquired a reputation as a brilliant orator. In the capacity of public prosecutor he conducted to a successful issue several important trials, which rank among the greatest of the State. A few of these are the trial of John Lamb for the murder of Officer Race, of Peter Stevens for the murder of his wife, and of Theresa Sturlata for the murder of Charles Stiles, in each of which, though opposed by eminent counsel, he secured a verdict which satisfied the demand of the people for substantial justice; the second trial of Alexander Sullivan for the murder of Mr. Hanford, principal of the North Division high school, and the prosecution of several members of the county board for what has since come to be known as "boodling." During these eight years Mr. Mills had readily gained a front rank among the many distinguished lawyers who adorned the Chicago bar. The fame of Mr. Mills as an orator and advocate extended far beyond the territory of which Chicago is the metropolis and assumed national dimensions. When the Democracy of Ohio determined, in 1888, to purge themselves of association with those who had for years been guilty of the grossest election frauds, and to aid in bringing to justice the tally sheet forgers in the contest for the Governorship of that State, Mr. Mills was paid the high compliment of being chosen to assist in the prosecution of that celebrated case, at Columbus. One of his later appearances in a case of special magnitude for the State was one far overshadowing in importance and public interest any in our recent history. The murder of Dr. Cronin and the conviction of his murderers, in 1889, was the absorbing topic of press and people for months. Mr. Mills was called upon to assist in the prosecution and was employed for more than seven months in the preparation of evidence and management of the trial. After resuming, in 1884, the general practice of his profession, Mr. Mills soon had opportunity to display the versatility of his mind and the breadth of his legal knowledge in a number of remarkable civil cases. His celebrity as a criminal lawyer brought him many retainers for the defense in desperate cases, both in this and other parts of the country. His treatment of all of them was marked by patient study and careful office preparation, the ripe results of which were shown in a readiness for every move on the part of the other side which had all the appearance and effect of spontaneity. Never taken unawares, he met and discussed the most varied legal points with a clearness and lucidity which attest the fullness of his reading and the thoroughness of his scholarship. His addresses to juries were always characterized by logic and eloquence of the highest order, and by a choiceness and beauty of diction only to be acquired by familiarity with the great masters of the realm of thought and the best models of literary style. These qualities have been notably displayed in public addresses delivered by him of late years on occasions of deep interest to the citizens of Chicago and elsewhere. A Republican in politics, Mr. Mills has always commanded the respect of all parties. Personally and socially, he has won hosts of friends by his unfailing courtesy and geniality, no less than by the magnetism of his intellectual power. Scholar, orator and gentleman, he occupied the highest social and professional eminence in the greatest city of the West. His death in January, 1909, was considered a public loss.

Hon. Matthew Mills, lawyer and member of the State Legislature, was born in Chicago, August 30, 1877. He is the son of Luther Laffin Mills. Matthew Mills' preliminary education was in the public schools of the city of his birth, at Lake Forest academy and at the University School of Chicago; and he is a graduate of Yale university of the class of 1900. He began the study of law, and in 1903 was graduated from the Northwestern Law school, since which time he has been associated in the practice of his profession with his distinguished father until the latter's death.

In 1906 he was elected a member of the State Legislature and he there established his reputation as a legislator of high order. He voted for such measures as the direct primary bill; for the employers' liability bill asked for by labor leaders; for reciprocal demurrage; for placing express companies under the jurisdiction of the railroad and warehouse commission; for the appropriation to clear the Illinois and Des Plaines rivers of obstructions caused by private power companies; for the bill requiring State treasurers to turn over to the State interest on public funds and for a referendum on city bond issues. He introduced the bill, which became a law, limiting the compensation of the State's Attorney of Cook county to $10,000 per year, and also the bill, which is now a law, making titles under the Torrens system more secure. He was instrumental in securing the passage of the law authorizing the probate court to remit costs to people of limited financial means. His acts in the legislature were so acceptable to the voters of the Thirty-first Senatorial district that he was renominated and re-elected in 1908. Mr. Mills is a Republican and a member of Park Lodge No. 843, A. F. & A. M., First Cavalry, I. N. G., and of the Marquette club of Chicago.

James L. Monaghan has been a well-known figure in local politics for the past twenty years. He was born at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, April 10, 1857, a son of Peter L. and Elizabeth G. (Donnelly) Monaghan. He was reared and educated in his native city, came first to Chicago in 1878, but did not permanently locate here until three years later. Although he attended the Kent College of Law, he never practiced that profession. A Republican in politics he was elected to the lower house of the State Legislature in 1888, served one term, then became deputy in the office of Henry L. Hertz, then County coroner. In December, 1894, he was appointed Deputy county comptroller, in which official position he has since continuously served. For many years Mr. Monaghan has served on the State, county, and city central committees. He belongs to the Lincoln, Hamilton and Illinois Athletic clubs; is married and resides at 1072 Douglas Boulevard.

Walter D. Moody, general manager of the Chicago Association of Commerce, the largest organized body of business men in the world, and in a broad sense probably more influential than any other, was born in Detroit, Michigan, January 16, 1874, a son of the Rev. Edward Bursell and Anna Maria (Guilloz) Moody. His father, a native of London, England, was a clergyman of the Baptist Church and is now living in retirement. His mother was born in France. They were brought to the United States by their parents about the year 1855, both families settling in Detroit, where they were married. Walter D. Moody received a practical education and began his business career when he was only fourteen years old, in the dry goods trade at a salary of $3.00 per week. A few years later he became identified with the wholesale millinery firm of Macauley & Company, of his native city; as traveling salesman, continuing in that capacity until 1898. He then organized the wholesale millinery house of the Mitchell-Moody-Garton company, in Detroit, of which he was vice-president and for which he was the European buyer until the fall of 1904. He then disposed of his interest to take the sales management of the wholesale millinery firm of Gage Brothers & Company, of Chicago.

His activities in that connection made him deeply interested in the work of the Chicago Commercial association, now known as the Chicago Association of Commerce, of which he became business manager in December, 1907, and of which, on January 5, 1909, he was elected general manager. In this connection his duties have greatly extended his acquaintance and have given him an enviable reputation in all business centers throughout Chicago's tributary territory. His success surpasses that achieved by many of the younger generation of business men whose foresight and cool and accurate judgment have made Chicago one of the world's greatest commercial centers. He is an originator and promoter of movements which are far reaching in influence, not alone to the trade of Chicago, but to that of the entire Western territory. Mr. Moody is a member of the Press club of Chicago and of the Chicago Advertisers' association, and as such has been able effectively to extend and advance the great work he has in hand. He is the author of a practical, common sense treatise on salesmanship—"Men Who Sell Things," now in its fifth edition, published by A. C. McClurg & Co. June 24, 1896, he married Miss Lillian Hannah Slater, of Detroit, and their home is 1795 Sheridan Road.

Henry W. Moore began practicing law in Chicago in 1834, and for a period of 14 years, when he permanently removed from the city, was engaged in the most important legal events of that time. He was a superior advocate, had a keen, discerning mind and was the equal of any of the early lawyers. Like many of the first lawyers of the city, he was a deputy clerk of the Circuit court under the yet well remembered Col. Richard J. Hamilton. The climate severely affected his health and for this reason he removed, first to Cuba and later to Massachusetts, where he afterward died.

Dr. Edward L. Moorhead was born on February 20, 1864, and was educated in the public and high schools of Terre Haute, Ind., in which city he was reared. His parents were John and Hannah (Devereaux) Moorhead. The father was a native of Monaghan, Ireland, but was reared in Scotland, and the mother of Hagerstown, Md. Both parents were of Scotch-Irish descent. The father came to the United States from Scotland in 1849 and for a number of years was engaged as a millwright and in constructing mills along the Wabash and Erie canal. He resided for many years in Terre Haute, Ind.

Dr. Edward L., the subject of this review, after finishing his public and high school education, took a course at St. Ignatius college, from which college he received the degree of Master of Arts in 1894. He entered Rush Medical college in 1887 and in March, 1890, was graduated therefrom with credit and with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. His first practice was from 1890 to 1892 as an interne of the Cook County hospital. He was for a number of years attending surgeon to Cook County hospital and from 1898 to 1901 president of the Medical Board. He has also been surgeon to St. Anthony de Padua hospital since its founding in 1897. He has been connected with the medical colleges for a number of years, having been a teacher in his alma mater for several years and at present is professor of gynecology, Illinois Post Graduate school. He is a member of the Chicago Medical, Illinois State Medical and American Medical associations. Before studying medicine, it should be said, he took a course of two years in mechanical engineering, and for a time was engaged in the drug business. Since 1890 he has been engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery in Chicago. His office at present is at 103 State street and his residence at 1648 Jackson boulevard. He is a member of the Catholic church, of the Knights of Columbus and the Catholic order of Foresters. On February 3, 1892, he married Jeanette Snell and they have one son, L. D. Moorhead, who is a student at St. Ignatius college.

Clyde A. Morrison has been an untiring worker in the reorganization of the office of the city attorney, and the high state of efficiency and businesslike manner to which it has been brought is largely attributable to him. Although a native of Peotone, Illinois, he has been a resident of this city since six months of age. Born March 12, 1876, a son of John and Pearl (Palmer) Morrison, he was educated at the grammar and high schools of Chicago and the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, Virginia.

He decided to make the legal profession his life's occupation and after the completion of his studies and admission to the bar in 1899, was employed in the legal department of the Chicago and Eastern Illinois Railroad company and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad company. Subsequently he was a member of the law firms of Pam, Calhoun & Glennon, Wetten & Morrison, Eddy, Haley & Wetten, and associated with Calhoun, Lyford & Sheehan.

Mr. Morrison first participated actively in politics as secretary of the Charles C. Dawes campaign committee when the latter was a candidate for United States Senator, and subsequently became secretary of the campaign committees of Governor Deneen and Mayor Busse. Of late years he has been active in politics, was the owner and published of the Hyde Park Republican, and later editor-in-chief of the Hamiltonian, the official publication of the Hamilton club. He is the present vice-president of the Illinois League of Republican clubs, and in the last national election was associated with the National Republican committee at the Auditorium under the direct supervision of national committeeman David W. Mulvane. He subsequently was Master in Chancery of the Superior court, but since May, 1907, has been serving in his present official position as chief assistant city attorney. He does not handle any legal business except city affairs and devotes his time exclusively to his official duties.

Buckner S. Morris was one of the lawyers who made his way to Chicago in 1834, arriving here with his family in August of that year, and was for about forty years a prominent character in the courts of the city and circuit. He was born in Augusta, Bracken county, Kentucky, in August, 1800, and his education was only such as could be obtained in the district schools of the locality. When about 21 years old he was employed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit court of his native county, where he became familiar with the modes of procedure of courts of law and the forms of pleading and records, and after about three years of service in that capacity he began the study of law, and was admitted to the bar when about 27 years old.

He commenced practice in his native county, and, having a natural inclination to politics, was twice elected to the Legislature of his State. He had great industry in the preparation of his cases and remarkable ability in analyzing and handling the facts of a case, and soon became very successful as a jury lawyer. He not only grouped and presented his ideas in a telling way, but his homely, countrified style, his quaint, every-day sort of familiar talk in addressing the jury, made him a formidable opponent when a case turned upon questions of fact.

As an illustration of his way of dealing with clients: A man living in one of the adjoining counties, having trouble with a neighbor, wrote Mr. Morris, giving his version of the facts, and asked his advice as to whether he had better bring suit. To which Mr. Morris replied in substance, that the law was against him, but he had no doubt a jury would find in his favor; and if he wanted a lawsuit he thought he could at least win in the Circuit court, but the Supreme court was made up of a lot of "old fogies," and he might get beaten there. In short, his mode of trying a suit, especially one in which the result rested with the jury, was unique and peculiarly his own. In 1853 he was elected judge of the Circuit court, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Hugh T. Dickey, and served two years, but declined reelection. As a judge he was patient and affable, and while he did not pretend to be what we call a learned judge, his good common sense and practical knowledge of affairs usually guided him to correct decisions. He was a candidate for governor in the '50s, but during the Civil war was involved in the Camp Douglas outbreak.

John B. Murphy, M. D., is a native of Appleton, Wis., and was born December 21, 1857. After receiving a primary education at the public schools he was graduated from the high school of Appleton on June 26, 1876. He began the study of medicine under the direction and tutorage of Dr. J. R. Reilly, a practicing surgeon of Appleton, who proved a most efficient and sympathetic preceptor. Later he entered Rush Medical college, Chicago, and in 1879 was duly graduated therefrom with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. During 1879 and 1880 he was interne at the Cook County hospital.

At the latter date he severed his connection with the hospital and formed a partnership with Dr. Edward W. Lee, at that time an attending surgeon at the hospital, and one of the best surgical practitioners in the city of Chicago. This partnership continued for ten years. In 1882 he went abroad and until 1884 was engaged in study in the hospitals of Vienna, Munich, Berlin, Heidelberg and London. The opportunities for enlarging his knowledge of surgery in those institutions were unsurpassed, and Dr. Murphy made the most of his opportunities. Upon his return to this city he devoted himself almost exclusively to the practice of surgery, and in a short time he was ranked as one of the foremost surgeons of Chicago. Still later his fame extended until his name was familiar throughout the country. His services have often been sought by hospitals and medical colleges. His unexcelled skill won for him the professorship in the chair of surgery and co-head of the department in Rush Medical college, head of the department and professor of surgery in the Northwestern University Medical school, professor of surgery in the Chicago Clinical school and the Post Graduate Medical school and hospital of Chicago.

For eighteen years he was attending surgeon to the Cook County hospital, and later advisory surgeon to that institution. He was chief surgeon to the Mercy hospital, attending surgeon at Wesley, St. Joseph's and Columbus hospitals, and consulting surgeon to the Hospital for Crippled Children and Alexian Brothers hospital. He was a member of the International Congress of Rome and Moscow, a member of the Surgical Society of Paris, and was made a life member of the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Chirurgie, Berlin. Among the American organizations with which he was connected, the most prominent are the American Surgical association, Fellow of the American Surgical society, the American Medical association, the American Association of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, the Academy of Medicine of Chicago and the Chicago Surgical society. In 1902 Notre Dame University bestowed upon him the honorary Laetare medal for eminence in professional scholarship and in the practice of surgery.

Dr. Murphy is a contributor to the standard publications on surgery, and his articles have attracted widespread attention and consideration, particularly from professional men. His reputation at present is worldwide as a general surgeon and as an expert in the surgery of the abdomen and neurologic surgery. He is the inventor of a number of important surgical appliances which are in general use throughout the world, and has made a number of important discoveries in medical science. Probably Dr. Murphy has no superior in the United States in original investigation, in skillful operation and in correct and reliable diagnosis. His services are called into requisition in different parts of the United States.

Oscar William Nelson was born in Tommallilo, Sweden, September 5, 1872, his father being Nels Martinson. His mother was formerly Hanna Olson. The father in the old country was engaged in the crockery, slaughter and bakery business. Oscar W. began for himself in the butcher business in 1896 at Orleans, near Oak street, but came to this country in 1887 and on the Fourth of July of the same year located in Chicago, when he was but fifteen years old. His education was received in Sweden.

After coming to America he opened a dancing establishment and continued that occupation for about three and a half years. He then resumed the butcher business until 1904, when he quit the same on account of ill health. In 1905 he began work as a sand teamster and in the spring of that year, on April 25, he began on his own account the sand and contracting business under the firm name of Oscar W. Nelson & Company and first located at Clark and Adams streets in the Lakeside building, but is at present located at 84 La Salle street. He resides at Maywood, Illinois, and owns the finest private residence in that suburb and village. It is known as "Sunshine" and well befits its name. It is built of material especially prepared by Mr. Nelson himself.

At the time the house was completed Mr. Nelson had just removed the two lions from the old city hall, then being demolished, and he had them placed at the East side of his residence, facing Des Plaines River on each side of the steps. The head of the woman taken from the same place will be mounted on a column of concrete and placed on the lawn with a flower pot on top. Mr. Nelson is an active Republican and is prominent in Maywood public affairs. At present he is interested and fighting for the dredging of the Des Plaines River in order to have it made a navigable stream. He is a member of the Maccabees, Oskaway Yacht club, Des Plaines River Boat club, and with his boat "Genevieve" has won two races on the Des Plaines River. He married Sophie Olson and has one child, Marie Genevieve Nelson, aged five years.

William J. Newman was born in Montreal, Canada, June 30, 1864, his father being Cornelius and his mother before marriage Catherine O'Hallaron. The father came from County Cork, Ireland and the mother from County Clare. They landed in Canada in 1860 and nine years later came to Chicago. The father was an iron melter and worked for Crane Bros. Mfg. Co. He died in this city in 1888. William J., the subject of this review, was brought to Chicago when five years of age. He attended the grammar school, graduating at the age of fourteen years.

When ten years old, during vacation time, he began to work for the old West Side library, at 239 West Madison street, and continued this work from time to time until his graduation. The manner of going to work early, while at the same time he pursued his studies is characteristic of the energy and enterprise of the subject. After leaving school he worked two years for D. Hale & Company of the Board of Trade as call boy. When this firm failed he engaged with the Western Union Telegraph company as messenger, continuing two years and then served as clerk one year. About that time he secured a position with the Northwestern Railway company and learned the trade of a machinist, after which he entered the police department as patrolman, continuing thus engaged for two years.

He then engaged in the wood, coal and teaming business at West Forty-first and Lake streets and was there engaged industriously and honorably for seventeen years, the first five years alone and the last twelve under the firm name of McCarthy & Newman. For the West Park board this firm furnished in place all black soil on the boulevard system, from North avenue to Western avenue on the street known as Humboldt boulevard. They hauled and delivered all the black soil for the boulevard from Douglas to Garfield park with the exception of two blocks, and in Douglas park, from Ogden avenue south. The greater part of the black soil for Garfield and Humboldt park was hauled by them. They dug tree holes, furnished black soil and sodded Diversey boulevards.

ward from the river to Clark street, and completed two miles of the Hennepin canal, known as miles No. 17 and No. 18. Upon the dissolution of the firm of McCarthy & Newman, Mr. Newman continued the contracting business alone. He hauled and disposed of all the excavation from the Illinois Tunnel company's bore in Chicago and deposited the material in Grand park, and worked at the same day and night, regardless of weather. This was a feat never before accomplished by any excavating contractor. He did the wrecking and disposing of the materials of the buildings where now stands the latest addition to Marshall Field's retail store, the Iroquois, now Colonial, Theater, State Savings Bank building, Republic building, Heyworth building, First National Bank building, Railway Exchange building and did all the excavating, and caisson hauling for the above named buildings.

He is at present digging the holes for two artificial lakes and building all roadways and approaches on J. Ogden Armour's property, near Lake Forest. The excavator and dumping machines used on this job, as well as the dump cars and the apparatus for dumping said cars used in the Illinois Tunnel company's bore and the machine used in digging part of the north shore channel of the drainage canal, are all of Mr. Newman's invention, upon which he holds patents. On August 11, 1908, Mr. Newman was awarded the contract to wreck the old city hall, to do the excavating and put in caisson and foundation for the new building at an aggregate contract price of $324,975. The time limit allowed for the work is two hundred and sixty days. From the above it will be seen that Mr. Newman is one of the most prominent, one of the largest and one of the most successful contractors in his line in the United States. He is well known to all Chicago business men and has the confidence and respect of everybody of his acquaintance. The work that he has undertaken and carried to finality is of large extent and very exacting in detail, yet all has been accomplished without severe penalty. He is yet young in years, but has done more than many men have accomplished during a long life.

He is a Republican and a Roman Catholic in religion. He belongs to Our Lady of Sorrows church and is a charter member of the Royal League and also belongs to the Chicago Association of Commerce. On August 30, 1904, he married Marguerite E. Yorke, by whom he became the father of four children: Helen Catherine, Adelaide Marie, William J., Jr., and Cornelius, deceased. The family reside at 1811 Lexington avenue.

Augustus Frederick Nightingale, the present county superintendent of schools, was born at Quincy, Mass., on November 11, 1843, and is the youngest son of seven children born to the marriage of Thomas J. and Alice (Brackett) Nightingale. The family is of English ancestry. In 1648 John Nightingale, of the county of Essex, England, immigrated to America and became the founder of the family in this country. Augustus F., the subject of this review, was reared on his father's farm and received his early education in the schools of Quincy. Later he attended the Methodist Conference Seminary at Newbury, Vt., and still later the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., from which institution he was graduated in 1866 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. In 1892, upon the submission of his thesis to the Upper Iowa University, he was given the degree of doctor of philosophy. In 1904 he was given the honorary degree of doctor of laws by Simpson college, of Indianola, Iowa.

After his graduation he was given the chair of ancient languages in the Upper Iowa University and continued to occupy the same until 1868. He was then elected to the presidency of the Northwestern Female college, Evanston, Ill., and served as such until 1871. That institution is now known as the Woman's College of the Northwestern University. From 1871 to 1872 he had the chair of ancient languages in Simpson college, Indianola, Iowa. From 1872 to 1874 he served as superintendent of public schools, Omaha, Neb. From 1874 to 1890 he was principal of the Lake View high school, Chicago. While serving in this capacity he largely built up his splendid reputation as a scholar and an educator. During all of these years he was a profound student of literature and particularly made the study of education a specialty. From 1890 to 1892 he served as assistant superintendent of the Chicago public schools. From 1892 to 1901 he was general superintendent of all the high schools of Chicago. In 1902 he was elected county superintendent and was reelected in 1906, and is now serving in that capacity. His entire life has been given to educational pursuits and to the study of all methods to impart instruction to youth.

Probably no person in Illinois is better qualified from all standpoints to occupy a higher position as instructor of any branch of modern learning. He has contributed extensively to educational literature. His work on "Requirements for Admission to American Colleges" is a standard work. His deep interest in what may be termed secondary school work led him to accept the editorship of the Twentieth Century Text Books—about 100 in number. He has lectured extensively on educational and economic subjects throughout the State. He has held the honorary position of president of the Nebraska State Teachers' association; president of the Nebraska State Sabbath association; president of the Illinois State Teachers' association; president of the Secondary Department of the National Education association; president of the North Central Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges. He has also served as trustee of the University of Illinois and was president of the board of 1903-4. He has also been president of the Massachusetts Society of Chicago.

On August 24, 1866, he married Fanny Orena, daughter of Rev. Charles H. Chase, of New Hampshire, and they have five children living, all being married: Florence, now Mrs. W. R. Abbott, M. D., of Chicago; Harry Thomas, a teacher in the University of Illinois Academy at Urbana; Jessie Irma, now Mrs. Harrison M. Angle, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and Winifred, now Mrs. Vaughn Lee Alward, of Chicago, and Pearl Romain, now Mrs. Winter D. Hess, of Evanston.

Dr. Nightingale is a Republican in politics, a member of the Hamilton club and of the college fraternities Psi Upsilon and Phi Beta Kappa. On November 3, 1906, the following editorial appeared in the Chicago Evening Post:

"Of the six candidates in the field for the office of county superintendent of schools, Dr. A. F. Nightingale easily leads. He holds the office now and he has conducted its affairs with conspicuous ability. While he appears as the Republican candidate to succeed himself, partisan consideration should not be permitted to influence the vote in selecting an incumbent for this office.

"Dr. Nightingale has made education and the organization and direction of educational activities his life work. He has been remarkably successful. In almost every field of work from the primary to teaching the classics in a university, from grade teacher to superintendent of high schools, from instructor in Greek and Latin to college president, he has left the mark of an earnest student, an apt instructor, an intelligent organizer and a judicious director.

"There is no reason why Dr. Nightingale should be retired from the superintendency of the county schools; there is every reason why he should be retained in the office he has filled so well. In character, scholarship, ability, energy—everything that the position demands—Dr. Nightingale is preëminently qualified to remain where the people of the county placed him in 1902."

He is now a member of the Educational Commission of Illinois, appointed to codify and improve the school laws of the State.

Anton Novak was born March 15, 1858, in Bohemia. In 1869 the father, mother, and five children came to Chicago, Anton then being eleven years old, the oldest of the family. He attended the Chicago public schools, and his father, who was a cabinet maker by trade and in a strange country, had hard times to get along. When the great Chicago fire of 1871 came, the family lost everything they had and were left penniless and destitute. The winter following the fire was a very hard one and Anton Novak was forced to leave school and go to work to help support the family and at the age of fourteen years, entered as an apprentice into the cigar business. He worked at his trade until 1877, when he left Chicago for New York, and there continued in the same line of business. In 1879 he was married to Anna Pelikovsky of New York city, and in 1882, he came back to Chicago and settled here permanently.

The same year he entered into the cigar manufacturing business, which business he carried on up to the time of his death.

Although he had taken an active part in politics for more than twenty years, he never sought any public office until the spring of 1896, when he was tendered the office of alderman of the then Tenth ward, to fill the unexpired term of Zina R. Carter, to which office he was elected. He served his term with great credit to himself and his constituents, and in 1899 was reelected. In 1905 he was nominated to the office of trustee of the Sanitary district for a term of three years, of which term he served only ten months, owing to his unexpected death.

On October 13, 1906, after an illness of a short duration he died at the age of forty-nine, leaving a widow and eight children, five sons and three daughters. At the time of his death he was president of the Bohemia club of Chicago, the Bohemian turners, the National Union and several other social and fraternal societies.

John T. O'Connell, as a dealer in real estate, has done as much for the improvement of the Garfield and Douglas park sections of the city as any one man, and through his instrumentality largely that locality has become one of the choice residence districts of Chicago. Mr. O'Connell is a son of John and Margaret (O'Brien) O'Connell, who were natives of Ireland and who immigrated from their native land to America and settled in Chicago at a period when it was but half its present size. In this city John T. was born, reared and educated in the public and parochial schools. He began life for himself as a clerk in the wholesale dry goods store of A. T. Stewart & Co., and later was in the employ of Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co., wholesale dry goods. In 1890 he established himself in the real estate business, making a specialty of West Side properties, and at this occupation he has achieved a fair measure of success.

About the year 1898 he moved his home to what is now known as the Garfield park section of the West Side, at that time a sparsely settled locality with little improvements. To better conditions an improvement club was organized, Mr. O'Connell was chosen president, meetings were held weekly, the two aldermen and many citizens regularly attended, and through the efforts of this club the sidewalks, sewerage, lighting, police and other necessary improvements were secured and in time the locality became one of the best for residence purposes in the entire city. Mr. O'Connell has ever been foremost in the support of all laudable public enterprises. In 1904 as the nominee of the Republican party, he was elected a member of the State Board of Equalization with a majority of about 16,000 votes, and is now serving as such. In August, 1893, Miss Margaret, daughter of the late P. W. Crowe, became his wife and by her he is the father of four children.

William L. O'Connell has achieved more than an average degree of prominence for one of his age, and as a matter of justice it should be said that he has added importance to the positions he has held and has acquitted himself with credit and honor. He is a native of Chicago, his birth occurring May 15, 1872. Michael J. and Anna (Bennett) O'Connell, his parents, were from Dublin and County Meath, Ireland, respectively, and immigrated to America in 1860. After residing ten years at Utica, New York, they removed to Chicago, where the father was an employe of A. Booth, as bookkeeper, prior to the great fire of 1871, and after that was associated with McGinnis & Co., dealers in fish, oysters and game, until his death in 1875. His widow survived him until her death October 17, 1905. William L. O'Connell is the only child born to his parents. He was educated in the public and St. Johns Brothers' schools, and later took a three years' night course in the Chicago College of Law, from which he was graduated.

While attending law school he was employed as city salesman for Franklin McVeagh & Co., but in 1902, under the firm name of McGuire & O'Connell, embarked in the cigar jobbing business. This partnership existed but a short time, since when Mr. O'Connell has continued it alone. To the business he has added the manufacturing of cigars. In politics Mr. O'Connell has always been a consistent and ardent supporter of the principles of the Democratic party. He was elected a member of the Democratic county central committee from the Sixth ward in 1903, and for four years was a member of the executive committee of that body. In May, 1906, he was elected Chairman of the Democratic county central Committee and has since served in that capacity. In July, 1903, he was appointed superintendent to the office of gas inspector by Mayor Harrison, served six months and was then appointed deputy commissioner of public works. Upon the resignation of Joseph Medill Patterson as Commissioner of this department during Mayor Dunne's administration, Mr. O'Connell was promoted to that position and served as such until the advent of Mr. Busse as Mayor. He is a member of Chicago Council, Knights of Columbus and is associated with other benevolent institutions. On July 17, 1905, he was united in marriage with Miss Anna J. Curry and to their union have been born two daughters, Mary and Anna.

James V. O'Donnell, lawyer and master in chancery of the Superior court, was born at Portland, Maine, September 14, 1868. His parents were Patrick and Mary (Gaugherty) O'Donnell. In the year 1864 they immigrated to the United States and settled at Portland, Maine, where the father engaged in the wholesale woolen business. In 1877 the family moved to Chicago, where the parents died.

From the time he was nine years old James V. O'Donnell has always made his home in Chicago. He completed his literary education by being graduated from Notre Dame University in the class of 1889, succeeding which, after a two years' course, he was graduated from the Chicago College of Law, having previously read law in the office of and under the direction of Judge John Gibbons. He subsequently became one of the firm of Gibbons, Kavanagh & O'Donnell until the election of Judge Gibbons to the Circuit Court bench, and then of the firm of Kavanagh and O'Donnell until his associate, Col. Marcus Kavanagh, was elected a judge of the Superior court. Mr. O'Donnell was then engaged in individual practice until 1902, when he was appointed a Master in Chancery of the Superior court, which office he now holds.

When war was declared between the United States and Spain Mr. O'Donnell enlisted as a member of Company I, Seventh Regiment, Illinois Volunteers on April 26, 1898, and was commissioned first lieutenant of his company on May 18, 1898. Together with his command Lieutenant O'Donnell was on detached service and held in reserve until peace was declared, when he was honorably mustered out of service. He is a member of Waldron-Murphy Camp of Spanish-American War Veterans, of the Knights of Columbus and the Chicago Bar association, and with his wife and three children resides at 1851 Barry avenue.

Peter B. Olsen is conceded to have been one of the most capable public officials ever elected in Cook county. A native of Christiania, Norway, his birth occurred April 11, 1848, and he is one of four living children in a family of ten. His father, Isak Olsen-Eng, was one of the pioneer piano and organ manufacturers of Norway, and his great-grandfather served as an officer in the German army in the early part of the Seven Years' war (1756-1763). Peter B. Olsen was educated in the public schools and at a commercial college in his native country, and prior to coming to America was employed several years in a wholesale grocery establishment and one year as a printer.

In 1872 he came to America for the purpose of familiarizing himself with the conditions prevailing here and intending to return to Norway after accomplishing that result; but the outlook here presented so many alluring prospects that he concluded to make it his permanent residence, and Chicago has since been his home. For a time he was a compositor in the job department of the Daily Skandinaven (John Anderson, publisher), and for about twenty years was employed in several departments on that paper, the greater part of the time in an editorial capacity.

About the year 1884, Mr. Olsen began to identify himself with local politics, and from 1888 to 1892 he was employed as a clerk in the map department of the office of the county recorder. In 1895 he was appointed clerk in the map department of the county clerk, serving eight years in that department, the last three years being the chief clerk. During this period, in 1898, he was elected to the lower house of the State Legislature from the old Eleventh

(now the Twenty-fifth) senatorial district, and in 1900 was re-elected to this position, serving two terms in all. In 1902 he was elected county clerk (with a plurality of 13,827), and his term of four years was marked by the high state of efficiency to which the office was brought. In February, 1908, he was appointed chief clerk of the County court, in which official position he is now serving. Mr. Olsen has been an unswerving advocate of the principles of the Republican party, and his influence is felt among all classes and particularly among those of his nativity. He is a Mason, a veteran Odd Fellow and a Knight of Pythias, also a member of the Press club of Chicago and of the Old-Time Printers' association, of which he at present is vice-president. He was married in 1874 to Claudia Engh, who died in 1879, leaving three sons, Egil T., Hugo and Frederick. In 1882 he married Jennie C. Engh, a sister of his former wife, by whom he is the father of five children: Walter A., Clara O. (deceased), Benjamin C. (deceased), Benjamin T. and Jerome C.

Anton Olszewski, publisher of the Lithuanian weekly Lietuva, located at 3252 South Halsted street, was born in Liudvinovo, government Suwolki Lithuania-Russia, on June 13, 1863, being a son of Joseph and Mary (Buyauskyte) Olszewski. In 1885 he came to the United States, locating at Plymouth, Pennsylvania, where he remained for five years, assisting his uncle in merchandising. In 1890 he came to Chicago and learned the printing business in the office of W. Dynienicz and later in the office of the Polish newspaper called Nowezycie, at Thirty-first and Morgan streets; later he worked as foreman printer in the office of a Polish paper, Reforma, published by S. Rokosz. This paper suspended and the outfit was used by Mr. Rokosz to establish the Lithuanian weekly Lietuva.

In January, 1892, after having finished eight editions of his paper Mr. Rokosz sold out to V. Zalauckas, who issued from the eighth to the thirteenth edition and then went out of the business. Later the paper was issued by Peter Zacharewicz and S. Lelaszius from numbers fourteen to twenty-three, when three of the compositors, including the subject of this sketch, in June, 1893, purchased the plant. Gradually the others dropped out, leaving Mr. Olszewski sole owner of the establishment in 1898. He now has a circulation of over 10,000 copies weekly and his affairs are on a solid foundation. The paper was first issued on Eighteenth street, next on Halsted, then at 954 Thirty-third street, but was located at 924 Thirty-third street, in the building owned by its proprietor. In 1906 he built the brick block at the northwest corner of Thirty-third and Halsted streets, three stories and a basement, in which the paper is now published. The building has deposit vaults and store-rooms and is 83 by 135 feet. In the Bridgeport Clothing company occupying the building, Mr. Olszewski owns a controlling interest, being president of the concern. The rear part of the building is occupied by the newspaper, and the second and third floors are used for residences and offices. He is a member of the Lithuanian Alliance of America and of several benevolent associations, including the Association of Simon Daukant, Sons of Lithuania, Lithuania club, and Chicago Association of Commerce. In politics he is a Republican. He is married and has two children, Anton and Algerd.

Francis L. Padeloup, the present chief deputy clerk of Cook county, has been prominently identified with local politics for over twenty years. Francis M. Padeloup, his father, was abstractor of real estate titles and among the pioneers of that line of employment in Chicago. For many years he resided at 417 South Halsted street and there died June 7, 1872. Francis L. Padeloup was born December 4, 1866, and was reared on the west side. He was educated in the public schools, beginning in the Foster school. His first employment was that of messenger boy for the American District Telegraph company, where he was promoted to a clerical position and continued in the telegraph business for several years. For a time thereafter he was an employe of the German American Insurance company.

His political career had its beginning in 1885, when he was employed as assistant chief clerk of the West Town Assessor, serving as such two years. By appointment of Mayor John A. Roche in 1887, he became assistant water assessor, but this position he resigned to accept the more responsible one of cashier of internal revenue. After serving thus for four years he resigned to accept the post of secretary to George Struckmann during his term as president of Board of Cook County Commissioners. In 1894 he was appointed to a clerkship in the office of Philip Knopf, who was then county clerk, served one year, then became chief deputy. This position Mr. Padeloup held almost continuously up to the present time, 1909, being retained by several county clerks on account of his technical knowledge of county affairs, election laws and his excellent executive ability.

Mr. Padeloup has found time to cultivate the good fellowship of such fraternal organizations and clubs as the Knights of Pythias, Fraternal Order of Eagles, the Royal Arcanum, the Illinois Athletic club, and is treasurer of the Chicago Bowling association, president of the Illinois State bowling association and treasurer of the American Bowling Congress, an international body. To his marriage with Miss Donna Jensen, which was celebrated June 30, 1896, one daughter, Donna, has been born.

Haynie Robert Pearson was born at Springfield, Illinois, in 1866, and comes of distinguished ancestry. His father, Brig.-Gen. Robert N. Pearson, was a native of Pennsylvania and a descendant of John Pearson, who was one of William Penn's faithful and principal aids. The father came to Cook county in 1878 and became city paymaster and was thus serving at the time of his death in 1903. In 1861, under President Lincoln's first call for volunteers he was the sixteenth man in Illinois to enlist in the Union Army. He joined the command under Colonel Prentiss and after serving for three months was honorably mustered out and promptly reënlisted under Gen. John A. Logan of the Thirty-first Illinois Infantry and served faithfully throughout the war. He was the youngest colonel in the Union Army and the youngest brigadier general mustered out at the close of the war. From 1880 to 1882 he was a member of the Illinois Legislature and from 1888 to 1892 served as United States Government appraiser under President Harrison. The mother of Haynie Robert was formerly Mary E. Tuthill, a sister of Judge Richard S. Tuthill and a descendant of John Tuthill, one of the Pilgrim Fathers.

Haynie Robert was brought to Chicago by his parents in 1878 and was educated in the public schools and graduated from the West Division high school. He attended Middlebury college, Vermont, and finished with a course at the University of Michigan Law school, being duly admitted to the bar in 1889. He immediately entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1892-93 he served as attorney for the Sanitary district of Chicago and in May, 1893, was appointed by Jacob J. Kern, assistant State's attorney. In 1896 he was reappointed to the same office by Charles S. Deneen and was made chief trial attorney of that office. While serving as assistant State's attorney he prosecuted a total of two hundred and forty-seven murder cases and secured twenty-one death sentences, which number up to that time was the largest of that character ever secured by a prosecutor in the United States; He also secured forty-nine life sentences. In 1901 he resigned and returned to private practice.

From that date to the present he has acted as attorney for the Chicago Underwriters' association, the American Can company, Baltimore & Ohio Railway company and various other large corporations. By inheritance he is a member of the Loyal Legion and of the Army of Tennessee. He is a member of the Chicago, Illinois State and American Bar associations. He is senior warden of St. Martin's Protestant Episcopal church, and is a Knight Templar and Thirty-second degree Mason. On September 14, 1902, he married Blanche B. Arnold, daughter of James M. Arnold, a retired business man living at 5721 Midway park, Austin. They have four children as follows: Beatrice, Robert S., Caroline and James Middleton Arnold. Mr. Arnold, her father, served throughout the Civil war in the Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Infantry Regiment and participated in the battles of Resaca, Champlin's Hill, Murfreesboro, Adairville, Kenesaw Mountain, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Jonesboro and Spring Hill. He is a member of the G. A. R., Columbia Post No. 706. He is the originator and founder of the association known as "Squad No. 1 of the Grandsons of Veterans." His grandson, Robert S. Pearson, aged thirteen years, was elected captain of Squad No. 1.

Ebenezer Peck located as a lawyer in Chicago during the summer of 1835. He was born in Portland, Maine, but his parents removed to Canada while he was but a lad, and he received his education and was admitted to the bar at the city of Quebec, where he began the practice of his profession, and soon rose to the rank of king's counsel, and was elected to the Provincial Parliament, where he acted with the Liberal party and acquired an influential position. After locating in Chicago he devoted himself earnestly to the work of his profession, secured a large and profitable practice, and was looked up to as one of the able lawyers of the city. He, however, had a great fondness for politics, which in a very few years distracted his attention from his law practice, and he finally, for a time, engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was then for a time clerk of the Supreme court, with his office in Springfield, but resigned that place in 1846 and returned to Chicago, where he formed a law partnership with James A. McDougal, who was afterward United States Senator from California. The firm soon secured a large practice, as both were able men and sound lawyers; but in 1849 Mr. Peck accepted the office of reporter of the Supreme court of our State to succeed Mr. Charles Gilman, who had died. He held the place of reporter until after the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln as President, when he was appointed one of the judges of the United States Court of Claims, which place he filled until 1875, when he resigned at the age of 70 years, and died at his home in Chicago two years later.

As a lawyer he was able and industrious, well versed in the common law, and an eloquent and effective advocate, courteous and gentlemanly toward the court and his brother lawyers, and thoroughly honest. He was a natural leader of men, and his influence was always thrown in favor of a high standard of professional conduct. He was an early admirer and friend of Mr. Lincoln, who had great confidence in his judgment, and often consulted him in the trying emergencies of the Civil war.

Charles W. Peters, chief deputy sheriff of Cook county, was born December 28, 1858, at Pomerania, Germany, and is one of three living children born to John and Johanna (Heitschmidt) Peters. John Peters was a weaver in the old country, but after the removal of the family to Chicago in 1865, followed cabinet making. His death occurred in 1889, and that of his widow, March 26, 1903. The early education of Charles W. Peters was secured in the public schools of Chicago, supplemented by a course in the Metropolitan Business college, in which he secured a life scholarship, and in the German parochial schools, where he completed his education in the mother tongue. He learned the trade of tuck pointing, an occupation now obsolete, but after a short time at this pursuit he became an errand boy in a tailoring establishment, with which he continued as a book-keeper and salesman for a number of years. In 1876 he secured a position in the office of the treasurer of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway company under Warren G. Purdy, who afterwards became the president of the road. After four years service he became a clerk in the Northwestern National bank, where he remained six years.

Owing to failing health occasioned by the confinement of his duties, he resigned to become a deputy sheriff under Sheriff Matson, was reappointed by Sheriff Gilbert, then became chief deputy under Sheriff Pease, and has since occupied this position under every successive sheriff. During his official career Mr. Peters has taken an active part as a Republican in all political campaigns, and has been secretary of almost every Republican county and city convention for the past score of years. He was also secretary of the State Republican convention that nominated Richard Yates for governor in 1900, and was assistant secretary of the convention that nominated Charles S. Deneen for governor four years later. As deputy sheriff Mr. Peters assisted in the execution of the anarchists and had charge of the force that quelled the teamsters' strike of 1905—a noteworthy achievement in view of the fact that the whole police department of the city had failed to accomplish this object. Mr. Peters was elected vice-president of the National Association of Sheriffs in 1907 and reelected in 1908; was a member of the Chicago Dragoons, and after the consolidation of this organization with Troop A, First cavalry, Illinois National Guard, was commissioned second lieutenant. He is a member of Golden Rule Lodge, No. 726, A. F. and A. M.; Wiley M. Egan chapter, No. 126, R. A. M.; Chicago commandery, No. 19, K. T.; Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., of which he is high sheriff; Prairie State council, No. 912, Royal Arcanum, of which he has served in every official position; in a similar manner he has occupied all the offices in Arion council, No. 11, Royal League, is a member of the Northwest club, the Pistakee Yacht club, of which he was commodore in 1907, and belongs to the Teutonia Maennerchor, a German singing society. As a member of the Royal Arcanum he was elected to the Grand Council and was then elected one of the trustees. In 1881 he married Miss Emma Ehlert and they have two children—Neva (Mrs. Hollis B. Wilcox) and Hazel C.

C. Clarence Poole, one of the capable patent lawyers of Chicago, and a member of the law firm of Poole & Brown, is of Puritan lineage, and a son of Charles H. and Mary A. (Daniels) Poole. He was born at Benicia, California, November 27, 1856. His father, a civil engineer by profession, was at the time in the service of the United States government at that point. The founder of the family in America was John Poole, of Reading, Massachusetts, who came to the Massachusetts colony in 1632, was one of the first settlers of Cambridge, and was later granted land at Reading and became one of the principal citizens of that place. Mr. Poole is a lineal descendant of Governor Dudley and Governor Bradstreet of the Massachusetts colony, and is a descendant, also, of Manasseh Cutler, of Hamilton, Massachusetts, a scholar and statesman, a chaplain in the American army and a noted patriot in the Revolution; was a director of the Ohio company in 1787 and was the leading spirit in opening the Northwest territory to settlement; was largely instrumental in securing the passage of the "Ordinance of 1787," by which slavery was excluded from the Northwest territory, and was a member of Congress from Massachusetts.

Mr. Poole early displayed a talent for mechanical studies, which he has since utilized in the practice of patent law, a department of legal work for which his abilities especially qualify him. His early studies were in the schools of Washington, D. C., and later he was fitted for the practice of civil engineering by studies under private instructors, and in 1874 and 1875 served as assistant engineer in surveys carried on by the Engineer Department of the army. Among the records of the War Department are a set of maps and plans for a projected canal from Cumberland, Maryland, to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, which were made by Mr. Poole from notes taken in the field before he was 19 years old. Intending to devote his attention to patent law, he entered the law school of the Columbian university at Washington, where he was graduated in 1882, taking a prize for an essay on "Trademarks" at his graduation. The fall of that year he came to Chicago, and was first associated with Melville E. Dayton, well known to the legal fraternity as a mechanical expert in court cases involving mechanical questions, in practice before the United States Patent office, and later, also, in legal work with Col. Taylor E. Brown, with whom he is at present associated.

Mr. Poole, during his practice of patent law, has acquired a high reputation for skill and ability in his special line of practice, and he has been an advocate in many important cases, both in the Patent office and in the courts.

He was married in 1884 to Anne Poole, daughter of the late Dr. William Frederick Poole, for many years librarian of the Newberry library, and since his marriage has lived at Evanston.

Mr. Poole is a member of the Chicago Literary club, which includes among its membership the best among Chicago's able and scholarly men. He has contributed occasionally to the columns of newspapers and periodicals articles on various topics, and has also contributed to the literature of his profession papers on special subjects, some of which have been prepared for and published by the Patent Law association, and has also written a valuable text book, treating exhaustively of the law relating to the validity of letters patent as affected by the application for the patent and proceedings in the patent office prior to the grant.

Alfred R. Porter was born on the West Side, in the city of Chicago, April 6, 1860, and is the son of Robert and Mary Jane (Layton) Porter, both of whom were natives of England, the father of Norfolk and the mother of Cambridge. While yet a young man the father crossed the ocean to America and arrived in Chicago in 1854. Here he took up the occupation of contracting and building, and for a time his office or shop was in one of the buildings of old Camp Douglas. After a useful and honorable life he died in 1891, followed by his widow in 1906.

They were the parents of ten children, all of whom are living. Alfred R., the subject of this review, is the fourth child in order of birth. His whole life has been passed amid the strife and turmoil of Chicago. In 1866 the family moved to Thirty-ninth street, a short distance west of Cottage Grove avenue, and there resided for many years. Alfred R. was educated in the old Cottage Grove public school, now known as the Doolittle school, and when he had reached the age of 16 years he became clerk in a drug store, continuing thus until at the age of 20 he was made manager of a well-patronized drug store at Fifty-third street and Lake avenue, now Hyde Park. In 1884 he entered into partnership with A. N. Warner, under the firm name of Warner & Porter, and embarked in the dry goods business at Fifty-third street and Lake avenue. In 1889 Mr. Porter bought out the interest of his partner and conducted the same alone until 1894, when he sold out to his former partner.

Mr. Porter has distinguished himself in the domain of politics. In 1891 he was elected justice of the peace at Hyde Park and police magistrate for the Hyde Park police district. He occupied this position with credit until 1900, then he resigned to accept the position of clerk of the Sanitary district of Chicago, receiving his appointment from the Board of Trustees. He occupied this position until December, 1902, when, having been elected in the previous November as Appellate court clerk, he began the administration of that office. He occupied this position with marked ability for six years, and under the new direct primary election of 1908 was re-nominated and in November duly elected to this position. He served as secretary and later as treasurer of the Hyde Park Republican club, and after the annexation of that suburb he became secretary and later president of his precinct organization, and president of his ward club, and served as county committeeman. He is a Republican. He is a member of the McCabe Memorial Methodist Episcopal church, which was organized in 1889 at his house, which was then Hyde Park Methodist Episcopal church, but subsequently the McCabe Memorial church.

He is a member of the South Park lodge, A. F. and A. M.; Fairview chapter, R. A. M.; Montjoie commandery, K. T.; Independent Order of Foresters; Hyde Park council, Royal Arcanum; Knights of Pythias, Knights of the Maccabees, Hamilton club, Marquette club, and the First Regiment Veteran Corps. On April 24, 1885, he married Nevada Barker, of Nevada City, California, and by her has two sons, viz.: Albert R. and Frank R.

Albert H. Putney, professor of constitutional and equity jurisprudence in the Illinois College of Law, and dean of the faculty, was born in Boston in 1872, a son of Albert B. and Sarah B. (Abbott) Putney. He was graduated from Yale college in 1893 with special honors in history and political economy, and spent the next two years at the Boston University Law school, where he received the degree of Bachelor of Laws. He was admitted to the bar of the State of Massachusetts in June, 1895, and practiced his profession in Boston until 1898 and then removed to Chicago. He was admitted to the bar of Illinois in 1899, and has since practiced law continuously in Chicago except during one year while he was in the Philippines. He has been a professor in the Illinois College of Law since 1900 and dean of the faculty since 1904. He has written much for various legal publications and was for a year editor of the Law Register, and is the author of works on "Government in the United States," "Colonial Governments of European States," "United States Constitutional History and Law," and a "Law Library," which is a general outline of the various branches of the law, in twelve volumes. He is a member of the Jefferson, County Democracy and Press clubs, and of the Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias.

William E. Quinn, superintendent of the bureau of sewers, Department of Public Works, was born at Yellow Springs, Ohio, June 18, 1860, and when 6 years old was taken by his parents, Michael and Catharine (Ryan) Quinn to Fort Wayne, Indiana, where he was reared and educated in the public schools and at St. Joseph academy, graduating from the latter institution in 1875. For a number of years he was employed as a clerk at Fort Wayne, but in 1883 came to Chicago, where for eight years he was engaged in the retail coal trade. Taking up the study of law, the better to fit him for the activities of a business career, he entered the Chicago College of Law, from which he was graduated in 1894. In 1892 he was appointed chief deputy coroner of Cook county, serving as such four years. Prior to this time (in 1889) he was elected village and town clerk of Hyde Park. In 1897 he became assistant superintendent of the bureau of sewers, city of Chicago, and served as such until 1901, when he was appointed superintendent of the bureau, having previously passed the required civil service examination, and has ever since served in that capacity. Mr. Quinn is single and resides at 121 Watt avenue, Pullman.

Paul Redieske. A well-known writer has said that there were but three important epochs in a man's life—his birth, marriage and death. In order, however, to properly understand the character of a man it is necessary that the side lights of his career be added to the strong outlines of such a picture. It is easy to give the dates of birth and marriage of the subject of this sketch, but it is necessary that details be added in order that those unfamiliar with his career can form an opinion of his worth as a man and an official. Paul Redieske was born March 28, 1865, in Pomerania, Germany, a son of Charles and Augusta (Behling) Redieske. The spring of 1867 the family immigrated to America, locating in Chicago, where the father was engaged as a plumber until his death, March 18, 1893. In the old country he served in the Imperial army through the Prussia-Austria campaign. He was a participant in the battle of Koenniggratz, which lasted thirty-six hours, and was on active duty twenty-four hours without relief. He was a non-commissioned officer, and for meritorious services was honorably mentioned in dispatches. Immediately after coming to America he became naturalized and ever thereafter was an American in all that the term implies. He had no time or patience to give to the pernicious agitators who foment trouble and prove a detriment to the country, and often was heard to express himself that he could not understand why foreigners coming to this country could ever be other than Republicans. Quiet in manner and demeanor, he was, withal, keenly alive to the duties and rights of American citizenship, but could not be induced to thrust himself into public notice.

Paul Redieske received his early education in the public and parochial schools, supplemented by a four-years course at the old Chicago Athenæum on Dearborn street. He learned the plumber's trade and later became his father's partner in that business, continuing the same in partnership with his brother, William, until 1898. Even before attaining his majority he became interested in politics, and shortly thereafter was elected secretary of the old Sixteenth Ward Republican club, and later was elected its president. The ward boundaries having been changed so that he had become a resident of the Twenty-second ward, he was elected county committeeman, and after his removal to the Twenty-first ward, where he now resides, he was elected clerk of the town of North Chicago in 1904, of which, in 1905, 1906 and 1907, he was collector. By appointment of Governor Tanner, in 1898, he became superintendent of Lincoln park, serving as such three and one-half years, then served three years as deputy sheriff under E. J. Magerstadt. In 1905 he was elected active secretary of the Cook County Republican Central committee, serving in that capacity until June, 1907, when, by the appointment of Mayor Busse, he became deputy commissioner of public works, in which position he has since served. At no time during his long official career has question ever been raised as to his integrity or competency. Mr. Redieske is a member of the German Lutheran church and the Hamilton club. February 9, 1888, he was united in marriage with Miss Antonia Rosz, and Lily and Paul are the two living children born to their union.

Edward A. Renwick, born in Grand Rapids, Michigan, March 24, 1860, is a son of William Buel and Mary Jane (Whitmore) Renwick. Edward A. attended public schools in Grand Rapids, graduating from the high school in 1881. In that year he took charge of his father's factory, continuing until the spring of 1882, when he left this position and came to Chicago.

After being a few months engaged in surveying at Graceland cemetery, he entered the employ of Holabird & Roche, architects, and continued in their employ until 1896, when he entered the firm as a partner, and is thus connected at the present time. He is a member of the Illinois chapter of the Institute of American Architects, the Western Society of Engineers, and also a member of the Union League club. In 1885 he married Harriet Jane Bonney, and has two children—Ralph Bonney and Margaret Genevra.

Otto Rexses, by reason of twenty years' service in the office of the county treasurer, is one of the well-known figures in county politics. He was born November 1, 1866, at Hirschburg, in the province of Silesia, Germany, and when 3 years old was brought by his parents, Edward and Marie (Schmidt) Rexses, to America. The family first settled in New York, but about a year later located in Chicago, and finally, in 1875, moved to Des Plaines, where both parents died. Otto Rexses has practically known no other home except that in Cook county. He was educated in the public schools of Chicago and Des Plaines and when a boy served a two years' apprenticeship to a florist. He then served a clerkship of one year on the Board of Trade and then began his career as an employe in the office of the county treasurer.

The value of his services was recognized by being retained under four different treasurers and being promoted from a subordinate clerkship to assistant chief clerk, then to chief clerk and finally to auditor, in which position he is now officiating. With but few exceptions he is the oldest and is one of the most valued attachés of the office of county treasurer. For many years Mr. Rexses has resided at Des Plaines, where he has served as village trustee. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity and in politics is a Republican. In 1892 he was united in marriage with Miss Emma Peters, and to their union five children have been born—Gerhard, Otto, Dorothy, George and Grace.

Rt. Rev. Paul Rhode, D. D., auxiliary bishop of Chicago and the first bishop of the Polish nationality in America, is a native of West Prussia and was born on September 23, 1870. In 1878 he was brought to Chicago and attended the parochial schools, St. Ignatius college, St. Mary's college of Marion county, Kentucky, and St. Francis seminary of Milwaukee, finishing at the latter institution his theological studies in 1893, being then ordained to the priesthood by Archbishop Katzer, of Milwaukee. Soon after his ordination he became assistant rector of St. Adelbert's congregation at Seventeenth and Paulina streets, continuing thus engaged for two years, when he took charge of Saints Peter and Paul church near the stock yards. Father Rhode with diligence and perseverance organized the parish and built the school, but after one year went to South Chicago, arriving there in 1897.

He took charge of St. Michael's congregation and so well was his administration liked that he has occupied the same position until the present time. He began with about 2,500 communicants, but the number has since been increased under his able management to about 6,000. Under his supervision the convent was constructed, also the rectory. The present church was completed by him in 1909. It is a beautiful structure in Gothic style, seats 1,500 persons and cost about $250,000. It is one of the most beautiful church edifices in the city. On July 27, 1908, Father Rhode was duly and solemnly consecrated auxiliary bishop of Chicago by Archbishop Quigley, assisted by Bishops Muldoon and Koudelka.

John T. Richards is one of the well-known Chicago lawyers who have made the bar of this city famous for its learning and worth. John L. Richards, his father, was born at Dowlas, Wales, in 1816, and by a singular coincidence Margaret Jones, to whom he was married in Allegheny county, Maryland, November 4, 1844, was born twelve years later in the same house, although they never met until after coming to America. Among the valued possessions of John T. Richards is his mother's certificate of baptism, dated November 30, 1828, the marriage certificate of his parents and his father's naturalization papers, bearing the date of July 16, 1862.

His father immigrated to America in 1843, and for a number of years was general superintendent of the Cumberland Iron & Coal company, in Maryland. Being of a devout mind, he took up the study of theology, was ordained a minister of the Congregational church, and served in the ministry until his death.

His son, John T., came to Chicago in 1872 and has here since resided. He received a liberal education and after completing his legal studies was admitted to the bar, and for many years has been recognized as one of the capable lawyers of Chicago. One of the most important cases with which he was connected was that of Crandall vs. Sorg, in which he was defeated before the master in chancery, in the Circuit court and in the Appellate court. The case was carried to the State Supreme court, where the unanimous decision was given in favor of his clients. The vital principle in law established by this decision was that when the owner of land makes a contract with a tenant whereby the construction of a building is required thereon, the land becomes subject to a mechanic's lien for the construction of the building or any improvement, notwithstanding the terms of the lease, which might specify that no mechanic's lien shall attach. Another case argued by Mr. Richards before the Supreme court, which attracted wide attention, was that of Smith vs. Evans, in which the court held that a servant could not serve two masters at the same time without the full knowledge and consent of both employers and recover compensation from both for services rendered; and the court further held that in case one of the employers was a corporation, consent could be given only by the board of directors, or stockholders, at a meeting properly held. In this case Mr. Richards was defeated in the inferior courts, but his contention was sustained in the Supreme court.

Mr. Richards is a member of the American Bar association, the Illinois State Bar association and the Chicago Bar association, of which he was chairman of the grievance committee one year, during which time very effective work was accomplished; he also served as vice-president of the association one year.

In private life he is identified with many of the social and fraternal organizations of the city, among which are the Union League and Hamilton clubs. He has been active in Masonic work and is a member of Dearborn lodge, No. 310, A. F. and A. M.; Wiley Egan chapter, No. 126, R. A. M.; was created a Knight of the Temple of Chicago commandery, No. 19, K. T., but is now a member of Chevalier Bayard commandery, No. 52, K. T., and Oriental consistory, S. P. R. S., and is also a member of Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He is a past commander of Chevalier Bayard commandery, and at the time of the dedication of the Logan monument in Grant park the consistory gave a banquet to Chevalier Bayard commandery, General Logan having been a member of the latter, and on this occasion Mr. Richards was one of the principal speakers.

John D. Riley, the present efficient superintendent of maps, was born December 29, 1870, in Lancashire, England, and is one of eight children, seven now living, born to Richard and Jane (Dobson) Riley. Of these children two are in England, one in Ireland, one in America and three in South Africa. The father died in England, where the mother yet resides. John D. Riley received his early education in his native country and when 17 years old came to America with a distant relative, R. W. Dobson, who had previously, when a resident here, platted and surveyed the town of South Chicago. For one year he served his uncle gratuitously as a surveyor and civil engineer, then until 1889 he was a draftsman in the employ of the town of Lake.

Upon the consolidation of the town of Lake with the city of Chicago, Mr. Riley's services were retained by Chicago, and thus he has continued to the present time. After serving several years as draftsman in the map department he successively served in a similar capacity in the department of sewers and in the office of the water assessor, then was draftsman in the specially organized department known as the special water pipe extension division, then as draftsman in the bridge division. Having passed the most successful civil service examination, he was appointed chief draftsman in the water pipe extension of the Bureau of Engineering in 1904, and in 1905 was promoted to the office of chief engineer of water pipe extension. He filled the requirements of this position until January 1, 1906, when he was made superintendent of the Bureau of Maps, which office he now holds under the civil service law.

Upon assuming charge of this bureau, Mr. Riley discovered a chaotic condition of affairs, the work in more than one division being several years in arrears, the force disorganized and many of them incompetent. With commendable energy he instituted immediate reforms, reorganized the bureau, reduced the force to better paid and thoroughly competent employes, and in two years has not only succeeded in wiping out all arrearages, but has increased the volume and character of the business over 20 per cent. Mr. Riley's chief accomplishment has been the working out of the new system of house numbers which is to take the place of the wretched house numbering conditions which have for so long been a reproach to the city of Chicago. The ordinance embodying this system goes into effect September 1, 1909, and for residents and strangers alike undoubtedly will make Chicago one of the easiest cities in the world in which to find one's way. The foregoing record is ample evidence that Mr. Riley is a specialist far above the average. He is an Odd Fellow and a member of the Masonic fraternity.

His marriage to Miss Elizabeth Loughman took place in 1895, their union resulting in two daughters, Leone and Edith, who are now receiving their early education in the public schools.

Martin Roche, of the firm of Holabird & Roche, was born at Cleveland, Ohio, on August 15, 1855, and is a son of Peter and Marguerite (Nolan) Roche, both parents being natives of the Emerald Isle. The father was a carpenter contractor and with his wife came to America in 1849 and to Chicago in 1857. On May 5, 1860, he was killed at New Orleans, Louisiana. The mother died in Chicago on February 28, 1884. Martin was educated in the public and high schools of Chicago. From 1871 to September, 1880, he worked in the office of W. L. B. Jenney, architect, but at the latter date became a member of the firm of Holabird & Roche, with which he has ever since been connected as junior partner. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the prominence of this well-known architectural firm.

Clifford G. Roe was born at Rolling Prairie, Ind., on June 26, 1875, his father being George W. Roe and his mother, before her marriage, Marietta Drummond, both of whom were natives of Indiana and of mixed Scotch, English, Welsh and Irish descent. The parents came to Chicago in 1878, where the father engaged in the real estate business. The father was a Republican, a useful and upright citizen, and passed away in 1900. The mother died eight years later.

The subject of this review was brought to Chicago by his parents at the age of 3 years. He was educated in the public schools here and afterward took two degrees at the University of Michigan. He is a natural orator, which fact was recognized in his high school and university career. In early manhood, feeling himself qualified as a public speaker, he made up his mind to become either a clergyman or a lawyer. His skill in debate at college finally caused him to choose the profession of law. He came to Chicago and began the practice. After a short time he went West, but after a few months of travel on the Pacific coast concluded to return, and entered the office of Schuyler F. Lynn, whose partner he became in a short time. He was very soon overwhelmed with business. From the very start he was compelled to combat the best and most skillful trial lawyers of the city. He was thus put upon his mettle and his best qualities showed like sparks from a flint. With a thoroughly trained mind, broad education, great powers of analysis and attractive measures of presentation, his arguments and oratory attracted general attention and soon won fame and prosperity for him. He secured the attention of Judge Olson and Mr. Healy, and in December, 1906, was made an assistant in the State attorney's office and was assigned to the Harrison street station.

There he was brought to a realization of what the white slave traffic meant. As public prosecutor he began a relentless and unceasing war upon this growing evil and is thus engaged at the present time. His brilliant and effective work in this field has secured recognition from all the better element of Cook county. It would be difficult to overestimate the value of his services in this regard. Aside from his legal duties he has found time to cultivate the social amenities of life. He is a member of the City club and takes an active part in the various political and public reforms as they arise. He has tried his skill and qualities as a writer of stories and other literary productions. He has also contributed articles on legal and municipal affairs to the magazines and newspapers. His writings showed broad learning, profound insight into social life and human conditions, brilliant phraseology and great artistic merit. He lives at 5700 Drexel avenue, is a Republican and a member of the Disciples of Christ church. He is also a Mason and a member of the Delta Upsilon fraternity and a member of the City and Quadrangle clubs.

Rev. Stanislaus Rogalski, rector of St. John Cantius' church, Carpenter and Front streets, was born in Bramber, Prussian Poland, April 19, 1871, a son of Joseph and Catharine (Domak) Rogalski, who immigrated to America in 1880, settling in Chicago, where they have since lived. Of their children, five grew to maturity—Mary (wife of Ignatius Karwata), John, Stanislaus, Joseph and Catharine.

Father Rogalski obtained his elementary education in St. Stanislaus' parochial school, Chicago; his classical education at St. Jerome college, Berlin, Canada, where he was graduated in 1890; and his theological education in the Gregorian university at Rome, where he was ordained to the priesthood in 1895. For the five years thereafter he was a teacher in St. Jerome college, Berlin, Canada.

In 1900 he was appointed assistant rector of St. John Cantius' church, Chicago, serving in that capacity two years, and in 1902 he was appointed rector of the parish. The membership of his church exceeds 15,000 souls, the school has 1,500 pupils, taught by twenty-one to twenty-eight sisters of Notre Dame who are connected with the parish. Under Father Rogalski's administration a fine school building has been erected, at a cost of $110,000; a library of 500 volumes has been fitted up in the basement of the church; thirty-seven religious societies are connected with the church, most of them making financial provision for sickness, death and family benefits; a dramatic circle of fifty-four artists has been organized to give benefits for the church; and there is a sewing society of nearly fifty young girls, organized to learn fine sewing and needlework under the instruction of sisters of Notre Dame. The church is an adjunct of the Resurrectionist Fathers. In the arduous and diversified work of the parish Father Rogalski has five able and zealous assistants.

Stanislaw J. Rokosz, proprietor of the Wawel hotel at 732-734 Milwaukee avenue, is a native of the city of Wyszyniec, Russian Poland, state of Gubernia Suwalki, and was born on May 8, 1859. He is the son of Julian and Frances (Olechnowich) Rokosz, and was reared in his native city until the age of 14 years, receiving there his primary education. At that age he ran away from school and home and went to England, where he remained for five years, but in 1878 came to America, landing in New York city, where he remained for two years. While there he was employed in a sugar refinery. He then came West to Manistee, Michigan, and secured employment in a lumber mill, where he remained for four years. In 1884 he came to Chicago and was employed in various capacities for some time. He was water inspector under Mayor Washburn for two years prior to 1891.

He then embarked in the newspaper business and was publisher of the Weekly Reformer, a Polish paper, for a period of two years. In 1893 he founded the Lithuanian newspaper called Lietuva, which he conducted ably and successfully for one and a half years, when he sold out, although the paper is still in existence. Succeeding the sale he embarked in the retail liquor business on the North Side and was thus engaged for eleven years. In June, 1907, he became the proprietor of the Wawel hotel, which he has since successfully conducted. On July 24, 1880, he married Mary, daughter of Jacob and Mary (Gackkowszka) Muszynski, of Manistee, Michigan, and has one daughter, Sophia, now the wife of Joseph Sobol, of

HORSE RAILWAY LINES 1865

Chicago. Mr. Rokosz is a member of the Holy Trinity Polish Catholic church, the Polish National Alliance, of which he was president for four years, National Union of America and Waubansia lodge, No. 160, A. F. and A. M. He is a stockholder and director in the Standard Casket & Coffin Manufacturing company of this city, of which organization he was president for two years. He owns two farms of 160 acres each in Holt county, Nebraska. He is not an aspirant for office but is prominently mentioned in connection with several important positions. In politics he is a Democrat. During his administration as president of the Polish National Alliance he was a member of the committee of the Kosciusko Monument association. It was largely due to his efforts that the monument was completed in 1905 at a total cost of $28,000 and stands today in Humboldt park, Chicago.

Edward George Ryan. No sketch of the "Early Chicago Bar" would be complete without notice of the gifted, learned and erratic Edward George Ryan, although he was only for, comparatively, a few years a resident here. He was born in Ireland in 1810, graduated from Dublin university with high honors, and afterward took a course at one of the law schools in Paris, and came to Chicago in the fall of 1836, and soon made himself felt in the profession. Probably no lawyer of his age ever came to Chicago who was so well qualified by his education for his chosen profession. He was an accomplished scholar, both in legal lore and general and historic literature; was an interesting and impressive speaker, with power to excite at will the sympathies or passions of his hearers. He could be argumentative, witty, sarcastic, ironic and pathetic as occasion demanded. He had an extraordinary memory and could draw, when needed, upon his whole course of reading and study. In the course of his study in Paris he had obtained access to "The Jesuit Relations," giving a full account of the early Jesuit missions in North America, and when started upon the subject he would talk by the hour, describing the hardships, self-devotion and suffering of those old missionaries, since so graphically described by Parkman and other historians. He soon formed a partnership with Henry Moore, then a lawyer and in practice there, and afterward became a partner with Hugh T. Dickey, then a rising lawyer. But neither of these relations lasted long. In the spring of 1840 he tired for a time of the law and started a newspaper which he called the Chicago Tribune, being the first to appropriate the name "Tribune" for a newspaper. This he conducted about a year, and into it he infused all the vigor, learning, impetuosity and crankiness of his intense personality, and in doing this he provoked quarrels which culminated several times in street fights. One of the most notable of these was his attempt to cowhide William Stuart, at that time editor of the Chicago American. As soon as the assault was made Stuart grappled with him, throwing him upon his back, and deliberately sat down upon him. An engraver of the city, who had some sense of humor, brought out a cartoon of the fight, in which he showed Ryan prostrate in the gutter, with Stuart sitting calmly on his chest, and Ryan with both hands grasping Stuart's collar and exclaiming, "Apologize and I'll let you up!" After about one year he abandoned the publication of the Tribune and resumed the practice of the law; but a short time later he left Chicago and went to Racine, Wisconsin, where he remained two years, and then went to Milwaukee, where he spent the remainder of his life.

Hon. Adolph J. Sabath, a native of Bohemia, is deserving of much credit for the prominence he has attained under adverse circumstances. He was born April 4, 1866, a son of Joachim and Barbara (Eisenschmel) Sabath. Until the age of 14 years he resided in his native country, receiving a liberal education in the public schools and from private instructors. The deplorable conditions existing then in Bohemia, and the opportunity for advancement being being of so limited scope, determined him to seek his fortune in America, and accordingly he immigrated in 1880.

Coming direct to Chicago, he first found employment as a general utility boy in a shoe store at the corner of Eighteenth and Halsted streets at $3.50 per week. He remained with this firm six years, and without having made the request, his wages were advanced from time to time until he was receiving $25 per week, and his occupation was changed to bookkeeper, then to buyer, and finally to the general management of the business. During this time, as opportunity afforded, he increased his knowledge of the English language and American history and customs by attending night school and pursuing a private course of study. In 1887 he became a partner in the firm of Kraus & Leaderer, dealers in paints, oils, wall paper, etc., and thus continued until 1889, when, owing to failing health, he disposed of his interest. Upon his recovery he took a one year's course in Bryant & Stratton's Business college, and, under the firm name of Sabath & Schlessinger, embarked in the real estate business, and also entered the Chicago College of Law. After the dissolution of the firm in 1891 Mr. Sabath continued handling real estate until 1895, and, having graduated from the Chicago College of Law in 1891, began the practice of that profession in 1892, at which he has since continued.

Upon the recommendation of the Cook county judges he was appointed justice of the peace by Governor Altgeld in 1895, and two years later became a police magistrate, serving as such until the inauguration of the Municipal court system. In 1906 he was nominated for judge of the Municipal court for the six-year term, but declined the nomination and was then nominated and elected to Congress for the Fifth Congressional district. In 1908, under the new Primary law, he was nominated for this position, and reelected by a majority of 3,177.

Such, in brief, is the career of a man who came from a foreign land to America when 14 years old and who has lived in the country of his adoption but 28 years. But there is another praiseworthy action of Congressman Sabath not generally known to the public, one which reflects the highest credit upon his filial devotion. In order to separate his relations from their deplorable environments in Bohemia, and with the money saved by self-denial from his meager salary as a boy, he brought to this country his parents and five brothers and five sisters and put them in the way of becoming self-sustaining. Mr. Sabath is a Democrat, a member of the Iroquois club, Jefferson club, and a member of the Masonic, Royal League, Modern Woodmen, Knights of Pythias and other benevolent and fraternal organizations.

H. L. Sayler (Harry Lincoln Sayler), newspaper man and manager, for many years, of the City Press association of Chicago, was born February 13, 1863, in Little York, a suburb of Dayton, Ohio. He attended the public schools of Shelbyville, Indiana, to which town his family removed, and then went to old Asbury college (now known as De Pauw university), at Greencastle, Indiana. In 1885, the last year of his college course, he edited and had charge of the college literary magazine, the De Pauw Monthly. He married Miss June Elliott, in Shelbyville, Indiana, October 9, 1889. Their children are John Elliott and Margaret. Before leaving college he served as correspondent for various Western newspapers, and in 1886 became the active representative in Indianapolis of the Charleston News and Courier and the St. Louis Republic.

In the winter of 1888 he came to Chicago and entered at once into the service of Wright & Russell, of the original City Press association. In 1890 he became assistant manager of that concern and a year later, the original managers withdrawing, he came into control of the association with A. S. Leckie. A few months later, on the organization of the present City Press association, he and his associates sold out to the newspapers of Chicago and became active managers of the new news association. After eleven years of joint management Mr. Leckie withdrew in 1901, leaving Mr. Sayler in sole charge. In December, 1908, he completed twenty years of service for the Chicago newspapers as manager of their local news service. In politics he is Democratic. He is a complimentary corresponding member of the Chicago Historical association, elected by that body; a member of the Illinois Historical society, the Louisiana State Historical association and the National Historical society. He has taken much interest in historical research, is a frequent contributor to historical magazines and the author of several fugitive and juvenile publications. In club life he was one of the founders of the William Morris club, devoted to widening the influence of that artist and craftsman, and also an organizer of the old Bryn Mawr Golf club, one of the first clubs of the kind established in Chicago. He belongs to the Chicago Yacht club, the South Shore club, and was one of the original founders of the Dofobs or Booklovers' club. His office is at 138 Jackson boulevard and his residence at 7125 Euclid avenue.

Conrad Schanze was among those who early settled on the West Side of Chicago and who became an integral part in its growth and development. He was born December 10, 1831, near Hesse Cassel, Germany, and in the fall of 1853 immigrated to the United States. After a short stay in New York he moved to Boston, where in 1854 he married Louisa Bode.

Having learned the shoemaker's trade in his native country, he followed that occupation the greater part of his life. In 1855 he came to Chicago and opened a shoe shop at the northeast corner of Center avenue and Polk street. In 1856 he built a house at the corner of Sebor and Desplaines streets. This lot cost him $180, of which he paid $100 cash. He sold this property at an advance the same year and at once erected a two-story cottage on Gurley street, 100 feet west of Blue Island avenue. This lot he traded with Thomas Morrison for lot No. 46 on Blue Island avenue, each party interested moving his old house to the new lot thus acquired. Here Mr. Schanze opened a custom shoe store, but owing to the scarcity of money and his doubts as to the value of such currency as was then in circulation, he accepted orders on the various lumbermen in the neighborhood, many of his customers being their employes. These orders he exchanged for lumber, and, having bought a lot at 48 Blue Island avenue, he erected, in 1859, a two-story house sixty feet long, employing for that purpose two master carpenters during the winter months at $1.25 per day each. He repeated this process in 1861 on property he had acquired at 46 Blue Island avenue, and in the rear of this lot moved his shoe establishment.

In 1865 he sold his shoe business and after a few months' visit to his old home in Germany, returned to Chicago and in 1866, from material procured from one of the buildings of Camp Douglas, erected a farmers' tavern for stock men on Halsted south of Forty-third street. This he conducted until February, 1867, when it was destroyed by fire. He then returned to No. 46 Blue Island avenue and again embarked in the shoe business. Owing to failing sight he turned the business over to his son in 1881, and after partially recovering his sight through an operation on one eye, and having accumulated considerable means, he lived a quiet, retired life until his death, August 22, 1903, preceded by his wife in 1896. His life was uneventful aside from an active business career, being similar to that of many of those who, coming from a foreign land, were compelled to labor long and severely in order to provide home and sustenance for loved ones. Their only child, Henry Schanze, was born March 26, 1855, and has always made Chicago his home. April 30, 1879, he married Sophia C. Maedl, by whom he is the father of one son, Harry.

Walter E. Schmidt, a member of the Board of Assessors of Cook county, is typically a Chicagoan in enterprise and thoroughgoing aggressiveness, although not a native of this city. He was born at Winona, Minn., May 18, 1868, and is one of five children, all living, born to H. G. C. and Edna (Kuust) Schmidt, both of whom were natives of Germany. The father followed the immigration of the family to America about the year 1850 and for many years resided at Winona, Minn., where he was engaged in real estate and serving as secretary to the German consul. In 1897 he moved to Chicago, where he now lives.

Walter E. Schmidt was educated in the public schools of his native city, the Minnesota State Normal School and Lambert's Business College. He was associated with his father in the real estate business and for two years was employed in the Merchants' bank at Winona. In 1891 he came to Chicago and for two years was cashier for Frey & Schlund, real estate, insurance and foreign exchange agents. For several years he was engaged in the real estate business in South Chicago, but in 1903 was appointed assistant county treasurer by John J. Hanberg. For four years he capably filled this position, acquiring a business training and knowledge of county affairs under the wise direction of Mr. Hanberg that, of itself, was equal to a business course at college.

Prior to this time Mr. Schmidt had been actively identified in Republican politics, and during the years 1900, 1901 and 1902 was collector of the port of South Chicago, serving under appointment of William Penn Nixon. Since 1895 he has been secretary of the Eighth ward (formerly the Twenty-third ward) Republican club, a location more generally known as South Chicago. In 1906 he was elected a member of the Board of Assessors of Cook county, which office he is now filling. On March 1, 1907, he became secretary of the Illinois Improvement and Ballast company, general contractors, which is his present private business; is also secretary of the Calumet Publishing company, Daily Calumet. Mr. Schmidt is a member of the Masonic fraternity, is Past Worshipful Master of Triluminar Lodge No. 767, is a Thirty-second degree member of Oriental Consistory, and a member of Medinah Temple A. A. O. N. M. S. He is also a member of the Royal League, Royal Arcanum, the Woodlawn club, the Illinois Athletic club and the Hamilton club. November 26, 1895, he wedded Miss Nellie, daughter of Henry W. Starr, of Rome, N. Y., by whom he is the father of one son, Walter E. S.

William H. Schott was born at Mendota, Illinois, on September 16, 1867, and is the son of Henry J. and Anna (Turner) Schott. The father was a successful merchant and served with credit throughout the entire Civil war, and died finally in 1872 from wounds received in the bloody battle of Chickamauga. William H. was educated in the public schools and in 1884 entered the employ of the Thompson-Houston Electric company in the capacity of engineer, at Bloomington, Illinois. After four years of service, having become an expert in the business, he was transferred to Lynn, Massachusetts, where he remained for two years. A little later he accepted a position as an expert with the Western Electric company, but in 1894 went into an independent business in general electric construction and contracting engineering, with offices in the Monadnock building, and in May, 1907, removed to suite 1108, 125 Monroe street, his present location. He was the first tenant in the building.

Aside from his ordinary duties he has become an inventor of practical appliances in his line of business. He is the designer and builder of what is known as "The Schott Central Station Heating Method." This system is adapted for the heating of whole towns and cities, and at the present date is in successful operation in over thirty towns and cities of the United States. The apparatus is designed and built for both steam and water systems. In addition to all this, Mr. Schott is actively engaged in the construction of electric light and power plants both of gas and water and in hydro-electric developments. His operations have been extended to all parts of the United States. At this date he is president of the Schott Engineering company, the successor of W. H. Schott. This company operates in all public utility lines. He is president of the Schott Specialty company and president of the Weiderholt Construction company. His business operations have become wide and profitable. Among other concerns in which he is interested are the Citizens' Heating company of Terre Haute, the Mount Carmel Gas & Electric company, and the Mount Carmel Water & Light company. The latter two are located at Mount Carmel, Illinois. He is likewise connected with the Citizens' Gas & Electric company of Mount Vernon, Illinois. In all his business operations he has shown great activity and capacity for intricate work.

He is a member of the Chicago Athletic club, South Shore club, Missouri Athletic club of St. Louis, and the Columbia club of Indianapolis. He is a Mason—a member of the Kenwood lodge, No. 800, Fairview Chapter, and Montjoie commandery. On October 12, 1892, he married Dora Landstaff, of Indianapolis, and they reside at 6200 Monroe avenue.

Frank P. Schmitt, lawyer and State senator from the Thirty-first Senatorial district, has achieved more than the average degree of success in his profession, and as a legislator is recognized as one of the most useful and practical men in the upper house of the General Assembly. Born at Louisville, Kentucky, August 4, 1862, Mr. Schmitt is a son of Frank P. and Mary F. (Shelton) Schmitt, who were of German and American nativity, respectively. In 1880 the family moved to Chicago, which has continued to be their place of residence ever since.

After attending Adams academy, Harvard university and the Albany Law school, Mr. Schmitt, in 1885, was admitted to the bar of Illinois and immediately thereafter began the practice of his profession in Chicago. While he has had a very wide experience as a lawyer, he is best known by his skill in the conduct of chancery and real estate cases. In 1904 he was appointed master in chancery of the Superior court and has served in that capacity by reappointment.

For fifteen years Mr. Schmitt has been a resident of the First precinct of the Twenty-fifth ward, and, being of the belief that every citizen should take an active interest in local as well as State and national politics, has acted accordingly. For the past eight years he has been the president of his precinct and for two years has been president of the Twenty-fifth Ward Republican club. In 1906 he was elected to the State Senate and became closely identified with much of the beneficial legislation which has since been enacted. His skill as a lawyer and his ability as an advocate mark him as one of the leaders of the Senate, both in committee room and upon the floor. He introduced and secured the passage of the measure known as the standard policy bill, which provides what must and what must not be contained in all life insurance policies written in Illinois. He also introduced and secured the passage of the two bills which require the State's attorney of Cook county to turn over all the fees of his office to the county treasurer. He took a leading part also in all legislation which has to do with the deep waterway project, and was active in support of the direct Primary law. Senator Schmitt is a member of the Chicago Bar association, of the Illinois State Bar association, the Marquette club, the City club and the Edgewater Golf club. Soon after his admission to the bar he was married to Theodosia Murray, and has one daughter—Olga.

W. Schrojda, a member of the Board of Cook County Commissioners, was born March 31, 1872, in a small village near Bromberg, province of Posen, in that part of Poland under the rule of the German Empire, and is one of nine children, four now living, born to Matthew and Rose (Mosinski) Schrojda. He received his early education in the public schools of German Poland, but when 15 years old, owing to financial reverses to his father, he immigrated to America for the purpose of making a home and fortune. Locating in Chicago early in 1887, he was, for a time, employed in the factories as a woodworker. During this period he applied himself assiduously to perfecting his knowledge of the English language and attending night schools.

His first wages were $3.50 per week, which subsequently were advanced to $7.50. The winter of 1889 he was employed in the lumber camps at Menominee, Michigan, but from the ensuing spring until 1895 he worked in a furniture factory in Chicago and attended night schools. In April, 1895, he served as deputy assessor of the West town, continuing this until the following July 15, and the succeeding two years he was a guard in the county jail. During this time he attended Nisson's Business college, and this schooling was supplemented with a course at John Marshall Law school. For eighteen months he served as bailiff, then served as chancery record writer in the office of the Superior court clerk until 1904, and for the succeeding year was judgment clerk in the abstract department of the office of the county recorder.

Having espoused the cause of the Republican party, he was nominated and elected county commissioner in 1906, and in 1908 was renominated for the office at the August primaries and reelected the ensuing November. Aside from the foregoing activities, Mr. Schrojda embarked in the insurance business and is successfully conducting that line of work. He is president of the Polish Republican league of Cook county, is also president of a Polish Republican club on the West Side whose membership is limited to 100, is a member of the Knights of Columbus, of the Royal Arcanum and of the Modern Woodmen of America. February 26, 1891, he was united in marriage with Miss Rose Harmacinski, and with his wife and daughter, Helen, resides at 678 Dickson street.

John C. Schubert has been prominently identified with county and city politics for the past twenty years, and as a matter of justice it is not too much to say that he has been throughout a faithful and capable official. He was born in what is now the First ward of this city of Chicago, March 26, 1857, a son of Andrew and Eva (Englehart) Schubert, who were natives of Germany. The parents left Bavaria for America in 1851 and came direct to Chicago, where the father followed the occupation of builder until his death in 1902.

The boyhood days of John C. Schubert were passed in a similar manner to that of the average Chicago boy, his education having been acquired in private schools, and his occupation, until 19 years old, having been any honest employment he could find to do. In 1876 he engaged in mercantile pursuits, at which he continued until 1892. Prior to the latter date he had interested himself in local politics, and as a Democrat was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners in 1888, and reelected as such upon the expiration of his term, serving two full terms. In 1890 he was honored by the nomination and election to the office of clerk of the Criminal court of Cook county, served as such four years, was renominated for the office in 1894, but was defeated for election with the rest of his ticket. In 1896 he was elected a delegate to the National Democratic convention from the First Congressional district of Illinois. By appointment of Mayor Harrison in 1897 he was appointed chief smoke inspector, a position he retained with credit and honor for ten years. By direction of Mayor Busse, in 1907, he was transferred to the position he now occupies, which is that of chief clerk of the collection division of the bureau of water. In 1900 he was chosen elector at large from the State of Illinois by the National Democratic convention that nominated William Jennings Bryan for the presidency. Mr. Schubert is identified with a number of social and benevolent organizations and has had the distinguished honor of being elected high chief ranger of the Catholic Order of Foresters. He was happily married April 19, 1892, to Miss Mary E. Brennan and resides at 1821 Indiana avenue.

Paul Schulze, president of the Schulze Baking company, was born in the province of Hanover, Germany, June 13, 1864. His father was Gustav Schulze, a civil engineer of prominence, who planned and superintended the construction of several railways in Germany and Russia. His mother was Henrietta (Roeper) Schulze. Young Paul spent his boyhood in his native city. There he secured his education in the high school, and at the age of 16 he entered upon a business career. He came to this country when 19 years old and located at Big Stone City, South Dakota. He here lived four years, and for a few months he worked on a farm and clerked in a general merchandise store, starting at $10 per month, and attended school during the winter. His next step was the acceptance of a position with a wholesale hardware house in Minneapolis. He continued with this house for seven months, when, finding the chances for advancement unsatisfactory, he secured a position with a St. Paul wholesale flour house, where he remained three years.

In 1890 he came to Chicago to make it his permanent home, and in 1891 started the Englewood Flour company to push the sale of the Washburn-Crosby company's flour. This undertaking was a success from the start and because of the rapid increase of business it was found necessary, in 1896, to remove the main office to the Garden City block. The firm's name was also changed to Paul Schulze & Company. In the organization of the Schulze Baking company in 1893, Mr. Schulze took a prominent part and was elected president. This institution is too well known to need description. It was under the management of his two brothers, William and Emil Schulze, until 1903, when he severed his connection with the Paul Schulze company to take the active management. Under his guidance, within the last four years, three large new bakeries were built in order to take care of the increasing trade. The four plants of the company are now located at Sixty-third street and Stewart avenue, Webster and Clybourn avenues, Harrison street and Francisco avenue, and Thirty-sixth and La Salle street, respectively, with general offices at 185 Dearborn street. In social and religious circles Mr. Schulze is liked and respected. He is a Lutheran.

Politically Mr. Schulze is a Republican, and takes a lively and intelligent interest in public affairs. He is a member of the Union League, Germania and Beverly Country clubs, the Art Institute, Association of Commerce, the Manufacturers' association and the Advertising association. On May 24, 1892, Mr. Schulze was married to Miss Ida Johl, of Faribault, Minnesota, and they have four children—Walter, Paul, Jr., Helen and Victor. The family residence is on Melrose avenue, near Sheridan road, Kenilworth.

Daniel J. Schuyler was born near the town of Amsterdam, New York, on February 16, 1839, and is the son of John Jacob and Sallie A. (Davis) Schuyler. The Schuylers of whom the subject of this sketch is a descendant came early to the colony of New York from Holland in 1647, and descendants have spread throughout the United States and become distinguished in private and public affairs.

The first of the name who came to America was Philip Pieterse Van Schuyler, who came from Holland over two centuries and a half ago and settled where the city of Albany, New York, now stands. The Schuylers later became prominently connected with all colony affairs and distinguished themselves in the Revolutionary army when the separation between the colonies and Great Britain took place.

The subject of this review belongs to a branch of the family that settled in New Jersey just before the Revolution and there became prominent. He was born on the farm which had been selected by his grandfather, and his education was obtained in the common schools near his home. In early boyhood he displayed high qualities which have since distinguished him in his career as a lawyer. He delighted in literature, and his early essays and poems were often published in the village newspaper. While yet a youth he displayed unusual oratorical qualities and his address on the subject of John Brown's crusade, after the death of that martyr, was a notable affair in the community where he resided. Endowed with a vigorous mind, strong imagination, rare powers of language and brilliant and persuasive speech, he eagerly sought every source of information that would widen his knowledge and uphold his ideals. At the age of 17 years he commenced and completed a six months' course of study in an academy at Princeton, New York. Later he resumed his studies there, succeeding which he transferred his studies to Franklin, Delaware county. He then entered Union college, Schenectady, and remained until 1861. Possessing the temperament and the quality of mind required by an eminent lawyer, he began the study of law about this time in the office of Francis Kernan, of Utica, one of the most sagacious and able lawyers of the East. Under his able directions and tutelage he continued his studies until January, 1864, when he was admitted to the bar.

He came West and located in Chicago, and here he has practiced with much success ever since. When he first came the practice in Chicago was difficult because it was in the possession and control of a retinue of distinguished lawyers who had made the Western city famous in law as it was in most everything else, but he came to Chicago and soon clients began to gather around him. As time passed his practice expanded and the character of the cases became more complicated, technical and exacting. As in everything else he has undertaken, he successfully mastered every obstacle and in the end not only became the equal of any lawyer in this city, but surpassed the most of them.

He practiced alone for several years, but in 1872 formed a partnership with George Gardiner, continuing thus associated until 1879, when the latter was elected judge of the Superior court, after which Mr. Schuyler entered into partnership with C. E. Kremer under the style of Schuyler & Kremer, and thus remained until 1900, when it was changed to Schuyler, Jamieson & Ettelson. The partnership is one of the strongest in the city, having a large practice and the confidence of the public and the bar. Mr. Schuyler is regarded as one of the ablest trial lawyers of Illinois; he probably has not a superior in the West in commercial, corporation and fire insurance practice.

In 1865 he was united in marriage to Mary J. Byford, the second daughter of Dr. William H. Byford, an eminent physician of Chicago, and to this union four children have been born, two of whom are living. Mr. Schuyler has found time amid the exactions and duties of his legal practice to cultivate the artistic and social side of life. He is a member of the Holland society, which he helped to organize, and has occupied therein one or more official positions. He has shown a deep interest in the public welfare of the city, state and country, and as a Republican takes an active interest in the broad party measures so vital to the safety of the country and to the welfare of the public. In 1902 he was nominated for Circuit court judge on the Republican ticket, but before election the Supreme court having declared the law under which he was nominated to be unconstitutional, his nomination became void. He is a member of the Hamilton club and resides at 3427 Vernon avenue.

Henry M. Seligman, chief assistant prosecuting attorney for Chicago, is of German and Bohemian ancestry and was born in this city December 8, 1872. Until 9 years old he attended the public schools, and from that time until the age of 14 years was reared by the Jewish Orphan Asylum at Cleveland, Ohio, where he attended public school and one term at high school.

Left without the guiding hand of a father when yet a child, his mother supplied the place of both parents, and to her loving care and wise counsel his successes in later years are largely attributable. His life has had its numerous adversities, filled with self-denials, but, as in the case of many others, has but served as a greater incentive to push forward. In 1887 he returned to Chicago and became office boy for the law firm of Kraus, Mayer & Stein, continuing with it and its successors until the beginning of 1895.

During this time he resumed his high school studies, and in 1891 began reading law and attending the Chicago College of Law at night time. In 1893 he was graduated from the Chicago College of Law, following which he took a post graduate course, which he completed in 1894 with the degree of LL.B. Since 1895 he has been engaged in the active practice of his profession, at which he has won deserved success. He has been employed by Cook county and by the attorney general of Illinois in special litigation, and in 1907 was appointed assistant prosecuting attorney of Chicago. After serving two months in the last named position he was appointed chief assistant attorney of the office, in which capacity he has since continued to serve.

When but twenty-one years old Mr. Seligman was elected president of the Alumni association of the Chicago College of Law, and at the time of his graduation from that institution was the historian of his class. He is a member of the B'nai Brith, Kilwinning lodge, No. 311, A. F. and A. M., the Marquette club and the Royal League. In June, 1901, Miss Phenie Lichtenstein became his wife, and to them has been born one daughter—Gertrude.

Nicholas Senn, M. D., LL.D., was a native of St. Gallen, Switzerland, where he was born October 31, 1844. When 8 years old his family came to the United States and settled in Washington county, Wisconsin, where Nicholas received his primary education, finishing at an academy in Fond du Lac. Succeeding his studies, he taught for several years, but in 1864 began studying medicine in the office of Dr. E. Munk, of Fond du Lac. In 1866 he entered the Chicago Medical college and in due time graduated therefrom in 1868 and received an internship of eighteen months at the Cook County hospital.

Determined to extend his medical knowledge to the utmost, Dr. Senn went abroad in 1878 and there pursued his studies in the best schools in Europe for a considerable length of time. Upon his return he was given the chair of the principles of surgery and surgical pathology in Rush Medical college. In 1884-87 he served as professor of surgery in the College of Physicians and Surgeons and for the succeeding three years held the chair of the principles of surgery. In 1890 he was elected professor of practical and clinical surgery in the same institution. He was professional lecturer on military surgery and professor of surgery at the Chicago Polyclinic. He was attending surgeon at the Presbyterian hospital and surgeon-in-chief at the St. Joseph hospital, with which latter institution he was identified for eighteen years. There he performed the greater share of his remarkable private work.

It is not too much to say that Dr. Senn was the foremost surgeon of the United States and one of the foremost of the world. In time he became an extensive author on surgical subjects. More than twenty important articles on all the various branches of surgery were written by him for publication. He died suddenly in January, 1908, after an extremely busy, momentous and valuable life. He left a widow and two children.

John Charles Shaffer was born at Baltimore on June 5, 1853, and is the son of James and Ann Shaffer. He was educated in the public schools of Baltimore. On December 23, 1878, at Baltimore, he married Virginia Conser, and by her has two children—Carroll and Kent.

When he was 17 years old John C. became a telegraph operator in Baltimore, and at the age of 21 was clerk in the Board of Trade, Chicago, with the firm of J. B. Hobbs & Co. At the age of 25 he started the business of J. C. Shaffer Company, commission merchants on the Board of Trade, and conducted the business successfully until November, 1888, when, having purchased the Street Railway company of Richmond, Indiana, he moved there and as president operated that railway. He had previously sold out his business on the Board of Trade. In April, 1889, he formed a syndicate which purchased the street railways of Indianapolis. Of this company he also became president and managed its affairs at Indianapolis. In 1892 he bought the street railways of Asbury Park, New Jersey, and of that company was likewise president. In 1893 he sold his Richmond and Indianapolis roads and, returning to Chicago, built the Chicago & Englewood Electric railway.

About this time he also built and operated, at Cleveland, a grain elevator with capacity of one million bushels. At this date he is president of the Cleveland Elevator Company. He organized the Cleveland Grain Company and became chairman of the board of management. In 1901 he bought and has since conducted the Chicago Evening Post. About this date also he organized a company which purchased the Frank Parmelee Transfer Company, of which concern he is president. In 1904 he bought the South Chicago elevators, D, C and C annex, with storage capacity of 4,500,000 bushels. In 1904 he organized the firm of J. C. Shaffer & Co., dealers exclusively in cash grain. Recently he bought the Star League of newspapers, of Indiana, comprising the Indianapolis Star, the Terre Haute Star, the Muncie Star, all morning papers, the only morning issues in the three cities. In 1908 he built the electric street railroad of Vicksburg, Mississippi, and was president of that organization for four or five years, when he sold out to New Orleans capitalists. It will be thus seen that his life has been extremely active and successful. He is a Republican and a member of the Chicago, Union League, Chicago Athletic, Caxton, Glenview, Twentieth Century, Mid-day, Automobile, City, Press, South Shore, University and Country clubs of Evanston. He is also a member of the Lotus club of New York.

John G. Shedd is a fitting representative of that class of American citizens who, by indomitable perseverance, have hewed success out of the great forest of human endeavor. Although a native of New England, his career is typical of the great West, where man is solely judged by his own merit and not by his ancestry or his social connection. His success as a business man has not been brought about by any one or any two great efforts, but rather by a steady climb and the mastering of small details.

Born on a farm in New Hampshire, he received his early education in the district schools, and when 16 years old began his mercantile career as a clerk in the grocery store of Solomon Sanders, at Bellows Falls, Vt. The call of the great West was so attractive to the young man that he came to Chicago during the summer of 1872 and secured employment as salesman for the firm of Field, Leiter & Co. Step by step he worked his way up through the different departments, often under discouraging conditions, mastering the difficulties as they appeared, conquering obstacles that often proved too great for another, but ever progressing, slowly as it sometimes seemed to the young man, gaining strength and confidence with each successful battle and winning the confidence and esteem of his superiors. So pronounced was his success that Marshall Field, the great prince of all merchants, said he was "the best merchant in the United States." Upon the death of Mr. Field, Mr. Shedd, his logical successor, became the head of the great establishment, and many of the modern methods of conducting this and similar business concerns have been inaugurated by him.

There is also a John G. Shedd other than the business man: A man connected with many of the leading clubs and delighting to associate on terms of sociability with his fellow man; a man of studious habits, carefully analyzing public men and events; a man of artistic temperament surrounded by his works of art and a well-selected library. But in his domestic associations is where he is most happily and fortunately situated and where he is best known. Mr. Shedd was married May 13, 1878, to Mary R. Porter, of Walpole, N. H., and with his wife and two daughters, Laura A. and Helen M., resides at 4515 Drexel boulevard.

Henry Siegel, the president and founder of Siegel, Cooper & Company, was born in Eubigheim, Germany, March 17, 1852. He was the eighth of ten sons of Lazarus Siegel, a farmer by occupation who served with distinction as burgomaster of his city. His attributes of industry descended to his son Henry and, augmented by business ability and marvelous energy, are the distinguishing characteristics of the merchant prince who stands at the head of the Siegel chain of stores, unquestionably the largest retail organization in the world. Henry Siegel was educated in the common schools of Germany and was the last of the Siegel brothers to emigrate to America. He landed in New York on July 12, 1867, at the age of 15 years. He had been preceded by the older brothers, beginning with B. Siegel in 1851. Several of these brothers served the Union gloriously as soldiers during the Civil war.

Mr. Siegel's merchandising experience began a week after his arrival in New York with a position in a Washington, D. C., clothing store at $3.50 per week. After four years' service he left the employ of this concern, his salary then being $15.00 weekly. After two years in Parkesburg, Pennsylvania, in the employ of his brothers, he became one of the partners in a store established by the brothers in Lawrenceburg, Pennsylvania. In January, 1876, the brothers came to Chicago, establishing the firm of Siegel, Hartsfeld & Company, manufacturers of women's cloaks. Henry Siegel was a member of the firm, his duties being those of a traveling salesman. In all these years a growing ambition was shaping the course of Henry Siegel. For ten years the salesman traveled over this and adjoining states, meeting thousands of business men and familiarizing himself with business methods of all kinds. More and more he had become impressed that retail stores had thus far never been perfected and that there were certain defects and shortcomings representative of all of them. The intensely interesting problem of planning a retail organization in which present faults would be minimized, in short, one that would be a model among stores, became his controlling thought. The ambition to found a great store grew and in May, 1887, in partnership with Frank H. Cooper, a successful merchant of Peoria, and Isaac Keim of Chicago, the firm of Siegel, Cooper & Company was launched with a capital of $300,000 and a location at the southeast corner of State and Adams streets, with a frontage of 145 feet on State street. Success was almost instantaneous. The business grew and prospered. Then, August 2, 1890, the building and stocks were completely wiped out by fire.

Not discouraged, new quarters were secured at the corner of Wabash and Adams and the business successfully conducted there until March, 1892, when the present quarters in the Leiter building were occupied. The capital stock was increased to $1,000,000 and the company was made stronger by the incoming of Frank H. Vogel, present first vice-president of the company, and, previous to his identification with retail merchandising, a powerful factor in the meat packing business. Soon afterward, Joseph Basch, the present secretary and general manager of the company, and the resident controlling director, sold his own retail business on upper State street and cast in his lot with the fortunes of the young giant among Chicago stores, now being heavily interested in all the Siegel enterprises.

Joseph Basch, like Mr. Siegel, is of German extraction, being born in Posen, Germany, March 22, 1863. He was educated in the textile industry of Saxony and was apprenticed to the great manufacturing and exporting house of D. Goldberg & Company in Berlin.

His first great advancement came at the age of 16 years and was due to a readiness for responsibility which has been a characteristic of his whole life. The English representative of Hohenstein & Lange, an allied house, died suddenly. Immediate choice of a successor was imperative. Of the available men Joseph Basch alone had mastered the English language and thus it was that he at the age of 16 years was sent to London.

Success attended his efforts and he was later given the British American Colonies in addition to his work in England. Then the States were added to his territory. At the age of 22, six years after his first start as an export representative, he definitely decided that America should be his country, left the employ of Hohenstein & Lange, and established the manufacturing and importing house of Friedlander & Basch, of New York City. Disposing of this business in 1891 he came to Chicago and in partnership with Ferdinand Siegel and others opened a retail cloak business on State street. His interest in this business he sold a few years later in order to identify himself with Siegel, Cooper & Company. His marked success as the manager of this store has made him a dominating factor in the Chicago business world.

With the great Chicago store growing and prosperous, the mercantile ambition of Mr. Siegel and his associates were far from realized. A wonderful transcontinental chain of retail stores, with buying powers and facilities greater than any single organization could hope to command—each store independent of the other as to actual management—but all centered under one grasp of master minds, that was now the controlling desire of these able and bold spirits.

In 1896 the first step of expansion beyond the bounds of Chicago was taken in the establishment of the Siegel, Cooper company of New York, with a capital of $1,000,000 and an establishment that was then the marvel of the city. In 1902 Mr. Siegel disposed of his holdings in the Siegel, Cooper company of New York. But progress did not halt.

In quick succession Mr. Siegel and his associates bought the great Simpson Crawford company of New York with its capital of $5,000,000. Then was established "The 14th Street Store," a great popular-priced establishment with capital of $1,000,000. That was in 1904. Then Boston was invaded and the palatial Henry Siegel & Company with capital of $1,000,000 was opened with instant success. In the meantime a quarter of a million dollars had been added to the capital of the Chicago store and half a million dollars are now being expended in adding new selling floors to care for the unceasingly growing business of this house. The Chicago store has a frontage of over 400 feet on State street, is of solid granite, steel and concrete construction, and is one of the largest buildings in the world dedicated to the selling of merchandise.

SECOND AND THIRD COURT-HOUSES.

Seven selling floors, each with approximately 60,000 square feet of floor space, give room for a stock valued at millions, and require nearly 3,000 employes to care for the business volume. The aggregate employes of the four stores number over 12,000 and 250 expert buyers traverse the entire world securing merchandise to supply the outlet of the four stores. Resident organizations are maintained in all prominent foreign buying centers. The buying power of the allied stores is focused through and made a great factor for price in a fifth company, the Henry Siegel wholesale, with headquarters in New York.

The present officers of the Chicago company of Siegel, Cooper & Company are: Henry Siegel, president; Frank E. Vogel, vice-president; Isaac Keim, second vice-president; Joseph Basch, secretary; J. S. Jacoby, treasurer.

John M. Sienkiewicz, manager of the Polish National Daily, Dziennik Narodowy, at 738 Milwaukee avenue, is a native of Polkowo, Poland, where he was born on July 4, 1874, the son of Vincent and Elizabeth (Judycka) Sienkiewicz, who came to the United States in 1888, first locating at Plymouth, Pennsylvania, where the father was employed in and about the mines prior to 1901, at which date they removed to Chicago. At the present date the parents are living with their son, the subject of this review. They were the parents of the following children: John M., the subject; Annie, wife of Stanislaw Nadrowski; Josephine, wife of Michael Komorowski; Stanislaw W. and Frank C. John M., the subject of this memoir, was educated in the schools of his native land up to the age of 14 years. Upon coming to America he finished his schooling at Plymouth, Pennsylvania, where he learned to speak and write the English language. He still further supplemented his education in English after coming to Chicago; he also took a course in the French language at the Metropolitan Business college.

On January 1, 1897, he located in Chicago and took charge as assistant secretary of the Polish Young Men's Alliance, which position he occupied for some time. For five years he served as president of the same organization up to August in 1907. In May of that year he became identified with the Polish National Daily as manager, which important and responsible position he is yet filling with ability and credit. He is a member of the St. Albert's Polish Catholic church, Polish National alliance, Polish Young Men's alliance and the St. Cecilia Singing society. He is a Republican in politics. He is a member of the Kosciusko Monument central committee of Washington, D. C. On February 26, 1908, he married Maria, daughter of Walery and Ludwika (Bachowska) Wierzbicki, of Galicia, Austrian Poland.

Frank J. Skala, of the firm of F. J. Skala & Company and proprietor of the Bohemian Slavic bank, located at 318-322 West Eighteenth street, was born at Pisek, Bohemia, October 28, 1869, and is a son of Frank and Anastasia (Zeman) Skala, who immigrated to the United States in 1891, settling in Chicago, where the father died in 1899. After his death his widow returned to Bohemia and there she still resides, well advanced in years. Frank J. was reared to manhood in his native land and received his education in the high school and the college "Gymnasium" of his home city. In 1890 he crossed the ocean to the United States and settled in Chicago, where he became at once identified with the newspaper business. He secured a position with the Denni Hlasatel, a Bohemian daily, in the publication of which he is still interested as a stockholder.

In 1897 he embarked in the banking business on West Eighteenth street and at the same time purchased the business of the Spevak Steamship Ticket company. He deals in foreign exchange and does a general banking business. In 1903 he constructed the handsome building he now occupies on West Eighteenth street and his institution is known as the Bohemian Slavic bank, one of the most prosperous financial institutions of the kind on the West Side. The institution has the entire confidence of the community. Mr. Skala himself is distinguished among his fellow citizens for his progressiveness, public spirit and upright character. He is one of the most successful Bohemian business men of the city. Politically he is a Democrat and although he takes much general interest in public affairs, he has not been an aspirant for political favors. On October 2, 1897, he married Bessie, daughter of John and Mary Panosh, of Kewaunee county, Wisconsin, and they are the parents of six children, as follows: Frank, Joseph, Paul, Boris, and Blanche and Henrietta; the latter two being twins.

Edward J. Smejkal is one of the younger generation of lawyers that have achieved distinction in the legal profession; and in addition he has won an enviable reputation as a legislator. Born in the city of Chicago on January 1, 1875, he is a son of Anthony and Marie (Siman) Smejkal, who are natives of Newtown, Bohemia, and Chicago respectively. After attending the grammar schools of the city he entered the English high and manual training school, from which he was graduated in 1891. For a number of years he was employed in the credit department of Marshall Field & Company and while thus engaged began reading law and at nights attending the Chicago College of Law. Immediately following his graduation with the class of 1894, he took a post graduate course at Lake Forest university, which conferred upon him the degree of LL. B. in 1895.

Not having attained his majority, he was not admitted to the bar until March 28, 1896, at which time he passed his examination before the Supreme court, at Ottawa. For a time he practiced alone, then for ten years was associated with his brother, Joseph A. Smejkal. At the present time he is the senior member of the firm of Smejkal, Klenha & Ring, with offices in the Reaper block. He was admitted and qualified as an attorney, counsellor and proctor in the United States District court, is an attorney and counselor of the United States Circuit court, qualified as an attorney and counselor of the Supreme court of the United States March 1, 1906, and as attorney and counsellor of the United States court of appeals for the Seventh district April 14, 1908.

While engaged in the general practice of law Mr. Smejkal makes a specialty of patent litigation. In 1900 he was appointed by Governor Tanner attorney for the State Board of Health, of which he afterward became registrar. From boyhood he has taken an active interest in local politics, and as a Republican was elected to the lower house of the State legislature in 1902, and reelected to this position in 1904, 1906 and 1908, during which time he served as a member and as chairman of some of the most important committees of the house. During the last session he was chairman of the committee on Drainage and Waterways, one of the most important of all the committees. In July, 1907, he was appointed assistant prosecuting attorney of Chicago and has since served as such, having particularly in charge the prosecution of those violating the smoke ordinance. Mr. Smejkal is a member of Pleiades Lodge, No. 473, A. F. and A. M.; Wiley M. Egan Chapter, No. 126, R. A. M.; Palestine Council, No. 66, R. and S. M., Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T.; Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., and Chicago Lodge, No. 4, B. and P. O. E. March 8, 1900, Miss Bessie Rusy became his wife and to them three children have been born: Richard, Helen and Edna.

Franklin P. Smith was born September 30, 1864, at the corner of Harrison and Wabash avenues, Chicago. He is the son of Eben Byron and Harriet (Barnum) Smith, who came to Chicago from Detroit, Michigan, in 1862. The father engaged in the wholesale dry goods business on Michigan avenue as a member of the firm of Partridge & Smith. Thus he continued until a short time before the great fire, when he became a member of the firm of Hamlin, Hale & Company.

At the time of the fire Mr. Smith resided on Michigan avenue between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets. During the extraordinary excitement of the hour, Mr. Smith managed to secure drays and wagons and moved the most valuable part of his stock to his home, where it escaped the fire. After the fire the firm built a modern store at Madison and Franklin streets and they were backed by H. B. Claflin & Company, one of the largest dry goods houses of New York city. A little later the name of the firm became Hamlin, Davy & Company. About 1878 Mr. Smith engaged in manufacturing shirts, men's furnishing goods, etc., under the firm name of Tomlinson, Smith & Company, and was located on Fifth avenue between Madison and Monroe. There he continued until the death of his wife, March 12, 1886. He then entered into partnership with his son Franklin P., and continued to oversee the business until his death, June 22, 1906.

Franklin P. Smith was educated in the public and high schools of Chicago and in 1882 became a bookkeeper for the Chicago Wire and Iron Works, of which he subsequently in 1884 became owner. In 1896 he moved to his present address, 100 Lake street. At this date the business is confined to ornamental iron and bronze work. The factory is located at Deering, Fullerton and Clybourn avenues, and the company employs about 350 men and does an annual business of over $500,000.

Mr. Smith's summer residence is at Lake Forest and his city house at 2816 Michigan avenue. He attends the First Presbyterian church, and is a member of Home Lodge, No. 508, A. F. and A. M. He also belongs to the following clubs and societies: Calumet, Chicago Athletic, Onwentsia, South Shore Country, Chicago Yacht, Chicago Automobile clubs, Sons of Revolution, Association of Commerce, Manufacturers Association, vice-president Architectural Iron League, Builders and Traders Exchange, National Founders association and the Art Institute. On February 6, 1901, he married Daisy Durand, daughter of the late Henry C. Durand, formerly president of the Durand & Kasper wholesale grocers establishment. They have one son, Durand, and one daughter, Daisiana.

Samuel L. Smith. In 1838 there came to Chicago a young lawyer whose ability as an orator left a deep impression upon the legal fraternity of the young metropolis of the West. This young man, Samuel L. Smith, was born in Pennsylvania in 1817, received a fine literary education in Philadelphia, studied law at Yale college, and in 1836 came to Illinois, and to Chicago two years later. Naturally witty and apt, ready at repartee, a master of invective and sarcasm, he was a formidable opponent in any case he undertook. In 1839 he became attorney for the city. Beyond all doubt he was among the foremost lawyers ever at the Chicago bar. During the cholera epidemic in 1854 he was stricken with that dread disease and passed from life on July 30 of that year.

Henry Spears, assistant Sheriff of Cook county, has for years been one of the well-known men connected with the public affairs of the county. He was born October 15, 1850, in Brooklyn, New York, and at the age of 6 years came with his parents, Henry and Gertrude Spears, to Chicago, which has since been his home. His parents were both natives of Germany, their advent in America being the year 1842. The father was a grocer by occupation, and oldtime residents recall his store on the site of the present postoffice prior to the great fire of 1871. He was for a time South Town collector and also acted as county coroner. Assistant Sheriff Henry Spears was educated in the public schools of Chicago. He began his business career in the grocery business with his father, and his political career as deputy under Sheriff T. M. Bradley. Following this in succession he became a commercial traveler for a wholesale trunk house, commission merchant on South Water street, minute clerk in the office of Probate Court Clerk Seth Hanchett, assistant jailor of Cook county, deputy under Sheriff Matson and chief clerk of the Probate court. He was serving in the latter capacity when, upon the election of Sheriff Strassheim, he became assistant Sheriff of Cook county, in which capacity he has since served. Mr. Spears is a Republican in politics and a Royal Arch degree Mason. In 1877 he married Miss Cecelia Keinz, by whom he is the father of four children: Harry W., Edward G., Freda J. and Francis.

Joseph Spiegel has been a resident of Chicago for the past forty-three years and is the founder of one of the great mercantile establishments of the city. He was born near the city of Worms, in the Province of Rhine-Hesse, and the Grand Duchy of Hesse, Germany, September 23, 1840. His parents, Moses and Regina (Hart) Spiegel, immigrated to America in 1849, in order to accompany Marcus M. Spiegel, another son, who was implicated in the revolution of 1848 and was compelled to flee his native country. Marcus M. Spiegel embarked in the grain business at Millersburg, Ohio. He was one of the first to enlist for the preservation of the Union in 1861, and served as first lieutenant in the Sixty-seventh regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in the Shenandoah Valley under Gen. Philip Sheridan. Later he became colonel of the One Hundred and Twentieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry and was a participant in many of the great battles and important campaigns of the Civil war. He was killed while on the Red river expedition to Shreveport, Louisiana.

Joseph Spiegel was but a small lad when he came with his parents to America. His early education was obtained in the public schools of New York City, subsequently in a seminary at Greensburg, Ohio. In 1862 he enlisted in Company C, One Hundred and Twentieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and fought at the siege of Vicksburg and the battle of Jackson, Mississippi. While on the expedition up Red river he was captured and for thirteen months was a prisoner at Tyler, Texas. In 1865, when peace was declared, he came to Chicago and embarked in mercantile pursuits. He thus continued with varying success until 1893, when Spiegel's House Furnishing company was organized with a capitalization of $50,000. The first location was at 249-251 State street, but in 1895 was changed to the corner of Congress and State streets. Since 1901 the establishment has been at 182-184 Wabash avenue. The success and growth of this concern is typical of the wondrous growth and development of the city. A surplus of $450,000 has been accumulated, and branch establishments have been made at Ashland avenue and Forty-eighth street, 9133-35 Commercial avenue and Milwaukee and Armitage avenues. During this period of growth a mail order business was begun and quickly grew to gigantic dimensions. To segregate this line from the regular business the firm of May-Stern was admitted to a holding and was incorporated with $500,000 capital as Spiegel, May, Stern company. This establishment covers one entire block, with offices at 1045-1054 Thirty-fifth street, and employs from 700 to 800 hands. The immense amount of business transacted by this corporation ranks it among the great twentieth century institutions of Chicago.

Modie J. Spiegel is the son of Joseph and Matilda (Liebenstein) Spiegel, and was one of the prime movers in the organization of Spiegel's House Furnishing company and of the Spiegel, May, Stern company, being the treasurer of both organizations. He attended the public schools of Chicago and for two and one-half years was a student at Racine college, Wisconsin. He then engaged in mercantile pursuits with his father until the formation of Spiegel's House Furnishing company, in 1903, of which he was one of the organizers, and has since been one of the directing minds. A Republican in politics, he has never sought for political preferment, but has endeavored by precept to accept in the fullest sense the duties of American citizenship, voting for the best interests of his party and advocating all measures for the general good. His aid in quelling the teamsters' strike brought him into general recognition as a man of superior force and character, and for this reason, and with the desire to have a representative of the Jewish people on the Board of Education, he was appointed as a member of that body by Mayor Dunne. His ripe business experience led to his selection as chairman of the finance committee, and in this capacity he has since served. In 1908 he was reappointed a member of the board by Mayor Busse. Mr. Spiegel is a member of the Standard club, the Illinois Athletic club, and the Ravisloe Country club. He is married and resides at 4537 Ellis avenue.

Giles Spring was the first lawyer by a few days or weeks to reach Chicago in the early part of 1833. He was born in New England, but while yet a youth his parents removed to Ashtabula county, Ohio, where he grew to manhood, and studied law with Wade & Giddings (Benjamin F. Wade and Joshua R. Giddings), of Ashtabula, then leading lawyers of Northern Ohio, and whose names have since been closely identified with important political events in our country. His early education, judging by his spelling and grammar, must have been quite meager; but he was a tireless reader, his favorite field for reading being cases reported in the old English equity and common law reports and the old English classical writers, such as Addison, Johnson, Fielding, Dean Swift, etc. He had a quick, keen sense of justice—not that which only enabled him to see the right or wrong of his clients—but he could take in the whole case, and almost, as it were, by intuition, see where the merits lay, and what in the light of the law should be its outcome. The solution of legal problems came as spontaneously to him as those of arithmetic or mechanics to certain phenomenal geniuses. He was of a highly nervous temperament, and was intense and combative in his manner, but always a gentleman in his deportment to the court and counsel, and a frank, generous, kind-hearted, broad-gauged man. His reading had given him a large vocabulary of good old English words, and he used these discreetly to express in a terse and direct manner what he meant to say; and while he was a ready and fluent talker, he was not tiresome or verbose, but always seemed to know when he had said enough to make himself understood. After a successful career at the bar he was elected in 1848 judge of what was then called "the Cook County court," now known as the "Superior court of Cook county," to succeed Judge Hugh T. Dickey, who had been elected judge of the Circuit court; and upon the bench his quick perception and grasp of facts, with his wide knowledge of law, made him one of the most efficient jurists that ever occupied the bench of Cook county. By his death, in June, 1851, the profession lost a member in whom we took just pride, and the bench one of its brightest ornaments.

Mason B. Starring was born in Chicago on May 8, 1859, and is a son of Henry J. D. and Alida M. (Tower) Starring. This branch of the Starring family traces its ancestry to Holland and also to heroes of the American revolution. Mason B. in early life was educated in the public and high schools of Chicago and at the age of 18 years became an employe in the baggage department of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway company. His father for many years had been at the head of that department and while thus engaged had invented the system of checking baggage which is now used extensively throughout the United States. At the age of 20 years Mason B. became a general officer of the company, being placed at the head of the baggage department to succeed his father. He remained in the service of that railway company, although part of the time general baggage agent of the Pennsylvania company, until 1885 when he began business for himself in Iowa, as a banker and grain dealer, where he remained until 1888, when he came to Chicago and entered the employ of the Chicago City Railway company as clerk.

Having made up his mind to study law he did so at leisure hours and in due course of time was admitted to the bar. In 1894 he was appointed assistant general counsel of the Chicago City Railway company under Julius S. Grinnell and in 1898 was made acting general counsel of that company. In 1903 his title was changed to general solicitor and he was elected a director and general manager in May of that year. In February, 1906, he was promoted to the vice-presidency. In March, 1907, he was offered and accepted the presidency of the Northwestern Elevated Railway system and is thus occupied at the present time. On October 27, 1886, he married Helen Swing, daughter of the late Professor David Swing, one of the most illustrious independent preachers ever in the United States. They are the parents of two children: David Swing and Mason B., Jr. The elder son is a student at Harvard, and the younger at Yale. Mr. Starring is a member of the Chicago club and the Lake Geneva Country club, president of the Industrial club of Chicago, a member of the board of governors of the South Shore Country club and vice-chairman of the executive committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce. He is also a member of the Sons of the American Revolution. The family reside at 568 East Division street and spend their summers at Swinghurst, their summer residence at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin.

Christopher Strassheim is a native of Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, born March 22, 1850, but he has been a Chicagoan, thoroughly interested in the old Chicago and the new Chicago, ever since. It was in 1854, when he was about four years old, that his parents brought him to the United States. The family located in Chicago, on the North Side, where the parents have since died, justly proud of the enviable record made by their son in the business and political circles of their adopted city. He was a student in the public schools near his home until 1866, when he was about 16 years old. Then he took up the task of earning his own living, and, if possible, a little more. It was as a tinsmith's apprentice that he had his first experience of the activities of the world, and he gave to the acquisition of a knowledge of that industry five years of constant work and study. Having confidence in his ability to succeed as a tinner, should he fail in other fields of endeavor, he established a commission business under the firm name of Strassheim & Brother. That was in 1871. Six years later he sold his interest in the enterprise to his brother, in order to organize the house of Jacobs & Strassheim, wholesale dealers in wooden and willow ware. In 1887 the firm branched out as wholesale grocers and their trade rapidly extended and commensurately grew in bulk and importance.

In 1889 Mr. Strassheim purchased the interest of Mr. Jacobs, his partner, and not long afterward he sold a half interest in the business to Philip Jaeger. Strassheim & Jaeger successfully operated a wholesale grocery at La Salle and South Water streets for eight years, and in 1897 Mr. Strassheim sold his interest to the new firm of Jaeger & Son. In 1899 he entered the wholesale flour and bakery supply trade. In 1906 he connected himself with the Shepard-Strassheim company, wholesale grocers, who are doing an extensive business at 153 West Randolph street, and became a director of that firm. During all the years of his manhood, Mr. Strassheim has taken a deep interest in politics, especially as a factor in all commercial and industrial progress, believing that good politics means good business and that bad politics must inevitably result in bad business. He did not take part in active political work, however, until 1891, when he was a member of a committee of seven appointed to report on Republican candidates for city offices, and as a result of his labors and those of his associates his organization was able to name a ticket that was successful at the polls and fairly satisfactory to the public in its administration of public affairs. In January, 1892, he was appointed by Governor Fifer a member of the Lincoln Park Board of Chicago, and in 1903 he was elected a member of the Board of Commissioners of Cook county. The record that he made in those capacities and his enviable reputation as a merchant had now brought him so prominently and so favorably before the people that in 1905 he was nominated and elected sheriff of Cook county. He married Eva Merkel in 1878. His residence is at 65 Lincoln avenue, in the Twenty-third ward.

George Struckmann, a resident of Bartlett, Hanover township, has figured prominently in the affairs of Cook county for the past thirty years, but of late has been living a retired life. He was born in Germany in 1835, a son of Gottlieb Struckmann.

He immigrated from Stadthagen to America in the early 50's and assisted his parents on the home farm in Hanover township, Cook county, Illinois, where they had settled. When civil war was declared he raised a company of volunteers at Hanover which was assigned to the Benton Hussars, later the Fourth Missouri Cavalry of the Sixteenth Army Corps, under Gen. Franz Sigel. He served until peace was declared, chiefly in the Southwest, was honorably discharged and, returning home, resumed the plow which had been abandoned for the sword when danger threatened the country of his adoption.

At various times he served as assessor, collector and supervisor of his township, and beginning in 1878 served by election four successive terms as a member of the lower house of the State Legislature. In 1889 he was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners, was successively reelected, serving eleven years in all, and in 1893-4 was president of that body. Mr. Struckmann is a Republican in politics, a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Grand Army of the Republic. In 1867 he was united in marriage with Christiana Busche, a native of Germany, who came with her parents to America when she was yet a child. Four children were born to this marriage, one of whom, William F., appropriate mention of whom is made elsewhere in this work, is the present assistant attorney of Cook county.

William F. Struckmann, assistant county attorney, is a son of George Struckmann, one of the well-known men of the county, appropriate mention of whom appears in this work. He was born December 17, 1866, received his early education in the district schools of Hanover township, where he was born, was graduated from Elgin academy in 1885, and after completing the course in the law department of Michigan State university received his degree in 1888.

Returning to Chicago, he became a minute clerk and common law record writer in the office of the Superior court clerk. For four years he continued to serve in this capacity and the experience thus acquired has proved invaluable in his subsequent career as a lawyer. Until 1893 he was a member of the legal firm of Strong & Struckmann, but in December of that year was elected assistant county attorney, served one year, then passed the Civil Service examination, was appointed to again fill the same office and has since continued to serve in that capacity.

While engaged in private practice Mr. Struckmann succeeded in carrying through the courts many important estates and actions at law and chancery. As a public official his definite knowledge of certain branches of the law has proven invaluable. He is a Republican, a member of the Union League club, is a Knight Templar and Consistory degree Mason, and resides at Berwyn. In 1893 he was happily wedded to Miss Alvena Heidemann and is the father of two children: George and Marie.

Joseph J. Sullivan is one of the trial lawyers connected with the office of the city attorney. He was born in the city of Chicago March 19, 1879, a son of Mago and Johanna (Hussey) Sullivan, both of whom were natives of Ireland, who came to America in 1861, and since 1864 have resided in Chicago. Joseph J. Sullivan attended the parochial schools of Chicago in boyhood, and in 1895 entered Notre Dame university at South Bend, Indiana, from which he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Letters in 1901, and the degree of Bachelor of Laws in 1902. While a student at Notre Dame he was editor in chief of the Scholastic, the college paper, and a member of the track team, the debating team and the university stock (dramatic) company. In 1903 he took the Supreme court examination, was admitted to the bar, and has since been engaged in the practice of law in Chicago with the exception of a brief time when engaged in newspaper work.

During the past five years he has been employed as a campaign speaker by the Republican county central committee. In 1907 he was appointed assistant city attorney and assigned to trial work, in which capacity he has since served. Mr. Sullivan is a Republican in politics and a member of the Hamilton club and the Knights of Columbus. November 15, 1904, he was united in marriage with Miss Annabelle Horan, by whom he is the father of two children. He resides at 285 Armitage avenue.

Bernard Edward Sunny is a native of Brooklyn, New York, born in 1856. At the age of 16 years he started out in life for himself, as a messenger for the Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph company. During this service he acquired a practical education, and began the study of electricity and its practical application. He soon became an operator, and in three years' time was an electric telegraph expert and was transferred to a higher field at Chicago where, while yet in his teens, he became night manager.

He early became interested in the telephone and soon mastered this subject as he had the telegraph. In 1879 he was offered the superintendency of the Bell Telephone company, accepted the responsibility and later was continued in that position by the newly united Bell and Edison companies, which had united under the name of Chicago Telephone company. He now began to be recognized as an able executive officer and was offered and accepted the presidency of the Chicago Arc Light and Power company in 1888. His services in a still more difficult field were then demanded. He became western manager at Chicago of the Thomson-Houston Electric company, and so able and efficient were his services that when the Edison General Electric, the Thomson-Houston and the Brush interests merged into the General Electric company he was retained as western manager of the new company. In 1906 he was elected a vice-president of the General Electric company, a position he resigned in April, 1907, at which time he was elected vice-president of the American Telephone and Telegraph company, and later was elected president of the Chicago Telephone company.

Aside from his distinctive business relations he has occupied other positions of trust and responsibility. He served as president of the Civic Federation and as president of the board of trustees of the Kankakee Asylum for the Insane. In 1893 he was a director of the World's Columbian Exposition, but declined reelection in order to give his attention to the Intramural Railway, of which he was president. In 1900 he was a delegate from the Sixth Congressional district to the National Republican convention. He is a member of the Chicago, Union League and Merchants' clubs. In 1878 Ellen C. Rhue, of Brooklyn, became his wife; they have two children, Helen T. and Arthur E., and reside at 4933 Woodlawn avenue.

Denis J. Swenie. Probably the most conspicuous figure in the annals of the fire department of Chicago is Denis J. Swenie, who resigned from the head of the department in June, 1901, after a notable service of fifty-two years. During this long period the marvelous changes that took place can hardly be credited. He first became marshal in 1879 and so continued for twenty-two years. He was in touch with every subordinate during the period of his control of the department and was the father of many reforms which were instituted to improve the fire extinguishing service. He knew every member of the force personally and was a strict disciplinarian, requiring faithful and honest service, although he was admired by his subordinates. He kept abreast of the times and took advantage of every improvement in methods of fighting fire. He believed in the merit system and under him the service brought better results as time passed. He did not believe that the department should be controlled by politics and always advanced real merit. He was thoroughly practical and at all times in case of fire was on the ground, and in this respect his service was remarkable. His early life is of interest. He was born in Glasgow, Scotland, July 29, 1834, and was of Irish lineage.

From the age of five years Denis J. attended fires which were extinguished by both his father and his uncle, who were members of the volunteer fire department of that city. His parents came to Chicago in 1848 when the city had a population of only about 20,000. At first Denis J. was engaged in the manufacture of leather hose, fire hats, etc., with C. E. Peck, whose house was on Lake street. While thus engaged he became acquainted with members of the fire department and with the needs and progress of fire fighting development. At the age of 16 years he joined Hose Company No. 3, and later No. 3 Niagara, and when 18 years old became assistant foreman of Red Jacket Engine Company No. 4; in 1856 he became assistant chief. In 1858 he became chief engineer of the fire department under the volunteer system and was the first chief of the paid fire department in 1858-59. In 1861 he became foreman of an engine company and in 1868 was offered the position of first assistant fire marshal, but declined.

At the time of the great fire in 1871 Mr. Swenie was foreman of the Fred Gund Engine Company No. 14. During that fire his services were so conspicuous that his fame as a fire fighter became at once recognized and widespread. He was appointed assistant fire marshal in 1873. In 1879 he was chosen acting fire marshal of the department and the same year reached the highest position, becoming fire marshal of the city. He held the position with conspicuous credit for twenty-two years and scores of times during that memorable period escaped death only by the narrowest margin. He retired at the age of 67 years. His wife was Miss Martha Toner, daughter of John Toner, to whom he was married in 1853. Mr. Swenie died on February 16, 1903, and was buried in Calvary cemetery. Three boys and three girls were born to his marriage. In the order of birth they were: Mrs. W. H. Ebbert, Mrs. J. A. Sauter, Mrs. J. Kirkley, Frank W. Swenie, James Swenie and Denis J. Swenie, Jr.

Frank W. Swenie was born December 4, 1861, the son of Denis J., whose sketch precedes this. He was educated at the public schools and upon leaving the same was connected for a time with the Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph company. Later he was connected with the American District company and the Western Union. In 1880 he was a lineman in this city and gradually worked up step by step through the different grades to his present position, chief of the fire alarm and telegraph department. His business career has been active and honorable. He now has served twenty-nine years in his department, having taken charge of his present position in 1905—during this period he has not been out of the department. He is a member of the Catholic order, Knights of Columbus, and in October, 1889, married Anna M. Sennott of this city. They have four children: Martha, Marshall, Robert and Edith.

Adam Szwajkart, physician and surgeon, and a member of the staff of St. Mary of Nazareth hospital, with residence at 870 West Diversey avenue and office at 667 North Ashland avenue, is a native of Austria-Poland, was born at Rykow, Galicia, Austria, on December 24, 1860. He is a son of Charles and Malvina (Wodiera) Szwajkart, and was educated in the high schools of his native land, finishing at the University of Cracow, Austria, from 1875 to 1880. He became an apprentice in pharmacy and attended the University of Austria at Cracow in 1880 and the University of Lemberg in 1883, where he finished his pharmaceutical studies and received the degree of Master of Pharmacy.

In 1886 he came to the United States and entered the Bennett Medical college of Chicago, from which he was graduated in 1897. He also graduated from the medical department of the University of Illinois in 1903. His elaborate medical education and his natural ability eminently qualify him for the large practice he has at the present time. He has practiced in Chicago since 1897, but from 1886 to 1897 he conducted the drug business and operated in succession seven different stores. In 1897 he gave up the drug business and has since given his whole attention to the practice of his profession. In 1894 he was sent by his Polish compatriots to represent them at the Kosciusko exposition at Lemberg, Austria, an honor which his high character and popularity rendered appropriate. On January 10, 1893, he married Eugenia, daughter of Leo and Valeria (Borska) Nowierska, of San Antonio, Texas, and they have three children, viz.: Adam, Eugene and Blanche. The two elder occupy the first grade in their respective studies, being masters of three languages.

Mrs. Szwajkart's father was a Polish revolutionist and was sent by the Russian government to Siberia for participation in political movements against the government. After a short time he escaped and made his way to the United States, settling in Texas, where he is yet engaged in the jewelry business in the town of Floresville. Dr. Szwajkart and family are members of the St. Hyacinth Polish Catholic church. He is a member of the American Medical association, Chicago Medical society, State Eclectic Medical society and the Polish Medical society of Chicago, the only one of that nationality in the United States and organized by subject in 1899. He is at present serving his third term as its president. He is also a member of the Polish National Alliance, Polish Roman Catholic Union and Catholic Order of Foresters. He was appointed commissioner of West Side public parks in 1904 and served for one year. He served seven years as chief medical examiner of the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America and has been a member of the staff of St. Mary of Nazareth hospital since 1897. He was physician to the Austro-Hungarian consulate general for three years. In politics he is a Republican. He is recognized as one of the ablest physicians of Chicago.

Thomas Taylor, Jr., lawyer, came to Chicago in 1887. His father was a cousin of Tom Taylor, the English dramatist. In 1882 he was graduated from Knox college, with the degree of Bachelor of Science, and in 1885 from the law school of Harvard university, with the degree of Bachelor of Laws. Later he studied civil law at universities in Berlin and Vienna. He began the practice of his profession in Boston, but came to Chicago in 1887. He has ably filled the office of master in chancery for sixteen years and has at the same time had an extensive practice at the bar. He has been a member of the Chicago Bar association for fifteen years and was its treasurer 1894-97. Politically he is a Republican. He is a member of the Chicago Historical society and of the University, City, Onwentsia and Chicago clubs. In 1891 he married Miss Florence Clarkson, daughter of John Thorne Clarkson, and has sons named Thorne Clarkson and Wilberforce Taylor, and a daughter, Florence. His office is in the First National Bank building, his residence at Hubbard Woods, Illinois.

Rev. John Tomaszewski, rector of All Saints' Polish Catholic parish, 9-23 Lubeck street, is a native of the town of Klotno, Russian Poland, and was born on October 15, 1869. He was liberally educated in his native city and in the city of Wloclawek, receiving at the latter a thorough classical training. He came to America in 1895 and first located in Cleveland, Ohio, where he became a teacher in the school of the Immaculate Sacred Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary, continuing thus engaged for a period of three years. In 1898 he came to Chicago and resumed his theological studies under the able instruction of the late Bishop Kozlowski, and in 1899 was duly ordained by him to the priesthood. Immediately thereafter he was appointed an assistant to the All Saints' church, in which important capacity he served acceptably for six years.

In January, 1907, he was appointed rector of All Saints' parish, which consisted of 3,265 communicants. Under Father Tomaszewski's administration the charge prospered from the start and at present is in a happy and flourishing condition. The father is president of St. Anthony's hospital, which is in charge of six devoted sisters of the Immaculate Conception, and was founded by Bishop Kozlowski. Connected with the church, also, is a parochial school under the direction of four lay teachers. The names of the teachers are: Mr. Andrew M. Pohorylo, principal; Mr. Michael S. Adamczyk, Mr. F. Krawcowicz and Mr. K. S. Hrapkowicz. This school has about 450 pupils and is under the religious instruction of Father Kornapfel, assistant rector of All Saints' parish.

William H. Troyer has won an enviable record as a lawyer and a legislator. Born in St. Joseph county, Indiana, March 27, 1865, he resided in that State until 18 years old, during which time he attended the public schools, supplemented by a course of instruction at the Northern Indiana Normal school at Valparaiso. He took up the study of telegraphy and, becoming a proficient operator, was employed at this occupation at various places in Indiana and Illinois. It was not his intention to make telegraphy his life's occupation, but rather a stepping stone to something more desirable. While employed as a telegrapher he began the study of law, and coming to Chicago entered the Union College of Law, from which he was graduated in 1890. Prior to this, however, he took his examination before the Supreme court at Ottawa, and was admitted to the bar.

After his graduation he found it necessary, in order to support a wife and child, to return to his old occupation as a telegrapher for a time, but early in 1891 he located in Chicago for the practice of his profession. Like most young lawyers, he found that it was anything but a path of roses at the beginning; but persistence, a careful attention to all cases entrusted to him, a thorough knowledge in the principles of law, has enabled him to overcome obstacles and obtain a fair share of the legal practice of this great city. Shortly after locating here he became assistant attorney for the Bureau of Justice, a philanthropic institution, continuing as such three years, when he was made chief attorney.

In 1904, 1906, and in 1908 he was elected representative to the State Legislature from the Twenty-first Senatorial district and is generally considered one of the capable men of that body. During his first term he served on the following committees: Corporations, judicial department and practice, insurance, miscellaneous, manufacturers, State and municipal civil service reform, and building, loan and homestead associations. During his second term he was chairman of the committee on parks and boulevards, and a member of the committees on building, loan and homestead associations, Chicago charter, corporations, insurance, judiciary, judicial department and practice, municipal courts, miscellaneous subjects, and to visit penal and reformatory institutions of the State. Mr. Troyer was appointed a member of the staff of the city prosecuting attorney, in which capacity he is now serving. October 30, 1887, he married Miss Josephine M. Smith, at Hampshire, Illinois, by whom he is the father of one daughter—Marie.

Joseph Z. Uhlir is a practical exemplification of the old copy book maxim, "Where there is a will there is a way," and is justly entitled to the credit due for having made an honored name and achieved success under adverse conditions. He was born in Bohemia, Austria, on December 19, 1872, and is a son of Joseph and Mary (Karas) Uhlir. When he was yet an infant his father died and at the age of 3 years he was brought by his mother to America and to Chicago. Here in the public schools he received his primary education, and having made up his mind to practice law he entered the Chicago College of Law at Lake Forest university, and after a full course was graduated with honor in 1893. During the period of his legal study he was employed in one or more of the city law offices.

Immediately after his admission to the bar on March 26, 1894, he began the practice of his profession and has been thus engaged with steadily increasing clientage and success until the present. His success as a lawyer was only brought about by hard study, long researches into authorities having a bearing upon the case in hand, and a careful, analytical consideration of all the issues involved. He early took a deep interest in local politics, which fact in the end led to his election in the spring of 1904 to the City Council from the Twelfth ward, and here by reelection he served three terms with credit.

Although a Republican, he was elected from a strong Democratic ward, the first time by a majority of over 1,700 votes and the second time more than 2,700 votes. At the last aldermanic election the result was one of the surprises of the day, his majority being about 3,500. Taking all the facts of the situation together, it is doubtful if any alderman ever received such general approval from his fellow citizens. As a member of the City Council Mr. Uhler was particularly interested in all legislation affecting his ward. He was chairman of the committee of special assessments and general taxation and a member of the judiciary, license, streets and alleys, west division and public lands committees. In this day of graft and vicious legislation Mr. Uhler's record stands unblemished, for his utterances and his acts were sufficient to rank him one of the wise and clean men of the city's law-making body. It is not often that one of foreign birth can come into America and achieve such pronounced success. His many acts of kindness to his fellow countrymen and, in fact, to all, regardless of nativity, is one of the causes of his popularity and the sincere affection with which he is regarded. In 1908 his worth was recognized by his election to the municipal bench. This honor in a measure is shared by the Bohemian-Americans of the city, who consider the honor thus bestowed upon Judge Uhler to be an honor and recognition to themselves. On August 15, 1900, Judge Uhler was united in marriage to Carrie Zacek, and by her has one son, Joseph, now 6 years old. He is a member of the Hamilton and Bohemian Turner clubs and several improvement and pleasure clubs and lodges.

William J. Umbach, who has achieved deserved commendation by reason of his meritorious services as an influential member of the Board of County Commissioners, was born July 25, 1869, at Archer and Wentworth avenues. He has always made his home in that vicinity and now resides at 792 Thirty-fifth street. Joseph Umbach, his father, was a native of Germany and was honored by being one of the Emperor's bodyguard. In his native country he married Anna Marie Zinnigen and in the year 1853 emigrated to America, residing for one year in the city of New York, then removing to Chicago, where he established a meat market business. There were fourteen children in the family, most of whom reside in Chicago.

William J., one of the youngest of the children, was educated in the public schools of Chicago. On June 1, 1895, he was married to Miss Henrietta Hagen. He is now successfully engaged with his brother, Frank L., in the rendering business at 3929-3931 South Halsted street. Mr. Umbach is a public-spirited citizen and has always taken an active interest in all public questions. In politics he is a staunch Republican, being a member of the precinct and ward organizations. His abilities and activity were rewarded in 1904 by his nomination as county commissioner in the Republican county convention. He was elected in November, 1904, and reelected in 1906 and 1908. The Board to which he was elected a member in 1904 was one of the most important Boards the county has ever elected, as it had the direct supervision of the $5,000,000 voted by the people of Cook county for the erection of the new county building. Mr. Umbach was an active member of the courthouse committee from the time the building was begun until its completion. He is a charter member of Lincoln council, Modern Woodmen of America, also of several well-known athletic associations and societies promoting and encouraging outdoor sports.

Charles W. Vail, clerk of the Superior court, president of the Prairie State Coal and Coke company, member of the Chicago Association of Commerce and member of the Cook County Central Republican committee and representative of the Third Congressional district of Illinois on the Republican State Central committee, has become as popular and as widely and as favorably known as any public man in the country. Mr. Vail was born at Fairbury, Ill., and there acquired a public school education, which he supplemented by a course of study at a prominent Chicago business college. He early identified himself with real estate interests in this city and gained valuable experience and an intimate knowledge of all factors in local land values which came in time to make him especially skillful and accurate and much sought as appraiser and arbitrator in important real estate transactions in Chicago and elsewhere, in which large financial interests were involved.

He early took a deep and active interest in the political affairs of the Town of Lake and of the Thirty-second ward. His long connection with the Cook County Central committee of the Republican party kept him in close relations with the leaders of these districts and the fidelity with which he had handled all public affairs, no less than his unflinching fealty to his friends, naturally brought him into a favor that was something more than merely local. His nomination and election to the office of clerk of the Superior court came as a joint recognition of his personal merit and popularity. After serving one full term, he was renominated to the same office in the primaries of August, 1908, and was reelected in the following November. He is a member of the Hamilton club, a thirty-second degree Mason, an Odd Fellow, a member of the North American Union and of Charles W. Vail Camp of the Modern Woodmen of America.

D. Herman Wamsley, one of the trial lawyers attached to the office of the city attorney, was born May 9, 1872, in the village of Wamsleys, Adams county, Ohio, and is a son of John B. and Cecilia (Newman) Wamsley. In the fall of 1872 the family moved to Tuscola, Douglas county, Illinois, where the father was engaged in milling for a time, but at present is engaged in mercantile pursuits.

After attending the public and high schools at Tuscola, D. Herman Wamsley became a clerk in the private banking house of Baughmann, Orr & Co., serving as such for about four years, then as assistant cashier of the Citizens' Banking company, at Champaign, for one year, but in 1895 he came to Chicago, where, for some time, he was credit man and cashier for E. V. Price & Co., wholesale clothiers. In 1897 he entered the law department of Lake Forest university, from which he was graduated in 1900. By examination he was admitted to the bar in 1901, succeeding which he was associated with Burres & McKinley in the practice of his profession until May, 1903.

At this time John F. Smulski was city attorney and had begun his campaign of reorganizing and putting on a business basis the affairs of the office of which he was the head. In order to accomplish this result he found it necessary to have associated with him capable and aggressive lawyers. Mr. Wamsley was by him appointed assistant city attorney and has ever since held that position, being at the present time one of the trial lawyers of the office. Aside from his business career as a lawyer, Mr. Wamsley has found time to cultivate some of the social features of life. He is a member of Woodlawn Park lodge, No. 841, A. F. and A. M.; Jackson Park chapter, No. 222, R. A. M.; St. Bernard commandery, No. 35, K. T.; Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S.; Woodlawn Park club, Hamilton club and the Chicago Bar association. He resides at the Del Prado hotel, in the Seventh ward.

Francis W. Walker has been a practicing lawyer of the Chicago bar for the past thirty-two years, and if having been born, reared and educated in Chicago, and if having passed his entire life in this city entitle him to the phrase "to the manner born," he is justly deserving of that distinction. Lucas B. and Lucinda (Le Seur) Walker, his parents, were natives of New York and were descended from English-Quaker ancestry on the paternal side, and of French-Huguenot stock on the maternal. In 1855, when Chicago was a comparatively small, straggling frontier city, they immigrated westward and located here. Lucas B. Walker engaged in mercantile pursuits until the great fire of 1871 destroyed his property and left him destitute. He subsequently was engaged in merchandising and died March 22, 1890, followed by his widow two years later.

Francis W. Walker was born October 12, 1856, the year following his parents' arrival in Chicago, and was educated in the public schools, the University of Chicago and in Dyrenforth's Business college. Under the direction of Luther Laflin Mills he began the study of law, and entering the Union College of Law was graduated therefrom with honors in 1877. He was duly admitted to the bar and since that time has risen to be one of the foremost lawyers of the city.

As first assistant state's attorney under Julius S. Grinnell, from 1878 to 1884, he achieved fame in the prosecution of the anarchists following the bomb throwing in Haymarket square, and in the celebrated boodle cases that landed a number of so-called "prominent men" in the penitentiary. He subsequently was appointed and served with credit as county attorney. For a number of years past he has been the trial attorney for the Metropolitan Elevated and South Side Elevated Railroad companies, and is the present attorney for the sheriff of Cook county. The early life of Mr. Walker was one of hardship and self-denial. The fire of 1871 left his father penniless and shortly thereafter he secured employment in the mailing department of the old Chicago Times, and in connection with that work established a paper route. From the proceeds of this labor he secured the means to defray his expenses while attending business college and law school. To become the successful lawyer it was necessary for him to delve into all manner of studies and investigations, and often to burn the midnight oil in pursuit of abstruse and remote subjects bearing upon the litigation in hand. His retentive memory and orderly methods of classification have contributed in no small measure to the success he has achieved. In politics he is a Democrat.

Socially he is a Knight Templar and thirty-second degree member of the Masonic fraternity, belongs to the Royal Arcanum, and is also a member of the Union League, Chicago, Kenwood, Iroquois, Jefferson, Calumet and Muscatawa Yacht clubs. He is a member of the Unitarian church and resides at 5222 Lexington avenue. October 16, 1890, he was united in marriage with Miss Lulu M. Calhoun, who died October 8, 1896. On June 27, 1898, he married Miss Anna Benson. Mr. Walker is the father of four children—Franklin J., Marguerite O., Edwin B. and Everett W.

James Ward, a well-known and highly esteemed early settler of Chicago, was born near Antrim, Ireland, August 1, 1814. He was the son of Moses Ward and Sarah A. McQueston. He came to America at the age of 20, settling at Auburn, New York, where he managed a farm and a stone quarry until 1841, when with his young bride he moved to Chicago. For a residence he bought a small house on leased ground now known as 170 and 172 Randolph street, just west of La Salle, moving later to the "outskirts," near Sangamon and Randolph streets, on the West Side, with which part of the city he always remained identified.

In partnership with his brother, Hugh, he began the building business in 1842 and continued it until about 1857.

He was a member of the Board of Education from 1857 to 1863, when he was appointed building and supply agent, and superintended the construction of all the public schools erected in Chicago up to the time of his death, July 6, 1881. As a mark of esteem for his untiring devotion to the interest of the schools the "James Ward" school was named in his honor.

While building agent of the School Board Mr. Ward could never get an appropriation for trees to ornament and shade the school grounds, so he cut branches from his own willow trees and those of his friends, especially of Philo Carpenter, and planted them on the school grounds. These were hardy and grew rapidly, and still exist in many of the old school yards.

Mr. Ward was thrice married. His first wife was Mary E. Hickson, who died in Chicago in 1855. Of this union Sarah Agnes, wife of William A. Amberg, and Mary Etta, wife of Edward J. Gannon, of Dallas, Texas, are still living. His second wife was Orchestra Pier, of Syracuse, New York, who died childless two years after the marriage. The third was Mary E. Smith, who with her children, Frank C., Albert J., Anna R., Ella D. and James A., are still living in Chicago.

Fred Lester Watson, treasurer of the American Steel & Wire company, twelfth floor Commercial National Bank building, was born in Wayne county, New York, April 9, 1866, a son of Lester and Elizabeth (Cook) Watson, both of Scotch ancestry. His father, a farmer, died in 1866, his mother in 1905. After acquiring his education in the public and high schools of Des Moines, Iowa, he gave his attention to financial affairs and was for a time a banker in that city. He came to Chicago in 1888 and soon afterward connected himself with the wire interest. In 1891 he was paying teller of the National Bank of the Republic, a position which he relinquished to become still more active and prominent in the wire business.

He has, however, found time and inclination to identify himself with other important interests and is treasurer of the American Steamship company and of the American Mining company. He is a member of the Chicago Athletic club and is influentially associated with other popular organizations, including the South Shore club, the Chicago Yacht club and the Midlothian and Exmoor Golf clubs. Politically he is a Republican, vitally interested in the aims and work of his party. His residence is at 4740 Madison avenue.

John E. W. Wayman, State's attorney for Cook county, was born on a farm near Glen Easton, W. Va., in 1872, a son of John P. and Annie R. (Wilson) Wayman. He was there reared to early manhood and after attending the district schools, entered the Bethany college, from which he was graduated in 1894. Declining a professorship in his alma mater, he came to Chicago with the ultimate intention of practicing law. His first employment in that city was with Spaulding & Merrick, tobacco manufacturers, in which firm he subsequently became traffic manager. He prosecuted his legal studies as opportunity afforded and was graduated from the Kent College of Law in 1898. Since that time he has been energetically engaged in the practice of his profession.

As a Republican he has been active in the support of his party. At the August primaries of 1908 he was nominated for State's attorney of Cook county. A spirited campaign was made for the nomination and at the polls his election by a plurality of 50,000 votes followed in the succeeding November. His public speeches are noted for logic, epigrams, satire and incisive reasoning. Besides achieving distinction in his profession, he has lectured frequently before church and other clubs on Shakespearean and other subjects. He is a member of the Hamilton, Illinois Athletic and the South Shore and Beverly Country Golf clubs, and resides at 7246 Princeton avenue. In 1895 Mr. Wayman was married to Miss Bessie B. Caleb (daughter of H. R. Caleb), and to them has been born one daughter, Annie Jean.

Charles H. Weaver was born at Utica, New York, January 10, 1843, a son of Uri and Phila A. (Dorand) Weaver. In 1847, when 4 years old, he was brought by his parents to Aurora, Illinois, and three years later the family located in La Salle county, on government land. The boy was educated at the district school near his home and at a select school at Ottawa, Illinois, where he finished his studies in 1860. For a time thereafter he was employed as a school teacher.

He came to Chicago October 4, 1863, when he was about 21 years old, and associated himself with H. H. Marsh, his uncle, in the produce commission business. They began their enterprise in a basement on Dearborn street. From the outset they had quite a fair trade and by giving close attention to the business they soon built up a good list of customers. In the following May they moved to 120 South Water street, where they remained until their business was broken up temporarily by fire. At that time South Water street was the center for the wholesale grocery trade, fish and seed dealers, cured meat dealers and allied branches of business. The old Board of Trade was then on that street, between La Salle street and Fifth avenue, and Fifth avenue was known as Wells street. Lake street was to the city what State street is today, a street of dry goods houses, jewelry stores, etc. There were not more than ten or fifteen fruit and produce houses in Chicago. In October, 1868, Mr. Marsh retired and Mr. Weaver assumed entire control. After the big fire of 1871 the firm of C. H. Weaver & Co. was formed. It is probable that Mr. Weaver has conducted a commission house on South Water street for a longer time than any other man at this time actively engaged in his branch of trade, and he has occupied the same store continuously since 1873. It is doubtful if any other similar concern in the city has transacted a larger business, and his firm has been one of the largest in their line for the greater portion of the time during the past forty-five years.

Mr. Weaver's advancement has been steady and sure, his methods have never been questionable, and it is admitted by all that he has most worthily won such success as has come to him. He still gives his individual attention closely to the superintendency of his large establishment, which in all of its departments employs about 100 people. Associated with him in the enterprise are L. B. Kilbourn in the butter and egg department, C. A. Weaver, son of the senior partner, in the same department, and Mr. Morf, who is connected with the fruit department. Mr. Weaver was until recently president of the Illinois Creamery company and of the Elgin Butter company, and is now president of the Chicago Green Fruit Auction company. He has been president of the Chicago Produce Exchange, the International Apple Shippers' association, and other trade organizations, and a director of the Bankers' National bank. He is a member of the Illinois and Menoken clubs. In politics he is a Republican. He has long lived on the West Side. His great-grandfather served the cause of independence in the Revolutionary war, and for generations members of the family have been notably patriotic and public spirited.

William H. Weber, a member of the Board of County Assessors, is a native of Orland township, Cook county, Illinois, his birth occurring August 7, 1856. He is a son of Justus and Mary (Shields) Weber, who were among the early settlers of Cook county. Mr. Weber received his education in the district schools and was graduated from the Cook County Normal school in 1875. From 1875 to 1880 he taught school in various parts of Cook county and the following three years was tax clerk in the office of the county treasurer. From then until December, 1886, he served as secretary to the collector of internal revenue, and from that time to 1890 was chief clerk and record writer to the clerk of the Criminal court. Succeeding this he was chief clerk to Sheriffs Gilbert and Pease until his election, in 1898, as a member of the Board of County Assessors, in which position he has since officiated by reelection. Mr. Weber is a Mason, a Republican, and resides at Blue Island, where, since 1885, he has been a member of the Board of Education. He married, in 1878, Minnie A. Shoengen, by whom he is the father of three children.

George H. White, the present prosecuting attorney for the city of Chicago, has had somewhat of an eventful career. He was born at Union Village, Washington county, New York, September 18, 1854, a son of James and Caroline E. (Cunningham) White. In 1860 the family moved to Boone county, Illinois, where the father followed farming until the Civil war, when he enlisted and served as a member of Company E, Ninety-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. When peace was declared he returned to Illinois, and he and wife resided at Harvard, Illinois, until their respective deaths. George H. White attended the public schools at Harvard, the Normal institute at Sharon, Wisconsin, and in 1875 was graduated from Northwestern university at Evanston, Illinois. He taught school at Momence until 1878, and during this time lectured and took up the study of law.

While still continuing his legal studies he published The Independent, Harvard, Illinois, for one year. He was admitted to the bar at Marshalltown, Iowa; St. Paul, Minnesota; Madison, Wisconsin, and San Francisco, California. In 1882 he located for the practice of his profession at Minneapolis, and while there married Miss Cora H. Arndt. He came to Chicago in 1898, where he has since resided, engaged in general practice. Mr. White is conceded to be one of the ablest lawyers of the Chicago bar. In May, 1907, Hon. Fred A. Busse, mayor of Chicago, displayed his sound judgment, after mature deliberation, by appointing him to the position of city prosecuting attorney, in which capacity he has since served. The administration of this office by Mr. White is one of credit to himself and to the city. Mr. White has resided at 5016 Jefferson avenue, Hyde Park, since coming to Chicago. He is a Knight Templar Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine. Two children, Vernon A., born December 16, 1887, and Gladys C., born October 19, 1890, have blessed his marriage. The family affiliates with the Methodist church.

John L. Whitman was born at Sterling, Illinois, July 23, 1862. His father was P. L. Whitman and his mother before her marriage was Helen Quick, both of whom were natives of New York State and of German descent. The father was by occupation a wagon-maker and is still living at St. Paul, Minnesota, at an advanced age. The mother passed away at Aurora, Illinois, in 1890. John L. resided with his father at Sterling, Illinois, until he had attained the age of 16 years, and was educated in the public schools. At that age he went to Tampico, Illinois, and learned the trade of painter and decorator, after which he returned to Sterling and remained for a short time. In 1890 he came to Chicago and began work as a conductor for the North Chicago Street Railway company, and remained thus occupied for a period of nine months. On December 1, 1890, he entered the county jail as a guard and held the position for four years, when he was promoted to the position of chief clerk. This he held for one year and was then appointed jailer and retained the position until June 1, 1907, when he was appointed superintendent of the house of correction.

Mr. Whitman has had a varied and unusual experience. From his earliest recollection he was interested in the moral surroundings of himself and his associates. He developed a desire to do good and to avoid selfishness. He was a close student of the world and of humanity and at an early age not only became self-supporting but managed to extend his usefulness to many who were not so fortunate as himself. Having had this early training in benevolent fields, his coming to Chicago opened a wider field for his unselfish purposes. While working as a conductor for the street railway company many instances are related of his kindness, humanity and general high character. His appointment as guard at the county jail was the opportunity of his life for benevolence, kindness and humane conduct. As a guard he was a revelation to the prisoners. Uniformly he addressed them kindly and placed himself on the same plane with them, sympathized with their misfortunes and kindled in their hearts a desire to lead a better life. On one occasion during a serious quarrel among the prisoners he hurried to their midst, but no harm was done him, many calling out, "Don't hit him, don't hit him, on your life." His success in this responsible position led to his appointment as jailer, and again in this higher capacity he showed his extra fitness for the position, and so it has gone on until the present. His usefulness can scarcely be overstated and the good he has done would be hard to overestimate.

Through his efforts the John L. Whitman Moral Improvement association of the Cook county jail was slowly evolved and fully organized. The design of the association is to so unite the prisoners as to maintain good order, impart proper instruction and improve the morals of the inmates. He is greatly assisted in his life's work by his able and faithful wife, to whom he was married on November 14, 1880, her maiden name being Anna Glennon, of Woodstock, Illinois, and they have one son, Glennon T., aged 26 years, a deputy clerk in the Municipal court. Mr. Whitman is a Republican and a Baptist. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, Modern Woodmen and National Union. He belongs also to the City and Marquette clubs.

James H. Wilkerson has achieved a national reputation as a lawyer connected with the office of the United States district attorney. He was born December 11, 1869, at Savannah, Missouri, his parents being John W. and Lydia (Austin) Wilkerson. When 13 years old he moved with his family to Mount Ayr, Iowa, and at the age of 15 years entered De Pauw university, at Greencastle, Indiana, from the classical course of which institution he was graduated in 1889, when but 19 years old. The succeeding two years he was principal of the high school at Hastings, Nebraska, then returned to Greencastle, Indiana, where for two years he was a member of the faculty of his alma mater and occupied the chair of English and rhetoric.

During this time he studied law and attended the law school at Greencastle, and in 1894 came to Chicago, passed the Supreme court examination, was admitted to the bar, and for eighteen months practiced law with an office in the office of Myron H. Beach. He then became associated with the firm of Tenney, McConnell & Coffeen, and so continued until 1900, when he was admitted a partner and thus continued until January 1, 1908, since which time he has been engaged in individual practice in connection with his public duties.

Mr. Wilkinson has always been a Republican in politics. In 1902 he was elected from the Thirteenth Senatorial district to the State Legislature, and as a member of that body his services were noteworthy by reason of his conducting the fight for the State Civil Service Law, which failed to pass, and in introducing the resolution for the charter amendment to the State constitution, which was adopted by both House and Senate and was ratified at the following general election. In 1903 Mr. Wilkinson was appointed county attorney, serving as such until September, 1904. In 1906 he was appointed special assistant United States district attorney and has since served in that capacity. In this position he was the attorney in charge of many important cases in litigation that commanded national attention. Among these were those of the Government against the Standard Oil company, which resulted in the fine of over $29,000,000; the rebating cases against the Lehigh Valley Railway company, the Nickel Plate Railway company, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway company, A. Booth & Co.; the case against express companies for issuing franks, or free transportation; the case against the Monon railway for issuing free transportation for advertising; the Allis-Chalmers case for violation of the Alien Labor law; the case enjoining the Sanitary district from diverting the water of Lake Michigan to the Calumet river, and many other similar cases. As a lawyer Mr. Wilkerson ranks among the first in Chicago. He is a member of the Union League, Hamilton and Law clubs, and the Chicago, State and National bar associations. He is married and resides at 6448 Minerva avenue.

Orva G. Williams, president and treasurer of the O. G. Williams Manufacturing company, has been a resident of Chicago since 1899, and has achieved distinction in commercial and public life. He was born April 25, 1865, in Columbiana county, Ohio, but at the age of 1 year was taken by his parents, Richard G. and Elmira (Frost) Williams, to Alliance, Stark county, Ohio, where he was reared and received his education at the Alliance high school and Mount Union college.

Preparatory to a business career he took a course in the Cincinnati Law school, now a department of the University of Cincinnati, and in 1886 located at Ravenna, Ohio, where he embarked in the novelty advertising business. He later became vice-president and secretary of the Standard Novelty company, at Coshocton, Ohio, where he resided many years and built up an extensive business. Under his experienced management the O. G. Williams Manufacturing company has become one of the well-known manufacturing establishments of Chicago. This corporation is capitalized at $150,000, is located at 223 and 225 Washington street, employs forty traveling salesmen, manufactures leather, wood and celluloid novelties, imports lithographic calendars, and has business dealings in every State and territory of the Union and in Mexico and Canada.

Mr. Williams has in the midst of his busy, business career found time to devote to the political and social amenities of life. He is a Democrat in politics, is a member of the Iroquois club, of which he has been treasurer for the last four years, and was a member of the reception committee that entertained President Cleveland when visiting Chicago. A rare event in politics occurred when he, a Democrat, was a member of the banquet committee that entertained President Roosevelt in Chicago. He has not aspired to political preferment, although his name was frequently mentioned as a possible candidate of his party for the office of mayor at the time of the election of Mayor Dunne. He is a thirty-second degree Mason, a Knight Templar of Apollo commandery, No. 1, and a Noble of Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, of the Chicago Athletic association, the Kenwood and South Shore Country clubs; is a member of the ways and means committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce, director of the Civic Federation of Chicago, and in 1908 was elected president of the National Association of Novelty Leather and Celluloid Goods Manufacturers. September 8, 1894, Mr. Williams was united in marriage with Josephine Stack, of Denver, Colo., and is the father of three children—Elsie, Dorothy and Orva G. II.

Adam Wolf was born in the village of Staedecken, near Mayence, Germany, January 5, 1857. His parents, Nicholas and Marianna Henrietta (Zimmermann) Wolf, immigrated to America in 1864, and coming direct to Chicago made this their home until their respective deaths. Adam Wolf was educated in the private and public schools of Chicago and at Bryant and Stratton's business college. For a time thereafter he clerked in a dry goods store and later established himself in that line on Chicago avenue, near Paulina street. Believing it to be the duty of all good citizens to interest themselves in the political welfare of the community, he early took a part in precinct and ward politics, and in 1892 was elected West

Town collector. He served one term in this position, and the following, quoted from the Chicago Daily News of March 30, 1893, is the political creed, in substance, of Mr. Wolf, and, in a measure, is the reason of his subsequent success in politics:

"Something wonderful has happened. A town collector has not only turned over the funds in his possession to the comptroller without being called upon to do so, but has actually paid interest on the money. The man responsible for this agreeable innovation in the method of transacting public business is Mr. Adam Wolf, collector of the West Town. Yesterday on making his usual settlement with the comptroller he found that $1,527.79 interest had accumulated on the daily deposits for four months. This money he turned in with the other funds, something, it is said, which no other town collector has ever done. It is also claimed for Mr. Wolf that he has collected $110,000 more than any other of his predecessors and at the same time has reduced the expense of his office by $2,000. In turning over to the city the interest on public money in his care Mr. Wolf has, perhaps, done nothing more than his duty, but so few men holding public office do their whole duty that it is a pleasure to note an exception to the rule. . . . The value to the community of this precedent can be better appreciated when it is stated that experts figure the interest returned to the public treasury by officials in Illinois since 1893 at about $3,000,000." In 1895 Mr. Wolf was elected city treasurer, and to the duties of this office he gave the same painstaking care that he did to his previous position. In 1898 he was elected a member of the Board of Cook County Assessors, and for just reasons he has since been retained in this position by reelection. In other ways he has been prominently before the public, having served as a member of the Republican State and County Central committees. On March 20, 1884, Mr. Wolf married Anna Enders, and to them five children have been born—Harriet C., Robert N., George A., Herbert C. and Mary Louise.

Bernard Wygant was born at Stone Ridge, Ulster county, New York, on November 11, 1836, and was one in a family of thirteen children, but one now living, born to the marriage of Thomas Wygant and Hannah Woodruff Ketcham, who were of English ancestry, chiefly, but mixed with Scotch and Irish blood. Thomas Wygant was a farmer by occupation. To improve his circumstances and to give his growing family better opportunities he immigrated westward in 1849 and settled on a farm at Lyonsville, Cook county, Illinois. He was there but a short time when the discovery of gold on the Pacific coast led to his crossing the plains to California, and there he died in November, 1850.

His widow and a large family of children, the eldest but 18 years old, were thus left to bear the burdens of life in a practically new country and among strangers. The hardships of pioneer life and the self-denials entailed upon them at that period were the necessary adjuncts of the time. Bernard Wygant had attended the schools of his native town when a small lad, and the death of his father and consequent necessity in helping to maintain the family did not permit him to secure but the ordinary common school education. In 1854 he came to Chicago and the year following was employed as a money delivery man for the American Express company. Succeeding this he was made office clerk, but in 1864 he entered the employ of the Western Union Telegraph company and in 1867 allied himself with the Merchants' Union Express company, which, in 1869, was consolidated with the American Express company.

He thus continued until 1887, when his services were secured by the Wells-Fargo Express company as assistant agent. In 1896 he was promoted general agent of the company, in which capacity he served until his death, December 17, 1908. Mr. Wygant was a Republican, a member of the Illinois club, the Royal League and the Royal Arcanum, the Chicago Commercial association and the Chicago Traffic club. In 1863 he married Miss Apphia B. Frost, and they are the parents of one daughter, Apphia Belle, who is the wife of Verna R. Day, of Chicago.

Alonzo Wygant, son of Thomas Wygant and brother of Bernard Wygant, was for about forty years connected with the United States Express company at Chicago. He was born in Ulster county, New York, July 31, 1846. He was but 3 years old when he was brought to Cook county, Illinois, by his parents, and the district schools of the country and the grammar schools of the city afforded him his education.

At about the age of 18 he entered the employ of the United States Express company and with the exception of a few months' intervals devoted to his private enterprises, he thus continued about forty years.

He was gradually promoted, as his ability developed, to the positions of branch agent, cashier, agent, general agent, and in 1904 to general superintendent. Mr. Wygant became one of the well-known men of the city and commanded universal respect by reason of his general ability, unquestioned integrity and exemplary character. For three years and up to the time of his death he was treasurer of the West Park Board. He was a Republican, a Mason of high standing and belonged to the Episcopal church, the Union League club, the Illinois club and the Chicago Athletic club. In 1868 he married Miss Caroline Aspinwall, a native of Vermont, who, with their daughter Elsie, survive him. Mr. Wygant died December 23, 1907.

Andrew H. Yount, secretary to the president of the County Board, is a native of Tippecanoe county, Indiana, born September 17, 1851, to the marriage of Henry and Catharine (Talbert)

Yount. His early years were spent on a farm. He attended the country schools of the neighborhood and private schools near his home until 1869, when he entered Indiana Asbury (now De Pauw) university. He took a full course, beginning in the preparatory department, and was graduated in 1874.

After leaving college Mr. Yount began the study of law in the offices of Wallace & Rice, attorneys, of Lafayette, Indiana, was admitted to the bar and entered upon the practice of his profession. In May, 1884, he came to Chicago and obtained employment on the Chicago Morning News, with which he was connected until 1905. During this employment he was reporter, political editor, special writer and, for four years, city editor. During the following two years he was editor of the Saturday Blade, a weekly publication of Chicago.

He then entered the employment of the Chicago Inter Ocean newspaper, with which he remained until May, 1906, when, having passed the required civil service examination, he was appointed to the position of secretary to the president of the County Board.

BIOGRAPHIES RECEIVED TOO LATE FOR ALPHABETICAL INSERTION IN VOLUME I.

JOSEPH LOUIS BONDY, president of the J. L. Bondy Wire and Iron Works, general office 1110, 140 Dearborn street, factory at Polk and Rockwell streets, was born at Monroe, Mich., December 16, 1868, a son of Charles and Mary (Guyor) Bondy, of French descent in both lines. One of his ancestors settled in Detroit in 1794, and his maternal great-grandfather fought for American independence under General Washington, and died at the very unusual age of 113 years. His mother's father wielded a strong and good influence over many of the leading Indians in what is now Michigan and was the arbitrator of numerous disputes among them. Sometimes they came long distances for his advice, by which they are said always to have abided. Because of his uncommon physical strength, they called him "Big White Oak." Charles Bondy was successful as a contractor and builder, and died in 1884. Joseph Louis Bondy was educated in public schools at Detroit, so far as education was permitted him in his youth, and when only eleven years old became a floor sweeper in the employ of the National Wire and Iron company of that city. During the succeeding eight years he was gradually promoted until he became a traveling salesman, his advancement to that position necessarily implying an intimate knowledge on his part of the details of the business as well as of its relations with the peculiar trade to which it appeals. He left Detroit to come to Chicago and take a similar position with the company controlling the Barbee Wire and Iron Works, with which he remained eleven years. Then he opened an office as a manufacturer's agent and after a year of success established a factory. His enterprise grew so rapidly that in 1907 he found it necessary to incorporate it, and the J. L. Bondy Wire and Iron Works was launched, with Joseph Louis Bondy as president, Edwin C. Boutelle as vice-president and Charles E. Bondy as secretary and treasurer. The company manufactures a general line of ornamental wire and iron work, employs about fifty men, and its operations are extending so rapidly that it expects soon to double its working force. It has successfully undertaken numerous important contracts, among them the contract for the iron work, fire escapes, etc., for the Chicago Board of Education, others for iron accessories at Forest Park and at Oak Park, and another for all of the window gratings on the new county building. As well as being the largest producers of ornamental iron fencing in the middle west, their 72-page catalogue, devoted exclusively to iron and wire fencing, is recognized by the trade as being the most elaborate and complete ever published. In many ways he has proven himself a citizen of public spirit. He is a member of the Illinois Athletic association, and in 1906 was commodore of the Columbia Yacht club. He married Mary Pringle, a native of Edinburgh, Scotland, October 19, 1890, and she has borne him three children, only one of whom (Joseph Louis Bondy, Jr.) is living. His residence is at 309 Winthrop avenue.

Herman H. Breidt, lawyer and State Senator, was born June 22, 1859, in the city of Chicago. His father, Julius Breidt, was born in Pfortsheim, Baden, Germany, and immigrated to the United States about the year 1845, and soon thereafter came to Chicago, where he conducted a jewelry store at the corner of Randolph and Canal streets until the time of his death. His mother, Pauline Breidt, whose maiden name was Pauline Graefe, is one of the early settlers of Chicago. She was born in the village of Asthausen, Saxony Meiningen, Germany, and immigrated to Canada about 1850, and came to Chicago some five years later.

After attending the public schools in boyhood Herman H. Breidt became a student at Dyrenforth's Business college. After leaving school he embarked in the jewelry business for a short time, and, although successful he disposed of his business and began the study of law, that being the profession of his choice. He is a graduate of the Chicago Kent College of Law, and received the degree of LL.B. from Lake Forest university. Since early manhood Mr. Breidt has taken a deep interest in political matters, and as a Republican has been an active worker in the interests of his party. He has served as secretary of the Twenty-seventh Ward Republican club three years and as its president six consecutive years. He was elected a member of the Forty-third and Forty-fourth General Assemblies of the State Legislature, and in 1906 he was elected to the State Senate, representing the Twenty-fifth Senatorial district. In the Forty-third General Assembly he was chairman of the committee on Fees and Salaries. During that session he introduced in the House of Representatives the police pension bill which is now the law in this state. In the Forty-fourth General Assembly he was chairman of the committee on Judicial Department and Practice, one of the most important committees in the gift of the speaker. As a member of the Senate in the Forty-fifth General Assembly he was chairman of the committee on military affairs and as such introduced and had passed the bill revising the military code of this state and making same conform with the regular army code. During the Forty-sixth General Assembly Mr. Breidt was chairman of the civil service and of the election committees. As a legislator Mr. Breidt's actions have been intelligent and effective, particularly in regard to his district, the city of Chicago and Cook county, and many good laws now on our statute books were introduced and aided in their passage by him.

He is a member of Logan Square Lodge No. 891, A. F. and A. M.;

Avondale Chapter, order of the Eastern Star; Oriental Consistory, A. A. S. R.; Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S.; Avondale Lodge of Odd Fellows, Garden City Lodge, Knights of Pythias, Maplewood Council, Royal Arcanum, Herman H. Breidt Camp, Modern Woodmen of America, Avondale Council of the Royal League and a member of other social organizations. On November 12, 1890, Senator Breidt married Carrie B. Haussen, daughter of the late Ferdinand Haussen, who for forty years was a member of the village and high school board of the village and town of Jefferson and who was a member of the City Council of the city of Chicago during the World's Columbian Exposition. Mr. Breidt resides with his family, which consists of himself, wife and son, Hilmer, Breidt, at 2710 Milwaukee avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Perley D. Castle, present cashier of the Austin State bank, was born in Barrington, this county, on March 2, 1863, and is the son of Lester D. and Lucy A. (Taylor) Castle. The Castles are of English descent and originally lived in New York state. The Taylors are also of English descent and were Puritans in colonial times. Lester D. is the descendant of Henry, who came to the colonies in 1635. Phineas Castle, the great grandfather of Perley D., served as a captain in the French and Indian War, and later, when well advanced in years, was a continental soldier in the Revolutionary War under General Israel Putnam. The grandfather of the subject was Edward Castle, who married Jerusha Bellew, and their children were Lester D.; Emily, who married W. J. Lytle; Rhoda, who married Ira J. Chase, a former governor of Indiana, and Charlotte. Edward was one of the pioneers of Cook county and settled in the township of Palatine, near the village of Barrington. He purchased eighty acres of the government, and owned a total of 160 acres. This land is still held by the members of the family. Edward finally owned a total of 200 acres. He was public spirited and one of the prominent pioneers of that community. He assisted in establishing the First Methodist church at Barrington. He died in 1870, aged seventy years. Lester D., father of the subject, was born on March 4, 1826, in New York. He received a common school education and at the age of seventeen years came to Cook county with his father. He finished his education in Waukegan academy and then worked on his father's farm. He married Lucy A. Taylor, daughter of Samuel, who was an Illinois pioneer and a descendant of Puritan ancestors. Lester D. remained on the homestead after his marriage and there became a prominent and useful citizen. Late in life he retired to Barrington. He was a great admirer of Abraham Lincoln, and was a stanch anti-slavery and Union man. He held several local offices with credit and fidelity. He served as a member of the Board of County Commissioners in the '50s when only twenty-seven years old. His wife was a member of the Methodist church. He passed away in 1905, in Barrington.

To him and wife were born the following children: Arthur L., Percy V., Charles S., Fredrica, Perley D. Ben B. and Lotta. Perley D. was reared on his father's farm and was educated at the district school and at the Barrington high school. He taught school in his home district and later began work in the store of A. F. Davis, at Ridgefield. Later he was in partnership with Mr. Davis, under the name of Davis & Castle, general merchants. After six years he moved to Austin and in 1891 assisted in organizing the Austin State bank, becoming one of its stockholders. He was elected cashier and has held the office ever since, to the satisfaction of the stockholders. On June 25, 1890, while living in Ridgefield, he married Edith A., daughter of A. F. Davis, and they have four children, Harold A., Lester D., Dorothy J. and Virginia E. The family are members of the Presbyterian church of Austin.

Richard E. Coldrick, the present efficient city clerk of Harvey, who is engaged in the insurance and real estate business there, was born in Godnet, Ontario, on July 28, 1859, and is a son of Henry and Jane (Stephen) Coldrick. The father was a doctor and a dealer in art goods, paints and paper, and for many years was prominent in the locality where he resided. The parents are now living in London, Canada. Richard E. was educated in the public schools of Canada and in those of Flint, Mich., where the family resided for some time. In 1869 they returned to Flint, and after about three years went back to Canada. Richard E., during these movements, remained with the family, but finally returned to Flint and resided with his maternal grandmother until 1886, finishing in the meantime his education at the high school. He began business life in his father's store and later occupied a position in the store of his uncle at Flint, Mich. In 1891 he came to Harvey, Cook county, and became a clerk in the office of the Chicago and Grand Trunk railway. There he remained until 1896, when he accepted a position in the office of the Bellaire Stamping Company's works at Harvey. Having shown his fitness for business, he was later sent on the road by this company as a commercial traveler, during which time he sold goods throughout Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Iowa. In 1901 he engaged in the real estate business at Harvey and has thus been successfully and actively occupied until the present. He early took an active interest in the welfare of the community, and his qualities and standing were recognized in 1901 by his election to the office of city clerk and by his reelection to the present time. He is a Republican and Episcopalian. On June 30, 1896, he married Annette M. Greene, daughter of Thomas and Sarah (Preston) Greene of Flint, Mich. They had one son, Ernest Harold.

Clarence L. Cross was born in Binghamton, N. Y., in 1854, and is the son of Alfred J. and Francelia (Harvey) Cross, who came to Chicago in 1857. The father, Alfred J., was born in Keeseville, N. Y., on September 10, 1833, and died in Chicago in 1901. His father, John Cross, came originally from New Hampshire, but later lived in New York in the vicinity of Oswego and Binghamton. Alfred J., in 1853, married at Hamilton, N. Y., Francelia Harvey, who died in 1891. By this marriage the following children were born: Clarence L., Mrs. C. O. Gregg, Mrs. M. C. Chambers and Mrs. C. F. Ames. Alfred J., in 1893, married as a second wife Mrs. Theodore Curtis of Chicago. This lady survives him. In 1856 Alfred J., having made up his mind to settle in the West, left his family at Binghamton and came to Chicago. Finding the outlook favorable for business he returned and brought his family out the following year. He engaged in contracting and street paving and the filling in of streets and had a great deal of work in bringing the street level to its present elevation. He paved Dearborn street with the first cobble stones put down in this city. He removed the buildings at old Fort Dearborn when the latter was dismantled. In 1859 he contracted to build a part of the Mobile and Ohio railroad in Tennessee and Mississippi and was thus engaged when the Civil War broke out. He spent four months in trying to save a portion of his property, but was then compelled to go North, owing to the hostility and the feeling against Northern men. It was about this time that Alfred J. and his father, John R., patented a machine for graining hollow ware. This method is used generally today, manufacturers using the same patterns. Prior to this date all wooden pails, wash tubs, etc., were painted, but afterward they were grained by the Cross process. They also patented a machine for transferring the natural grain of hard wood to interior finish, cabinet work, etc. This process was photographic in its reproduction. Alfred J. was an early resident of Riverside and took an active part in the organization of that village. In 1876 he served as one of the trustees from the organization until 1881. He held other public offices in the town of Riverside with credit to himself and took great interest in the welfare of the village. About 1874 he connected himself with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad and was continuously in the employment of that road thereafter until the date of his death. Immediately after the great fire of 1871 he was field marshal of the shelter committee. Mr. T. W. Harvey also took an active part at this time in restoring order in the city and providing houses for the homeless. Under their generalship over 8,000 houses were built in about four months. These buildings were completely furnished with the necessities of life and were supplied with fuel and food. This assistance was given to just those families as had lost their homes and were unable to build from their own means. Clarence L. was educated in the common and city schools and upon reaching manhood married Grace, the daughter of Ezra Sherman of Chicago. They have three children: Bessie, Alfred and Phyllis. Clarence L. has resided at Riverside since 1875. For eight years he held the office of village trustee and for one year was president of the village. He is a member of the Union League and Riverside Golf clubs and of the Chicago Association of Commerce.

C. L. Davidson of Harvey was born at Coldwater, Mich., on September 12, 1861, and is a son of Lucien and Anna (Hill) Davidson. While he was yet an infant the family moved to near Michigan City, Ind., where he was reared, and where he received a public school education. He worked on a farm and later teamed until 1885, when the family came to Kensington, Ill. He was employed in his father's flour and feed store for a time, but in 1892 came to Harvey as an employe of the Harvey Land association. From 1895 to 1897 he was a member of the Harvey police force, then became a member of the firm of Davidson & Son, which does a general teaming and livery business, the senior member of the firm being his father. The Davidsons, father and son, are among the respected and substantial business men of Harvey. C. L. Davidson is a Republican in politics and he and family are communicants of the Methodist Episcopal church. He was married in 1893 to Miss Nellie Burroughs, a native of Northern Michigan, and to their union three children have been born.

Dr. Thomas A. Davis is one of the most eminent surgeons in the West, and has also such marked ability as an executive and business man that he is especially identified with the founding and advancement of the medical and surgical institutions of Chicago. The College of Physicians and Surgeons, with its hospital and dispensary adjuncts, is greatly indebted to his professional ability and faithfulness, as well as his financial foresight and his business energy, for its standing as one of the foremost institutions of the kind in the country. It is his alma mater, and with English-Scotch pertinacity and intellectual virility he has been faithful and constantly influential in the advancement of her best interests.

Born at Ingersol, Ontario, on the 22d of December, 1858, Doctor Davis is the son of Thomas and Catherine (Kennedy) Davis. His father was a native of London, England, and his mother was born in Edinburgh, Scotland. At an early age in his life the family removed to Wisconsin, where Thomas A. received a common school education and a partial collegiate schooling before engaging in business with a large milling and elevator company of New Richland, Minn. He had already commenced his medical studies, and during this period of active business, covering five years, continued them. In 1879 he pursued a short course at Rush Medical college, and while still in business at New Richland studied under Dr. Carroll Corson. Finishing his regular course in medicine and surgery at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1885, as one of the first graduates of the school, he soon afterward commenced his service as interne of the Cook County hospital, holding in succession the various positions of junior physician and surgeon, examiner, obstetrician, pathologist and senior physician and surgeon. In 1887 he entered private practice and in the same year became associated with the College of Physicians and Surgeons as lecturer on surgery. His subsequent advancements on the staff of that institution include adjunct professor of surgery (1892), associate professor of surgery (1894) and professor of surgery (1896). In 1894 he was also chosen to the office of president of the medical and surgical staff of the West Side hospital (affiliated with the college), and this position he still holds, having been surgeon to the Cook County hospital since 1874. It may be stated that for eight years Doctor Davis served as first assistant to the eminent surgeon, the late Dr. Christian Fenger, which experience, with his service at the West Side and Cook County hospitals, furnished him with unusual opportunities for wide observation and practical work even, in the earlier years of his career.

Doctor Davis has served for many years as chief of the Cook County hospital staff, and was for a time president of the West Side Free Dispensary. He has been professor of surgery in the Chicago Post-Graduate Medical school, and is a leading member of the following organizations: American Medical association, Illinois State Medical society, Chicago Medical society and the Chicago Pathological society. He is a Master Mason, a Knight Templar and a Shriner, being a member of Hesperia lodge, Washington Chapter and Chicago Commandery, and is also identified with the Illinois club.

In 1893 Doctor Davis was united in marriage with Miss Jennie McKee, daughter of J. L. McKee, of Three Oaks, Mich., and to their union has been born one child, Helen. Although he has an office in the Columbus Memorial building in the down-town district, the Doctor has resided for many years at 981 West Jackson boulevard. He has wisely invested his large professional earnings in real estate and other securities, and has attained a substantial standing as a leading surgeon, a man of affairs and one of the prosperous citizens of the West Side.

John Donaldson, one of the best known certified public accountants in Chicago, was born in Montreal January 26, 1847, and is the son of William and Elizabeth (Lang) Donaldson. The father was a native of Perthshire, Scotland, and came to Canada about 1835. In 1837 during the Papineau rebellion he served as a member of one of the Scottish Highlander regiments located in Montreal at that time. Afterward he was for many years a successful dry goods merchant of Montreal. His son John was educated at the public schools and at two of the well known private academies of Montreal, and at the age of sixteen years entered the office of one of the large retail dry goods stores with which he continued for several years. Later he accepted a position in the office of the Citizens' Insurance company and of the Provincial Permanent Building society, as head accountant, of which organization Sir Hugh Allen of the Allen Steamship company was for many years president. In 1871 he moved to Toronto and remained there for eighteen years, when he came to Chicago with his family. For thirty years he has been a successful public accountant and auditor. During his residence in this city he has been connected with many of the largest manufacturing and financial establishments, making a specialty of insolvency, legal work, partnerships, public offices, etc. He is regarded as one of the most reliable and accurate of the certified accountants of the city. Mr. Donaldson is recording secretary and has been for many years a steward of the Wesley church, and is also superintendent of the senior department of the Sunday school and chairman of the committee on music. He is secretary of the Black Hills Anaconda Mining and Milling company, one of the famous mines of the Black Hills district. It is believed that this mine will soon become one of the most famous mines in America, as it has all the possibilities of being such. The recent discoveries of enormous deposits of Uranium with other valuable metals has added very greatly to the future prospects of this wonderful mine. On March 31, 1871, Mr. Donaldson married Jane Ann Landon of Spencerville, Ontario. They had six children, three of whom are the following, now living: Katherine McLean of Portland, Ore.; Elizabeth L., a graduate of Chicago University School of Education, now a teacher; and Robert Duncan, the Chicago representative of several New York business houses.

William J. Doyle was born April 29, 1879, at Perth, Province of Ontario, Canada, a son of Timothy and Teressa (Devlin) Doyle. His father was a farmer and died in 1906; his mother is yet living at Perth, Canada.

The subject of this sketch received his early education in the public schools, subsequently attending Perth Collegiate Institute, from which he was graduated with the class of 1897 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He then took a course in commercial law, bookkeeping and stenography at Perth Business college, and after his graduation therefrom came to Chicago in 1897, and for a time was employed as a stenographer, and attended the John Marshall Law school, from which he was duly graduated. He began his professional career in the legal department of the Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland, and later was associated with the Bankers' Surety company. At the time of the establishment in Chicago of a branch of the Title Guarantee and Surety Company of Scranton, Pennsylvania, Mr. Doyle became its assistant resident manager and also had charge of the legal department. He has since retained this position. Although of foreign birth Mr. Doyle is in all other essentials an American, and particularly a Chicagoan, with an unswerving belief in the present and future greatness of Chicago. His office is in the Rookery and his residence is at 5735 Lake street, Austin. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, the Woodmen of the World, and belongs to the Commercial and Hamilton clubs. August 27, 1902, he married Miss Fannie K. Mulligan of Chicago, and they have one son, Lester.

Dr. Geoffrey J. Fleming of Austin was born on the West Side, Chicago, on June 1, 1873, and is the son of James, who came from Ireland to Chicago in the early '50s. The Fleming family went from Flanders to England about the time of the Norman conquest and after that were residents of Great Britain. A particular branch of Flemings of which the subject of this review is a member settled in County Coren, Ireland, and there they engaged in farming. Four brothers of the family came to Chicago, Peter, Geoffrey, David and James. Here they prospered, reared families and passed their lives. James was the father of Dr. Geoffrey J. He was at one time connected with the Chicago water works department. His first wife died in Chicago and his second wife, Alice Sheridan, was born in Montreal, Canada. To him and second wife were born the following children: Nellie, Geoffrey J., Alice, Elizabeth, Catherine, Joseph, Marie and Grace. James was of an inventive and mechanical turn of mind. While connected with the water department he devised a non-freezing fire plug. Dr. Geoffrey J. was reared in Chicago and was educated at St. Stephens parochial school and later attended St. Mary's College, Kansas, from which he was graduated in 1893. He then took a full four years' course in the College of Physicians and Surgeons and was graduated in 1897, with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. Succeeding his graduation he served as interne in the Cook County hospital for eighteen months. In 1900 he began the practice of his profession in Austin in the same neighborhood where he yet lives. He soon had a large and lucrative practice and at the present date is one of the leading physician and citizens of this portion of the county. He is a member of the Chicago Medical society, American Medical association, and is a diligent student of medical questions and economic problems. He is one of the medical staff of Oak Park hospital. On July 23, 1890, he married Harriet Sonn, a daughter of James Van Ness and Sarah (Bowen) Sonn. The Sonns were of Holland stock. The Doctor is a Knight of Columbus and a Forester. In politics he is independent.

Harry E. Guest had achieved creditable distinction as one of the leading business men of southern Cook county after having lived here but ten years. He was born at Hamilton, Ontario, June 14, 1869, a son of William George and Anna (Gual) Guest. During boyhood and early manhood he attended the public schools of Ancaster, a suburb of Hamilton, and assisted his father, who was a large dealer in farm implements and hardware, and also worked at farming. In 1899 he came to Chicago and for a time was employed in a factory at Blue Island. He then engaged in the wholesale cracker business at Englewood as a member of the firm known as the Crossman Jobbing company, but subsequently sold his interest to A. B. Crossman and embarked in the jobbing of candies and confections, in a small way, at Blue Island. Good business methods and painstaking care enabled him to prosper until he removed to his present location on Halsted street, near 119th street, where better facilities were afforded. In 1902 the business was incorporated as the Harry E. Guest Candy company, with a capital of $30,000. Harry E. Guest was the president and C. T. Walmsley secretary and treasurer. This firm is now carrying a large and carefully selected stock of goods, employ a large corps of assistants, operate nine delivery wagons and practically supply the trade of southern Cook county.

Mr. Guest is an Odd Fellow and a member of the North American Union. In politics he is a Republican. January 24, 1895, he married Miss Marcia Lord, and he and wife, with their two daughters, Margaret Lord and Helen Louise, reside at 211 Burr Oak avenue, Blue Island.

Henry J. Hankermeyer, residing at 5807 Henry street, Austin, was born at Hanty, Hanover, Germany, February 16, 1846, his father being William Hankermeyer. He acquired a limited education in the public schools and married so young that he was only nineteen when, in 1865, he brought his wife, who was Dorothy Von der Ahe, and their infant son, Henry C., to the United States. They made the voyage to New York in seven weeks on a sailing vessel, and were a week on an immigrant train between New York and Chicago. Mr. Hankermeyer had spent all his money except $2.50 and borrowed more from German friends. He secured employment at $1.25 a day on the Galena division of the Chicago & Northwestern railroad and thus continued eight months. In 1866 he began working at $2.50 a day in a clock factory at Austin, his home being on Park avenue in a little house that had been moved from Oak Park and is still standing. After a brief residence in Chicago he returned to Austin, where he bought a small frame house and two lots for $900 saved from his small earnings. In the employ of the clock company he had gained some proficiency with the saw and the hammer and for ten years he labored successfully as a carpenter and builder. He was appointed policeman at $60 a month and served as such three years, the first and only policeman in Cicero, driving all over the township with a horse and buggy. Returning to house-building at Austin, he began to invest quite heavily in local real estate, buying first two lots at Chicago and Park avenues, on which he built, and similarly sixteen lots on Prairie avenue. While tearing down a house in Hyde Park he broke both his legs, and when he was able to walk again he was elected constable, which office he filled eight years, meanwhile putting up a block of business buildings at Superior street and Park avenue. His success was the just reward of energy and honesty. As one of the founders and chief promoters of the Lutheran church at Austin, he induced H. W. Austin, "father" of the place, to give a church lot and a bell and to assist otherwise. An organization of about sixty Germans was effected, money was subscribed and Mr. Hankermeyer erected a small frame building which stands near the present church and houses a parochial school. He was a liberal giver toward the new church building. Mr. Hankermeyer is a Republican in politics. His wife has borne him the following named children besides four who died young: Henry C., George, Frank, Annie, Mary, Walter, Arthur and Mabel. All these, except Annie, have married. He finished at the Lakeside business college and the Metropolitan Business college and was prepared for business. At the age of eighteen years he began for himself in the grain and hay business as a member of the firm of Fred Hey & Sons, thus using his father's name because of the fact that both sons were minors. Following this he became a street-car driver and conductor, then resumed the sign painting business as a contractor, and still later embarked in real estate operations, also being associated with Alderman William J. Murphy in the manufacture of bricks. A characteristic trait of Mr. Lorimer developed during this varied career was to know the details of whatever he took upon himself to do and this quality has been a predominant quality of his whole life. In 1887 he was appointed assistant superintendent of the city water main extension department and had charge of the water system of all the territory south of Madison street. In 1891, by appointment of Mayor Hempstead Washburne, he became superintendent of the Water Department, a position he resigned in 1892 in order to devote his time to the furtherance of his candidacy for clerk of the Superior court. College of Physicians and Surgeons, Chicago. On February 9, 1847, he was born on the Isle of Man, and is the son of William and Margaret (Kinley) Quine. He was brought to Chicago in 1853 and in the public common and high schools received his early literary training. Upon reaching early manhood he served an apprenticeship of four years in pharmacy. Having made up his mind to study medicine he entered the Chicago Medical college and after receiving a full course was graduated with credit in 1869 and with a degree of Doctor of Medicine. Doctor Quine ever since beginning the practice has steadily and rapidly advanced until he is now recognized as one of the ablest and most successful physicians of the West. As an instructor he occupies an important and commanding position at this date. He was professor of materia medica and therapeutics in the Chicago Medical college from 1870 to 1883. Since the latter year he has occupied the chair of principles and practice of medicine in the College of Physicians and Surgeons. His medical learning, enthusiasm and ability as an instructor and an executive officer are recognized throughout the West and have left a powerful impress upon the students who have passed under his eye. He is a member of the Medical Board of the Cook County hospital also a member of the Neurological society of the Chicago Academy of Sciences, also of the American Medical Association, the Chicago Medical society, the Chicago Pathological society, the Chicago Society of Internal Medicine, the Illinois State Medical society, of which latter he is ex-president and is also a member of several clubs, as follows: Practitioner, Washington Park, and Westward Ho. His office is in the Columbus Memorial building and his residence at 3160 Indiana avenue.

John Tracy Rafferty was born in Chicago November 13, 1861, a son of John and Mary (Tracy) Rafferty, and was educated by Jesuits in the Brother's school on the West Side. He was several years employed in bridge construction. About 1887 he was appointed to the Chicago police force and, with Lieutenant Plunkett, stood guard during the World's Columbian Exposition at the eastern gate of the grounds. Eventually he became a "plain clothes man," with the rank of sergeant. Resigning a few years after the World's Fair, he engaged in the liquor trade, in which he continued as long as he lived. He married Josephine Hobart Smith February 28, 1898. She was a native of McDonough county, Illinois, and a descendant in one line from the late Vice-President Hobart. This family of Hobart has an American history dating back more than 200 years. Mr. Rafferty was a Knight of Pythias and a member of the Chicago Policeman's Benevolent association and of other social and beneficial societies. He was a Republican and believed in and promoted good government. Genial and benevolent, of scholarly inclination and habits, he was a staunch friend, broadly charitable in all relations, helpful where help could be worthily bestowed. He died July 31, 1907. His widow, Josephine Hobart (Smith) Rafferty, is a trained nurse. Childless, she has given a home to and reared several orphan children and found homes for others. Her benevolences have been many and unfortunates of all classes have found in her a friend who has delighted in helping them so far as she has been able.

John F. Smulski was born at Posen, German-Poland, in 1868, and is the son of William and Euphenia Smulski. Both father and mother were also natives of Posen and in 1869 came to the United States. The father followed the occupation of farming for many years and later in life became the publisher of the first Polish newspaper in America, The Polish Catholic Gazette. He passed away in Chicago in 1897, but his widow is yet living at an advanced age. John F. Smulski was brought to Chicago by his parents at the age of ten years. Previous to coming here he had received a primary schooling in Berlin, Germany. Upon his arrival here he began attending St. Jerome's college and finished with a course at the Northwestern University Law school. He was admitted to the bar in 1890 and continued the practice of his profession with success for a period of sixteen years. However, as early as 1886 he had engaged in the publishing business with his father. In 1906 he organized the Northwestern Trust and Savings bank and was duly elected its president. At the present time he is also president of the Pulaske Lumber company. His abilities have made him conspicuous in the business and public affairs of Chicago. For three terms he served with credit as a member of the City Council. He was city attorney for two terms and was treasurer of Illinois for one term. He is now an ex-president of the West Park board. In all the various positions he has occupied he has brought to bear upon his duties rare ability and sterling honesty. As city attorney he reorganized and systematized the conduct of that office. He adopted the policy on liability claims that the city either did or did not owe the amount claimed and accordingly refused to compromise. The office was cleared of political bias and was conducted as it should be, purely on a business basis. He inaugurated, in fact, a new regime which was the basis of the present excellent and systematic management of the office. As president of the West Park board he effected several important reforms. He is a Roman Catholic and a member of the Chicago Athletic association and the Chicago Press and Hamilton clubs. In 1899 he married Harriet M. Smulski and they reside at 46 Columbia street.

Dr. Bayard Taylor Stevenson, a successful practitioner of medicine at Harvey, was born at Rising Sun, Ind., December 7, 1872. He is a son of Dr. George A. and Margaret R. (Hastings) Stevenson, and a grandson of Armour Stevenson, who was descended from colonial ancestors. Dr. George A. Stevenson was a graduate of Rush Medical college of the class of 1864, and for forty-five years has been practicing medicine at Rising Sun, Ind., where he is not only extolled as a capable physician, but is highly regarded for his sterling worth as a man and a citizen.

Dr. Bayard T. Stevenson received his early schooling in the place of his nativity and later took a course in the State Normal school at Terre Haute. Under the direction of his father he read medicine and attended lectures at the Hospital School of Medicine, Louisville, Ky., and the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Chicago. He was graduated from the latter in 1898, and began the practice of his profession at Patriot (Switzerland county), Ind. After a short stay at Patriot he came to Harvey, Ill., where he has since resided in the enjoyment of a practice far above the average.

Doctor Stevenson, aside from his duties of caring for the ailments of the people of southern Cook county, has been active in promoting civic growth along sane, business lines, and has particularly aided in the improvement of sanitary conditions in Harvey. In 1894 he married Miss Isobel Bowker, daughter of John E. and Henrietta (Peabody) Bowker.

Walenty Szymanski, dealer in household goods, furniture and hardware, 624 Blue Island avenue, was born in the Province of Posen, German Poland, January 30, 1860, a son of Cassimir and Mary Szymanski. When eighteen years old, in 1878, he came to the United States and locating in Chicago began, in a small way, his present business at 618 Blue Island avenue. Being of a frugal disposition and with good business judgment, he gradually prospered, and as his means afforded, expanded until he has become recognized as one of the successful and progressive business men of Chicago. In 1892 he removed to his present location, which he owns in fee simple. Mr. Szymanski was married in July, 1883, to Miss Victoria Synoracki, and to their union have been born three daughters: Wanda, the wife of Victor Schiller, D. D. S., Isabella and Cornelia. He is a member of St. Albert's Polish Roman Catholic church, the Polish National Alliance, of which he was vice president one year, the Polish Turners, St. Albert's society, the Catholic Order of Foresters No. 62, the Royal Arcanum, Columbian Knights, Bohemian Independent Order of Foresters, Knights and Ladies of Honor and St. A...a's Roman Catholic society. In politics he is independent and votes for the man rather than the party.

Enoch Albert Whipple, manager of the Grand Pacific hotel, was born at Jefferson, Wis., December 21, 1851, a son of Zebulon and Helen M. (Brown) Whipple. His father, a successful stock raiser, died in 1900. Mr. Whipple was educated in common schools in Jefferson county, Wisconsin, and at the Chicago Commercial school. In 1872 he established himself in the lumber trade at the Clybourn bridge and conducted a successful business during the ensuing three years. He was cashier of the Grand Pacific hotel 1875-79, and with J. M. Lee as a partner, became connected with the Victoria hotel. Two years later he went to the Palmer house as assistant manager. After a year's success there he was for five years assistant manager of the Great Northern hotel, then became manager of the Grand Pacific. His long connection with these well-known hostleries has made him a figure in the hotel world. Mr. Whipple married Miss Elizabeth Fitzgerald, July 11, 1904, and has two sons—Richard G. and Willis Z. Whipple. His residence is at 538 Leland avenue.

Edson Stayman Willaman, treasurer of the well known firm of Thomas J. Bolger company, and one of the progressive and aggressive younger business men of the Chicago of today, was born at Smithville, O., December 1, 1879. John Willaman, his father, was engaged in the grain and milling business, married Elizabeth Bauman and died at Wooster, O., in 1898. Members of the family earned distinction in Ohio regiments during the Civil War, and in business careers and citizenship became prominent. In the year 1900 Mrs. Willaman moved to Chicago, where she now resides.

In the public schools and a business college at Wooster, O., Edson Stayman Willaman received his education. Coming to Chicago in 1900 he embarked in the retail drug business at the corner of Sangamon and Madison streets, and while thus engaged took a course of instruction in the Chicago College of Pharmacy. In 1902, after having disposed of his drug business, he entered the firm of Thomas J. Bolger company as treasurer and as such has since officiated. The success of the large commercial houses of Chicago is based, primarily, upon the business integrity of its officers, and upon the harmonious working of its different departments. The firm of Thomas J. Bolger Company is no exception to this rule. From a small beginning the firm has worked its way up to a foremost position among the dealers in municipal bonds and high grade securities of the city. As treasurer of the company Mr. Willaman, although young in years, has been a potent factor in the success of his firm and is conceded to be one of the foremost bond experts in the country. As a citizen he quietly and unostentatiously exerts his influence for the general good, and in voting casts his ballot for the man rather than for the party. He is a thirty-second degree Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine and is a member of the Illinois Athletic association. His home is at 247 Winthrop avenue and his business location is 703, 153 La Salle street.

Dr. John King Winer was born at Toronto, Canada, on October 22, 1862, and is a son of William D. and Helen (King) Winer. The Winers for several generations have been physicians and surgeons. The Grandfather Winer served as a surgeon during the Revolutionary war. The grandfather on the mother's side was president of the faculty and a professor of medicine at Trinity college, Toronto. The father came to Chicago in the '50s and continued to practice here successfully until the outbreak of the Civil War, when he was appointed major surgeon of the Twenty-third Illinois infantry, known at the time as Mulligan's brigade. He went to the front with this command, but upon the capture of the latter at Lexington, Mo., and its dispersion, he returned to Chicago after his liberation. Upon his arrival here he became chief surgeon at Camp Douglas. He saw various other services during the war and at its close established himself in Chicago in the general practice of surgery. At the time of his death in 1872 he was admittedly one of the most skillful, successful and prominent surgeons in the country. In conjunction with Sister Walberger he founded St. Joseph's hospital and for many years was its only medical attendant. Dr. John King Winer was educated at the public schools of this city and at St. Ignatius college, also at St. Michael's college and Upper Canada college of Toronto. Having concluded to study medicine, he entered Rush Medical college and in due time was graduated with honor in 1884, and with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. From 1884 to 1886 inclusive, he served as an interne in the Cook County hospital. He has practiced in this city and with much success since 1886. He is at present attending physician at Passavant hospital, obstetrician of St. Vincent's Orphan asylum, and attending physician at the North Star dispensary. He is a member of the Chicago Medical society, the Illinois State Medical association and the American Medical association. On September 30, 1888, he married Nellie Cox, daughter of the late William Cox, former cashier of the Chicago National bank. They have one child, Honor Winer. The family resides at 299 La Salle avenue and the doctor's office is at 202 Bush Temple.

Ninian H. Welch, assistant Probate Judge of Cook county, is a native of Illinois, born near Rosecrans, Lake county, January 1, 1873, a son of John T. and Emma J. (Page) Welch. His parents were natives of New York and Michigan, respectively, were married in Lake county and both families were among the early settlers of Illinois. They were the parents of four children: John P., William S., an attorney of Chicago; Ninian H. and Sue Emmeline, a graduate of the University of Chicago and a teacher in the high schools of the city.

The subject of this sketch was reared on a farm, was graduated from Wheaton college with the degree of Bachelor of Science, took a post-graduate course in philosophy and history at Beloit college, and later the degree of Master of Arts from Lake Forest University and the degree of Bachelor of Laws from Chicago-Kent College of Law. During his collegiate career he taught school in order to secure the means to defray his expenses in securing his education.

On June 1, 1902, he began practicing law in Chicago, which he has since continued. On January 1, 1907, he was appointed assistant judge of the Probate court of Cook county, in which capacity he has since served. Mr. Welch is a Republican in politics, a member of Garfield Lodge No. 686 A. F. and A. M., Washington Chapter No. 43 R. A. M., the Royal Arcanum, the National Union and the Hamilton clubs. He has achieved distinction as a speaker, his public utterances being characterized by logic, incisive reasoning and oratory of a high order, and his services are always called for during political campaigns. June 18, 1908, he married Miss Mabel M. Ott, a native of Michigan, and the daughter of Joseph E. and Rose (Boyer) Ott, and their residence is at 994 West Adams street.

THE INFIRMARY — THE WORLD'S FAIR — SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR — LATE BANKING — MARQUETTE CLUB — SEAL OF CHICAGO — HAMILTON CLUB

WHEN the Legislature of Illinois in 1907 enacted a law authorizing the State Board of Charities to take charge of and care for all insane persons confined in county institutions, it became necessary for Cook county to build a new infirmary. Before the insane asylum at Dunning could be turned over to the State the inmates of the old infirmary and consumptive hospital had to be removed from the county farm, on which the asylum was located.

Upon the passage of the law the County Board set about seeking a new site for the poorhouse. One was found at Oak Forest, three miles southwest of Blue Island and nineteen miles from the center of the business district of Chicago, and its purchase was effected in December, 1907, at a cost of $33,624. It consists of 255 acres of high, rolling land, one-third of which is covered with medium growth black and white oaks.

Architects Holabird & Roche were engaged to prepare plans for the grounds and buildings and also for a new consumptive hospital. It was estimated that these improvements would cost $2,000,000. On April 7, 1908, a proposition to issue bonds to this amount was approved by the people of Cook county by a vote of three to one.

After they had prepared their original plans the architects visited the Eastern states for the purpose of conferring with the managing officials of almshouses and other charitable institutions and asking for their criticisms and suggestions. The plans were exhibited at the National Conference of Charities and Corrections held in Richmond, Va., in May, 1908, where they were submitted to and scrutinized by the leading charity workers of the country. In October the plans were laid before the Illinois State Conference of Charities at Rock Island, Ill. Local experts in charity work were also asked to examine and criticise the plans. As the result of the various criticisms and suggestions some important changes were made for improving the plans and broadening the scope of the work of the institution.

The main group of buildings is located in the wooded portion of the farm, which is twenty to thirty feet higher than the east two-thirds of the tract of land purchased. The eastern portion of the farm is open prairie land under cultivation, except a strip of low ground running through it. In the lowest depression an artificial lake will be made by shallow excavations and the other low ground will be drained into it.

In the general scheme the buildings are arranged on the block plan, consisting of small structures located apart from each other but connected by covered arcades. The inmates of the institution will be housed in separate structures or ward units with a capacity for 160 persons. Each ward unit consists of two buildings connected in front with an open porch and an enclosed corridor. Each building is two stories in height and each story contains a ward consisting of a dormitory with forty beds and a day room. The ward units are arranged in two rows 150 feet apart, on an axis running nearly north and south.

Intersecting this main axis near the center and crossing it at right angles is the axis on which are located the service and administration buildings, the general hospital, homes for superintendents and nurses and the wards for irresponsibles.

At the intersection of the two axes is located the chapel, surrounded by an ornamental garden, which in turn is enclosed by cloisterlike communicating corridors, forming the ornamental center of the scheme. The chapel is well placed, both from a practical and sentimental point of view.

West of the chapel is the receiving and administration buildings, the homes for superintendents and nurses and general hospital. East of the chapel are the dining room, kitchen, bakery and daily supply refrigerators, and immediately behind these are the laundry, men's baths, workshops and the wards for irresponsibles, while at the east end of the east and west axis are the water and power plants. These buildings are grouped around a common service ward and so arranged as to permit of economical means of conveying light, heat and water to the numerous buildings and to insure a thoroughly convenient means of food distribution aside from the dining room service. Except the irresponsibles and inmates of the general hospital all the inmates will be fed at the central dining room, which will seat 660 persons. The inmates of the irresponsible wards and the general hospital will be supplied with food through underground tunnels.

The east and west axis forms a dividing line which separates inmates according to sex, the males being cared for on the north and the females on the south. The hospital building, for practical reasons of administration, is located near the center of the scheme, as near to the administration building and service buildings as the proper consideration of exposure will permit. The hospital wards lie north and south, are exposed on the east, south and west sides, and receive the maximum amount of sunlight and air.

The nurses' home and the residences for the superintendent and medical officer are located in front of the administration building and hospital. The buildings for housing consumptives are located at some distance from the general group of buildings in the southwest corner of the farm and on the highest ground in it. The morgue building and isolation ward are also placed away from the general scheme, near the driveway leading to the farm buildings.

For the convenient working of the administration, all communicating corridors have been arranged to run in uninterrupted straight lines as far as possible, and in view of the large proportion of inclement weather, access under cover to all buildings on the grounds, with one or two exceptions, has been made possible.

The scheme embraces the following separate buildings: Administration building, receiving building, service building, eight ward buildings, old couples' home, general hospital, buildings for consumptives, power plant, water supply, electric, sewerage, telephone, fire alarm and heating systems, bathhouse, workshops and men's club, laundry and sewing room, morgue, autopsy and mortuary chapel, nurses' home and farm buildings.

All buildings are two stories in height except the administration building, which is three stories, and some of the service buildings, which are single storied. All permanent buildings are of fireproof construction and of sanitary and durable materials.

The primary aim of the World's Fair movement in Chicago was educational. Nearly 30,000 persons contributed $1 to $100,000 to the glory and improvement of Chicago's tributary territory, and 750,000 Western people came to the exposition on Chicago day. Work to secure the site for Chicago was begun in 1889. Chicago's rivals were New York, St. Louis and Washington, D. C. St. Louis and Washington were smiling in their defeat; New York sulked. An Illinois company was incorporated with forty-five directors, officered thus: Lyman J. Gage, president; Thomas B. Bryan, first vice-president; Potter Palmer, second vice-president; Benjamin Butterworth, secretary; A. F. Seeberger, treasurer; W. K. Ackerman, auditor. Congress had advanced the opening of the exposition from 1892 to 1893, and there were three years in which to get ready. Paris had had six. The site was located at Jackson Park. Root, who planned the White City, did not live to see it, but others took up the work that he laid down. At an extra session, in the summer of 1890, the General Assembly of Illinois authorized Chicago to pledge $5,000,000. Meanwhile commissioners were in England and on the continent, doing missionary work for the fair. Everywhere they were royally received. In the winter of 1890-91, while work was being pushed at Jackson Park, a party of United States naval officers sought exhibitors in Central and South America. In the winter of 1891-92 another commission visited Rome, and Pope Leo XIII., hearing for the first time of the Chicago World's Fair, expressed a lively interest in America, and generous contributions were made by the Vatican. Everywhere the Chicago

Columbian Exposition missionaries were successful. The season of preparation passed quickly. In deference to New York's wish to celebrate the 12th of October, the dedication of the World's Fair buildings was postponed till October 22. There was a great inaugural ball and next day a great civic parade. Red and yellow, the Columbus colors, were to be seen everywhere in Chicago. The consummation of this celebration was the dedication itself. So large was the attendance that 15,000 troops, including artillery and cavalry, were scarcely noticed in the vast assemblage in the Manufactures building. The spring months of 1893 were cold and stormy, but by May 1 the exposition was nearly complete. On that date the fair was formally opened. The Palace of Mechanic Arts, though devoted to ponderous and unornamental exhibits, was indeed a palace in its exterior appearance. Inside, old Spain, young America, France, Germany, England—the whole civilized world—was represented in wonderful mechanical creations. The Machinery building and the Electrical building, isolated though they seemed, were vitally bound together by two avenues, one surface, the other subterranean. In the latter, historic exhibits marked all important advances in electrical science. The Transportation building was one of the "show" structures of the exposition. The range of the exhibits within it was so wide as to be wellnigh all-inclusive. The Fisheries building was as unique architecturally as the exhibit was subjectively. No building was more popular with visitors of all classes during the fair. The department of mining further evidenced the progress of America. Its exhibit was at once a delight and a surprise. As they were most attractive in extreme purity of architecture, so in their contents the Art and Agriculture buildings vied with each other in beauty. The shoe and leather exhibits, the forestry exhibit, and the exhibit of dairy products and methods together would have constituted by themselves a fair that should have drawn hundreds of thousands of visitors from all parts of the country. Krupp's stupendous ordnance creations, the Rabida, with its priceless collections from the Vatican and from Spanish treasures of history, the caravels of Columbus fitly anchored in sight of the ancient convent, the White Horse inn, the Cliff-Dwellers' rocks, the elevated Intramural railway, the club houses of various States and governments, were all objects of great and never-failing interest. Not since the Tower of Babel fell, through the wrath of the Almighty, had such a confusion of tongues been heard as chattered by day and by night round the Ferris wheel. It would be as vain to do justice to a tour of the world in a few paragraphs as to attempt any brief description of the life, habitations, costumes and customs of the heterogeneous population of the Midway Plaisance. Between the Esquimaux village and Old Vienna, and between quiet existence in the bamboo-housed settlement of the Javanese to the hurly-burly of the Wild East and Wild West shows, were such contracts as only volumes would suffice to properly present. One night Remenyi went into the Javanese theater. The manager kept the orchestra after the performance, and as they played their weird, quaint melodies the great Hungarian violinist interpreted them in music intelligible to occidentals. The Hollanders present wept. They were moved by this presentation of the difference between the music of their native land and their adopted land. One great lesson of the Columbian Exposition—there were very many—was the lesson that men, regardless of color, of nativity or of language, think pretty much alike and act pretty much alike under given circumstances. It was a liberal education in its proof that “a mon’s a mon for a’ that”—in its inculcation of the scriptural teaching that all men are brothers.

The causes which led to the Spanish-American war of 1898 need not be here discussed at length. Besides, to recapitulate those causes here would be to retell a story of tyranny, oppression and revolting cruelty that all who read this know full well and would be glad to forget. After all, this is a record of Cook county, not one of Spain or of Cuba, except so far as men of Cook county may have had to do with them. All those baleful influences which brought on that brief but decisive international conflict had wrought their inevitable work of humiliation, of wrong and of destruction upon a loyal and long-suffering people before there was any occasion for armed men from Cook county to take any part in Spanish-Cuban affairs.

April 25, 1898, President McKinley sent a message to Congress recommending a declaration of war. That same day Congress passed a formal declaration of war, the Queen Regent of Spain made a protest to all the European powers against the action of the United States and President McKinley called for 125,000 volunteers. The last of the vessels of the Asiatic squadron left Hong Kong that day for the Philippine Islands, where a battle was expected, orders were issued declaring the harbor of New York closed to all vessels between sunset and sunrise, and Governor Tanner issued a mobilization order on the seven infantry regiments, Illinois national guard, and on Colonel E. C. Young’s cavalry troops to gather at Springfield by noon on the following day. Before that eventful and prophetic day was over the First, Second and Seventh regiments of infantry and the First regiment of cavalry, Illinois national guard, left Chicago for the mobilization camp at Springfield—in all, 4,633 men. On the 28th orders were issued by the War Department calling for the concentration of about 10,000 troops at Tampa, Fla. From there the force that was to invade Cuba would be taken. May 1st Commodore Dewey, in command of the Asiatic squadron, almost totally destroyed the Spanish fleet in Manila bay. War was in progress. So far it had been the bloodiest war in all history, but it had not drawn much American blood. May 2, 60,000 Illinois people visited Camp Tanner at Springfield to see the militia in bivouac. On the 9th Secretary of War Alger ordered Governor Tanner to prepare two regiments of Illinois volunteers to be moved as early as possible to Chickamauga National park and announced that the artillery and cavalry of the State would soon be called to follow. On the 10th all the regular troops at Chickamauga were ordered to move south, there to be coalesced with the volunteer forces preparatory to the occupation of Cuba. The next day General Miles decided to take command at Tampa, preparatory to an invasion. The first fight between United States and Spanish soldiers took place on the 12th on Cuban soil. The First and Sixth regiments of Illinois volunteers left Camp Tanner for Chickamauga and Washington on the 17th. The Second was ordered to start at once for Tampa. The Fourth and Seventh were ordered to move south immediately.

The First regiment, Illinois volunteers, originally of the Illinois National guard, organized in Chicago, was mustered into the service of the United States at Camp Tanner, Springfield, May 13, 1898, with Col. Henry L. Turner in command. Four days later it started for Camp Thomas, at Chickamauga, where it was included in the First brigade, Third division, First army corps. There it remained till June 2, when it left for Tampa, Fla., where it did provost duty till June 30. On that day most of the regiment, which now was strengthened by many recruits, started for Cuba, but the steamer on which it sailed was detained in Key West harbor till July 5 and did not enter Guantanamo bay till after nightfall on the 8th. The regiment landed on the 10th and reached the scene of hostilities next day. Two of its companies were detached for service in nursing wounded men and fever patients in hospitals, and on the 12th about eighty men from the First were sent with Miles's command to Porto Rico, where they were assigned to engineering work. But most of Colonel Turner's men were in the trenches before Santiago and on the 17th were of the troops to whom that city was surrendered. Meanwhile, so many of the men of the First had succumbed to fever or were in its grip that the bulk of it was sent on board hospital boats to Montauk Point, Long Island, to be cared for at Camp Wikoff. Thence, as many of its members as were fit for the hardships of the journey started September 8 for Chicago, where they were received with many honors and where the regiment, now numbering 1,235, rank and file, was mustered out of the service November 17. The First is entitled to historic distinction for more reasons than one. Though greatly weakened by yellow fever, it made a brilliant record and was warmly praised in official reports. It was the only regiment from Illinois that saw active service in hostilities in Cuba. Officers as shown by muster-out rolls: Henry L. Turner, colonel; George V. Lauman, lieutenant-colonel; Joseph B. Sanborn, major; Edgar B. Tallman, major; James M. Eddy, Jr., major; Frederick A. Brookes, first lieutenant and adjutant; Oliver A. The Second regiment Illinois volunteer infantry, originally of the Illinois national guard, was organized at Chicago with 1,249 men, rank and file, in command of Col. George M. Moulton, and was mustered into the United States service at Springfield May 4-15, 1898, and left for Tampa, Fla., May 17. Its destination was changed to Jacksonville, however, and it was assigned to the Seventh army corps, commanded by Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, with which it participated in the dedication of Camp Cuba Libre. It was transferred, October 25, to Savannah, Ga., where it was quartered at Camp Lee till December 8. Then the First and Second battalions sailed for Havana. They disembarked there December 15 and were soon joined by the Third battalion and went into quarters at Camp Columbia. Colonel Moulton was chief of police for Havana December 17, 1898, to January 11, 1899. The regiment remained at Camp Columbia till March 28. On that and the two succeeding days it left in detachments for Augusta, Ga., where (numbering 1,051 officers and men) it was mustered out of the service April 26. The Seventh Illinois volunteer infantry, the Hibernian Rifles, companies A, B, C, D, E and F of which were recruited in Cook county, was mustered into the United States service at Springfield, May 18, 1898, with Col. Marcus Kavanagh in command. It departed, May 28, for Camp Alger, Va., and was in camp later at Thoroughfare Gap and Camp Meade until September 9, when it returned, 1,309 strong, rank and file, to Springfield. It was allowed a thirty-day furlough previous to its muster out, which was effected October 20. There was good fighting material in this organization, but it was not called into active hostilities. The Eighth Illinois volunteer infantry (colored) contained six companies (A to F inclusive) from Cook county. It was mustered in at Springfield July 23, 1898, numbering 1,217 men and officers, under command of Col. John R. Marshall. Having offered to relieve the First Illinois at Santiago, Cuba, it left for there August 8, going via New York, and was a week in making the trip. It was at once assigned to duty at Santiago, but later was transferred to San Luis, where Colonel Marshall was appointed military governor. There the bulk of the regiment was stationed till early in March, 1899, when it was ordered to Illinois. It reached Chicago March 15. When mustered out of the service April 29 it numbered, officers and men, 1,226.

The First Illinois cavalry, organized in Chicago upon the first call of President McKinley for troops, embraced seven companies of Cook county men. It was mustered into the service at Springfield, May 21, 1898, with Col. Edward C. Young in command; started for Camp Thomas, Ga., May 30, was encamped there till October 11, then was mustered out, numbering, rank and file, 1,208. It participated in no engagements, but in drill and discipline was brought to high efficiency. Officers as shown by muster-out rolls: Edward C. Young, colonel; Roy B. Harper, lieutenant-colonel; William P. Butler, Frank B. Alsip, John S. Hart, majors; Alvar L. Bournique, regimental adjutant; Milton J. Foreman, quartermaster; Louis M. It is probable that, in proportion to the number of men involved, Cook county's representatives in the United States navy during the Spanish-American war saw more active service than its representatives in the army. In considering this fact it should not be forgotten that it was distinctively a naval war. As members of the Naval Reserves they nobly did their duty in every station and in every emergency. They were assigned as follows to various battleships, and in smaller numbers to other vessels in active service: To the Oregon, 60; to the Yale, 47; to the Harvard, 35; to the Cincinnati, 27; to the Yankton, 19; to the Franklin, 18; to the Montgomery, 17; to the Indiana, 17; to the Hector, 14; to the Marietta, 11; to the Wilmington, 10; to the Lancaster, 10. Illinois Naval Reserves were in service on board nearly sixty vessels, notably on board most of the vessels of the North Atlantic squadron. They took part in the historic engagement off Santiago, in which Cervera's fleet was destroyed and in about every other maritime event of the war that took place in the West Indies. Exposed to peril in many forms, not a man of them was lost. The reserves from Illinois were mustered into the United States navy, while the naval militia of other States retained their State organizations. When it became certain that war was inevitable, the government set about strengthening the navy. The Naval Militia, originally organized about five years earlier, made it possible for this State to promptly offer for the service men of high efficiency. This fact was promptly and forcibly brought to the knowledge of the Navy department by General McNulta, head of the local committee, and the Naval Militia was enlisted almost in a body. Only eighty-eight of its men failed to meet physical requirements, and they were immediately replaced by recruits. A detachment of more than 200, commanded by Col. John M. Hawley, left Chicago May 2, 1898, the day following that of Dewey's destruction of the Spanish fleet at Manila, and was soon joined by the rest of the First battalion. The number of men from Cook county was 400. The Second battalion, 267 strong, was made up of men from other parts of Illinois. The Reserves were mustered out at the close of hostilities in different fields as they could be spared from the service, some of them serving out their full term of twelve months. The Reserves from Chicago and vicinity are organized under the style of Naval Reserve veterans.

Mention has been made of eighty men who were detached from the First Illinois volunteer infantry at Tampa, Fla., for engineering service at Porto Rico. They went with General Miles's expedition, July 12, 1898, and being pioneers in such service in that field, became known as the First Engineering Corps. They were chiefly employed in bridge building, in furtherance of operations preparatory to an intended movement across the island, till September 8, when they sailed for the United States. They arrived in Chicago September 17. November 20 they were mustered out of the service.

There came down to the new Chicago from the old Chicago several staunch national banks which have been referred to at more or less length and quite a number of strong private banks whose history antedates the Great Fire of 1871. The latter were the institutions of Greenebaum Brothers, bankers, established about 1854; Adolph Loeb & Bro., bankers, about 1856; Foreman Brothers, bankers, 1860; Meadowcroft Brothers, bankers, 1860; the Hibernian Banking association, 1867; E. S. Dreyer and Co., before 1870; the Union Trust company, 1870. Among private banks established soon after the fire were the Corn Exchange bank, 1872; and the bank of Peterson & Bay, 1873. There were nineteen national banks and eight savings banks in operation in Chicago January 10, 1872, in which were deposited $41,742,922, against $26,077,921 on deposit October 2, 1871, six days before the fire. Not only had the city revived financially, but it was in a more healthy condition than ever before.

The stringency that followed the panic of 1873 caused the suspension of several national banks without serious injury to the financial system of the city. But later the failure of the State Savings Institution, Chicago's leading savings bank, and of some lesser banks, was far-reaching in its effects. Public confidence in savings banks was destroyed, and it was some years before it was revived with the encouragement of a policy of State supervision of all banks doing business under State charters.

The First National bank came out of the panic of 1873 with renewed and strengthened public confidence in its stability and in the wisdom and resourcefulness of its management. It has often been remarked that Mr. Gage not only averted a calamity for his own bank but stimulated the nerve of other bankers and inspired a public belief that most Chicago banks could meet all obligations if they were not harassed or hampered.

Peterson & Bay, bankers, began business in 1873; Schaffner & Co., bankers, in 1878.

In the State Savings Institution, organized in 1863, D. D. Spencer became a stockholder in 1872, a director in January, 1873, president in June, 1873, owner of more than four-fifths of the capital stock February 5, 1874. From then on he was its borrower-in-chief. Insolvency, with all the attendant horrors of a failure, involving hundreds, if not thousands of hard-working, frugal men and women was inevitable. The following is a copy of a promissory note found by the assignee among the bank's assets:

"$479,177.40.

Chicago, December 31, 1875.

"One year after date, I promise to pay to the State Savings Institution, in the City of Chicago, four hundred and seventy-nine thousand, one hundred and seventy-seven dollars and forty cents, for value received, with interest at eight per cent per annum, for money borrowed.
D. D. SPENCER."

Hardly had the closing doors of the bank clanged their alarm to a too-trusting public when it was known that Spencer had disappeared from Chicago. He lived long afterward at Stuttgart, Germany, but it is not of record that he ever made good his defalcations. The Cook County National bank, which he had organized, had failed badly in 1873. The receiver of the assets of the Illinois State Savings Institution paid the last of 50 per cent to depositors in 1884. Soon after the collapse of the State Savings Institution came the failure of the "Fidelity," a savings bank which eventually paid about 70 per cent of an indebtedness of a million and a half. The greed of profit at the expense of security brought on the "savings bank crash" of 1877.

In 1880 the deposits in Chicago banks were $64,764, increase over about $47,000,000 in 1879. The clearing house returns for those years showed an increase of nearly half a million. In 1881 there was a further increase of more than a quarter of a million. Chicago had gained second place in amount of deposits among great American financial centers. Prosperity was growing. In all quarters public confidence was fully restored. In 1883 a Chicago bank took fourth place among the banks of the entire United States. That year witnessed a steadily prosperous business. In 1880 the Chicago Clearing House association, established as a private institution in 1870 and not incorporated till 1882, included in its membership twelve national, two State, three savings and two branch banks.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency of October 1, 1883, mentioned the following active national banks: The Chicago National bank, the Continental National bank, the First National bank, the Hide and Leather National bank, the Home National bank, the Merchants National bank, the Metropolitan National bank, the National Bank of America, the National Bank of Illinois, the Northwestern National bank, the Union National bank, the Union Stock Yards National bank. Increase in twelve months: Loans—$6,143,189; cash and exchange—$6,943,509; deposits—$2,999,928; capital and surplus—$871,600.

The charter of the old First National bank expired in 1882. It paid each of its stockholders $294 for every $100 received, in addition to an average of 10 per cent per annum in dividends on capital which had been paid from time to time. The new First National bank was organized and succeeded to the business of the original bank.

The National Safe Deposit company was organized in 1880, the National Bank of America was organized January 1, 1883; the Continental National bank March 5, 1883; the Drovers' National bank, 1883; the Metropolitan National bank, 1884; the Western Investment bank, 1884; the Chicago Trust and Savings bank, May, 1885; the Atlas National bank, May 17, 1886; the American Exchange National bank, in May, 1886; the Lincoln National bank, March, 1887; the Fort Dearborn National bank, May 1, 1887; the Illinois Trust and Savings bank, August, 1887; the Union Stock Yards bank, established in 1867, its charter expiring in 1887, became the National Live Stock bank; the Prairie State National bank was organized May 15, 1888; the Northern Trust company was organized in 1889; the American Trust and Savings bank, 1889.

The following named national banks were doing business in Chicago about the beginning of the decade 1890-1900: The American Exchange National bank, the Atlas National bank, the Calumet National bank (South Chicago), the Chicago National bank, the Columbia National bank, the Commercial National bank, the Continental National bank, the Drovers' National bank, the Englewood National bank, the First National bank, the Fort Dearborn National bank, the Hide and Leather National bank, the Home National bank, the Lincoln National bank, the Merchants' National bank, the Metropolitan National bank, the National bank of America, the National Bank of Illinois, the National Live Stock bank, the Northwestern National bank, the Oakland National bank, the Union National bank, the United States National bank.

The capital of the national banks of Chicago at the end of 1890 was $16,100,000; surplus and profits were $10,343,119; deposits were $94,471,271, a substantial increase in twelve months. The total capital of the State banks was considerably more than eight million dollars, making the combined capital of State and national banks more than twenty-five and a half million dollars. As indicated by the report of the Controller of the Currency for 1890, Chicago was making rapid headway on her sister cities of the East as a great money center. In the decade just closed the percentage of drafts and checks handled by Chicago banks had rapidly increased, while the percentages of New York and Boston had declined. Chicago was now doing 7 per cent of the whole banking of the country in the matter of checks and drafts. New York still led, but Chicago was gaining fast and Illinois ranked second among the States in the amount of drafts drawn. Massachusetts was first, New York fourth. Illinois had passed the billion mark, New York had not.

ness at the end of 1900, said: "The bankers of the country think New York's banking business is large, and that the percentage of increase of deposits during the past six years is, or ought to be, larger than elsewhere, but this is a mistake so far as the percentage of increase is concerned, for Chicago beats New York by over 125 per cent on New York's increase. This is a remarkable difference, and means that Chicago's commerce, so far as bank deposits show it, is growing twice and one-fourth as fast as New York's. Everybody knows that Chicago is one of the phenomena of the country, so far as its development is concerned, but few are aware of the remarkable speed shown by the figures of our tellers. Even Boston's growth of banking during the six years mentioned is far outstripped by Chicago's, and it does look as if the "Hub" is going west. Chicago's percentage of increase exceeds Boston's by 30 per cent upon Boston's figures, in spite of the big manufactories in New England. Philadelphia, too, whose population is now slightly exceeded by Chicago's, is away in the rear in percentage of increase, as Chicago's figures exceed Philadelphia's by 44 per cent." The paper went on to show that on the deposits of its national banks for 1890 Chicago had increased its business during the past six years 46 per cent; Boston, 36½ per cent; Philadelphia, about 32 per cent; New York, about 20 per cent.

The American Exchange National bank, caught with three hundred thousand dollars of the exchange of the Fidelity National bank of Cincinnati, upon the latter's failure, called on its stockholders to make good the amount. Their prompt response left the bank free to fight first in the lower, later in the Supreme court. In every case set up by the receiver of the Fidelity bank that the exchange was issued without consideration, the American Exchange National won, establishing a precedent of interest to bankers throughout the country.

The Park National bank was closed by the controller in 1890. There were several failures among private banks. The Thirty-first Street bank, a dependency of the Park National, went down with it; the Oakland, Prettyman and Kean banks failed that year. The Globe National bank began business December 22, making the number of national banks twenty-four. The Globe Savings bank and the Chemical Trust and Savings banks were organized. In 1890, also, the United States National bank became the Columbia National bank. The State and private banks of 1890 were Adolph Loeb & Brother, the American Trust and Savings bank, the Bank of Montreal, Cohn & Strauss, bankers; Charles Henrotin, banker and broker; the Chemical Trust and Savings bank, the Chicago Trust and Savings bank, the Corn Exchange bank (organized in 1872, reorganized in 1879, now the Corn Exchange National bank), the Dime Savings bank, E. S. Dreyer & Co., bankers; the Farmers' Trust company, Foreman Brothers, bankers; the Globe Savings bank, Greenebaum Sons, bankers; the Guarantee Company of North America, the Hibernian Banking association, the Illinois Trust and Savings bank, the International bank, Meadowcroft Brothers, bankers; the Merchants' Loan and Trust company, the Northern Trust company, Paul O. Stensland & Co., bankers; Peterson & Bay, bankers; Prairie State Savings and Trust company, Schaffner & Co., bankers, the Security Loan and Savings bank, the State Bank of Illinois, the Union Trust company, the Western Trust and Savings bank. The latter was organized January, 1890, succeeding the Western Investment bank. The Milwaukee Avenue State bank was organized September 15, 1891. The Security Loan and Savings bank began business in 1891, succeeding the private banking house of Filsenthal, Gross & Miller. The Chicago National bank was organized January 2, 1892.

The bank panic of 1893 shook down the financial structures of a few weak banks as an earthquake might have toppled over the buildings in which they were housed, but the havoc was by no means general. The coolness of the Chicago clearing house management was effective in preventing panic. Banks were mutually helpful throughout the ordeal. Some weak banks had inevitably to go, but private banking and its attendant ills were buried, at least for a season. Such institutions went into liquidation or reorganized under State charters and became subject to State supervision.

In the decade 1889-99, inclusive, Chicago banks passed through trying times that led to a period of great prosperity. In that ten years Chicago gradually discarded the provincial system of banking and took on the metropolitan system. In that period, too, it became a depository of funds for large flotation enterprises. The first instance in which Chicago banks became active in such a capacity was in the floating of the Glucose Sugar Refining company, capitalized at forty millions. In the promotion of that interest the Illinois Trust and Savings bank received jointly with a New York concern the underwriting deposits. Next followed the National Biscuit company, capitalized at fifty-five millions, which was for the most part floated in Chicago. In 1898, a year historic for promotion, Chicago banks acted either wholly or in part as trustee for enterprises capitalized in total at more than 300 million dollars. Among them were the American Steel and Wire company, the American Tin Plate company, the National Steel company, the National Carbon company, the American Linseed company and the Chicago Union Traction company. In the same period Chicago banks were large lenders of money in New York, in Berlin and in London. In 1898, when money was stringent in Germany and the bank rate was advanced to 6 per cent Chicago banks carried credits of about ten million dollars in the German capital. In 1899, because of fluctuations of the New York stock market and unusually heavy transactions on that exchange, money was rapidly advanced. At that time

Chicago loaned daily on call from two million to five million dollars, a kind of transaction that was practically unknown five years before. It is significant that during the period of the Spanish-American war (April to August, 1898), when New York's bank deposits went down from $738,683,800 to $658,503,300, Chicago's bank deposits increased $6,452,996. Country bankers had not forgotten that in 1893, when industrial depression had set in, New York banks had issued clearing house certificates. From December, 1890, to June, 1899, the deposits of Chicago national banks went up from $94,470,300 to $216,751,193, a growth of 129.43 per cent. Deposits in her State banks increased in the same time from $35,753,854 to $101,104,303, an advance of 282.77 per cent. The total increase in deposits of banks of both classes was $223,384,696, a growth of 171.53 per cent. Of the total percentage of increase the relative gain was 31.40 per cent for the local national banks; 68.60 per cent for the local State banks. To some extent, but not wholly, this showing was due to the latitude which the State laws offer with reference to reserves, not available under the national banking act. Its cause is found, also, in the fact that a coterie of capitalists had founded and successfully managed several State banks. The decrease in banking capital by suspension or voluntary liquidation in the ten years under consideration was $4,450,000 on the part of national banks, $2,000,000 on the part of State banks. At the same time old capitalization had been increased and new capital had come into action, amounting altogether to $2,195,000.

These national banks were doing business in Chicago in 1900: The Bankers National bank, the Chicago National bank, the Commercial National bank, the Continental National bank, the Corn Exchange National bank, the Drovers' National bank, the First National bank, the Fort Dearborn National bank, the Live Stock National bank, the Merchants' National bank, the Metropolitan National bank, the Republic National bank, the First National Bank of Englewood, the Oakland National bank. State banks: The American Trust and Savings bank, the Chicago City bank, Foreman Brothers Banking company, the Garden City Banking and Trust company, the Hibernian Banking association, the Home Savings bank, the Illinois Trust and Savings bank, the Merchants Loan and Trust company, the Milwaukee Avenue State bank, the Northern Trust company, Pearsons-Taft Land Credit company, the Prairie State bank, the Pullman Loan and Savings bank, the Royal Trust company, the State Bank of Chicago, the Union Trust company, the Western State bank. Following is an exhibit of the condition of the combined national and State banks of Chicago during the five years ending and including 1900:

1897. Loans and discounts, $151,570,775; total deposits, $245,- 463,612.
1898. Loans and discounts, $168,345,896; total deposits, $276,- 159,823.
1899. Loans and discounts, $217,474,204; total deposits, $345,- 077,893.
1900. Loans and discounts, $234,576,463; total deposits, $394,- 545,617.

Now Chicago again led Boston in amount of clearings.

In July, 1900, the Lincoln National bank was consolidated with the Bankers National bank. In the following September the Northwestern National bank and the America National bank were absorbed by the Corn Exchange National bank and the First National bank and the Union National bank were consolidated, leaving fourteen national banks doing business in Chicago, counting the First National bank of Englewood and the Oakland National bank, which were outside the central reserve district, and of course including the two banks at the National Stock Yards. In the downtown district there were left only ten national banks. In the opening of this decade there were twenty-three in all, sixteen of them down town. These changes effected a slight falling-off in capital stock, but the surplus of the banks was largely increased in the decade and the institutions were much strengthened. In that period there was a gain of 190 per cent in deposits. Such changes illustrate a process of natural selection which is as clearly active in economic affairs as in physics. "National banks that had a place in the list of 1890 but have already disappeared or will disappear in the course of the negotiations now in progress," said The Economist for July 21, 1900, "are the America, American Exchange, Atlas, Hide and Leather, Home, Illinois, Lincoln, Northwestern, Park, Union, United States; State institutions in the same category are the Chicago Trust and Savings bank, International, Northwestern Bond and Trust company, Western Investment bank. On the other hand, the Chicago City, Foreman Brothers, Garden City, Milwaukee Avenue, Pearsons-Taft Land Credit company, Royal Trust, State and Western State, now in the State bank list, were not there ten years ago, while the Bankers, Corn Exchange and Republic are new in the national table. Of banks that have come and gone in the interval may be mentioned the Globe National, Columbia National, Bank of Commerce, Commercial Loan and Trust, Chemical Trust and Savings (afterward the Chemical National), Globe Savings, Central Trust, Industrial, and Market National. The market was fully organized, but the only business it ever did was to wind up. Several private banks have failed—Meadowcroft, Schaffner, Dreyer, and Silverman. It is well known, of course, that by no means all banks that have passed out of existence were insolvent. There were some notable consolidations before those of this year." The banking situation in Chicago was strengthened by this process. An era was ushered in in which there was no anxiety as to the stability of Chicago's banking system. But there was a cessation of consolidation. The Chemical National bank and the National Bank of Illinois passed out of the reckoning. The Chicago Savings bank began business May 1, 1902; the National Bank of North America was organized that month. The First Trust and Savings bank was organized December, 1903. These were notable occurrences in Chicago banking history in the early part of the ten years now commanding attraction. In 1906 and later there was considerable activity in the organization of State banks. In this decade ripened some bank history of the kind that reputable Chicago bankers have sternly discouraged, even from the day of D. D. Spencer down to the day of Paul O. Stensland. Stensland's bank, the Milwaukee Avenue State bank, went by the board and as a consequence of its way of going Stensland was sentenced to the penitentiary. The short-lived Bank of America fell a victim to official borrowing of the style of Spencer, and Abner Smith, its president, and F. E. Creelman and J. V. Pierce, two of his associates in its management, were convicted of misappropriation of its funds and dealt with in accordance with law. It is worthy of note that Smith had had long experience as a justice of the Circuit court. The Chicago National bank was brought low by John R. Walsh, its president, and was in turn the means of his undoing. He, too, was convicted of wrongfully handling bank funds.

The recovery from the panic of 1907 was rapid during the early part of 1908. As the disorder was mainly in New York, the rest of the country returned to comparative prosperity as affairs in that city improved. In Chicago clearing house certificates were issued to the amount of $39,240,000, and the largest amount outstanding at any one time was $38,285,000. This was the principal point where clearing house checks were issued as circulating money, and the device was very satisfactory. Such checks were circulated to the amount of $7,600,000. The bulk of them were converted into pulp early in April.

Important among the events in the local financial field in 1908 was the transformation, in February, of the National Live Stock bank into the Live Stock Exchange National bank.

The following named banks were in operation February, 1909: The Bankers National bank, the Commercial National bank, the Continental National bank, the Corn Exchange National bank, the Drovers' Deposit National bank, the First National bank, the Fort Dearborn National bank, the Hamilton National bank, the Live Stock Exchange National bank, the Monroe National bank, the National City National bank, the National Produce National bank, the Prairie National bank, the Republic National bank, the Calumet National bank, the First National bank of Englewood, the Oakland National bank. State banks: The American Trust and Savings bank, the Austin State bank, the Central Trust bank, the Chicago City bank, the Chicago Savings bank and Trust company, the Citizens Trust and Savings bank, the Colonial Trust and Savings bank, the Cook County State Savings bank, the Drexel State Savings bank, the Drovers' Trust and Savings bank, the Englewood State bank, the Farwell Trust company, the First Trust and Savings bank, Foreman Brothers' Banking company, the Guarantee Trust and Savings bank, the Harris Trust and Savings bank, the Hibernian Banking association, the Illinois Trust and Savings bank, the Kasper State bank, the Kenwood Trust and Savings bank, the Lake View Trust and Savings bank, the Merchants Loan and Trust company, the Metropolitan Trust and Savings bank, the Northern Trust company, the North Avenue State bank, the North Side State Savings bank, the Northwest State bank, the Pearsons-Taft Land Credit company, the Prairie State bank, the People's Trust and Savings company, the Pullman Trust and Savings bank, the Railway Exchange bank, the Royal Trust company, the Security bank, the South Chicago Savings bank, the State Bank of Chicago, the State Bank of West Pullman, the Stockmen's Trust and Savings bank, the Stock Yards Savings bank, the Union Bank of Chicago, the Union Stock Yards State bank, the Union Trust company, the Western Trust and Savings bank, the West Side Trust and Savings bank, the Woodlawn Trust and Savings bank.

Following is a statement of the deposits of the two classes of institutions November 27, 1908, and February 5, 1909:

	Nov. 27, 1908.	Feb. 5, 1909.
National Banks	$878,882,224	$398,955,330
State Banks	367,105,534	391,179,195
Total	$745,987,757	$790,134,525

In the brief time indicated an increase of forty-four million dollars was made. The total in September, 1908, was about $734,000,000. From that time to February 5, 1909, there was an increase of fifty-six million dollars. These deposits are much the highest in the history of Chicago banking. They promise soon to come up to the 1,000-million mark.

In 1909 the deposits of Chicago banks were about forty million dollars greater than the aggregate of those of St. Louis, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Kansas City, Milwaukee and Omaha, but the capital and surplus of Chicago banks was about thirteen million dollars less than the combined capital and surplus of the six cities mentioned. Bank deposits are included. Of individual deposits the Chicago total was only $177,414,672. The St. Louis total was 105 million. In the five smaller cities the proportion of individual deposits to the whole was higher, as bank deposits naturally tend toward large cities.

Marquette Club.—On March 18, 1886, George V. Lauman, Samuel E. Magill, Charles U. Gordon, Will S. Gilbert, William S. Hussander and Charles C. Colby filed in the office of the Secretary of State at Springfield, Illinois, a declaration of their intention to form a corporation to be known as The Marquette Club of Chicago, for the advancement of the science of political economy and the promotion of social and friendly relations among its members; to exert such influence and render such service as might be possible in behalf of good government; and to promote the growth and spread of Republican principles. Following is a copy of the certificate of its incorporation:

“STATE OF ILLINOIS, DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

“Henry D. Dement, Secretary of State:

“To All to Whom These Presents Shall Come—Greeting: Whereas, a certificate, duly signed and acknowledged, having been filed in the office of the Secretary of State, on the 18th day of March, A. D. 1886, for the organization of The Marquette Club of Chicago, under and in accordance with the provisions of ‘An Act Concerning Corporations; approved April 18, 1872, and in force July 1, 1872, a copy of which certificate is hereto attached;

“Now, therefore, I, Henry D. Dement, Secretary of State of the State of Illinois, by virtue of the powers and duties vested in me by law, do hereby certify that the said Marquette club of Chicago is a legally organized corporation under the laws of this state.

“In testimony whereof, I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the Great Seal of State. Done at the city of Springfield, this 18th day of March, A. D. 1886, and of the Independence of the United States the 110th.

(Seal)

“HENRY D. DEMENT,
“Secretary of State.”

The following named were selected as directors to control and manage the club during the first year of its corporate existence: George V. Lauman, president; F. W. C. Hayes, first vice-president; S. E. Magill, second vice-president; Charles U. Gordon, secretary; Will S. Gilbert, treasurer. Upon the organization of the club these committees were appointed: Political Action Committee—F. W. C. Hayes, Charles C. Colby, William A. Paulsen, James S. Moore, Richard H. Towne; Finance Committee—William L. Blood, Walter S. Judson, Frank B. Whipple; House Committee—Edward O. Fiske, Joseph C. Pollock, Henry T. Smith; Membership Committee—Will S. Hussander, George W. Keehn, Leroy T. Steward. In 1887 an entertainment committee was added; in 1889 a library committee; in 1892 an art committee. As exigencies have risen, still others have been created. In addition to the regular committees provided by the constitution, special committees for certain specific purposes are appointed whenever their services are required. The number of members of the political action committee has been changed from time to time. From five in 1886, it rose to sixteen in 1895 and its chairman was added to the board of directors. This committee now includes ten members and is thus constituted:

THOS. G. CORLETT, Chairman.	EDWIN H. CASSELS.	✓ 7
WILLIAM H. EMRICH, Secretary.	HENRY C. ADAMS.
FLETCHER DOBYNS.	GUSTAV E. BEERLY.
GEORGE E. WISSLER.	CHARLES A. LAWES.
MITCHELL D. FOLLANSBEE.	WILLIAM MCC. BLAIR.

JOHN W. KENNEDY, Chairman.	FRANCIS W. TAYLOR.
EDWARD G. PAULING.	SIDNEY W. WORTHY.
JOSEPH B. LEAKE.	ALEXANDER H. REVELL.
LEONARD GOODWIN.	WILLIAM B. AUSTIN.
JAMES McNALLY.	GEORGE S. WOOD.

There is a campaign committee of 100. The officers of the club are:

CHARLES L. FUREY, President.	CHARLES M. FOELL, 2nd Vice-
W. J. CALHOUN, 1st Vice-Presi-	President.
dent.	E. A. BIGELOW, Secretary.
	HOWARD N. WAGG, Treasurer.

It is the duty of the political action committee to take cognizance of all national, state, county, and municipal elections and recommend to the club such action on such elections and on all political matters as will most surely advance the interests of good government. It is evident that such responsibilities are strictly in line with the objects of the club as stated in its application for charter and in a preamble to its constitution. How well the Marquette club has done its self-assigned work for "good government—local, state and national"—fair-minded Chicagoans, forgetting partisanship, know full well.

No better evidence of the integrity, patriotism, sincerity and efficiency of the Marquette club could be presented than the following list of names of the members of its present campaign committee. It is as fine a body of representative Chicagoans as could be organized for any purpose—a convincing human document, guaranteeing all that the club stands for:

Alfred H. Mulliken, L. A. Neis, Otto L. Tossetti, John W. Turner, F. T. Vaux, Herman Waldeck, Dr. Carl Wagner, Seymour Walton, W. G. Weil, Arthur D. Wheeler, Geo. S. Wood, Wm. L. Bush, Justus Chancellor, Chas. A. Churan, Geo. E. Crane, E. C. DeWitt, Fletcher Dobyns, Chas. J. Dorrance, W. P. Dunn, A. O. Erickson, John M. Ewen, Mitchell D. Follansbee, Chas. Y. Freeman, Charles C. Gilbert, Leonard Goodwin, William H. Emrich, Edwin H. Cassels, Henry C. Adams, Charles G. Dawes, Fred W. Upham, E. G. Halle, Wm. Penn Nixon, La Verne W. Noyes, E. G. Pauling, John M. Roach, Frederick A. Smith, Herbert S. Duncombe, Charles F. J. Lange, Col. George V. Lauman, Gen. Joseph B. Leake, Chester A. Legg, Henry W. Leaman, Eames MacVeagh, Joseph Mann, Fred Miller, Mathew Mills, Geo. E. Wissler, and Leslie Witherspoon.

The entertainment committee, under the direction of the board of directors, provides for the entertainment of members of the club and its visitors and prepares for all meetings of the club suitable programs, which are constitutionally restricted principally to addresses on economic and political topics. It is probable that during the period 1886-1908 no other club in America has entertained more really great men than has the Marquette. The ablest orators, American and foreign, have brought to it their best offerings. Its members are proud of the fact that no other club in the West is able to secure more desirable speakers than can be induced to appear before the Marquette. The club is always ready to champion any movement which promises the enhancement of the public good. It is its settled policy to afford opportunity to each member who wants actively to participate in the administration of its affairs or in its work in any specific field.

The Marquette's clubhouse, at 365 Dearborn avenue, is large, well appointed and well adapted to its purpose and has come to be popularly regarded one of the most conspicuous of the landmarks of the North Side division of Chicago.

The history of Chicago's seal has been traced back to 1833, when the present city was still a town. The design of the seal was a primitive yet faithful copy of the obverse side of the half-eagle gold coin of the United States. Col. T. J. V. Owen has been credited with being the author of this, the first authentic signature of the town's existence. Upon the incorporation of Chicago as a city in 1837, among the first questions to come before the Common Council was that of a municipal seal, some of the city fathers seemingly favoring the retention of the old town seal, while others, among whom were Mayor Ogden and Alderman Goodhue, argued in behalf of the adoption of an entirely new seal, symbolic of the newly created city's present and future. A committee composed of the mayor and Aldermen Goodhue and Pearsons were appointed to draft a new seal. The committee reported as follows: "The shield of Chicago shall be represented by a shield (American) with a sheaf of wheat on its center; a ship in full sail on the right; a sleeping infant on top; an Indian with bow and arrow on the left; and with the motto 'Urbs In Horto,' at the bottom of shield, with the inscription, 'City of Chicago—Incorporated 4th of March, 1837,' around the outside edge of said seal." Amendments to the above ordinance were made in June, 1854, and February, 1893, the first amendment specifying that "over the shield an infant reposes on a seashell," and the latter amplifying this description by decreeing a "sleeping infant on top, lying on its back on a shell."

As a result of the fact that no faithful reproduction of the seal authorized by ordinance was in use in the city's departments, a new and corrected design and description of the municipal seal was provided for by ordinance of March 20, 1905, having for its chief recommendation heraldic and historic accuracy. This is the seal of the present Chicago and is described in the ordinance as follows: "The seal provided and authorized for the city of Chicago shall be an obverse side with a diameter of two and three-eighths inches, the impression of which is a representation of a shield (American) gules, argent, and azure (in red, white and blue); with a sheaf of wheat in fess point (center), or in gold; a ship in full sail on dexter (right side supporter) proper; on top a sleeping infant proper, reposed as in a shell argent (in silver); an Indian chief with a bow and arrow, proper, on sinister (as left side supporter) standing on a promontory, vert (in green); with the motto 'Urbs in Horto,' or, on scroll, gules (in gold on a red flowing ribbon) at bottom of the shield; with the inscription, 'City of Chicago; Incorporated 4th March, 1837,' or in gold, within an azure (blue) ring around the outer edge of said seal, which seal represented as aforesaid and used with or without colors, shall be and is hereby corrected, established, declared to have been, and now to be, the seal of the city of Chicago. For general use, the plain impression in white containing the figures as given above shall be sufficient." The symbolic meaning of the new and corrected seal is rendered thus: The shield represents the national spirit of Chicago. The Indian, representing the discoverer of the site of Chicago, is also indicative of the aboriginal contribution which enters into its history. The ship in full sail is emblematic of the approach of the white man's civilization and commerce. The sheaf of wheat is typical of activity and plenty, holding the same meaning as the cornucopia. The nude babe in the shell is the ancient and classical symbolism of the pearl, and Chicago situated at the neck of the lake signifies that it shall be "the gem of the lakes." The infant, represented in repose, has the additional meaning of contentment, peace and purity. The motto "Urbs in Horto" means "City in a Garden." The date, "March 4th, 1837," names the date of the incorporation of the city. (This is a modification of the description prepared by Dr. B. J. Cigrand.)

Hamilton Club.—This club was organized April 9, 1890, the twenty-fifth anniversary of Lee's surrender to Grant. Its purpose is the advancement of political science, the promotion of good government and the development of patriotism. Its membership is composed exclusively of pronounced Republicans who believe in and are willing to work for Civil Service reform. The officers for 1890 were Robert McMurdy, president; M. Lester Coffeen, first vice-president; Frank I. Moulton, second vice-president; Herbert C. Metcalf (resigned), third vice-president; Robert Mather, secretary; Ralph Metcalf, treasurer; John C. Everett, chairman of political action committee. Directors: Frank H. Barry, Frank Compton, Joseph Defrees, John C. Everett, John E. Goold, Frank A. Helmer, George W. Underwood, Frank H. Valette, Henry H. Windsor and John L. Woods.

"The Hamilton" has had a steady growth and has led many citizens of Chicago, including quite a number of young men, to take the Republican view of public affairs and in measures designed to promote good government. It has watched men charged with the conduct of local government and has sought to raise the administration of municipal politics above the level of mere partisanship.

While distinctively Republican in its aims and organization, the club inculcates high ideals of citizenship, featuring addresses not limited to partisan views and seeking, through discussion, to encourage independence of thought. Its influence has been felt most forcibly in presidential campaigns. It organized a corps of speakers who addressed more than a hundred working men's meetings on the financial issues of the campaign of 1896. In 1900 its bureau of 250 speakers held six noon meetings every weekday during the campaign—three in the down town districts and three in the factory districts.

Thus the gospel of Republicanism was carried to thousands of working men during their midday hour. Systematic attention was given by the club to first voters. The stereopticon was also brought into use for the dissemination of Republican ideas among men on the street in the evenings. During such campaigns the club conducted large men meetings. A notable one was that of October 20, 1894, when Hon. Thomas B. Reed addressed 17,000 people at the First Regiment armory and at an overflow meeting held near by. Among the large mass meetings promoted by the club in the campaign of 1900 were the great Roosevelt meeting at the Coliseum, with an overflow meeting at the armory just mentioned; the Auditorium meeting addressed by Luther Laflin Mills, and another Auditorium meeting at which John Maynard Harlan was the speaker.

This club was largely instrumental in securing the passage of the local Civil Service law, and its members advocated its adoption by the voters of Chicago, which was accomplished through the municipal election held in April, 1895. A standing committee of the club reports infractions of this law and recommendations as to its enforcement. The club is entitled to the credit for the passage of the law of 1895 changing the compensation of members of that General Assembly of Illinois from $5 a day to $1,000 for the session. It was believed this change would tend to shorten the sessions of the Legislature and improve the personnel of its membership.

A noteworthy feature of the history of the Hamilton club has been its banquets, the first of which was held in 1891. They have been among the great political banquets of the country, and the addresses delivered to the assembled guests have been substantial contributions to current political literature. Many speakers from the South have been chosen, it having been the aim to have that section represented at each banquet. The growing feeling of brotherhood between North and South was the theme at the banquet on the occasion of the club anniversary in 1899. The Hamilton club has repeatedly entertained leading men of the nation. President Roosevelt has been the guest of honor on several occasions. President-Elect Taft was entertained on his return from the Philippines in April, 1904, and has been present at several subsequent events, notably in 1908, when he and Mr. Bryan addressed the same audience on the politics of the time. It entertained Admiral Schley, January 25, 1902. Right Honorable James Bryce, ambassador of Great Britain to the United States, was its guest in June, 1908. The vice-president, several cabinet officers and governors, numerous senators and many congressmen, as well as men prominent in other departments, have frequently spoken before it.

The club is endeavoring to make a complete collection of Hamiltoniana. It possesses the famous limited edition of Hamilton's works, edited by Senator Lodge, numerous biographies, the prize orations delivered for a generation at Hamilton college, Hamilton's autograph and all notable portraits of him, including a print of the famous portrait now in the New York Chamber of Commerce, presented to the club by the late John Jay Knox.

This club took possession of premises at 21 Groveland park, September 16, 1890; removed to 3014 Lake Park avenue May 1, 1895; to 114 Madison street March 14, 1898; and to its present quarters May 19, 1902. It occupies the building at the northwest corner of Clark and Monroe streets, which is practically the center of the loop district. It leases the ground but owns the building and all that it contains, a property valued at $80,000. The building is five stories in height; it has all modern facilities and the requisite equipment for club purposes. The club has absolutely no bonded indebtedness. It maintains a sinking fund and expects within a comparatively short time to accumulate an amount sufficient to justify the erection of a new clubhouse. During the first eight years of its existence it was confined in its active membership to the South Side and its field of operations was restricted as indicated, but in 1898, in deference to the prevailing sentiment of its members, it secured a location in the heart of the city, with all the facilities of a modern metropolitan club. Its territorial scope being thus widened, its membership at once trebled. The following named were its officers and directors January, 1909: President, Marquis Eaton; first vice-president, George W. Dixon; second vice-president, John H. Batten; secretary, Henry C. Morris; treasurer, W. S. Bruckner; directors, Harlan W. Cooley, Augustus D. Curtis, Henry R. Corbett, Fred A. Fielder, W. A. Leonard, Foster S. Nims, M. B. Orde, F. L. Rossbach, M. O. Slocum and William E. Wright.

The club publishes monthly The Hamiltonian, a journal devoted to Republican principles and the news of the organization. In its editorial policy it is fully in accord with the aspirations of all true Hamiltonians. By non-resident members and resident members temporarily absent from Chicago it is welcomed as a means of keeping in touch with the inner life of the club.

MUNICIPAL, JUVENILE AND OTHER COURTS

APPPOINTED under a resolution of the General Assembly to revise the Law Practice code, the State Practice commission recommended in October, 1900, the following changes: To provide power in the County court to order a special docket of cases from justice courts; to make the laws concerning publication harmonize; to empower the County court to assess costs against objectors in tax cases as in other cases; to provide that, upon motion, usually supported by affidavit, the court might order oral testimony to be produced; to provide for medical examination of the plaintiff in personal injury cases; to require a bond to pay damages upon the appointment of a temporary receiver; to repeal the provision that the jury should be the judge of law in criminal cases; to substitute an affidavit of merits concerning the nature of the defense; to provide how judgments should be reversed; to institute certain reforms in regard to the habeas corpus; to extend the jurisdiction of the Probate and County courts; to provide how judgments against partnerships might be entered; to define the nature and responsibility of joint obligations; to define the duties of appraisers of personal estates; to specify how inquests in lunacy should be conducted; to define the privileges and liabilities of debtors under certain conditions; to provide that large cities should be given the power of assigning justices of the peace to the duties of police magistrates; to punish the practicing of law without a license; to fix the costs in justice courts, etc.

In the Legislature of 1899-1900 the Civic Federation caused to be introduced a bill providing for the division of Chicago into districts having one or more judges with practically the same powers as justices of the peace. It was proposed that such judges, instead of being named by the Circuit and Superior court judges under appointment by the governor and confirmed by the Senate, be elected by the people and be paid an annual salary of $4,000 each.

It was Judge Gary's opinion in 1898, while he admitted that many faults existed in the justice system of Chicago, that the imperfections were not due to the fact that the justices were named by the judges, but because fees and not salaries were paid them. So long as they drew fees they would do nothing to curtail court cases and operations. If in any suit the odds were even, they would decide for the plaintiff, their customer. Every justice directly or indirectly solicited business in order to increase his compensation. One of the faults of the system in Chicago was that the judges who made the justice appointments could not know in all cases the qualifications and character of the men they appointed. It was thought that a salary to each justice instead of fees might in a large measure remove the objections.

The Legislature in 1899 passed a joint resolution creating the Practice commission. The design was to effect needed changes in the practice and procedure of the courts. During the year about 400 such changes were suggested, of which over 100 concerned the practice in justice courts. This seemed to indicate that there was something inherently wrong in the latter. There were at this time in the city twenty-four acting justices and in the county outside of the city 116 additional justices. In the North, South and West towns 57,979 cases were commenced in 1898. During the same period 18,697 cases were commenced in the Superior and Circuit courts. Thus, four times as many cases were commenced in the Justice courts as in the Superior and Circuit courts. The intention of previous Legislatures had undoubtedly been good. By enactment they had provided that all justices of the city of Chicago should be appointed by the governor, with the consent of the Senate and upon recommendations only of the judges of the Circuit, Superior and County courts. This seemed to make ample provision for the best men possible, but such law had been passed about thirty years before. The city had outgrown such regulations, and a new order of procedure was needed. The fee system, it was asserted, should be substituted for the salary system. The degree to which the fee system had carried unjustifiable actions was pointed out as one of the consequences of the system. No justice, it was claimed, should be allowed to originate his own business. The fee system put a premium upon the number of actions commenced, and hence all justices sought vigorously to secure as many cases as possible. It was demanded that justices appointed as police magistrates should be required to devote their whole attention to criminal cases and that all persons except licensed attorneys should be prohibited from practicing in the courts. The abused right of an officer to arrest a violator of the law, it was claimed, made alteration and improvement of the system necessary. Under the existing practice a suitor who received an intimation of an adverse decision was in the habit of dismissing his case before trial. It was declared that the law should be so amended that he should not have a right to dismiss his case after a hearing had been commenced. Where a litigant thus received intimation of an adverse decision he dropped his case before that justice and commenced action before some other justice, and so continued until he received intimation that his case would be decided in his favor. Another serious objection to the practice was the right of a litigant to bring suit before any justice in the county. It meant great hardship upon men who were cited to appear through revengeful motives in distant parts of the county.

The extraordinary number of suits against the city for personal injuries declared to have been occasioned by defective wooden sidewalks was cause for serious consideration during the summer and fall of 1900. By about the middle of September there were pending against the city such suits to the amount of about $30,000,000. At the same time there were outstanding against the city judgments to the amount of about $2,000,000. During the previous year 400 of such cases were disposed of at a cost to the city of over $350,000. On January 1, 1900, about 1,400 of such cases were pending as against about 650 on January 1, 1897. About 85 per cent of the suits were of the personal injury class. Here then was a field for vast reform and improvement. It was an extraordinary state of affairs. It showed an utter lack of suitable precaution made systematically and concertedly to protect the city's interest. The enormous expense of the legal machinery was largely thrown away. Upon investigation it appeared that during the past dozen years cases of this character by the hundreds had been commenced because shyster lawyers knew that judgments could be obtained owing to the weakness of the defense put up by the city. In numerous instances judgments by default had been taken against the city without a fight on legal and systematic grounds having been made. The public and the press demanded the establishment at once of an efficient city legal department that could meet and fight successfully all unjust claims of this character against the municipality.

In the fall of 1900 the extortion practiced by constables throughout Cook county was cause for urgent demand for reform. It was another fault of the justice courts. As much of the litigation in justice courts was begun solely for the purpose of securing fees, it followed as a natural consequence that constables themselves and other tipstaves would push their interests as far in the same direction as possible. Accordingly there had grown up a shameful system of extortion and blackmail that was largely unknown to the masses of the people. The press at this date somewhat in detail called attention to these various abuses and argued that the system should either be corrected or abandoned. The best critics, among whom was Judge Carter, expressed the opinion that the proper remedy was the abolition of the fee system. As a matter of fact the justice courts had become the most objectionable and corrupt feature of the city government. Judge Carter himself called the whole justice court system a legalized band of hold-up men.

The looseness of judicial procedure in other courts of Chicago and Cook county was revealed in September, 1900, when Judge Hanecy released a convicted murderer upon habeas corpus because of the omission of certain words in the mittimus. It was shown at the same time that during the last preceding four years no less than thirty criminals had thus been released on similar technical grounds.

There was no doubt of the guilt of these men. The objections arose owing to their release upon some purely trifling matter. Reform in this particular was demanded by the public press.

Late in November, 1900, an important ordinance was passed by the City Council. It provided for a bill abolishing Justice courts and substituting District courts of record and for its reference to the appropriate State Legislative committee. This was the first definite action taken which culminated in the establishment of the present Municipal courts of Chicago. The bill was introduced in the City Council by F. K. Blake. It divided the city into districts wherein should be established Courts of Record to take the place of and supplant the Justice courts. But the Justice courts were not so easily abandoned. Numerous methods to improve them or supplant them with something better were made previous to 1905.

In the meantime several important changes in the practice of the Circuit and Superior courts were suggested. However, all felt that contemplated changes in the Justice courts would work important improvements in all the other courts, and in the end they did. The introduction of the Juvenile courts to try offenders of tender years produced results so satisfactory that other improvements were demanded from time to time.

The first effective impulse given to the organization of the Municipal court of Chicago was at a date just previous to the adoption by the people of the constitutional amendment of 1904 which now constitutes Section 34 of Article 6. The Chicago New Charter convention had considered many proposed amendments affecting the interests of Chicago and Cook county. Through its executive committee the convention determined to draft a bill to be introduced in the General Assembly for the creation of Municipal courts in this city. This executive committee consisted of John P. Wilson, John S. Miller, Murray F. Tuley, Carter H. Harrison, Bernard E. Sunny and Bernard A. Eckhart, with John P. Wilson as chairman. This committee employed Hiram T. Gilbert as an assistant and began active work about December 10, 1904, all members of the committee participating. On or about January 20, 1905, after many conferences and after mature deliberation, the committee agreed upon a bill to be entitled, "An Act in relation to Municipal courts in the city of Chicago."

This bill provided for one Municipal court designated the Common Pleas court and five additional Municipal courts designated City courts. The former was given jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases and proceedings except those generally in equity, but also of special equity cases, and the latter were given jurisdiction of cases over which justices of the peace had jurisdiction where the amounts did not exceed $500, and also of all other suits at law for the recovery of money only when the amount claimed did not exceed $500. On January 24, 1905, this bill was introduced in the Senate and became known as Senate Bill No. 45 and was introduced in the House as House Bill No. 98. Immediately the character and purport of the bill evoked great interest among the members of the Legislature. Its provisions were studied and discussed in detail and there was developed strong opposition to its passage. This led to the selection by the Chicago bar of sixty-eight members, together with four Cook county judges specially chosen, whose duty was to study, amend, elaborate, prepare and introduce a new bill that should meet all requirements thus far developed. The result was an amended bill entitled, "A Bill for an Act in relation to a Municipal court in the city of Chicago." This was known as House Bill No. 27. It dropped from consideration the contemplated Common Pleas court and limited the jurisdiction of the Municipal court to all those suits and proceedings, whether civil or criminal, of which justices of the peace were given jurisdiction by law when the amount involved did not exceed $500, and of all criminal actions where the fine did not exceed $200 or where the imprisonment did not exceed one year, or both such fine and imprisonment. The courts under this bill were to be called City courts. Its provisions were radically different from those of the original bill, as they prescribed that appeals should lie from its decisions to the Circuit, Superior, Criminal and County courts. The appeal cases were to be tried de novo as required under appeals from justices of the peace.

On February 21 there was introduced in the Senate what became known as Senate Bill No. 207, entitled "A Bill for an Act in relation to Municipal courts in the city of Chicago." This bill likewise omitted the Common Pleas court and provided only for Municipal courts with the same jurisdiction as was to be conferred upon the City courts as in Bills 45 and 98. At first the salary of the chief justice was fixed at $4,500 a year and of the associate judges at $4,000. The term of office was set at four years and the election of judges was fixed for the first Tuesday of April, 1904, and every four years thereafter. The bill also made the office of clerk and bailiff elective and named their salary $4,000 per annum. The House committee to whom was referred House Bill No. 98, after long deliberation, reported a committee bill entitled, "A Bill for an Act in relation to Municipal courts in the city of Chicago." This bill limited the original criminal jurisdiction of the Common Pleas court to misdemeanors. It omitted the article for a grand jury and made radical changes in the practice provisions. It provided that the judges should be elected on the first Tuesday of April, 1906, the chief justice for six years and the associate judges, one-third for two years, one-third for four years and one-third for six years, and further provided that an election for eight associate judges should be held every two years and for a chief justice every six years. This bill was known as House Bill No. 422. In the Senate the provision for a Common Pleas court met with opposition and for a time progress was deadlocked. To reconcile the differences Hiram T. Gilbert was engaged to prepare the draft of a new bill that should do away wholly with the Common Pleas court. The draft thus prepared was in the main the bill finally adopted. The design of the Senate committee was to frame a bill that should preserve the practice provisions of House Bill No. 422, though different in phraseology and form. To prevent overcrowding of the court, actions for ejectment, injuries to persons and qui tam proceedings involving over $1,000 were omitted from the bill. The classes of cases which were to be tried without pleadings were enlarged so as to include all actions at law that did not exceed $1,000. House Bill No. 422 was amended in the Senate to correspond with the Gilbert bill. The House refused to concur in the Senate amendments, whereupon a joint conference committee, after making some changes in the Senate amendments, reported a bill that was adopted. During the entire period of these proceedings the members of the General Assembly gave protracted, intense and elaborate consideration of the new measure. It was supported in the House by Representatives Pendarvis, Church, Daugherty, Lindley, McGoorty, McKinley, McSurely, and Williams, and in the Senate by Senators Hass, Berry, Campbell, Galpin, Gardner, Humphrey and Maher. The final passage of the bill was credited to the energy, ability and determination of these gentlemen. This law was approved May 18, 1905, and went into effect as soon as assented to by a majority of the legal voters of Chicago at an election held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, 1905.

The amendment of the Constitution known as Section 34, Article 6, adopted in 1904, provided for the creation of Municipal courts to take the place of those held by justices of the peace and police magistrates, and empowered to perform other judicial work specified and necessary. Instead of creating independent Municipal courts, the General Assembly, at its discretion, created branch Municipal courts all under one head entitled, "The Municipal Court," just as each branch of the Circuit or Superior court is a distinct unit.

The jurisdiction of the Municipal court, briefly stated, was classified under five varieties of action: First, when the amount claimed exceeded $1,000, and when actions for the recovery of personal property or for the recovery of certain damages exceeded $1,000; second, all suits, whether civil or criminal, at law or in equity, tried under change of venue from other courts of the county; third, all criminal cases in which the punishment is by fine, or by imprisonment otherwise than in the penitentiary; fourth, all suits and proceedings of which justices of the peace had jurisdiction by law when the amount involved did not exceed $1,000, with some exceptions and limitations; fifth, all other suits at law and for the recovery of money only when the amount claimed did not exceed $1,000.

At first the city was divided into five Municipal court districts, in each of which was located a civil and a criminal branch. This division proved unsatisfactory, and on June 10, 1907, under the Municipal court act, the judges entered an order abolishing the Third, Fourth and Fifth districts and rearranging the boundary lines of the First and Second districts so as to include the whole city. This order was approved by the council June 17, 1907, and became effective July 15, 1907. The First district comprised practically all that part of the city north of Seventy-first street and west of Lake Michigan and south of Seventy-first street and west of Cottage Grove avenue. The Second district comprised South Chicago. Thus the First district was made to embrace almost the whole of the present Chicago.

Full provisions for pleadings, for the dispatch of business and for the accommodation of poor suitors were made and were changed and improved from time to time as needed under the order of the court. The Municipal court was made to consist of twenty-eight judges, one of whom should be chief justice and the other twenty-seven associate judges. Each branch court was presided over by a single judge of the Municipal court.

The duties of the chief justice were as follows: To provide for holding as many branch courts in each district as was necessary for the proper dispatch of business; to exercise general superintendence over the business of the court; to preside at the meetings of the judges; to assign the associate judges to duties at branch courts; to receive their monthly reports and to determine the times of their vacations; to superintend the preparation of the calendars and determine the order in which cases should be tried; to determine the number of petit jurors to be summoned and to cause them to be questioned as to their qualifications; to prescribe forms of praecipes, summonses, entries of appearances, affidavits, bonds, attachment writs, replevin writs, petitions for change of venue, bills of particulars and all other papers necessary for the use of parties to suits.

The Municipal courts were required to be kept open for business every day of the year except Sundays and legal holidays; all suits were to be treated as emergency cases; vacations of judges were to be so arranged as not to interfere with the dispatch of business.

The associate judges possessed the following powers: To receive and investigate all complaints concerning the court and the officers; to determine the number of deputy clerks and deputy bailiffs and to fix their salaries; to remove deputy clerks and deputy bailiffs; to institute such special rules and regulations as should seem expedient. These powers were more elaborate and extensive than those possessed by judges of the Circuit and Superior courts. It was provided that no person should be eligible to the office of chief justice or associate judge unless he was thirty years of age, a citizen of the United States, and should have resided in Cook county in the practice of law for five years next preceding his election. Provision for an increase in the number of judges was made. The judges of the Municipal courts could interchange duties with judges of other city courts. The clerk of the Municipal court was made an important official personage. His duties were wide, important, and authoritative restrictions over him were made sufficient. Full provision for all deputies, assistants, etc., was made. Aside from his salary no officer of the court was permitted to receive any compensation whatever.

The substitution of Municipal courts for Justice courts was such a radical change that the General Assembly and its advisers prepared a flexible code of practice so that faults which could not be foreseen could be corrected as fast as disclosed. To prevent serious blunder in the procedure, the rules generally prevailing in the Circuit court were adopted, as it was believed dangerous to attempt at the outset to put in operation a new set. Ample power to make changes in the rules was given to the court officials. Full provision was made for every step necessary in the management of suits from the first paper until the settlement of the cases under judgment or otherwise. Scores of rules, regulations, practices, orders, etc., which need not be detailed here were adopted.

At the time the Municipal court act went into effect the Circuit court of Cook county consisted of fourteen judges and the Superior court of twelve judges. Each of these courts had a chief justice selected for one year by the judges themselves from their own number. Each judge was entirely independent of every other judge and had power to adopt and enforce in the branch over which he presided such rules of practice not inconsistent with law as he might deem proper, regardless of the rules which might be adopted and enforced in other branches of the court. Though one judge might declare a statute or municipal ordinance constitutional or valid, another judge might declare it unconstitutional or invalid. One judge might pronounce a judgment of conviction in a criminal case, which another judge, upon application for a writ of habeas corpus, might declare invalid and might discharge the party convicted. Many other practices apparently inconsistent and cumbersome were carried out by the Circuit and Superior courts. As a whole the system was grievously unsatisfactory in its results. The cost to the taxpayer was out of proportion to the benefits. The Municipal court act sought to eliminate from the system such defects and incongruities in the Circuit, Superior and Criminal court systems by providing a chief justice with extensive powers of superintendence and by conferring upon the judges as a whole large discretionary authority.

Many changes have been made in the rules, management, procedure and province of the court since it began operations. During its first year there were instituted in the First district seventeen branch civil courts located at 148 Michigan avenue. In these seventeen civil branches nine judges heard jury cases and eight judges heard cases without juries. There were thirteen criminal branches throughout the district. In the Second district there was one branch court located at 8855 Exchange avenue, South Chicago, for civil and criminal business. In the new city hall, quarters for the civil branches of the court were designed. It was planned to give the court twenty-four court rooms in this building, besides special offices for the chief justice, clerk, bailiff and jurors. Provision for additional rooms for the Criminal courts was made. During the first year there was a noticeable decrease not only in the number of cases filed for suit, but in the commission of crime. The new court from the start established a reputation for efficiency and certainty of punishment which economized court expenses and deterred offenders from the commission of vice and crime. Not only was there an immense decrease in the number of arrests for felonies, misdemeanors and violation of city ordinances, but there was a substantial increase in the number of persons sent to jail and to the House of Correction. This improvement in court and criminal statistics during the year was attributed to the following accomplishments: Speedy trials; strict bail regulations; House of Correction rather than jail sentence; care not to interfere with the administration of justice in the courts and the consequent encouragement of the police officer to do his duty; imposing a heavy penalty for carrying concealed weapons.

The Municipal court was really a reform movement forced upon the people by the faults and imperfections of the Justice system and by the necessity for honest procedure and expedition. Great latitude to improve itself was given the court. Accordingly many amendments, changes, improvements and advances have been made as time has revealed their character, importance and necessity.

In 1907 the probation system was given special consideration. Prior to 1900 the practice of placing offenders against the criminal laws upon probation had received no recognition throughout the country except in one or two states. By October, 1907, the statutes of twenty-four states authorized probation for juvenile offenders, the statutes of nine states authorized probation for adult offenders, and the statutes of seven states authorized probation for adult delinquency. About this time Judge Tuthill of the Juvenile court of Chicago said, "The probation officer is the keystone which supports the arch of the law." At first, probation was inaugurated in Chicago under volunteer officers exclusively, but a little later paid probation officers were employed.

At the end of the second year of the Municipal court, December 6, 1908, the following results of the year's work were shown: A steady increase in litigation; an increase of 32 per cent in civil litigation; an increase of over 10 per cent in criminal and quasi-criminal litigation; an increase of 117 per cent in the amount of money judgments; a marked increase in efficiency in disposing of litigation, both criminal and civil; a continued decrease in crime since the institution of the court; a decrease in the number of arrests over those of 1906; a decrease in the number of alleged offenders over those of 1906; a decrease in the fines assessed against offenders; a large release in the amount of fines by the pardon of offenders; an increase of 23 per cent in the number of offenders punished by House of Correction and jail sentences; the discharge of over 55 per cent of criminal and quasi-criminal cases and preliminary hearings; relieved the Circuit, Superior and County courts of over 35 per cent of their civil litigation since the institution of the Municipal court; the commencement by poor persons, who were unable to pay the costs, of 432 cases, of which number 121 subsequently paid the costs; nearly 82 per cent of writs placed in the hands of the bailiffs were served; 31 per cent of the cases appealed to the Appellate court in 1907 were reversed; of the total number of cases disposed of in 1907 the percentage of reversals was about one-tenth of 1 per cent; the receipts of the court increased 8 per cent and the expenditures increased 14 per cent.

During 1908 there were in operation in the First district eighteen branch civil courts, all located at 148 Michigan avenue, known as the Central Civil Court building. In these eleven judges heard jury cases and seven judges heard cases without juries. There were thirteen criminal branches in the First district presided over by ten judges. The thirteen criminal branches were located as follows: Criminal Court building, two branches; Harrison and La Salle streets, two branches; 20 South Desplaines street; Morgan and Maxwell streets; 5233 Lake avenue; 235 West Chicago avenue; Shakespeare and California avenue; 242 East Chicago avenue; Sheffield avenue and Diversey boulevard; 6347 Wentworth avenue; 834 Thirty-fifth street. The Second district branch court disposed of both civil and criminal business and remained located at 8855 Exchange avenue, South Chicago. During the year several important changes and improvements were instituted and numerous amendments were suggested.

An important piece of legislation reported during 1908 was the Limited Adult Probation bill. This was favored by the Illinois State Conference of Charities, the Civic Federation of Chicago, the City Association, the Legislative Voters' League and the press generally of the city. A bill to legalize probation proceedings already instituted in Chicago and to provide for future action passed the Legislature early in 1909.

In March, 1909, representatives of the Chicago Municipal court introduced or had introduced in the Legislature a bill confirming and controlling the parole system practiced under the Chicago Municipal court. This bill was introduced to prevent alleged abuses of the system by members of the court who should take liberties similar to those lately practiced by Judge Cleland.

During the few years just previous to 1909 there was a growing and prevalent belief that the jury system should either be vastly improved or should be abolished entirely. The increasing difficulty of obtaining good jurors was acknowledged. The jury commissioners of Cook county stated that obtaining good jurors was like fishing in Lake Michigan—very uncertain, as the more there were taken out made it so much more difficult to catch those that were left and smaller ones would have to be taken. The commissioners themselves believed that the average of jury excellence was decreasing. They noted that the laws and regulations concerning the selection of jurors hampered and prevented in a large measure the procurement of satisfactory panels.

Late in 1908 the Appellate court in a number of reverses nullified in a large degree the usefulness of the Municipal court as an agency of quick justice; but the Supreme court handed down a decision soon afterward giving it all the power and jurisdiction that were intended by the framers of the law. A particular question involved was the right of city judges to try cases on information when the punishment was to be anything but a penitentiary sentence. The Supreme court decision restored to the Municipal court its original jurisdiction and power. During the last two years numerous attempts to render the Municipal court non-partisan have been made, but without effective results. The old parties continue to name partisan tickets and to place the selection of these important officials under the control, dictation and corruption of bosses and machines.
